the reader enquire after him in any place where he hath lived, and I believe that an especial token that he will be remembered by, will be some vile prank that he hath played; and the truth is, that when this Sanders appeared at Box-church-house where his father lived, we of the neighbourhood conjectured, either that he had done some prank elsewhere, and was come thither to, shelter himself, or that he was come thither to do some good prank; in order whereunto it was observed that he was much accustomed to night-walking, as he pretended to go a fishing, and such was their credit, if any thing were lost, sheep or the like, and search to be made, the house which the officers did usually begin with was the Church-house, where this Sanders's father lived and harboured him.

Sect. 24. Yet with a prank or two of his being of latter days, being notoriously known and infamous, I shall here acquaint thee with. Sometime in the year 1654, I think it was about the 15th or 16th of September, this Sanders being at an alehouse in Pickwick in the Parish of Corsham, in the company of one Thomas Stockman of Bathford, he falls there to abuse him so far forth, as that he forced him to pay a reckoning for beer, &c. which Sanders had spent before Stockman came in, and afterwards following the poor man, going homeward, it being night, in a lane about half a mile from the house where they had drank, this Sanders overtakes him, knocks him down, robs and wounds him so grievously, that he lay sometime under the hands of a charitable person for his recovery: Insomuch that complaint was made to a Justice of Peace, who grants forth his warrant, yet to be shewn, against Sanders: but, I know not the cause of it, this warrant was never served upon him, so that he stands guilty of this assault and robbery, even to this hour. Thus much hath Thomas Stockman formerly affirmed, although at this time he would neither be deposed of it, nor prosecute Sanders for it; for since the time that he was robbed, and this July 1, this Thomas Stockman is fallen off to the Quakers; and therefore conceives oaths and prosecutions to be against his principles. And all this would have been testified to the Commissioners, if they would have given my witnesses leave to speak. I shall trouble thee with one passage more: I having some discourse since with a man of Corsham (one whom the Doctor knows, and pretends to respect much) touching this business, and having told him that Sanders was an especial witness against me; the man by way of wonder speaks to this purpose: Why they would not take the testimony of such a rogue as Sanders, I think, would they? and then tells me a story that Sanders on a time coming to his house, sits him down by the fire, where the man, having some occasion to go into another place, left him sitting, but at his return, which it seems was sooner than Sanders expected, he finds this Sanders with his feet standing on the fire, and his head and his hands up in the chimney stealing bacon that hanged there. Nay, even at this time; his oath, and behaviour were such, that it bred astonishment even in those that countenanced him. Inso-much that John Travers sitting by, and hearing his Deposition, was overheard to say to this purpose; There is a rogue to swear, I could not keep him sober a day together, but that he would be drunk every day.

Sect. 25. And indeed the Commissioners might soon have perceived the truth, and credit of this man, if they would have noted, or been informed touching words by him then spoken, he being then upon oath: and those were touching his fidelity to the State, and his service done to the State: and the wounds (as he reported yet to be seen) which he had received in the state-service. Whereas it would have been proved, if they would have heard my witnesses, That he received those wounds when he was in arms against the State, and under the command of captain Thinn: and it is like enough that he had there continued still, had he not feared that they would have hanged him for breaking open and robbing houses; and this fear it was, and not any good will which forced him over to the other party, there to secure himself: and as John Travers reported it, brought a good horse with him; to give them some assurance that he durst not go back again to that party from whence he fled; and, as Sanders then affirmed, he became a soldier under captain Travers, a fitting match; like captain, and like soldier.

Sect. 26. But may some say, That all this, however true, makes him no more than a thief or a robber of both God and man; or a plunderer, or a parricide, a profaner or a drunkard, or the like. But now this doth not wholly disenable his testimony; but could I make it appear that he had formerly foresworn himself, that then I had something to the purpose. To this I shall answer.

1. That by their instructions the Commissioners were to take the testimony of none but credible witnesses: and certainly it will appear by that which hath been already said, that Sanders to all uninterested men is nothing like it: we cannot prove it that those who bore false witness against Naboth, did ever bear false witness against any before: But this it was which rendered them suspicious, and with just Judges should have been cause enough to abhor them, because they were sons of Belial, wicked, mischievous, lawless men; men of so much known infamy, that they would not stick at any thing, which was put upon them, be it either to speak or to do, but in the general were ready for any wicked employment, and for the particular fitted themselves according to their occasions who employed them. Such who held a common shop for all comers, and would furnish their customers according to their likings. And here by these Commissioners leave, I shall tell them, that, there are other exceptions as well as former perjury; which with equal Judges, such who have the discretion to know, and the conscience to practise just things, may render some witnesses unworthy of credit. In that famous Trial of Faulconer's, ante, perjury in the case of the Lord Craven, we have several proofs brought in touching Faulconer's former behaviour and credit; and all taken, a piece of justice, which I could not obtain from these Commissioners, as that this Faulconer had been a blasphemous debauched man, a cozening and cheating fellow, and one that had been several times committed for suspicion of felony; and all for this purpose, to make it probable that he who formerly had, for nothing, or but a small matter of profit, committed such horrid crimes, would not for some greater matter stick to forswear himself.

Sect. 27. And now I shall add 2. That the Doctor and his Commissioners had a better opinion of Sanders, than Sanders had of himself; for Sanders was so far conscious to himself, that his guilty conscience did so far mis-give him, as to make him doubt that his former infamies had been so odious, as that they had been enough to disenable him to give in any thing in point of evidence, and to take off all his testimony in all places whatsoever. For thy further satisfaction in this particular, I shall now acquaint thee with the false pretences and lies wherewithal Sanders, or such as acted for him, got hands to that forementioned Certificate which Mr. Chambers so tenderly delivered in. After such time as Sanders had deposed against me, helike foreseeing that I should recriminate, he goes, or procures some to go to some of the Borough of Chippenham, and tell them to some such purpose, That he was to appear the next assize at Sarum as a witness in a trial: in order whereunto he desires their hands to a certificate touching his behaviour for half a year last past. Doubting, as it was informed, that otherwise his testimony would not be taken in regard of his former infamies, being both notorious and frequent. Such, as I have heard, was his relation; but I must tell thee that this relation was false in every particular. For.

1. Sanders dreads an assize or sessions as much or far more than he doth a Pest-house; nor can you fright him worse than to tell him that he must appear there.

2. This certificate pretended for the assize at Sarum (where Sanders did not appear, nor had he any business there) was delivered in three weeks before at Marlborough.

3. This certificate desired to enable him to take an oath, was framed and delivered in after the oath was taken. So that Sanders or his agents have herein notoriously falsified, and imposed upon his neighbours at Chippenham, as some of them (if I have not been mis-informed) have acknowledged: protesting against it, and complaining that he hath grossly abused them, in procuring their hands with a lying pretence, and afterward carrying them to such a place, and using them to such a purpose.

which was contrary both to his pretence and their intention. So that we have here that old piece of policy practice, 'Scelere velandum est scelus,' a former wickedness covered with a latter; false-swearing plaistered over with a lie; by lying he procures this certificate, that he might employ it to cover his former false oaths. Now I do not wonder that William Pinchin, Nicholas Spenser, William Sanders and Obadiah Cheltenham should contrive and practise such unworthy courses; my wonder is, that the Doctor should so demurely put to his helping hand for the promoting of them; say that he should be more forward than William Pinchin: and readier to call for it than William Pinchin was to deliver it in. But doubtless the Caln business did yet stick in the Doctor's stomach; there were a generation of men heretofore great pretenders to godliness, that were very touchy, and very implacable; and perchance before I make an end of this discourse, I shall make some observes to the Doctor of the Agagite in the Old Testament, and the Scribes and Pharisees in the New.

Sect. 28. And now for a full answer to that question, But can you prove Sanders to be perjured before? I shall say that readily I cannot, perchance, nor none beside: and this is the reason of it, because it is believed that this was the first that ever he was admitted a witness upon oath against any; and it is like enough that therefore he forswore not himself before this time because that before this time he had no opportunity: the want of which we know hath restrained many a one from wickedness, which otherways they have had a mind unto. By his own acknowledgment he looks upon his credit as much crazed, otherwise he never would have importuned for this certificate. I think it be not usual for men to carry their certificates with them in such cases to any Assize.

Sect. 29. But the Commissioners (being belike pleased with his Deposition, because he had sworn as they would have him, and having in him found such a one as they had looked for of a long time) were by any means willing to preserve his reputation; in order whereunto the Doctor (as I have said) delivers in the certificate: Mr. Byfield, Mr. Bayly, Mr. Hunt, thwart with, interrupt and turn back my witnesses, that they might not inform how infamous Sanders had been. And Mr. Blisset (he loves to have something rare by himself) to rebate the edge of the Depositions of col. Eyre, Rainold Arlet, William Morley, and Michael Baily, says, that those offences were committed long ago, and that since he, that is, Sanders, might become a new man, or to some such purpose. But now I would fain know of Mr. Blisset, when this reformation began in William Sanders? or (if that question may seem to signify nothing) by what testimony in his life and conversation hath this Sanders evinced it, that there is any reformation at all wrought in him? As I remember, sir Water Raleigh rejects the book of Judith from being so much as Apocryphal, because he cannot find any time, age, or century wherein to place it. And I doubt me that Mr. Blisset would have as much to do to find out the time when William Sanders reformation began, or any thing that doth resemble it, unless he means that his oaths against me have merited so far as that his name doth now deserve to be put into red letters. And tell me Mr. Blisset, when did his reformation begin? Did it begin when he was before you at Caln? I have told you already, and had proved it (if they would have heard my witnesses) that he then forswore himself in your presence; affirming then upon oath, 'That he had received those wounds in the State's service, which he received in the king's;' or in a drunken fray at Chippenham; or did it commence as his certificate was delivered in at Marlborough? I have told you already by how many falsehoods and lies he obtained it; no signs of amendment these, no nor of change neither, unless the change be for the worse. Besides the man whose house he brake up and robbed at Swainwick hath since told me:

That he then took from him to the value of twenty marks, that he and his fare the worse for it to this hour.

Sanders in the mean time who hath robbed him, and spent, or worn out, or otherwise disposed of his goods, flouts it abroad, bears it high, and is so far from making this man any part of satisfaction, as that he comes not near him so much as to acknowledge that he hath done him any wrong. 'Anne sunt hæ vestes filii tui?' Do your reformadoes, your godly men go thus clad? are robberies, and lies, and perjuries proper arguments of a reformation, Mr. Blisset? Do grapes bear thorns, or figs thistles?

Sect. 30. And now Mr. Blisset must give me leave to reply upon him, and say, that if William Sanders were such a villain so long ago, and yet no amendment perceived in him, what an overwaxed and overgrown monster may he be by this time? To what an height of wickedness may he be mounted up unto, that was guilty of sacrilege when as he was not much above twenty? I remember that Medea in the Tragedy, meditating mischief and revenge, studies to do something which was answerable to her years; conceiving something more than ordinary to be proportionable now, because she had committed several strange wickednesses when she was but a girl. 'Hæc virgo feci' thus and thus I did, thus I murdered my brother, after this manner I deceived my father many a year ago, when I was but young: but, 'majora jam dicent scelera;' greater wickednesses may be expected now from me, now that I am at full growth, and am both a woman and a mother. Proportionably say I, this William Sanders might (beside many fair inducements from the Commissioners and suborners) encourage himself to some notable villany from this, that he had been so infamous so long ago; and might say to himself, that it is but a little more than what I have done already, that I am now about to do. I have already many a time, and often broke those commands, which enjoined me not to profane the Lord's day, not to dishonour my parents, not to kill, not to steal: and it is but a little more, if for 'once I break the next command likewise, that says I must not bear false witness, and swear falsely against a minister. And now that I have done with Mr. Blisset as touching Sanders; let me add something to Dr. Chambers, as with reference of the same person. I have told thee that at such time as (amongst other notorious infamies) we had proved Sanders to have fallen upon his own father, to have thrown him down, and beaten him, saying, that he would make an end of the old rogue; Mr. Chambers calls for a certificate, and promotes it in this Sanders his behalf. And this was the second time wherein he shewed himself very forward either to countenance or defend such who by the law of God had forfeited their lives. 1. In the behalf of William Pinchin; and here in the behalf of Sanders: making those crimes to be but small differences in the one, and no great matter in the other; which God's law looketh upon and punisheth as horrid, barbarous, and unnatural. And since the Doctor hath thus appeared in the behalf of such persons, he must give me leave to tell him a story. It is reported that when Caracalla had murdered his brother Geta in his mother's arms, he practised with Papinias at that time a famous lawyer, to defend or extenuate the fraticide before the Senate; of which foul murder the lawyer refuseth to undertake the patronage, giving this reason, That it was easier for a man to be a parricide than to defend it: and this with such resolution, as that it is said that he lost his life for his refusal. Now I question it, whether Dr. Chambers would in such a case have been so backward as this unbelieving lawyer was? I believe that he would not, my reason is this: he that shall (as the Doctor did) look upon a son's cozening, cursing, frequent beating of his parents, after a barbarous manner throwing them down, laying hands upon them, taking of them by the throat, drawing his knife upon them, calling them old rogue, and threatening to make an end of them, as only some small differences, or matters not much to be noted, or easily to be excused; may rationally be conceived to think it no great matter if he had actually murdered them. But the reader must remember, that in those days Parricides were very frequent, and in great credit; yea, and that then the Doctor, and his Commissioners, acted by a power which had murdered our king, the common father of us all, and many of their brethren beside. Yea and farther yet since that present government by which those horrid parricides were committed, was that which impowered these Commissioners and doctors to act, and that a strict enquiry was by them made, who were disaffected to it? and a severe punishment inflicted on those who were found disaffected to it; we may safely say, that even these men Commissioners and doctors did approve of those wickednesses which the other had committed; and by approving of them, confess themselves to be some of those parricides. The blessed Reformation being then so much improved, that the breach of the fifth commandment was accounted godliness, but the observation of it scandalous.

Sect. 31. William Sanders informs that Mr. Edward Long of the More, and Mr. Cannings were then and there with me at the same time. Now this is the third time that this Mr. Long's name hath been mentioned to his disrepute long after he was dead. Twice before by William Pinchin, and the third time by William Sanders; indeed I think I may safely say all these three times by William Pinchin, for that Sanders and Cottle were then at Caln, both catechised by William Pinchin before they swore; who (as I have been told) wrote down something which one of them never spake, and yet he hearing it, was (since William Pinchin had written it down) content that it should go so; so that we may guess that these swore not according to their knowledge, but according to their lesson: Obadiah Cheltenham, and I think John Travers, being at that time coadjutors with William Pinchin in the same business. This gentleman Mr. Long was then dead, and so could say nothing for himself or me: yet thus much I am confident will be testified by men yet living, who knew him well, that for four, nay five, nay six years before this Deposition was taken, it was even impossible for Mr. Long to be such as this Deposition represents him, a drinker to excess: as I have said, he was buried in Decemb, 1651, and for a long time before lay under a lingering and wasting consumption, which at last brought him to his grave: and this was so visible to his friends, that in case he had been inclined to intemperance, yet they would have withheld him even for his health's sake. It is like enough I might meet him at that house, and like enough it is that I might make some stay there with him; and if they ask me why, I shall tell the Commissioners and doctors that the occasions that drew me thither, were far more commendable, and my actings there far more clerk-like than theirs have been at several inns, at several places and times, for a longer time together than is mentioned in Sanders's Deposition. It is too well known, that there were at this time many unnatural differences betwixt this Mr. Long, his mother, and brother, which were heightened so far as to some suits of law: that these differences caused a great alienation of affections betwixt them, so great that (although but three) the same house would not hold them; for the composure of which strifes, there were many (and some persons of quality) that travailed much in it: and it was the pleasure of some of them to take me along with them, as one who was well known to all the disagreeing parties, and well thought of by them: in order to a composure I was sometime with one party, sometime with another, and sometime in one place, and sometime in another, and that for more hours together then are mentioned in the Deposition. And that this was the business which drew me to Rainald's house at this time, and occasioned me to stay so long there, and that I was not at all distempered with beer, would have been deposed by Mr. Canion mentioned in the Deposition, who was then and there all the time, and heard and saw all that had passed, but him (beside many other very material witnesses) they would not admit of.

Sect. 32. And I have now presented thee with all the Depositions against me as I received them under their clerk's hand: and I make no question but the reader (remembering how many Depositions I have charged them with which they never took, how many Depositions were taken but never entered, and how many Depositions were entered by halves) will take these for the greatest and worst which they had against me. To which, (beside what I have already observed) I shall offer to thy consideration some few things more. 1. Whereas there is mention made of my being at Bayly's and Rainald's alehouses, and of my drinking there, I shall tell thee, that I had both the women who keep these houses (being both very antient and their husbands dead) before the Commissioners, who were there sworn, but their Depositions in the clerks copy very much contracted, and are only in these words.

1. Sarah Rainalds who keeps the alehouse aforesaid says that Mr. Bushnell seldom came to her house but in parish business; nor hath he been there this half year, and the last time not to drink.

2. Elizabeth Bayly who kept the alehouse aforesaid, being sworn, saith, that Mr. Bushnell never came to her house (as she remembers) but upon parish business for making rates or the like: but saith, that he hath not been there this two years past.

This is every word which we have as deposed by them, when as it is well known that their Depositions were very much longer. I pass by that part of Sarah Rainald's Deposition, where she informs, that I was once there in company when the reckoning came to two shillings, and to Mr. Byfield, who asked how many there were of us; answers that there were about sixteen, and besides they had tobacco: which passage the clerk noted, although he did not take it, and to Mr. Byfield who somewhat scrupled the reckoning, says (looking up into Mr. Byfield's face) that there were sixteen, and that they had tobacco too.

Sect. 33. But now the question which I desired might be proposed to them both was this, Whether either of them saw me distempered with beer at any time, or drinking to excess in their houses? Which question was proposed to them both; and they both answered No. If there had been any such thing, that I had drunk hard with Mr. Long or any other, they must needs know it; and had they known it, I am confident that they would not have forsworn themselves to conceal it. I know not whether it were at this time against them, or at another time against Thomas Brewer, that Mr. Byfield took exceptions to this purpose!

That they were parties being alehouse-keepers, and therefore not likely to speak the truth, because it might prove penal to themselves for entertaining any too long, or letting them drink too much.

Now to see the disposition of that godly man; he would not believe that any swear truly, but such as swear as he would have them: To do a mischief. With him no witnesses were credible but desperate ones.

Nay, to see the abundant charity of that man! I presume that he conceived these women to have some understanding of an oath, otherwise he would not have admitted them to swear, and yet he sticks not to imply that they would perjure themselves to save their five shillings a piece. I had it not at that time in my head, but now let me mind them of one thing more, of which I have some confidence, and it is this. That had those women by virtue of those oaths which they had then taken, been demanded, whether they had never seen, William Pinchin drinking to excess in their houses? They must have answered that, although much against their wills, when they knew not how to be rid of him, he hath been drinking, and smoking, and quarrelling, and driveling, so long, that he hath made himself worse than a beast; yea and that, this would have been proved too, he hath there disgorged himself, I say not into his hat, but as seemly as one that uttered his mind, having overcharged himself with wine and quince pie.

Sect. 34. I had at this time, and before, several witnesses with me which I desired might be examined upon such queries as should have been proposed unto them, but a word of exception against them from William Pinchin the solicitor, and Mr. Byfield the advocate soon silenced or put them all by; and thus they served no less than four at this time, some whereof would have told pretty stories of William Pinchin, John Travers, Obadiah Cheltenham, William Cottle, William Sanders, yea perchance of the Doctor too, if they might have been heard; which doubtless William Pinchin foresaw, and therefore was so forward to stop their mouths; Mr. Byfield and the rest ever seconding him, having thus pretence for what they did, that what those who deposed against me was for the Commonwealth and present government, but that those who would have deposed for me, was against the Commonwealth, and against the present government.

Sect. 35. But amongst others, there appeared for me at this time Henry Sheyler before mentioned, whom William Pinchin stoutly opposed, alledging, that he was a drunkard, and that there had been two bastards laid to his charge. To which the other stoutly replies, that that charge might be false as well as true; but put him in mind of an attempt of a rape made by this William Pinchin upon a woman near Bristol, when they two were in arms in the king's army: and had he not been taken off, pretending this was nothing to the present business, he would have told the Commissioners such a story of their witness and solicitor William Pinchin, naming the time when, the place where, the manner how, together with other circumstances, so filthy, and much worse than beast-like, that I remember not that I have in any author, either sacred or profane, met with a story to match or parallel it, unless that Lam. 5. 14. come near it; but this was quashed, and Henry Shaylor permitted to proceed, which he did in these words:

That on Saturday on Whitson week last past, he went to enquire for William Cottle, whose wife told this deponent, that he had been three or four days running after William Pinchin to witness against Mr. Bushnell; upon which William Cottle coming into the house told this Deponent, that William Pinchin promised him, that if he would swear that Mr. Bushnell came drunk from Corsham he would make him parish clerk and register of Box. However if he were not ejected, he should be register. And then said farther, that if he should swear it, he should offend the gentlemen, if not the farmers. To which this deponent by reply bid him speak the truth; upon which the said Cottle affirmed, that he could not swear that he ever saw Mr. Bushnell discomposed with beer: Yet the said Cottle then affirmed that he had now an opportunity to be even with Mr. Bushnell for permitting col. Eyre to send him to Bridewell for selling ale without licence.

Sect. 36. Some few things I shall here offer to thy consideration touching this Deposition of Henry Shaylor.

1. That William Cottle's wife told him that her husband had been three or four days running after William Pinchin to witness against Mr. Bushnell. Now so much she had said before to Anthony Balden, and before her husband's face too; and thus much was testified upon oath before the Commissioners sitting at Caln by Anthony Balden; but it seems (according to the custom) either never entered, or else Indar Expurgatorius hath dashed it out.

2. William Pinchin offered to make him parish clerk and register, &c. Now these were places which to mine own knowledge William Cottle greedily thirsted after, and made great suit for, but was rejected for both; we conceiving him to be very unfit to bear any office about the church, who had been formerly thought unfit to serve so much as for a tything-man. I must tell thee further that there was some such trade driven likewise betwixt this William Cottle and John Travers. For William Cottle being summoned to appear before these Commissioners by this John Travers asks him, Who should pay him for his day's work? To whom John Travers replies;

That if Mr. Bushnell were ejected, he would see that he who succeeded him should pay him; but if Mr. Bushnell were not ejected, that then he was likely to lose it.

A pretty bait for such a fellow, and questionless enough to make him fetch trip, or (as Obadiah Cheltenham instructed him) to swear out right, for otherwise he was likely to lose his present labour, and expected reward; and that this was discoursed betwixt John Travers and William Cottle was testified on oath before the Commissioners now sitting at Marlborough by Mary Bayly; but either not taken, or else Indar Expurgatorius hath been here again. And here let me observe this unto thee, how that William Pinchin and John Travers have their varieties of baits and flies suitable to the appetites of their fish. (We know that Catalano had such heretofore; yea Mr. Chambers, the chief priests and elders made use of the like, Matth. xxvi. 61, compared with Luke xiii. 9.) Now they knew longed to have his bond up that he might sell ale again, and therefore they promise him,

That if he will appear and swear, that shall be taken up.

William Cottle sore longed for these offices, and therefore William Pinchin baits for him with these promises;

That if he would swear that Mr. Bushnell came drunk from Corsham, he would make him parish clerk and register.

Sect. 37. It hath been observed that there are four things especially which cause false accusations, malice, obsequiousness, coveture, and covetousness; we have no less than all these discovered in this William Cottle here:

1. Covetousness. The register's and clerk's place, together with 5*l.* beside, were promised him as his reward; and he must swear that I came drunk from Corsham, that he might obtain it.

2. Obsequiousness. He seems little to regard it whether he swore truth or falsehood; but whether he should please or displease. If he should swear it, he should offend the gentlemen, if not the farmers.

3. Malice, and indeed leavened, stale, and soured malice; and such on which the sun had gone down many an hundred time. That he had now an opportunity to be even with me, for permitting col. Eyre, to send him to Bridewell for selling ale without licence, which happened about September 1655.

4. Coveture (if it be not somewhat worse) for he falsely chargeth me of his crimes, and he therefore chargeth me with them, because I had laboured to suppress them in him, when as he was guilty of them; like the elders in the Apocryphal story of Susanna; because I would not consent or suffer him to practise profanations, and other disorders, he chargeth me to have been a practiser of such.

Sect. 38. I am now willing to put an end to the transactions of this day; only I shall tell thee before, that at this time it appeared that they had somewhat overshot themselves: (an usual thing for such Politicians) and that it was in some sort long of themselves that they had not their will of me so soon as they desired. I have told thee already that Mr. Byfield had taken order formerly that we should not in any wise have any copy of the Depositions, which at this time stood us in some stead, for the Doctor and he had then a strong party, (yea and if not a Quorum, yet a major party) for them. Their friends of Marlborough, and some one of Sarum, Mr. Phelps, were at their elbows, who no doubt had it in their thoughts to have made a quick dispatch with me; but my counsel opposed their sentence then, because we having no copy of the Depositions, could not possibly give in any Answer or plead to the Charge. The Evidences were long, and could not readily be summed up either by my counsel, or by him which was for the Commonwealth. This obstructed them at that time, and for the present the business was suspended.

Sect. 39. I heard the next morning, that my next appearing should be at Sarum about the Assize time shortly then to follow; but soon after I had word brought me, that it should be before that time and at Lavington: I understood likewise that Mr. Byfield was the cause of that alteration; for (having been for some time absent, and at his return into the room understanding what had passed) the man began to be in some passion, and clapping his hand upon the table, he fiercely tells them to this purpose, That if that order stood (the order made in his absence) or if I were not ejected, he would sit no more amongst them. Whereupon (for as I have said he had then a major party) that former order was reversed before the ink were dry; and I being called in, Mr. Blisset read a new order to me to this purpose:

That my next appearing before them was to be at Lavington, July 14, where I was to have my final judgment; that I was not to bring in any more witnesses for myself; but that they for the Commonwealth might bring in as they pleased.

Whereupon for that time I had my discharge, but I looked upon myself as condemned, and that this was only a reprieve from execution for so many (that is about 12) days.

The Transaction at my Sixth time of appearing before them, July 14 and 15, at the Antelope in Lavington.

Sect. 1. Although I looked on myself as a condemned person, having now no liberty left me to speak for myself, nor any beside to be heard in my behalf. But that all that were or would be against me, had not only a liberty, but a kind of invitation likewise to speak their pleasure of me, with approbation: and therefore might conceive that this summons was only that they might undo me with the greater reproach; every son of Belial being now encouraged to wound and insult over me, now that my hands were bound, and my mouth stopt; yet to Lavington I repair: Expecting that some far sought and prepared youths would have appeared, and have sworn up to the suborners' instructions, and the Commissioners' desires. When, lo! there appear for the Commonwealth, only Wm. Pinchin, Obadiah Cheltenham, Nicholas Spenser, William Cottle, and one Brewer, I think his name be John, that lived then either in Corsham parish, or at Weaver-Mill. Of these William Pinchin and Obadiah Cheltenham, as formerly, solicit the business; and unless it were in order to that, or his sequestratorship, or to hear his own commendations, I know not what it was which drew Nicholas Spenser thither. But there were only two prepared to swear. This Brewer and William Cottle. But now as touching Brewer's Deposition, as I remember, that was never taken by the Clerk; but as Brewer spake, Mr. Byfield wrote down something in his note-book, but what I know not. A story it was he told about an health or remembrance drank in col. Eyre's house, and that I was then present in the room, and he likewise as a servant to col. Eyre, but that I drank that health he could not depose: Whereupon Obadiah Cheltenham (being belike displeased, because he had sworn so much short of their expectation,) addresses himself to the Commissioners, and tells them, that he (that is, Brewer,) had represented it otherwise unto them. So that it seems, that they had the catechizing of him before he came to swear; yea, and possibly this might be done, when as they, that is, William Pinchin, Obadiah Cheltenham, John Travers, met somewhere at a kind of a feast, where, as I have heard, Obadiah Cheltenham being a small clothier, William Pinchin having fulling mills, and Brewer being a fuller; this Brewer had some promises that he should be set on work by them. Another bait suitable to the appetite of their fish. But it seems that Brewer being at this time under another influence, had forgotten his lesson, and spake not as they had taught him, but somewhat of the truth, and somewhat which was false: for he then and there reported upon oath, That at the time aforementioned he was then in col. Eyre's house, and his servant; of which falsehood he was then convicted by col. Eyre himself, at that time and place present, who then affirmed, which the other could not deny,

That this Brewer had never been any servant of his; that he had not found him meat and drink, or paid him wages, which he should be unwilling to owe to any servant.

But it seems that the occasion which drew John Brewer to col. Eyre's house at this time, was this: it happened that this Brewer ran a hunting after their hounds that day, and so afterwards thrust himself into the house for a meal's meat, and it is not unlikely, but that he might be so officious as to make himself a waiter until his turn came to dine. But now the information which col. Eyre gave, touching Brewer's Deposition, wherein he largely insisted on the company there present, as likewise the occasion on which that discourse began, as likewise the time and place where it began, and from what it had its rise, as likewise what he would have informed touching our being at Nowel's house, in order to his own vindication and mine, was at this time wholly suppressed: because contrary to that Order which they had formerly made, viz. That no witnesses for me should be admitted. Yea, notwithstanding one of the Commissioners then sitting, Mr. Michael urged that col. Eyre should be sworn, and his Deposition taken, yet the Marlborough and Sarum men together with Mr. Byfield, carried it in the negative, because contrary to their good Order: and the colonel being put back, I had not any hopes that any besides should be so much as looked upon.

Sect. 2. And touching this gentleman, col. Eyre, let me here add something; That as justice of peace, he had proceeded against many of those witnesses which swore most desperately against me, as felonious and scandalous malefactors; against William Cottle, by sending him to Bridewell for selling ale without licence; against William Sanders, by sending him to gaol about a robbery; against William Pinchin, in binding him to the good behaviour, and granting forth several warrants against him, for beating his father and mother out of doors. I cannot say that he acted any thing against Nowel, unless it were in taking away his licence: for, although Nowel hath been since prosecuted for the attempt of a rape, in an house, and in the night time, and he upon the out-cry of the party, as I have heard, making away, was yet discovered by the shoe of his hurt foot, which he left behind him, yet, I cannot say that col. Eyre bound him over for it. All which notwithstanding, all these men by col. Eyre thus proceeded against for several infamies, are by Mr. Byfield, the Doctor, and their friends at Marlborough, encouraged to testify against him to his reproach, and yet he not permitted to say any thing in his defence. I shall for the present observe thus much unto these Commissioners and Doctors, from a topic drawn, a Testibus ad Judices, That such judges have proceeded but with little credit or justice, that have countenanced infamous persons to be their witnesses: and that where sons of Belial are encouraged to testify, there the judges are usually such as the elders were in Jezreel, or the chief priests and elders were, Matt. xxvi. 59, 60.

Sect. 3. William Cottle, as I have told thee, was now at Lavington likewise, but all that he had to say, was only this, that he would be deposed, That he had never spoken such words to Henry Sheyler as are mentioned in his Deposition: But the man and his proffer were both rejected, and it is like enough for this reason; The Commissioners might look upon him already as a perjured person, and therefore might they well think that he would not stick to forswear himself again to excuse it, and as Sanders formerly endeavoured to countenance his perjury with a lie; so William Cottle minded to countenance his, with another false oath. But this, as I have said, the Commissioners did not admit; and yet they made use of his testimony against me; yea, and so did the judges in the case of Naboth, and the chief priests and elders, although they knew that their testimonies were false, and that they themselves had put those false words into the witnesses' mouths.

Sect. 4. And now when I consider, how William Pinchin, Nicholas Spenser, and Obadiah Cheltenham, would have engaged William Cottle to swear again, I cannot but wonder and tremble, to think how far wicked men for base interests will lead, and how far a wicked man for the hopes of a small reward will follow. This William Cottle (betwixt the time that he swore at Caln, and this time that he now appears at Lavington) was heard to wish, that his tongue had been cut out of his mouth before he had sworn against me; yet now being backed by his tutors, he is ready with the same tongue to lay a heavier burden upon his soul. Having sworn falsely before he now appears to swear falsely again, that he never said so. But mark the sequel: and here I would have the reader to admire, to wonder, to tremble, but not to judge. Shortly after this time William Cottle falls sick, his wife, as I have heard, hath reported it, that it began with a burning in his lips, proceeding thence to his tongue, insomuch that he was forced to keep water in his mouth to cool it, while he was at work; one who was with him as a physician hath told me, that when he came to see him, he found his tongue black, and swollen even out of his mouth. In this sad condition, sending forth such groans which were heard in the street, he continues certain days, and not long after dies. Now (considering that sentence, was past upon me, July 23rd, and that William Cottle was buried Aug. 18th next following, and that he lay sick for several days before he died, and was not buried till some days after he was dead) I say, these things considered, there will remain but a very few days for him to rejoice in my overthrow, or to please himself with the expectation of his reward. It must be confessed, that William Pinchin was somewhat more kind unto him in his sickness, than the chief priests and elders were to Judas in his distress; for as it is reported, both he and his mother visit him often: but now whether or no it were to encourage him with hopes of recovery, or to comfort him with an assurance of his reward when he was recovered, or whether or no it were to confirm him in what he had said and done, fearing that he should repent and tell the truth, I will not judge.

Sect. 5. Reader, think not that I insult over this carcase, or in any triumph tell thee of his sudden and sad fall, or say that he was thus smitten for this cause. Only let me say thus much, that as we may transgress by being too uncharitable in such cases, so we may transgress by being too stupid. And I wish that all that shall read this story, may from this example have a care to themselves, as with reference to their several actings and relations. If suborners, that they have a care how they prepare and practise with others. If mercenary, that they have a care how they are practised with; and if Commissioners, that they have a care whom they countenance and give credit to. And I wish that these Commissioners may be the last that credit or countenance such witnesses: That Obadiah Cheltenham, William Pinchin, John Travers; Nicholas Spenser, may be the last that prepare them: That William Cottle may be the last that take such oaths; and that I may be the last that suffer by them. And I further wish that these men, W. P. O. C. J. T. N. S. yea and the Commissioners and Doctors too, may timely and sadly consider of it; That if William Cottle's soul perish for this cause, then they cannot but look upon themselves as guilty of his damnation. If God will require the blood of men at their hands, who seeing others in wicked ways shall neglect to recal them; certainly much more will he require it at their hands who shall put them into wicked ways, and encourage them to go on. If he who withholds not from hell, be accessory, then much more he that thrusts thitherward. And here let me observe unto thee the portion which divine providence dispenseth to such practitioners, that do or say or swear basely or falsely for reward or gain.

1. They are often disappointed of, and never receive that which hath been promised them, as Cottle.

2. In case they receive it, yet can they take no delight in the keeping of it; it was so with Judas.

3. That such a thing which they never dreamed of befall them, which will never be wiped off, Infamy.

4. That that doth usually befall their families, which by these ungodly courses they laboured to prevent. I have told thee already, that John Travers promised William Cottle, 'that if I were ejected, he would see that he who succeeded me should pay him, if not, he was like to lose it:' but a third thing hath happened, which they never dreamed of: and who shall pay him now? Divine Providence so ordering it that I should be ejected: that William Cottle should live to see it; that he should die before he could receive the reward of his perjury; that that hath befall his family which by this means he laboured to prevent: and, if his soul miscarry for it, he is gone to such a master for his wages which neither he, nor the Suborners, nor the Commissioners, nor their Doctors did then so much as dream of. I say that that hath befallen his family which by this means he laboured to prevent, poverty. He left behind him many small children, and a wife, who was with the Overseers to engage for her house-rent (notwithstanding her late husband's father were her landlord) before I was thrust from the place. I have been told since, that this William Cottle's widow (belike conceiving herself to be her husband's administratrix, and that all promises made to him to be due to her) hath been with some of the engagers for the portion promised her husband; which it seems was five pounds, besides the clerk's and register's place; but that she was yet put off, and advised to go to Mr. Stearn; for it, which hath made the woman to fly high, and to report it.

"That had it not been for the oaths which her husband took against me (which he took upon the encouragement of W. P. J. T. O. C. N. S.) she believes that her husband had been alive to this hour."

From which it is clear enough that she believes that her husband had sworn falsely; and that he was thus taken off because he had sworn falsely; and that he had sworn falsely upon their instigation.

Sect. 6. Although they had no other witnesses against me but only Cottle and Brewer: yet I must tell thee, that at this time Mr. Long the intruder of Bath, by his letter gave me an alarm in the rear. To the best of my memory his letter was to this purpose:

1. That I had, without his leave, preached at the funeral of Mrs. Jane Rosewel, at St. James's church, in Bath.

2. That at her grave I used these words: 'Forasmuch as it hath pleased Almighty God of his great goodness,' &c.

3. That I was not well reported of by the godly.

Sect. 7. And here I shall offer to thy consideration:

1. Something touching the contents of the letter: and

2. Something touching the conditions of the man, which he hath expressed by his several actings.

As to the first branch in his letter;

That I had preached at James's church, in Bath, &c. without his leave.

I answer, That true it is, that I then and there preached, and was thereunto invited by Mr. Richard Masters her son; but I told him, before I promised him to do that last office for his mother, that I would not undertake it, unless he would first undertake that I might preach there without any obstruction or disturbance, of which he assured me, and told me he would make that his business. Upon this promise I repaired to Bath (for the former discourse was at my house at Box, whither Mr. Masters came on Monday before the funeral) on the Friday next after her decease, the day appointed for her interment; and coming with the corpse to the forementioned church, I find Mr. Long in the minister's pew; who then entertained me with this compliment, saying, I was welcome. Yea, and sometime after this solemnity, he comes to some of my friends, and enquires of my welfare, with thanks for my pains, desiring to be recommended to me, as also of my acquaintance. Now how suitable this is to his letter let the reader judge: nor heard I of one word of his distaste until the time that I was articulated against before these Commissioners, which was about 18 months after. Tell me, you Commissioners, how many times had the sun gone down upon his wrath in the mean time? and if they will needs hate him godly for all this, I shall tell them that they seem to deal with Mr. Long as the poets have done by their goddess Juno, whose deity they would assert; and yet they would not deny but that she was of a most lasting malice, and of a most revengeful disposition.

As touching the second branch of his letter; That I used at the grave these words; ‘Forasmuch as it hath pleased Almighty God of his great goodness to take unto himself the soul of our sister,’ &c.

I answer, That it is like enough that I might use these words, or words equivalent. I ever took her to be a woman who ever lived and died in the fear of God, and therefore in Christian charity was bound to believe that God whom in her life time she had served, would at her death, of his gracious mercy, take her soul unto himself. But now were I to speak at the grave of Mr. Long, (he continuing to the last such as he hath been) it is like enough I may say of him only this, ‘That God of his most wise and unsearchable providence had taken him out of the world.’

Add then as touching the third branch:

‘That I was not well reported of by the Godly.’

I would fain know who those godly men are which he means, and where they live? Doth he mean at Bath? I hereby assure thee, that (be my conversation what it will, yet) any there deserving that denomination, godly, could hardly speak evil of me, because I was then unknown to them; or does he by godly mean William Pinchin, O. C. W. C. J. T. W. S. N. S. ? of their virtues and other godly qualifications you have heard somewhat already, and more you shall hear anon: or does he by godly mean himself? This, indeed, is something like the rest; for I assure thee, that (excepting that time wherein he, together with one Bony a barber, his brother-in-law, then living in Bath, came to my house at Box, to search for the age of their wives in the register there) I remember not that I ever exchanged six words of discourse with him: and therefore he, (if godly, according to the true notion of the word) could not speak evil of me, because he had so small acquaintance with me. It must not be forgotten that Mr. Byfield presents this letter to them with this recommendation of Mr. Long;

Now to give thee my thoughts, I have a conjecture that Mr. Byfield and he did act by confederacy, mulis mutum, that they tossed good words to and fro betwixt them, that they did mutually give and take, and gratify one another with specious compellations: godly me, and I will godly thee: and that therefore they did give such words that they might receive the like. And thus did the Scribes, Pharisees and Lawyers heretofore (they loved to act according to, and follow the best examples) who seemed to hold their reputation as it were in common, and took a reproach done to one, as a reproach done to all, ‘Master in thus saying thou reproachest us also.’ Luke xi. 44, 45; but I doubt that as it was with those heretofore in point of holiness and righteousness, so it was with these now in point of godliness; that they understand and practise it much alike.

Sect. 8. But to return to Mr. Long, I have told thee that we were to others mere strangers, and although living near, yet it was in several counties; I never troubled myself about him or his business; and he now to appear against me in his letters? from whence proceeded this? from piety, or prudence, or any principle that is rational or religious? certainly from neither.

1. Not from Prudence. What? a minister (if he be such) against a minister, and at such a time as this? when we had almost all beside against us; for we to be at it amongst ourselves? It may be rationally conjectured that in Noah’s Ark the sheep and the wolf, the lion and the goat; the hawk and the dove had no hatred unto, nor fear of each other; the imminent and dreadful danger which they were all in, made them for that time to lay aside their antipathy: and then for Mr. Long at such a time as this, and in such a manner as this, and upon the solicitation of such men as these who brought his letter; to appear against me! and to engage against me in the behalf of such who would cry Aha, so would we have it, at the ruin of us all! and Mr. Long, let me tell you, that I have this conceit with me, that these very men who importuned you thus to appear against me, would to serve their turns, if occasion were offered, be as ready to practise with me to write against you.

Sect. 9. No Prudence then in Mr. Long’s actings. No, nor

2. Any Piety neither. There were, indeed, heretofore a sort of people who pretended to godliness, and yet amongst other vile affections were false accusers; these, indeed, might have the form, or outside, or resemblance of godliness, but in their conversations they denied the power thereof; and therefore were they the more notorious, because they intitled religion to it, and converted their malicious actings with so good a name, Godly. I would have Mr. Long observe it, if he understand the original, that the word which we English false accusers, or as it is in the margin, make-hates, is ἡσέβηται, (1 Tim. iii. 11.) the same word being Englished Slanderers, and both these, the false accuser and the slanderer, called by the Devil’s name, because they resemble him in their actings. Now to bring down this to Mr. Long;

1. I believe he will not deny it, but that his letter was intended by himself as an accusation against me.

2. And I have already proved it that this accusation, as to him, must needs be false, because he knew me not.

And then 3, he appearing by his letter against me in such a conjuncture of time, place, persons, and after such a manner; I cannot conceive otherwise but that it was with some spiteful malicious design against me. And therefore Mr. Long must give me leave to tell him, that I think I do him no wrong, if I report him for ῥαλῶσα, a slanderer, as the word is rendered 1 Tim. iii. 11, and for ῥαλῶσα, a false accuser, as the word is rendered, 2 Tim. iii. 3.

Sect. 10. And if Mr. Long will needs be Godly for all this, yet I must tell him that his Godliness is of a much differing kind from the primitive godliness, and the concomitants thereof. Then was Godliness accompanied with righteousness, faith, love, patience, meekness: So far from offering wrong to any, that it was desirous to do them all good; so far from hatred to any, as that it wrought charity towards all; and so far from severity, or rigidity, as that it made men most moderate towards offenders. Hence that of the apostle, 'If any man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual restore such a one in the spirit of meekness.' Gal. vi. 1. It is observed by many interpreters that the word which is Englished 'restore,' properly signifies to put in joint, any bone of the body which is broken, or out of its place. If then the spiritual man (the ministers of the church) were to set in joint members that were dislocated, then certainly in no wise to break them when they were whole; and if to set and restore them in the spirit of meekness, then certainly in no wise to break them in the spirit of backbiting and slandering. No fruits of Godliness these, Mr. Long. Nay more, to come to him nearer, and upon the score of writing letters. The apostle, although he says he needs them not, yet seems to intimate that it was then a custom for Christians, especially ministers, to grant to others according to their several occasions, their letters of recommendation; thereby to procure to those that travelled good acceptance, and entertainment with those Christians to whom they were to go, being upon their own account, utterly unacquainted with them. But now that a man should upon no grounds write against a minister, and so write against him as one of whom the Godly could not give one good word! certainly if this proceeded from Godliness, then it must be from such a Godliness, which the primitive Christians looked on with detestation; from such a Godliness as was that of the Chief Priests and Elders, Scribes and Pharisees; not from such a Godliness as was that of the apostles and brethren; for such a Godliness which hath its rise from hell, and not from heaven. The Jews, although they hated Paul to the death, and sought for his life often, yet it seems that they wrote no letters against him to their brethren at Rome. Malicious although they were, yet their malice seems to be terminated and limited to the parts near adjacent: but Mr. Long hath been more active, and his influence more diffusive, for—

Sect. 11. I am not the only man whom he hath singled out to shoot at: but he seems to be of the disposition of Ishmael, his hand is against every man; and although I could say much of him in this particular, I shall yet forbear it, because it is in the case of some other men; nor should I have so much as touched it, unless it had been to give thee some hint of his Depositions: And all that I shall touch at is to tell thee of the pains, travail, earnestness, expence, hazard, and other unworthy courses, which he hath practised against others as well as myself; but he hath not found in Somerset men according to his expectation; No Doctors or Marlborough men there; the Commissioners there being gentlemen discreet and moderate, who as I have heard, have (some of them) given him good counsel, yea and turned him off with several rebukes; and those such as, had they lighted on an ingenuous, modest, or godly spirit, would have been enough to confine him at home with shame and silence. Let others whom it concerns, report his carriage and actings then; what provocations he used to induce some to swear, what pains he took to summon in witnesses, what poor offices he undertook in his own person, what persons he uses in the business, and what names he hath for them to advance the design: I say of these, and such other like these, let others speak whom it concerns; only let me mind thee of one thing which hath been much talked of in Bath, and laughed at; it is this: Mr. Long having produced many witnesses (which it seems in their Depositions did not swear up to his desires) doth further desire that others then absent might be summoned in and heard, giving these absent men this character that they were, beside many other good epithets, godly men, and yet for his proto-saint, he names a man whom he doth no more take for godly, than he doth me, or I him. And here let me, for the close, observe one thing to Mr. Long, for his godfather Mr. Byfield who gave him that name godly, is since dead, and that is this, that the Chief Priests and Elders, Scribes and Pharisees, had such a gift, that they could change their countenance too, and speak differently of the same persons, accordingly as they were serviceable unto, or obstructive of their private, malicious, and hypocritical design. These people were much applauded, encouraged, countenanced, persuaded, and moved by the Chief Priests, when it was to bring our blessed Saviour to death: but when they went athwart the design, the best words which they had for them then, are 'This people who knoweth not the law, are cursed.' John vii. 49.

Sect. 12. But leave we Mr. Long, and return to the Commissioners, who (having now as many witnesses and papers as they thought would serve their turns, as likewise a supply of such other Commissioners which would do the business) employ Mr. Jonathan Hill to sum up the evidence against me; which he doth, but very briefly: his rhetoric consisting especially in this;

"That he laboured to aggravate my crimes from the crimes themselves, from circumstances, and from the quality of some persons who appeared as witnesses against me; and lessening their contradictions, perjuries, and subornations, by an argument drawn from a consideration had to the Commonwealth or present government, whose witnesses they were, and for whom they acted."

I cannot forget one thing which he insisted on in the first head, and that was touching the person of Nicholas Spenser, intimating that much credit ought to be given to his testimony, because he was a grave old gentleman. Touching his gentility and gravity I shall say nothing; only let me acquaint thee with this one thing concerning him: That this Nicholas Spenser professeth a skill in the recovery of such who are distracted; and withal, that he doth sometime practise upon pigs, being alike distempered; now I know not what courses he takes for the recovery of men: but I have been told that for hogs he hath this receipt; That he cuts an apple, or a piece of cheese, and writes upon it Sare, Nare, Fare, and then by inversion Fare, Nare, Sare, and so gives it the hog; for which, as I have been told, he hath received money, or something equivalent. Now this must be either a charm or a cheat, both which are punishable by our municipal laws: there is Mr. Jonathan Hill's grave old gentleman, I will not be peremptory neither that Mr. Hill said much upon the second head, nor indeed was it so much as was said and done, many a time before by Mr. Byfield and his Commissioners; who countenanced and encouraged many undue, unjust, yea very vile and wicked practices, pretending that it was for the Commonwealth or present government; in the mean time they discountenanced, suppressed many just overtures and proceedings of ours, pretending that it was against the Commonwealth, and present government.

Sect. 13. Now I would fain know of these men what they mean by, or what this same Commonwealth was, whose interest must be promoted by such unworthy courses? Did they mean that present government as it stood then established? This cannot be, because I have charged them with, and proved them guilty of the breach of that ordinance set forth by that power, and according to which they were to act; and it may seem strange that a man should say, that he acts for the Commonwealth, and yet at the same time violate those laws which the same Commonwealth hath made. I think that I do them no wrong if I should say, that by Commonwealth they meant some private interest or aim of their own, which yet must go under that vizard Commonwealth, that they may drive on the design with less suspicion. But I will for once suppose, that they meant as they said, and that their utmost aim was the promotion of the good of the Commonwealth, taking Commonwealth in the best sense: but then I shall add some few things to be considered of. As

VOL. V.

1. That a good end is not to be promoted by evil means; we may not do evil, that good may come of it, in any case. I shall add;

2. As not in any case, so much less are we to do evil for the promotion of the interest of the Commonwealth: of any temporal ordination, dominions and kingdoms are (as of God's especial institution, so) under his especial care: The powers that are, are ordained of God; and as we are therefore to be subject to them, because they are of his institution: (Cæsar is more ours, saith Tertullian, because our God set him up) so we may assure ourselves, that their interests are to be promoted only by such ways and means which the King of kings approves of; which we are assured are none but such as are lawful and just. So that to fancy, that that which is so especially from God, must be supported or advanced by such ways and courses which God hath expressed himself that he doth abhor, is upon the matter, to say, that our great God wants the devil's help to support his own institution: or that his government could not be established unless the prince of darkness did afford some contribution towards it. Mr. Byfield had an Hebrew name, and therefore possibly he might understand the meaning of those words, Perez Uzzah; and thence he might learn that God takes it much amiss from them, because they put forth their hands presumptuously and inconsiderately to uphold the Ark, although shaken: much more would he have taken it amiss, if they had in contempt of his express command put forth wicked hands to uphold it. I remember, that when captain Byshop endeavoured to extenuate, if not to justify Faulconer's perjury, in the case of the lord Craven, by recounting the services which Faulconer had done for the Commonwealth, and adding that Faulconer was one by whom the Commonwealth sat safe, at that hour; The learned Counsel replied on him thus; It is God that we sit safe by, and not by him. Perjuries are not proper means either to advance or strengthen a Commonwealth. I shall say no more in so clear a case, but only in the words of Job, "Will you speak wickedly for God? and talk deceitfully for him." And now I shall add,

3. That whosoever shall go about, either in pretence, or otherwise, to advance the interest of a Commonwealth by unlawful or wicked courses, is the greatest enemy unto it. The throne is established by righteousness, therefore destroyed and overthrown by injustice. And the former part of the verse, It is abomination, &c. seems to intimate that not only piety, but even prudence, should engage such who meddled in Commonwealths, to the observance of equity and justice, because wickedness is so destructive to them. Be it then either the supreme that commands unjust things, or inferior Commissioners that put unjust commands into execution, yet of them all, it may be easily proved, that there are none that are such malignants to their government, as are they themselves. Excepting himself and his virtuous Jezabel, I know not of any that did contribute more to the ruin of Ahab and his house, than did those obsequious elders and nobles of Jezreel, and their sons of Belial. It is like enough, that the state politic may deride both the priest and his doctrine; and it is like enough that Ahab (before he fell at Ramoth Gilead) would have derided, or done worse to any man who should have said as much to him. But I would have the state politics to tell me, what opinion they think that Ahab hath of it now? who were the greatest enemies to him and his house? who were they that brought his family to a sudden ruin, and a fearful one? could we hear him from the dead, he must needs answer, that he himself and his friends undid him, and that nothing did so much strengthen his enemies against him, as his own and his favorites injustice.

Yea, and possibly (you Marlborough men) some one whom you lately knew, your 'polished shaft' had not been so suddenly taken away, and his posterity, your 'plant of renown,' laid aside so soon, so as scarcely to be spoken of, but in pity or contempt, unless such officious Commissioners as yourselves, had executed his ordinances with far greater injustice than ever he made them. You might and did say, That it was for the Commonwealth, for the present government, and possibly you had thoughts thereby to have established, and perpetuated that establishment both for him, his, and yourselves. And now lo, as to them their honour is in the dust, and as for yourselves, you live the scorn of others as well as those whom you have injured: yea, and possibly in a very short time you may be in a worse condition than those whom you have thrust out of doors.

But to return to the transactions at Lavington at this time: After that Mr. Hill for the Commonwealth, had summed up the evidence against me, and my counsel on my behalf had pleaded to the charge, we were all commanded to withdraw, that the Commissioners might debate the business among themselves. There were at this time many of them, and indeed a greater number than I had seen at any time before, viz. Mr. Thistlethwait, Mr. Michael, Mr. Shute, Mr. Middlecot, Mr. Ludloe of Claringdon, Mr. Hely of Sarum, and the three Marlborough men whom Mr. Byfield had called upon that morning at Marlborough, and brought them along with him. Now those that know that country, can tell that Marlborough lieth not near the direct way from Collingborn to Lavington, and yet Mr. Byfield taketh it in his way thither; to give us to know, That malicious men will not spare for any pains; nor are they ever out of the way, so they may compass their mischievous ends. I was told likewise, that Mr. Byfield on the way from Marlborough to Lavington was like to have had some mischance, he falling from his horse, or his horse falling with him; I believe, that if any such mishap had befallen me, he would have made it a matter of charge: That either the horse or his rider had drank to excess. These Marlborough men, I say, he brought along with him; and, I doubt not but that he had sent to some in and near Sarum to meet him there: for such now appeared which never sate in my business before, nor did they ever hear Deposition of any witness which was taken by the Clerk, and yet they voted against me: of which more hereafter. And indeed the meeting of most of the Commissioners at this time in this place was design in Mr. Byfield, for he therefore reversed that Order which they had made for my appearance at Sarum, because he doubted (as he was heard to say) That I should make such friends there as to come off; which to prevent, he both straitens me in time, changeth the place, and provides himself of such executioners, that (right or wrong) should cut my throat in private.

Sect. 16. And now when the business came to be debated, had you seen how Mr. Byfield bestirred himself, what weight he laid upon every deposition against me: what rhetoric he used to improve them; what salvoes, and lenitives he finds for the perjuries, subornations, contradictions, and other vile practices of those witnesses which appeared against me; what applications and persuasions he makes to some whom he looked not for there; I say, had you seen or heard this, you might have been apt to think, that Mr. Byfield had taken more pains in framing this declamation, than in composing many a sermon. And yet as zealous, and eager as he was, he could not forbear (no not for that time) his beloved tobacco; that must be remembered, although he makes many a parenthesis in the taking of his pipe. I have yet by me the copy of a speech, which goes by the name of a speech of Sir Walter Raleigh's, spoken by him upon the scaffold a little before his death; Wherein (amongst other passages) he expresseth himself thus: "There is one thing above all that doth most afflict me, and that is a most false and scandalous report that hath much blemished my reputation and honour; how that when that noble and worthy earl of Essex left this world, that I stood in a window drinking tobacco, laughing and making merry at his downfall." Although I compare not myself to the earl of Essex, nor Mr. Byfield to sir Walter Raleigh, yet let me observe thus much upon his words: That if it had been dishonourable and scandalous for him thus to do, being but a spectator; then it would have been much more dishonourable and scandalous for him thus to have done if he had been a Commissioner, or an Informer against him. It is true indeed, my life was not then in question, but yet my livelihood, my reputation, the exercise of my profession (which a man ought to prefer before his life) were; and then for Mr. Byfield (as it is said then a minister) to be eructing out of his mischief in smother against a minister in such a conjuncture of time, was a carriage so misbecoming, and such a scandal, as that I believe, none that they ever turned out were proved guilty of.

Sect. 17. One thing more must I acquaint thee with, which happened while we were at Lavington; upon my coming to town, and bringing colonel Eyre, and some others along with me of good quality as witnesses, (which as I have told thee, were all turned back by virtue of Mr. Byfield's Order,) I was told that one near related to the persons and practices of these Commissioners, should say to this purpose, seeing us come in, That Mr. Bushnell had brought such and such along with him, but that it was to no purpose; for he could not stay at Box, because that place was appointed for another man. And now to see how murder will out, we have now the reason why they countenanced so many infamous perjured suborners against me, and that was this, because I had a considerable living to lose; that they had appointed it for another man; and, (as I shall tell thee by and by,) made their advantages by turning me out, and bringing another in. I remember that Plutarch tells us of one Quintus Aurelius, who in Sylla's time was proscribed and doomed to death, only for this, that he had a fair house at Alba. And let me add a little farther; that to thrust out the incumbent right or wrong, was not the only piece of injustice these commissioners and their then corresponding friends at London have practised; for beside the ejection of the clerk, they had an art to defeat the patron of his presentation. And without doubt this hath made many a man scandalous, that these commissioners had a resolution to dispose of, or to be gainers by the disposal of their livings. Let patrons speak for themselves: as to mine own particular I shall say only this:

1. That by their own confession, my place was appointed for another man. Which

2. I believe was the man who hath since my ejection held it, Mr. Sterne; who lived formerly in a living sequestered of Mr. Walker's at Chilmark, and it may be was there as a kind of a curate to Mr. Sangar, Dr. Chambers brother-in-law. But at this time was destitute, and therefore right or wrong, a place must be provided for him elsewhere. But yet

3. These men, as godly as they are, love dearly to be fingering money. Mr. Stern hath said, that Mr. Blisset had 20*l.* of him (I believe half the money would have made Mr. Blisset my friend) which in all probability he had an eye to of a long time, and therefore his utmost power must be improved for the thrusting me out; otherwise he had lost his expected gratuity which he was to receive for bringing the other in; 20*l.* sterling; that was a good circumstance indeed, Mr. Blisset.

Sect. 18. But to put an end to the transactions of this day: after a very long debate: (for Mr. Byfield and his Commissioners met with more obstruction in the business than they dreamed of) I was discharged from Lavington, having no more said to me then but only this; that I was to appear before them again at Sarum, at the assize time then shortly to follow; and there to undergo their examination touching my sufficiency.

The Transactions at my Seventh time of appearing before them, at the Three Swans, in Sarum, July 23.

Sect. 1. And having been so many times before them, and waiting so long before I could be heard, I had in the mean time the leisure and the opportunity to see and observe other ministers who were there besides myself: and I made myself curious to enquire who and what they were, and what the business might be which drew them thither. And was answered that some of them were related to some of the Commissioners, as brothers, kinsmen, sons in law; and that their business thither might be either to tender their humble respects to them (Mr. Byfield and the Doctor especially looked to be honoured) or else in order to some augmentation, or change. That others there present I was told wanted livings, and that they repaired thither (as vultures follow armies expecting shortly some execution, that they might be in a readiness to seize, and feed upon the prey. Both these I looked upon as volunteers, and that it was matter of advantage that brought them thither; but now there were others there who appeared as prest-men, and were forced in upon Summons, amongst whom I reckoned myself; and therefore I made myself the more inquisitive touching them, conceiving their condition to be as mine, touching some of which, I was told, that there were heavy Articles in charge against them, and many proofs of those Articles, but that the carriage of somebody was so humble, and a speech which somebody made so winning, that he was discharged until further order: but since I have heard that somebody hath furnished one of the Marlborough Commissioners with a horse, yea and that somebody hath presented him with a parcel of hay since that, so that it may be that the horse or the hay, made the speech, and not the master. These are but circumstances, Mr. Blisset. Against some others I was told, that there were Articles too, but yet that they would come off, because there was money advanced yearly, for the relief of Marlborough. Against others I was told, that there were Articles too, but yet there was but little danger in the business, because the persons so charged had been with Mr. Byfield and bowed before him, or were of the association, or of some classes. Now I hearing this, could not but conclude myself a man whom they had resolved for ruin, because I had practised none of these ways; for notwithstanding one near related unto me was told, that to stand out in my justification was not the way to get off, as also of another way which if I practised, might procure my discharge, or to some such purpose; yet I was resolved that neither horse, money nor hay, should go for me. I being otherwise taught, we must not do evil that good may come of it. If I had deserved ejection, they ought not to have discharged me for a reward; if I had not deserved it, they ought to have discharged me without it.

Sect. 2. I was told likewise that there were heavy exceptions taken against me that I came not amongst them, Mr. Chambers, Mr. Byfield, &c. and that I did not make one at their meetings. That I did not associate, but rather that I not only neglected but despised them, or to some such purpose. And doubtless (with the Doctor and Mr. Byfield) this was enough to make a man scandalous in the highest degree. Give me leave therefore to tell thee the reasons why I did not thrust in myself, and make one at their meetings: for although there were no law which either enjoined or forbade them; and therefore such meetings of themselves (being not simply evil) might be matter of indifferency; yet unto me there seemed not an indifferency ad utrumlibet: but that (all things which I proposed unto myself rightly considered) I conceived it better for me to forbear and to stay at home. For

1. I saw no great good which had come of them, or which in likelihood might come of them. And

2. Because they had no commission so to do, and that the times were touchy, hazardous, suspicious, I doubted what interpretation the civil power might have put upon such meetings. And

3. Because the persons who were the leading men among them were as fierce and rigid in their way, as are any (I believe) on this side or beyond Tweed; neither did I know what matters they would propose; or how far the managery of them might be extended. It was since our memories that one lost his head, and others were in pitiful case, for meeting and acting some things against the then present government. And whether or no the working heads of the times might not have strained these meetings to some such construction, I know not. However the pretences might be specious and fair, yet the design of some might be bad enough; and although some might appear there in their simplicity, yet others might have had some further differing, perchance contrary aim. And this we must have been sure for that the project of but one or two, if disrelished, would have been accounted the crime of us all. In short, I had heard so much of the dispositions of some of them, that they could not hold, but that they must needs be meddling in matters which they had nothing to do withal; all concerns both of church and state must come through their fingers, although directè, they were wholly for sermons, and directories, yet indirectè for acts, ordinances, orders, proclamations, in which I will not say they were better versed; but sure I am, of these some of them made more use than they did of their Bibles. I should not have spoken of it, unless a friend of their own Mr. March. Needham had observed it, That the Presbyterian Government (if such as the Kirkmen would have it) is no good friend or servant to the civil; nay, he affirms further, that the settling of the Presbytery in their mode, would erect a power ecclesiastical distinct from that of the civil: for (saith he) it is a maxim among all Presbyters, and we find it pleaded for at large in the Confession of Faith, set forth by the Assembly of Divines, That there ought to be a jurisdiction in the church, that is in their way of discipline, distinct from the civil. Which tenet of distinction (he adds) must needs be the same in effect with that of the Church of Rome's supremacy; seeing those who plead now for a power without the civil; will not be long ere they arrive to such an height of presumption, as to act above it, or against it in pursuance of their own designs: it will be impossible to keep such a church in discipline within its limits in any Common-wealth, which makes the same persons civil subjects and ecclesiastical superiors. Of the like strain may the reader meet with much more in the same Author, against whom I believe they will take no exceptions, being one that hath deserved so well from them, as that he engaged in their quarrel so far as to cast down their great accuser Mr. John Goodwin.

Sect. 3. And it may be upon this very conceit might the Doctor and Mr. Byfield intrude so much, and act so fiercely as they did in matters of that cognizance, which they had nothing to do withal; for as I have said elsewhere, by their ordinance, the ministers had nothing to do but only to be assistants to the Commissioners in matter of examination touching sufficiency; yea, and as I have heard a lawyer told Mr. Byfield, that by an act of parliament, made about the beginning of the long parliament, clergymen were wholly excluded from having any hand in secular employments. All which notwithstanding none take so much upon them in matter of scandal, as these two; it were no groundless or irrational conjecture to say, that thus they might do upon confidence of the Presbyterian power, in whose Chair they might fancy themselves to be, and that they were they that ought to have dominion; yea and notwithstanding they tell us that they hate Popery to the death; yet they may be pleased with, and practise according to the Jesuits, &c. In ordine ad spiritualia, which could they extend according to their desires they would leave but little for the secular power to take cognizance of: Mr. Byfield and the Doctor, they sitting at the stern, and directing the course, and the hackney Mailborough men tugging at the oar, and wafting them to their aims. Those for their reputation, honor, sway, these for their advantage and gain: one sort loving to be obeyed and revered, and the other sort loving to be fed. These dangerous consequences I presume the present civil power will have so much providence as to foresee, and will have so much prudence as to prevent.

Sect. 4. But to return to Sarum, being in town, July 22, the day before the examination, I went to visit Mr. Eyre, with whom I had formerly some acquaintance, his house being near to the house where I lodged: with whom I had not been long, but looking through a window into a court which leadeth into his house, I see William Pinchin and Obadiah Cheltenham making thitherward, whom Mr. Eyre meets at the door, and after some short stay with them he returns into the room again with a letter in his hand, which I conjecture he received from W. P. and O. C. and that it concerned myself; and this letter possibly Mr. Eyre might have shewn me, had not Mr. Byfield, the Doctor, and a third man whom after I understood to be Mr. Strickland, (somewhat you see will bring Mr. Strickland under Mr. Eyre's roof) came shortly after unto his house: whether it were design in them, or accidental to come so soon as the others were gone, I cannot say; which three, when I saw making towards the room, I withdrew into another, from which after some short stay I returned back again to Mr. Eyre, who then told me (these three being gone) that Mr. Byfield had told him; 'That the major part of the Commissioners were satisfied touching the matter of scandal proved against me:' as I remember I said no more to him but this. 'And what make I here then?' But these words of his brought somewhat to my mind, which I had read of bishop Ridley, who although he were sent to Oxford to dispute, yet his death was resolved on by Gardiner and Bonner, before he went from London, or had ever framed argument. And now Mr. Byfield hath given me a perspective wherewithal a man might look into his godly bosom; for it is now manifest, that this examination was intended to no other end, but that by it I should the more condemn myself; for whatever I had said, it would not have procured my discharge, because I was condemned before; and if I had said any thing to disrelish so learned, so prudent, so pious, so just a Quorum, as were the Doctor, Mr. Byfield, Mr. Hughes, and the Marlborough men, it should have been improved to have made more against me: 'Non intererat occidentium quid dicerent,' was the old rule of law, and since we have been told, that there is no reply to be made after that sentence is past, Mr. Byfield's friends must give me leave to tell them, that I have heretofore read of such as himself, and in this particular; and who should they be (Mr. Byfield loved to make use of rare men for his precedents) but the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem, (Reader, think not that I intend the resemblance to hold, save only in this, That Mr. Byfield and his friends were somewhat like the Chief Priests and Elders) who

1. Sought for and encouraged false witnesses, against that blessed person whom they studied how to destroy; which witnesses falling short of their expectation, they

2. Themselves proceed to examine him, 'Ut ex ipsius ore aliquid elicere quod ipsum oneret,' that they might intice something out of his own mouth to charge him withal.

Sect. 5. But come we to the examination, which was the next day following, at the Three Swans, where I appeared about two or three o'clock in the afternoon, where I found Mr. Chambers, Mr. Byfield, Mr. Hughes, and the three men of Marlborough; beside many other Commissioners and some ministers.

There were then with me col. Eyre, my counsel Mr. Carter, and another a minister, who were desirous to have heard the examination; but could not be admitted by any means, because there was an Order made,

That none should be in hearing but the Commissioners, and their subordinates.

I have a conjecture, that Mr. Byfield, if not the sole author, yet, was a main promoter of it, because he was so zealous, that it should be observed, and also gave some reasons why it was made: for when some of the Commissioners, (I having expressed myself, that it should have been indifferent to me if the doors were thrown open, and that all that would might come in) urged that others might be admitted, Mr. Byfield insists upon the Order, adding something by way of a seeming reproof for their inconstancy, Nay, if you will not stand to your Order, gentlemen; and then gives the reasons which moved them to make and to keep it, and that was,

That if all were admitted, then would the whole country know what questions they proposed.

And what if they had heard or known them? Were your questions such that you were ashamed that they should be known? Or was it for fear the country should, hearing your questions and my answers, think better of me than you were willing? And have been apt to discharge me whom you were resolved to ruin? But it may be Mr. Byfield's reason that all should be excluded, was not that the country might not know what questions they proposed, but that the country might not take notice that Mr. Byfield proposed no question at all; for I remember not that by way of question he said so much as a word to me. That tongue of his, which at former times ran upon speed, so that nothing could stop it, seems now to be crippled, and to be downright lame. So that, were he living, we have now got a receipt to cramp Mr. Byfield's tongue, and that is to discourse of matters of religion.

Sect. 6. This business of examination held for a long time, nor will I give thee any account of it, because I hear not that they say, that they ejected me for insufficiency. Let them report of it what they please, yet will there lie this disadvantage against them, that there is not much likelihood that they should report the truth, which took such a course that the truth should not be known. But for the reader's satisfaction in this particular, I hereby let them know that I shall not refuse any of them in any of the public schools of either of the Universities; where I am sure there will be no orders made to shut the auditors out of doors; nor shall Mr. Chambers cry out against me for this as he doth against Mr. Dell, Satis pro fiducia, as is the man, such is his confidence: For I assure him, that he cannot have a meaner opinion of me and my parts, than I have of myself; but yet mean although they are, yet perchance not so contemptible in respect of theirs. I remember, Homer, although he account Menelaus to be too weak to encounter the warlike Hector, yet he makes him match enough to combat the effeminate Paris.

Sect. 7. After the business of examination was ended, and I with-drawn, there comes to me into the chamber, where I was sitting with colonel Eyre and my counsel, Mr. Blisset's son the Commissioner's clerk, with advice to me that I should resign, adding that then I might be capable of another place, whether he came from his father with his word in season, I know not. I know not neither, whether he came in any way of courtesy with this advice; possibly he might by this, give me to know, that the same hand which had disposed of my living for another man, might upon the like consideration dispose of another man's living for me. But this his advice of my resignation, and the reasons of it, were rejected, with some contempt both on colonel Eyre's part and mine own; it being no other than ridiculous, that a man should be capable of, and thought fitting for another place, and yet not fit to keep his own; and therefore, as I said, this proposal was either that they might make their advantages all manner of ways by putting another into my place, and settling me elsewhere, or else that they might the more triumph in my ruin, because in thus doing I had contributed more to mine own ruin than they possibly could; having by a resignation made myself utterly incapable of returning to Box, as also of receiving any profit thence which might be allowed to such as were ejected.

Sect. 8. Shortly after this, I was called in again to receive my doom, which was pronounced against me by virtue of that Order which Mr. Byfield, and his Marlborough men, had procured against me at Lavington about twelve days before, and had lain dormant by them ever since, as a trusty reserve no doubt, which, if they could not destroy me any other way, should not miss to knock me down. I observed that while my sentence was reading, Mr. Chambers had pulled down his hat somewhat low on his face, but for the residue of his face which might be seen he looked very big, and possibly might say within himself, that now he had taught me to bring a man of his merit upon the stage, to make him the discourse and laughter of the country, for leaving Claverton, and going to Pewsie. Mr. Byfield in the mean time was playing with a tobacco pipe between his fingers, although he forbore to smoke it for that short space, yet had he the pipe in a readiness, and was a filling of it out of Mr. Martin's box before I left the room, and seemed to look merrily at it, which minded me of that 'Risus abest nisi quem visi movere dolores.'

No laughter there appears
Unless for others tears.

Sect. 9. And yet I assure the reader that as to the main, Mr. Byfield was very much disappointed in his expectation; I have heard say, that his word was, That if he could not bow, he would break them; if he were not dead, I should say it was a fitting motto for an inquisitor; however I must tell his surviving friends, that as to mine own particular he was so far from hitting the mark, as that he hath missed the butt: whosoever shall light on these sheets, and read them, will readily say, Surely he hath not bowed me, there being not a line in the whole relating to himself, that relisheth of begging; and for breaking me, I wish, so it might not be to their torment, these quondam Commissioners had seen how contentedly I lived without my means; how little I grieved for the loss of it; how little I desired the re-enjoyment of it: Yea, let me tell you farther, that, although ignorant and scandalous you account me, I have often read Psal. 37, and there I am taught (and I humbly thank him, God hath given me a heart to learn) not to fret myself because of evil doers; nor because of him who prospereth in his way; because of the man who bringeth wicked devices to pass: although I never envied your power, yet I pitied you for your managery thereof; and, for all your spiteful, vile, unjust proceeding, I desire to have no revengeful thoughts against you; nor had I in the publication of this narrative any aim to asperse you, but to vindicate myself: Yea, and let me tell you farther yet, that, although you had it not in your intentions, yet my ejection hath been some ways advantageous unto me, and that in securing me from several vexations, and a continuation of fears, doubts, charges, compliances, visits and other inconveniences, which had I continued at Box, I must have been exposed unto, all while you continued in your power, and executed your power with so much injustice. And this whether I look on the Commissioners or mine accusers.

Sect. 10. 1. For mine accusers, the chiefest of these was William Pinchin, of whose perjuries, subornations, and other his vile and base practices, I have spoken somewhat already, and more I shall say, when I give thee a short view of his life; and yet this man must have been humoured by me, and humoured in his baseness; Nay, not only humoured, but fed too; I must not have dared but have furnished him, whensoever he asked; and his poor indigent condition was such, that he would have been always craving; and if I had denied him at first, or questioned him afterward, it is like the fellow would have grown surly, and have stopt my mouth with the Commissioners, or threatened me with Tho. Cox, or his Mr. Chambers, or Mr. Byfield. I remember, that sometime before I was questioned, this William Pinchin came to my house, to borrow some money of me, with which I did not at that time furnish him; whether it were because I then had it not, or whether it were because his mother had formerly borrowed a considerable sum of me, as she said for him, of which I was not then satisfied, nor (what through their base sharking shifts and mine own easiness,) am I ever like to be, I now remember not; but as for me, he then went without it; but it seems he was then so nearly driven, that he borrowed what he could get from my servant. I have heard that he was highly displeased, that he went without it. And possibly took this course of perjury and subornation, to be revenged of me for it. Now under this pressure I must always have lain, nor would there have been any way to have kept him from forswearing himself against me, but to have lent him what he had asked for, and never after to have demanded it of him. His mother Joan likewise would have been sneaking after me, whose property is not only to forget courtesies, but to repay them with base usage, in denying what she hath received, or by patching with those to whom she hath been beholden; ever beggarly, and ever base. I must likewise have made much of John Travers, as long as he lived, and Obadiah Cheltenham, they must have been entertained and thanked, yea, and rewarded for frightening me; and my benevolence should have been spent at the next alehouse, they making themselves merry at my charges, and laughing at my fear, which had furnished them to pay their reckoning.

Sect. 11. Then for the Commissioners and their appurtenances. Thomas Cox doubtless would have visited me often; and I must have been as nearly related to Mr. Blisset's son as Mr. Stern was: and although Marlborough were too far to send hay, yet doubtless something would have been expected there, although less visible, yet not less chargeable. I could have expected no more courtesy from them than they vouchsafed to others, and that was only a dismissal until further orders. So that I could have looked upon myself at Box, for no better than their tenant at will, and that their favour towards me, would have been according as I remembered them: whereas I was since freed from all these charges, and continual fears; and if any man in my absence enquired for me, I had no cause to fear that it was Thomas Cox, your agent. Mr. Blisset's son hath had no relation to me; neither might the Marlborough men, or their wives, expect any horse, hay, money, or plate from me. Nay more, should I have chanced to have met your Doctor on the way, I should have given him, not such reverence which he looks for, but, such respect as I thought fitting: and upon some such weighty account, I have been told that he was distasted at me; and so was Haman the Agagite against Mordecai. Nay, which is more than all, the very sight of Mr. Byfield did not since affright me; but on him could I look with pity or contempt, whom my terrified brethren durst not think of but with trembling.

Sect. 12. I have but little more to add at this time, and that is touching Mr. Ludloe of Claringdon, and Mr. Hely of Sarum. These I have told thee appeared at Lavington, having never sate in business before: nor ever heard the Deposition of one witness, which was taken by their clerk; and therefore they could know nothing but by information from Mr. Byfield and his friends of Marlborough, and yet these sentence against me. And it is like enough, that as they were sent for, for this purpose, so were they resolved what to do before they came out of door. Touching Mr. Hely, the wonder will not be so much to them that know him. But now for Mr. Ludloe,* a gentleman; that he should in a matter of so great concernment, be so easy as to be drawn in against me in my livelihood, my reputation, my profession, my hopes, only upon the information of others, of such others; I will say no more, but only thus; that if Mr. Ludloe had been in my condition, a minister under question, and I in his place, a Commissioner to give my vote; if I should have voted against him, upon no better grounds than as yet appear to me, he hath voted against me, I should think that men had done me no wrong, if they had made this report of me, That it was pity, that a man no better qualified, should have so much power; and that in my sentence I had little regard either to piety, prudence, conscience, or justice.

Sect. 13. And now as touching Mr. Hely, I have been told, that a great exception which he had against me, was this; That I was a Common Prayer man. I think he could not have said more in my commendation; like Balaam, instead of cursing, he bleaseth me; he condemns me for having done my duty; and sentenceth me to deprivation for using that book, whereas by the law all ministers are liable to deprivation, because they do not use it. So that he dooms me being innocent, to that sentence which the Doctor and the other ministers had deserved.

The Transactions at my Eighth Time of Appearing before them at the Three Swans, in Sarum, March 17, 1657.

Sect. 1. And now it is like mine enemies had prevailed as far against me, as the injustice of corrupt judges, the malice of perjured witnesses, the restless impudence of the sons of Belial could desire. Both Commissioners, Doctors, and witnesses belike triumphing to think how much they had undone me. Notwithstanding it were by candle light that I were sentenced, yet was there an Order issued out the same night, I guess that William Pinchin and Obadiah Cheltenham, were not more earnest to desire it, than the Doctors and Marlborough men were to satisfy them, empowering Nich. Spenser and John Harding to the sequestration of the profits of my vicarage. Which suddenly they enter upon, and proceed in it with much diligence and terror. Nich. Spenser especially, traversing over the parish with a honey pot under his coat, doubting, as I have been told he should say, that he should not receive enough for his winter toasts. And clearly my condition was then such, that as they had taken a course that I should not stay at Box, so there was a course taken by others, that I should not know whether to go, or how to employ myself for a subsistence. For I was not in a capacity to receive any fifth, because I was unmarried; and utterly disabled to the performance of any ministerial duties, so much as to teach a private school, because I was ejected. And possibly these considerations might encourage the Commissioners, Doctors, Witnesses to act as they did, because they had now an opportunity to undo me according to their desires. They having deprived me of my present livelihood, and the Protector's declaration of Nov. 4, 1655, debarring me of all hopes of getting my livelihood for the future.

Sect. 2. Which person and declaration since I have mentioned, let me ask his Marlborough Commissioners and Ministers, and was this the thing whereby he merited so highly of them, as that they in their addresses to his son must needs call him 'polished shaft?' I believe that they were beholden to their doctors for their expression, and I believe again that they that doctors took it out of Isai. 49, 2, where the Messiah tells us that the Lord had made him such. And certainly this so properly agreeing unto him, as not without blasphemy to be communicated to any other. These men were, by their patrons instructions, to eject men who were found guilty of blasphemy; and lo, I believe that a more shameful and gross piece of flattery, and blasphemy, hath not been lately heard of than is this of their own. No nor in former ages neither, unless that of Acts 12, 22, come near it. But yet, I would do these men what courtesy I can, I will suppose that by that expression, 'Polished shaft,' they mean no more but this; that although propriè or primariò none can be justly styled so but the Messiah, yet 'secundum significationem limitatam, et restrictam,' in a limited and qualified sense others may be called so likewise. As kings and judges are called gods, because they receive their commission from God, and so ought to employ themselves as in his business: The same word giving them power to act, and likewise cautions touching their behaviour in that power: and so proportionable might they borrow this epithet 'polished shaft,' and bestow it upon their patriot. But now, this being granted them, they must yet give me leave to ask them, and with what congruity? And how do these words belong unto him? If I mistake not, the Messiah is there so called because he was sent of God to subdue his, and the church's enemies. But now what enemies of God, or of the Gospel, or of the church, did your Protector subdue? Stile you him by this name because of these ordinances? If so, then you speak by contraries; therefore a 'polished shaft,' a vanquisher of the church's enemies, because he first undid, and after stopt the mouths of hundreds of able, and orthodox ministers.

And whereas the apostle saith it would be woe to him if he did not preach the gospel, (which woe is still impendent upon all ministers who shall wilfully neglect their duty,) this Protector takes such an order, that it should be woe unto them if they did preach the gospel. And yet a 'polished shaft.' The church of England hath not greater nor more bitter enemies than the Jew and the Papist. The one hating us because Christians, the others because reformed; and yet both these had his favour. The Jew a kind of an invitation, near of the date with this ordinance: The other, entertainment in the Royal Palace, when as hundreds of ministers, I believe truly godly, and I think as learned as ever our church enjoyed since the Reformation, were not only thrust out of their livelihoods, but also cast off from executing the priests office unto the Lord. In this more like to the son of Nebat, than the son of God. And whereas those ejected priests and Levites had the land of Judah to go to, and there find both a livelihood and an employment: This their 'polished shaft,' had so ordered it, (it is Mr. Pryn's observation) that they should have no employment neither at home or abroad. Nay more, (to put them and their families upon a necessity of starving) he not only enacted that they should have nothing to subsist by, but also made it penal after the most ignominious manner, if they went about to beg, which, says the same Mr. Pryn in the same place, was such a transcendent barbarism, impiety, and high way to extirpate religion (as pious, learned archbishop Usher told him when he mediated for their liberty, as he told Mr. Pryn and others with tears, which broke his heart soon after) as the pope and jesuits themselves could not have invented the like; and exceeded all foreign persecutions against protestant ministers in Piemont, Bohemia, and Silesia by popish princes being of a different religion, but he a pretended protestant zealot. This is the Marlborough men's 'polished shaft.'

Sect. 3. And whereas they have none to liken him to, but the holy one of God, the best; I can hardly find one so wicked as to be joined in comparison with him, unless it were Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who out of a politic respect (like unto his), thrust out the Priests and Levites, both from their service, and their livelihoods; and after he had taught them the mode of sacrificing, suited himself with Priests of the lowest of the people, or the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem, who 'commanded the Apostles not 'to teach at all, or speak in the name of Jesus.' The apostate Julian, although he be looked upon as a bitter enemy of the Church of God, although he persecuted them, although he scoffed at them; yet I read not that he silenced them. One of the worst things which he is reported to have done against them, is, That he forbade them the public schools, and studies of arts and tongues; which decree an historian, principled like himself, stiles, 'inclemens, obruentum perenni silentio,' merciless, uncivil, and to be buried in everlasting silence; and yet these Marlborough addressers think not a name (fitting only for the Son of God) too good for their patron, who had made a decree against Christian ministers, far more barbarous than was that of Julian. It is true, indeed, in the close of that Ordinance, he hath a kind of qualifying proviso, and talks of tenderness to be used, but it is under such conditions, that if men should observe them, they must cease to be what they ought, godly indeed. And whereas he talks of tenderness, many a one in this land of ours can witness what his tendernesses have been; and have found the words of the wise-man verified in him, 'The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel,' Prov. xii. 10.

Sect. 4. And indeed this Declaration was of such a tender and godly strain, that shortly after my ejection, some sitting as a parliament, although the far greater part chosen by the country were by him excluded, thought it not fit that it should be continued, and therefore by not confirming of it, they null it; and not only so, but also they make further provision, That all ejected ministers whatsoever, married or unmarried, not having 30*l.* per annum, or 500*l.* in personal estate, might be capable of receiving fifths: which fifths the Commissioners by virtue of that act, were required to allow them, which I believe was no good news either to the Marlborough men or their doctors.

Sect. 5. Having such grounds for my claim, I repair to Sarum, about March 17, 1657, for the assize being there held about that time, I had some confidence that I should find the Marlborough men and their Doctors there; nor was I disappointed of my expectation, for there I find them at the Three Swans, sitting in Mr. Byfield's lodging; and being told that my application to them must be by way of petitioning, I employed one, who was a kind of a clerk to them, to draw it up in their usual form, which he did in these words; 'Sheweth, That your petitioner being by your lawful authority displaced from,' &c. which word 'lawful,' a friend of mine, being somewhat acquainted with their proceedings, did somewhat stomach at; which dislike being perceived, their clerk (belike knowing that lawful was not a word which belonged to his masters, the Commissioners and Doctors) was content to strike out, and so it was, 'being by your authority displaced,' &c. wherein, according to the act I moved, 1. for a fifths. And, 2. That to be allowed from the time of my ejection, which was above a year and half before. And 3, in regard I lived in Bath, which was in another county, and a day's journey from any place where they usually sat, I moved that this might be settled at this their present sitting. In order whereunto I had then some with me, who proffered themselves to be tenants to my vicarage at 100*l.* per annum; for the payment whereof there would have been better security given than 3 or 4 of the Marlborough men should have given out of that estate which is lawfully theirs. Now Mr. Chambers hearing Henry Sheyler

(for so was his name that made this proffer) promising 100*l.* and having heedfully eyed him all the time, asks (belike fearing that the Commissioners should have forgotten so necessary a question) Whether he were sufficient? it is like he meant, to pay the rent, which he proffered. And here to see how these Doctors, Mr. Byfield, and Mr. Chambers, concurred in questions fundamentals. What is your living worth a year, quoth Mr. Byfield? Is he sufficient to pay the rent, quoth Mr. Chambers? This business did in no wise concern Mr. Chambers, unless he mistook the examination of the sufficiency of the tenant, for an examination of the sufficiency of the minister. But it may be that the old business of this leaving Claverton and going to Pewsie, did yet stick in the Doctor's stomach, and therefore having undone me in the gross before, he now improves his spite, to undo me by retail. Let me here observe something unto thee touching this Doctor, and such as himself. When they are at any time questioned touching their leaving of their first livings, which many of them have done) these livings being of but a small value, and then intruding themselves into other livings, and the livings of others, 'per fas, aut nefas,' right or wrong; and those such which are of a greater value than their own livings, which they had repudiated: or when they labour for augmentations, or unions of two or three parishes into one, (these men will abhor Pluralities as odious as bigamy) and all for their own profit: in excuse for their shifting and changing, or consolidating, they will tell you either that the former air did not agree with them; or that by the exchange, they might win more souls, or (with more truth and plainness) that they were even enforced to this change for a comfortable maintenance for themselves and theirs, which their own livings could not supply them with. And yet these very men (the Doctor for one) have no such weights or measures for others. And when I say others, I mean ministers, and such (I speak not of myself) who are every whit as deserving as themselves: whom they can be content, not only unjustly to thrust out of all, but also to defraud of that small pittance, a fifths, which the modern laws hath allowed them; measuring unto us by the small Ephah, but weighing to themselves by the great Shekel. The Doctor must give me leave to tell him, that I have read of such who were of this judgment, that right and property to a thing were founded in grace; and that all men were usurpers who were not of the Godly. Now we know well to whom this epithet, Godly, hath been by some men appropriated in these latter years, and for what purposes: and therefore might the Doctor be so fierce against me, as one (I being not of their mark) on whom even an alms were cast away.

Sect. 5. Mr. Blisset had his fling at us, at this time when Henry Sheyler offered 100*l.* per annum for the vicarage; saying to this purpose, that Mr. Stern did not make above 90*l.* per annum of it. It seems that Mr. Blisset was well acquainted with Mr. Stern's receipts, and I doubt not but that he and his son William, have been well acquainted with some of Mr. Stern's disbursements likewise. But at this time at Sarum there was nothing done, for notwithstanding I had procured one who professed himself to be a tenant to my means under such a rent, and in regard of the distance I then lived at, and the uncertainty of the time and place of their sitting, I urged for a dispatch at that time, yet as to my business nothing would be done, I being put off only with this answer, that I should come before them at some other time and place, whereof Mr. Stern should have notice, that they might hear what exceptions he had to make to my demands. This was a business which did not please them, and therefore they delay me, on purpose (belike) to tire me out: or in case I would be clamorous, they would so order it that my expences in waiting on them, should amount to as much as the fifths, which they intended to allow me.

Sect. 1. I was told the next morning, that their sitting would be at Marlborough, and that (if I would have any thing with them) I must appear before them there, where, notwithstanding the nomination of that place gave me an assurance of the justice which I should find, I appear according to an order I received from their agent Thomas Cox: They had by this time obtained an addition to the number of both Commissioners, and Ministers, so that now they needed not send, or go to Sarum for it, they having a Quorum of their own nearer hand. Upon this additional account there sat at this time Mr. John Keyns of Marlborough, and another, who then lived in the parish of Bradford, being one who hath varied his name so often, that it is hard for me to say, what is the right; but at that time he wrote his name John Randolph.

Sect. 2. Mr. Stern according to summons appeared there likewise, bringing with him Nicholas Spenser, and William Pinchin so often before-mentioned, all whose business was to make what exceptions they could to defraud me of a fifths, and a very gracious ear they had from the Commissioners. Mr. Stern's first exception was, that I had carried away many doors, which legally I could not remove. To which I answered, That I had removed no more than I brought, and that in case I had exceeded he was to seek his remedy elsewhere, this being no obstruction to me for a fifths. Upon this Mr. Byfield begins a very learned lawyer-like discourse of what he had heard in that case, and that was to this purpose, That in case the doors were hanged in jimmals so as not to be removed without drawing of a nail, that then legally they could not be removed, but if only in books, that then they might: in which judgment of his all parties did acquiesce: and indeed this speech of his minded me of some words which were frequent in the mouth of my predecessor Mr. Coren, (a man too much given to suits of law) who would often say, That he was better read in the Acts of Parliament than he was in the Acts of the Apostles. Another exception which they had against me, was non-obedience to their orders, and this was made by Nicholas Spenser, and to me (who asked what order it was) he answers, it was an order which he had received from the Commissioners but that he had left it at home, but added that he shewed me another order which I would not deliver back again to him; this order I had then about me, and a very wise one it was, for I was required at my peril to deliver up possession by such a time; and yet no person named to whom I should deliver it up; but this, as nothing to the purpose, was waved likewise. Another exception was, that I was worth 500*l.* and this was managed by Mr. Stern, and William Pinchin, Mr. Stern affirming that he had heard so, and William Pinchin affirming the like: possibly if he had been called upon another time, William Pinchin would have fetched trip, and if need were would have sworn that he had known that I had been worth 500*l.* but these exceptions signified but little, and therefore were soon waved likewise. The next thing we fall upon was the valuation: I have told thee formerly, that I brought one with me to Sarum who professed 100*l.* per annum for it, which proffer they were resolved not to accept of. And therefore they all employ their united forces to beat down the value of. Yea notwithstanding Nicholas Spenser and William Pinchin had not long before valued my vicarage at 86*l.* per annum, at the parish rate, yet are they not now ashamed to say it was too much, John Randolph giving them this hint that it did usually pinch on the parson's side. These men William Pinchin and Nicholas Spenser having the same measures for me as some men say they have for their customers, a greater and a less. If I am to pay a tax, then the vicarage is worth 86*l.* per annum, but if I am to receive fifths, then it is not worth so much. Nor did these Commissioners that I could perceive take any notice of this; unless it were to countenance it, although in thus saying they manifested themselves to be such as honest men should abhor to be, and just men should abhor to countenance: but honesty and justice were virtues neither in use nor credit either with the Commissioners, Doctors, or Witnesses. One thing more touching these men Nicholas Spenser and William Pinchin, it is this: It may be that it was not only to injure me that they thus laboured to beat down the price of my living; they might in this have some aim unto themselves: for so it was that Nicholas Spenser and William Pinchin shortly after this become tenants to Mr. Stern for it, and therefore it is like they did so much undervalue it, that they might rent it at the same rent.

valuation, Mr. Byfield sends for a large paper book, written, which afterwards I understood was his Domesday book, wherein he had the value of all the livings in the county: and turning to Box, he finds it valued at 80*l.* per ann. and so he stints all further debate touching the valuation, because (as he said) that valuation was given in upon oath; soon after which he falls to reading of that Ordinance of Parliament, which allowed a fifth to such ejected ministers who were married, for a maintenance of their wives and children, and then asks me whether I demanded a fifth by virtue of that? to which I replied with some indignation, that he knew that I did not, being unmarried. But I added further, that I demanded a fifth by virtue of an act made 1656. Upon which words of mine he asks me whether I had that act or not? my answer was that I had it, and seeing me about to pull it out and read it, he asks that they had it too; and thereupon amongst an heap of Acts, Ordinances, Orders, Depositions, Charges, a great tobacco box, pipes, candle and candlesticks, he finds it out, and reads it. Now to see the disposition of this precious scribe, I think we do him no wrong to conjecture that he therefore proposed that question to me, Have you the Act? with a purpose to have defeated me of a fifth if I had not had it by me. His spite towards me continues still; had it been to do me a discourtesy, doubtless that Act had been in a readiness, but now it was purposely suppressed, and had never been produced but upon constraint, to let us know thus much, that voluntarily or with a good will, he would do nothing but mischief; and that when he did any thing which was right, he was even enforced to it.

Sect. 4. And since he is gone, and that this was the last time that ever I saw him, I shall say no more but this of him (had he been living till this time, I should have said much more to him) which I found by mine own experience, that he seemed to be a man of a stirring spirit, and one that proposed no other end unto himself, but himself, nor scrupling any thing which he conceived conducive to that end, his desires (for so much as I could discern in him) being rather that he might be feared than loved. I seldom hear of any courtesy which he did to any, unless it were by accident, and out of a cross humour to others, who would have done some mischief without his consent: so that it may be said that he disliked not the injustice, but this, that any should do it without his approbation. I seldom come into the company but that he is much spoken of, and yet very little which is commendable; and since gone I think scarce missed, or lamented, or wished for by any, unless by such as the men of Marlborough or those who have enjoyed other men's livings, and desire to keep them: and as touching his lay Commissioners of Marlborough, I believe that they loved him as much as he loved them, and that was very little: and yet they kept a fair correspondency, which doubtless was because they could not be without each other, and so their mutual respects grew not from affection but interest. I cannot charge him with receiving either bribes or gratuities, as hay, horse, plate, money: possibly it was not covetousness which made him to be so mischievous, but an inbred malice in him. If I had known that a present would have prevailed with him, or had I been minded to have practised with him that way, I should have courted him with a handsome quantity of Spanish tobacco, to which he was the most immoderately and scandalously addicted, that ever I saw any man. And yet (considering how many livings he had got into; how many ministers he had displaced, and even starved, and that in his translations he ever had an eye to the barn, glebe, and flock of sheep, more than to the church) it may be conjectured, that he was of like passions with his brethren, of whom every countryman can now observe, that their religious cry hath been only for self-interest, that their removes are for their advantage in revenue, and that their gain is their godliness. All which notwithstanding, I have been told that he died but poor, unless it were in books, of which (and of very choice ones) he left a handsome library; and perchance for this very thing he died the poorer, it being thought that he came by his books as lawfully as he did by his living. To speak in short, I look upon him as a man who was mischievously bent against every body, yea, and that, all things duly considered, he was more mischievous to his friends than his foes; for (and here let me yoke up some of his fellow Commissioners and ministers to him) I believe that many a one of their witnesses in my business had not contracted upon their souls those horrid crimes of perjury and subornation, &c. had it not been for their countenance and encouragement. I believe that were he living, he would confess, that he did me as much mischief as he could; and yet I believe that one of the same tribe did me more, although he were more secret in it. If you desire to know any thing touching his religion, I think you must enquire of Hugh Peters, or Philip Nye, whom it is like (had he lived till this time) as he had been a confederate with them in their traitorous and mischievous actings, he might have born company in their punishments.

Sect. 5. But to return to mine own business, having withdrawn some time, that the Commissioners might consider of it, I was shortly called in again, and told by Mr. Bayly (for he was chairman at that time) that in lieu of a fifth, they had allowed me 12*l.* per annum to be paid half yearly; the first payment to be made on the 29th of September then next following, which was more than two years after I was ejected, and so to be paid by 6*l.* every half year, on 25th of March, and 29th of September until further order. I presumed that they intended not this as any courtesy to me, and therefore expected no thanks, being indeed worse towards me than the more civil sort of thieves, of whom I have heard, that having robbed men of all, they have yet upon their complaint restored them again a considerable part of it. For this Order, Mr. Blisset's son William would needs have 2s. 6d. which I told him, was more than I should make of it. And since I have mentioned this Order, let me observe something unto thee, touching the Commissioners who made it: and all shall be to acquaint thee with the fittingness of these men to be employed in matters of the meanest trust; and how little they regard a parliamentary power, unless it be to serve themselves by it. For 1, they were by that act to allow me a fifth, and yet all things considered, they did not allow me a tenth. 2. This they were to allow me, if not from the time of my ejection, yet from the time that the act commenced, which was in Sept. 1656, and yet they allow me nothing till two years after. 3. They were by this act to settle this allowance to me during my life, whereas this was only 'till further order.' And indeed this same until further order, was in much use with them; and I believe that it brought them in many a round sum. If any were discharged, it was only 'until further order;' if any fifths were granted, it was 'until further order;' they ever kept us in a dependance and awe of them: and doubtless men's good behaviour was looked upon, accordingly as they or their wives were remembered: and indeed, as to myself, this same 'until further order,' cost me and my friends (considering how many journeys we made, how great expences we were at) even as much as the fifths came to, for we made one journey to Sarum, and two to Marlborough, before we could receive a penny. I remember that Mr. Bisset, when the Order was read, says (having pulled down his hat, and looking upon the table) that I had put Mr. Stern to a great deal of charge, and seemed to intimate, that therefore they allowed me no more for a fifth. And here to see how this treasurer chargeth me with his crimes: for it was he and his son who had put Mr. Stern to so much charge, and not I. For,

Sect. 6. Beside the 20*l.* which Mr. Blisset had from him, of which I have spoken already, they (as Mr. Stern reported it) demanded another round sum of him for their incident charges for thrusting me out: and upon this occasion Mr. Stern reported it, when Michaelmas was come, and that small pittance which they allotted me for a fifth became due, I employed some friends to demand it in my name, and to receive it to my use, by virtue of that order; to whom Mr. Stern makes his answer to this purpose, that he excepted not against the order, but that he expected that I should pay a fifth part to all taxes wherewithal he was charged: and being demanded what those charges were, he answers, That the Commissioners demanded 15*l.* of him for their incident charges in thrusting me out, of which he expected that I should pay a fifth part. Now I believe that Mr. Stern would never have spoken those words, unless his dear friends of Marlborough had hinted some such thing unto him; and that they would have stood by him in it, and have made it good: for notwithstanding, when my brother had told them of it, they seemed to make strange of it, and to be unwilling to own it, yet all this might be, because they were then under another influence; their 'polished shaft,' Oliver, was dead; and his son Richard, their 'plant of renown,' had called a parliament, which was at that time sitting, amongst whom there were many persons of honour; who (as I have been told) had a resolution to question these Commissioners, both touching their power and their actings; which was enough to make the Marlborough men to tremble, and possibly therefore they change their note, because the times were changed.

Sect. 7. I must tell thee likewise, that some of the witnesses who were so fierce against me, (reflecting belike on their own merits, and learning of the Commissioners) demanded and received from Mr. Stern, as he hath told me, considerable sums for their incident charges which they had been at in appearing so often against me, to swear me out of my living: conceiving belike, that if the Commissioners were so well paid for their injustice, then might they expect to be paid for their perjuries: and (considering the conditions of some of them) I believe that they did not (as some poor, cheap knights of the post) swear at a low rate, or for a few sixpences or shillings. William Pinchin doubtless knew how to value his oaths as well as he did his bread and cheese; and much according to those soldiers in the gospel, that would not be hired to bear false witness, but for large money.

Sect. 8. And clearly those words of Mr. Stern, that he expected that I should pay a fifth of their incident charges, put me in mind of something which I had read of Phocion of Athens, who being unjustly condemned to death, was afterward enforced to buy his poison, and to be at charges for his own execution: these men serving me in the same manner: for (as not content to take away all that I had) they would have made me pay them for undoing of me. And as in this, so in another particular likewise: for (as thinking they had not enough undone, in turning me out of my house, on the reparations whereof, and the mounds, I had laid out near 100*l.*) Mr. Stern prefers a bill against me in the Exchequer, (I guess being encouraged thereunto by these men) for dilapidations, to the value of more than I think he is honestly worth. Now I cannot think that Mr. Stern ever would have preferred such a bill against me, unless it had been upon their encouragement; nor do I believe that they would have encouraged him thereunto, unless they had thought with the wise ones in the Psalm, that they should never be moved; their long success in their wickednesses having possessed them with that delusion, that God did own them for his; and from this consideration, that the divine power made use of them as the instruments of his displeasure, to correct others by, (which sober men take to be an argument of his displeasure, rather than of his favour) they forthwith sooth themselves up that they were his beloved ones. These men little dreaming that their foundation was laid upon Oliver: and that Oliver's foundation was laid upon the most unparalleled wickedness that this land was ever guilty of: and that a building raised upon wickedness is never without a woe; and that the higher such a building is carried up, the nearer it is to ruin.

Sect. 9. I told thee but a little before, that Mr. Stern preferred a bill in the Exchequer against me for dilapidations: I must tell thee now, that upon my answer he forbears to proceed, as likewise the reason why he let his suit fall. When the bill was dismissed the court, for want of prosecution, I had a subpoena for cost for non-prosecution, which an attorney serving upon him, asks him, what his reason was that (since he had began his suit) he did not go on with it? To whom Mr. Stern makes his answer to this purpose; that the times were various, every month bringing forth some change, and that this was it which made him give over; for, said he, should it come to that pass, that 'Carolus 'Dei gratia' should be written instead of 'Custodes Libertatis Angliæ, actum esset,' all his hopes would perish: from which words of his it is evident enough, that he himself distrusted his own case, if proceedings should come to be legal; and that all the hopes he had that his suit should succeed, was only from this, that wickedness should still prevail; for that then he might expect to find such barons in the Exchequer, as he had found Commissioners at Marlborough.

Sect. 10. I have not yet done with this 15*l.* charges incident (and when I have done with that I have done with all) for let me now observe to thee, what a beneficial trade these Marlborough men made of it, let the wind sit which way it would. I think in this particular, out-doing the Jews themselves, for they would so far improve their opportunities, that fall out what could, they would turn it to their advantage: for were it that ministers were summoned, or not summoned before them, ejected or not ejected, yet, be the chance what it could be, it proved always to be a winning cast for them.

I shall say but little of the former, because it never was mine own case, yet there are those whom I know, that can tell you how often Tho. Cox their agent, visited them, and what his business was, what dangers he sets before them, and what advice he gives to prevent or remove those dangers; in brief the business is, Una cademq; manus—some quarterly feeling, he must be paid for preventing that storm which was of his own raising. And then for those who had been summoned to appear before them, I have told thee that all the discharge which they had, was only 'until further order;' which must needs keep them in a continual fear, and force them to a continual charge: nothing was too good, nothing too much for these Marlborough men and their wives. And now as touching such who were in my condition ejected, they had that art, that if they could get nothing by keeping of them in, they would be sure to get by turning them out. And here I can speak upon mine own knowledge, 20*l.* Mr. Blisset had, I know not for what else, for putting Mr. Stern in, and 15*l.* they demanded for thrusting me out; it is good being a hangman upon such terms; and unquestionless this was enough to make me scandalous, because I would not daub, and they were resolved to get by me one way or other. I have read of several persons, who in this particular, have been somewhat like these Commissioners; but the fittest example for them, is that of some sheep stealers that I have heard of, who have been so mischievously thievish, that they would destroy the sheep for no other cause, but that they might have the wool. And now one would think that they had undone me as much as possible, and yet Mr. Stern hath told me that he is a greater loser than myself, that I am 400*l.* the worse, but that he is 500*l.* the worse; so that to me he seems to have met with some of such a disposition whereof I have heard a miller to be, who stole five pecks out of a bushel. And if it be as Mr. Stern reported it, Mr. Blisset hath not been wanting to himself in this business: for he hath not only made the Vicarage of Box bring him in plentiful returns to his treasury for the present; but also he hath so providently provided it, that it shall yield him a crop after we are dead and gone; for as Mr. Stern told me, he hath gotten the next presentation to the place; so that now it is not to be wondered, that he ruined me first, and, after he had received his largess from him, cared not how soon Mr. Stern were gone from the place, in order whereunto it was endeavoured, that he should be made weary of it; because his turn was next: and so upon Mr. Stern's avoidance, he might make use and benefit of his presentation. These, Mr. Blisset, are circumstances that supersede all former circumstances whatsoever.

And now by way of conclusion, I had thought to have addressed myself to our renowned patriots now sitting in the High Court of Parliament, and humbly to have begged this piece of justice from them, That they (who call greater oppressors to an account, and force them to cast up their ill-gotten morsels, the incomes of their oppressions, bribery, perjury, subornations and the price of blood) would not think it below them to look upon such men as these: in their places indeed much inferior, but to their power altogether as mischievous. Nor should I have any aim or end of mine own in it; neither reparation nor satisfaction for my losses sustained, should I have looked for. Only this I conceive most equitable, that if I were content to sit down quietly by my losses unjustly sustained, then should they be inforced to surrender up those guins, which they have unjustly got, it would be too great a temptation to future ages to make them adventure on the like, if they should hear that such who were guilty of such horrid crimes, should yet go clearly off with the profits of their wickedness. But since his Majesty's gracious pardon may extend even to these; I shall not go about either to enumerate their crimes, or to aggravate them. May they enjoy, if it be lawful to wish so, the returns of their injustice. May Mr Blisset and his Marlborough friends, thrive better by their Commissioner-ship, than they are likely to do by their purchase at Purton. Yet this may we say safely of them, although we can call them to no other account; that they are such as those of whom the poet speaks:

Criminibus debent hortos, pratoria, menas.

Juv. Sat. 1.

They owe to their own crimes for their estates. And further let me tell them, that notwithstanding the Querela, the Question or complaint against them, for those crimes, be taken away; yet that the Culpa, the Guilt of them still remains upon their souls. Yea, and further yet let me add, that notwithstanding the Querela were remitted unto them without their repentance, or perchance so much as their desire, yet that their Culpa, their Guilt will not.

Proceedings against Dr. JOHN POCKLINGTON, for Innovations into the Church of England: 17 CHARLES I. A. D. 1641.

PETITION to the Right Honourable, the Lords of the Upper House of Parliament, the humble Petition of I. H. [Harvey one of Pocklington's parishioners] of Cardington in the County of Bedford, Gentleman.

“Humbly sheweth; That John Pocklington

* Several particulars of the Proceedings against Manwaring, are inserted from the Journals into Mr. Hatsell's Precedents, vol. 4, pp. 124, et seq.: where it appears, that on June 12, 1628, a Message from the Commons was sent to the Lords,

“In consequence of its appearing, That the book complained of, had been ‘printed by the king's command,’ and was to desire the Lords to enquire, by what means this command was obtained; and, when the Lords shall have found the party who gave the warrant, the Commons demand to have him punished with as much severity, or more, than Doctor Manwaring himself.—Upon examining into this matter, on the 12th and 14th of June, it came out that Doctor Laud, Bishop of Bath and Wells, had signified the king's express command to the Bishop of London, that the sermon should be printed.—And this declaration of the king's pleasure, confessed by Bishop Laud, is confirmed by the earl of Montgomery, the duke of Buckingham, and the earls of Suffolk and Dorset, who protested on their honours, ‘That they had since heard

Doctor of Divinity, rector of the parish church of Yelden in the county of Bedford, vicar of Waresly in the county of Huntington, prebend of Lincoln, Peterborough and Windsor, hath been a chief author and ringleader in all those innovations which have of late flowed into the church of England: for,

‘his majesty affirm as much.’—Notwithstanding this, the Lords, on the 16th of June, address the king, that he will order this book to be burnt, and will give directions for prohibiting the printing of it.—To which address, on the 18th of June, the king returns for answer, ‘That he is well pleased at the Lords' request to suppress the book, and to forbid its being printed again, and has ordered a Proclamation accordingly.’”

“It may not be amiss,” Mr. Hatsell observes, “to add, that within a few days after this transaction, Bishop Laud was translated to London; and, in 1635, Doctor Manwaring was made Bishop of St. David's; and this, though one of the articles of the judgment pronounced against him was, ‘That he shall be for ever disabled to have any ecclesiastical dignity, or secular office.’ On the 18th of April, 1640, in the next Parliament that met after this transaction, the Lords took up this business again; and, having read the declaration of the Commons against the now Bishop of St. David's, and the sentence of the Lords, they refer the whole to their Committee of Privileges, with leave to the Bishop to alledge any thing before the said Committee, on his part, either by pardon, licence, or otherwise. On the 21st of April, they order the records to be brought, that the House may determine this cause. But on the 28th of April, the king sends a message by the Lord Keeper, 'That his majesty, understanding there was some question concerning Doctor Manwaring, now Bishop of St. David's, had given command that the said Doctor Manwaring shall not come and sit in parliament, nor send any proxy to the parliament.' Thereupon, it was ordered to be entered so. Lords' Journal. I do not recollect to have seen this last very extraordinary, and illegal, exercise of the king's authority taken notice of in any history. See further, Commons' Journal, the 23rd of Feb. 1640."

This note was designed for insertion in Manwaring's Case, but was accidentally omitted there.

* "The remissness of Abbot and of other bishops by his example, had introduced, or at least connived at a negligence, that gave great scandal to the church, and no doubt offended very many pious men. The people took so little care of the churches, and the parsons as little of the chancels, that, instead of beautifying, or adorning them in any degree, they rarely provided against the falling of many of their churches; and suffered them at least to be kept so indecently, and slovenly, that they would not have endured it in the ordinary offices of their own houses; the rain and the wind to infect them; and the Sacraments themselves to be administered where the people had most mind to receive them. This profane liberty and uncleanness, the arch-bishop resolved to reform with all expedition, requiring the other bishops to concur with him in so pious a work; and the work sure was very grateful to all men of devotion: yet, I know not how, the prosecution of it with too much affectation of expence, it may be, or with too much passion between the ministers and the parishioners, raised an evil spirit towards the church, which the enemies of it took much advantage of, as soon as they had an opportunity to make the worst use of it.

"The removing the Communion Table out of the body of the church, where it had used to stand, and to be applied to all uses, and fixing it to one place in the upper end of the chancel, which frequently made the buying a new table to be necessary; the inclosing it with a rail of joiner's work, and thereby fencing it from the approach of dogs, and all servile uses; the obliging all persons to come up to those rails to receive the Sacrament, how acceptable soever to grave and intelligent persons, who loved order and decency (for acceptable it was to such) yet introduced first murmurings amongst the people (upon the very charge and expence of it) and if the minister were not a man of discretion and reputation to compose, and reconcile those indispositions (as too frequently he was not, and rather inflamed, and increased the distemper) it begot suits, and appeals at law. The opinion that there was no necessity of doing any thing, and the complaint that there was too much done, brought the power and jurisdiction that imposed the doing of it, to be called in question, contradicted, and opposed. Then the manner, and gesture, and posture, in the celebration of it, brought in new disputes, and administered new subjects of offence, according to the custom of the place, and humour of the people: and those disputes brought in new words and terms (altar, adoration, and genuflexion, and other expressions) for the more perspicuous carrying on those disputations. New books were written for, and against this new practice, with the same earnestness, and contention for victory, as if the life of Christianity had been at stake. Besides, there was not an equal concurrence, in the prosecution of this matter, amongst the bishops themselves; some of them proceeding more remissly in it, and some not only neglecting to direct any thing to be done towards it, but restraining those who had a mind to it, from meddling in it. And this again produced as inconvenient disputes, when the subordinate clergy would take upon them, not only without the direction of their diocesans, but expressly against their injunctions, to make those alterations and reformations themselves, and by their own authority.

"The arch bishop, guided purely by his zeal, and reverence for the place of God's service, and by the canons, and injunctions of the church, with the custom observed in the king's chapel, and in most cathedral churches, without considering the long intermission, and discontinuance, in many other places, prosecuted this affair more passionately than was fit for the season; and had prejudice against those, who out of fear, or foresight, or not understanding the thing, had not the same warmth to promote it. The bishops who had been preferred by his favour, or hoped to be so, were at least as solicitous to bring it to pass in their several dioceses; and some of them with more passion, and less circumspection, than they had his example for, or than he approved; prosecuting those who opposed them, very fiercely, and sometimes unwarrantably, which was kept in remembrance. Whilst other bishops, not so many in number, or so valuable in weight, who had not been beholding to him, nor had hope of being so, were enough contented to give perfunctory orders for the doing it, and to see the execution of those orders not minded; and not the less pleased to find, that the preju-

3. "He shews more outward reverence to the altar, than to the name of God: for one time in the church protesting before God, and his holy altar, when he made mention of the altar, he turned himself towards it, and made low obeysance before it, but at the name of God he shewed no such respect.

4. "He hath placed a cross in a cloth behind the altar, called the altar cloth.

5. "He useth much to magnify the cross; and once in his sermon speaking of Moses his prayer against Amalek, he said, that Moses spread forth his arms in the form of a cross, and that that posture of his was more available with God than his prayer.

6. "He hath caused a bell to be hung up in his chancel, called a sacring-bell, which the clerk always rings at the going up to second service, which he performs with variety of postures, sometimes turning his face towards the South, sometimes towards the East, and sometimes towards the West.

7. "He hath caused two cloaths to be made, which he calls corporals, and these he useth to lay over the bread in the Sacrament; and each of these hath five crosses on it, one at each corner, and one in the middle.

"8. That he refused to give the Sacrament on Easter-day, anno 1638, to twelve or four-dice of that whole transaction reflected solely upon the archbishop.

"The bishop of Lincoln (Williams) who had heretofore been Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, and generally unacceptable whilst he held that office, was, since his disgrace at Court, and prosecution from thence, become very popular; and having several faults objected to him, the punishment whereof threatened him every day, he was very willing to change the scene, and to be brought upon the stage for opposing these innovations (as he called them) in religion. It was an unlucky word, and cozened very many honest men into apprehensions very prejudicial to the king, and to the church. He published a discourse and treatise against the matter, and manner of the prosecution of that business; a book so full of good learning, and that learning so close, and solidly applied (though it abounded with too many light expressions) that it gained him reputation enough to be able to do hurt; and shewed that, in his retirement, he had spent his time with his books very profitably. He used all the wit, and all the malice he could, to awaken the people to a jealousy of these agitations, and innovations in the exercise of religion; not without insinuations that it aimed at greater alterations, for which he knew the people would quickly find a name; and he was ambitious to have it believed, that the archbishop was his greatest enemy, for his having constantly opposed his rising to any government in the church, as a man, whose hot and hasty spirit he had long known." Clarendon.

teen of his parishioners, though they had acquainted him before, that they intended to receive on that day, according to their usual custom; and though at the time of the administration of the Sacrament, even from the beginning thereof to the end, they kneeled at the rails, for otherwise he would not administer it to them at any time, yet he still passed them by, and sent them away without it, to their great reproach and discomfort: having no just cause so to do.

"9. He hath also composed and published two books or pamphlets, the one intituled "Sunday no Sabbath," the other "Altare Christianum," wherein he justifies and defends all those innovations in religion that have been unhappily introduced into this church, which also he practises by himself; and besides, in those books he asserts and maintains divers wicked, Popish and Antichristian points, to the great danger and damage of this church and state; justifies sundry popish canonized saints for true saints and Martyrs of God, and censures our own English Martyrs (mentioned in Master Fox's Calender, before his book of Acts and Monuments, set forth by the public authority, and approved by the whole convocation anno 1579,) for traitors, murderers, rebels and heretics.

"May it therefore please this honourable house, to take the premises into your just and pious consideration, and to convert the said Doctor Pocklington before you, to answer the same, that so he may receive such condign and exemplary punishment, as may deter all others from the like dangerous attempts and innovations: and your Petitioner* shall ever pray, &c."

The first eight of these Articles being evidently proved against him, and also acknowledged by himself; the ninth was thus managed against him, as follows.

A Discovery and Declaration of divers wicked, Popish and Antichristian innovations and doctrines, published and taught, and peremptorily affirmed and defended by JOHN POCKLINGTON, D. D. to the great dishonour of God, the great reproach and scandal of true religion, and to the great hurt and danger of the Church of England: collected word for word out of his own books, viz. "Altare Christianum," and "Sunday no Sabbath;" and humbly presented to the knowledge, consideration, and just sentence of the right honourable the Lords of the higher house of parliament.

1. Touching Churches.

1. He affirms and maintains the dedication and consecration of them by prayers: and that, as he saith, from the doctrines and decrees of Popes of the first and best times, and confirmed by the doctrine and practice of the holy Catholic church. And he censures the Centurists for bold and impious, because they condemn and brand such kind of Popish consecration of wood and stones, for the mystery of iniquity, Alt. Chr. c. 10, p. 52.

* See Oldmixon's Hist. of England under the Stuarts, vol. 1. p. 165, where it is said that for the rare doctrine of "Sunday no Sabbath," he (Harvey) was made the king's chaplain.

Now such consecration is contrary to the statute of Ed. 6, c. 10, and 1 Eliz. c. 2, and 8 Eliz. c. 1, which abolisheth and inhibits all other rights and ceremonies and forms of consecration (with all Popish ceremonies and pontificals, wherein the manner of consecrating churches, chapels, and church-yards is prescribed) but such as are only prescribed in the books of Common Prayer and ordination, wherein there is not one word touching any such consecration of churches, chapels, and altars, as this man would have.

2. He teaches and affirms, that the distinction of places in the church is very ancient, and observed even from the Apostles times; and that several places in the church were appointed for the Clergy, and for the Laity, Alt. Chr. c. 8, p. 43, 44. And these several places had several degrees of holiness. Auditorium was the place for the laity, and that was less holy; but Presbyterium was the place for the clergy, and this was more holy. And in the holy place, namely the Chancel or Presbytery, there was a throne or chair placed.

3. But he bethinks himself, and saith, that this chair was not in all churches, but only in the churches of bishops; and that such a chair was in the church of Jerusalem and Rome: and then after affirms that the succession of bishops in such a chair, was one thing that kept Saint Augustine from departing out of the bosom of the Catholick church; for he brings him in, saying thus, The succession of priests from Saint Peter keeps me of right in the church: the name of this Catholic see, that is, of Rome, keeps me in, Alt. Chr. p. 47.

And again, Sunday no Sabbath, p. 2, he saith, that the succession of bishops from the seat of Peter is that which keeps us in the church's lap.

Moreover, he saith touching this succession in the chair, that the very note whereby heretics were known from catholics, was, that the catholics could shew their churches and the very chairs in them; wherein there was not only a moral succession in purity of faith and manners, but a local succession of bishops continued, Alt. Chr. p. 47.

Again, he saith, that they that say there were no material churches till 200 years after Christ, are more injurious to the church than they are aware; for if in all this time there were no material churches, then there could be no material chair, then no real inthronization, then no personal succession from the apostles, whereby the right faith was derived from God the Father to his Son, and from the Son to his apostles, and from the apostles to succeeding bishops, Alt.

VOL. V.

Chr. p. 49. And a little after he saith, they that deprive us of the benefit of this apostolical tradition, pluck one staff out of our hands, whereby we stay ourselves from falling from the true catholic church, and beat all heretics out of our communion.

Miserable were we, if he that sitteth now archbishop of Canterbury could not derive his succession from St. Augustine, St. Augustine from St. Gregory, St. Gregory from St. Peter.*

* The uninterrupted succession by imposition of hands of the Clergy of the Church of England from the Apostles (which is by some supposed to give particular efficacy to their ordination, and, indeed, to be essential to the validity of Orders) has been much litigated. See the Church Histories and "Brett's Divine Right of Episcopacy," &c. Lond. 1728. "Williams's Succession of Protestant Bishops asserted, &c." also his 'Translation of Le Courayer's Defence of the Validity of the English Ordinations, and of the Succession of the Bishops in the Church of England, 2d ed. Lond. 1728,' and his translation of "Le Courayer's Defence of his former Treatise," published in the same year: together with the other books mentioned in these works. Le Courayer for his part in this controversy was persecuted in France, and took refuge in England, where the University of Oxford conferred on him, by Diploma, the degree of Doctor in Divinity. In Ward's Errata of the Protestant Bible, printed in 1688, and lately republished in Ireland, it is asserted that Bishops, Priests and Deacons, being Protestants, are without consecration, ordination, mission, succession, and pastoral jurisdiction; and that all those and their flocks are guilty of sacrilege. See also "Certain Accusations brought recently by Irish Papists against British and Irish Protestants of every denomination, examined by Thomas Kipling, D. D. Dean of Peterborough," London, 1809. In the Church of Rome, Orders are one of the Seven Sacraments. At the time of the Reformation, their sacramental character was much disputed. In the "Institution of a Christian Man" Orders, Matrimony, Confirmation and Extreme Unction are recognised as Sacraments, but declared to be of inferior consideration to the other three, viz. Baptism, the Eucharist, and Penance. It was at length determined that none but Baptism and the Lord's Supper are Sacraments. See the twenty-fifth of the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion. In the Church's Catechism, however, it does not seem to be absolutely affirmed that these two are the only Sacraments, but rather that no others are generally necessary to salvation. The sacramental character of Orders was discussed in both houses of parliament during the debates upon the bill for removing doubts respecting the eligibility of persons in Holy Orders to sit in the House of Commons, (st. 41 G. 3, (U. K.) c. 63,) and upon a motion for the issue of a new writ for the Borough of Old Sarum, made in the House of Commons, May 4th, 1801, see Cobb. Parl. Hist. See also upon the sacramental

What a comfort is this to his Grace, and to all those that receive consecration from him, and to all those that they shall ordain, when they remember that his Grace can say, 'Ego sum hæres apostolorum,' &c. here I and my predecessors have kept possession, here are my evidences that I have to show, that I have received the right faith from the true owner. All this he saith, Alt. Chr. c. 9. p. 50.*

So that he makes succession to evidence faith, and not the true faith to evidence succession, which is downright Popish.

And in his 'Sunday no Sabbath,' p. 48, he speaks to the same purpose in these words:—In this sort Augustine confounds the Donatists and Sectaries of his time, saying, 'Numerate Sacerdotes,' &c. reckon up your Priests, who succeeded one another after St. Peter in his chair; if you will be esteemed members of the Church. Hereby we may by God's mercy make good the truth of our Church; for we are able lineally to set down the succession of our Bishops, from St. Peter to St. Gregory, and from him to our first Archbishop St. Augustin, and so downward to his Grace that now sits in his Chair, Primate of all England and Metropolitan.

So that he makes the succession of Bishops from St. Peter and the See of Rome, to be a sure and infallible sign of the true Church, and herein shews himself to be a perfect Papist.

All this he speaks by occasion of the Bishop's chair, which he saith is placed in the Chancel, which is a degree holier than the body of the Church.

4. But yet he affirms a holier place than both these, and that he calls 'Sacrarium,' or 'sanctum sanctorum,' the holy of holies, and this he thus describes; it is a place at the upper end of the Chancel, inclosed and railed in from the rest of the Chancel, whereinto none may enter but the Priests themselves, and none else, no not the King, without a dispensation. This he clears, as he saith, out of the history of Theodosius the Emperor, who when the time of offering gifts was come, rose up, and with tears went into the holy place, and after his oblation stood within the rails: but St. Ambrose, saith he, put him in mind of the difference of places, and told him that that part of the Sacrarium or Chancel within the rails, was only for Priests, and no other might enter in there, or so much as touch them. And so he, fair and mannerly, bad the nature of Orders and the indelible character of the Priesthood, (which seems to be derived from it) Campbell's Lectures upon Ecclesiastical History.

The objection to the English Orders derived from the story of the Nag's Head ordination (as it is called, perhaps consecration or episcopation would be a more exact name) seems to be extremely refined and subtle; since it does not appear to be questioned that Parker and his brethren had been apostolically ordained Deacons and Priests.

* See vol. 4, p. 515, Laud's Case.

King go forth, and stand with the rest of the common people, which accordingly he did. Alt. Ch. p. 81.

2. Touching Altars.

1. He affirms, that we ought to have in the Church a real, material, proper Altar, Alt. Chr. p. 13. And again he saith, we have an earthly Altar here on earth, on which tithes, and offerings, and such earthly things were at first dedicated and consecrated, to maintain the earthly bodies of Priests, whose bodies serve at God's Altar. Alt. Chr. p. 9.

2. For the manner how Altars came into the Christian Church, he saith that no man of judgment or learning, though he looked over antiquity, as the devil looked over Lincoln, will say, and justify, that Altars crept into the Church; but the governors of Christ's Church, and the true and only successors of the Apostles (sure he means the Pope of Rome) brought them in by the special direction of God's holy spirit, Alt. Chr. c. 21, p. 141.

To affirm that God's spirit directed the bringing in of material and proper altars into the Christian Church, is to slander the Holy Ghost, seeing the spirit of God never taught any man in any age, any other thing but that which Christ taught in the days of his flesh; as appears Joh. 14. 26. Now Christ never taught any thing of earthly and material altars in the Christian Church; and therefore that spirit that teacheth any such thing is not the spirit of Christ, but of Antichrist.

3. For the necessity of Altars, he would make that appear in this regard, because without them, he saith, there can be no consecration; the Eucharist, saith he, cannot elsewhere be consecrated but on an Altar, Alt. Chr. p. 27.

This he affirms stoutly in his Sunday no Sabbath, p. 48, and in his Alt. Chr. c. 12, p. 75. 76. that where there is no Altar there can be no consecration. And he saith touching the Primitive Church, that if they had no Altar, then they had no Eucharist to deliver; or if they delivered it, they gave it before it was consecrated; for they had no Church nor Altar to consecrate the same upon, and 'Eucharistia in Altari consecratur,' we are sure out of all antiquity, that the Eucharist must be consecrated on an Altar.

From which desperate assertion, it must needs follow, that Christ did not deliver the Eucharist to the Apostles, nor they to the faithful, or else that it was not consecrated, as he saith, when he delivered it, seeing it is most evident by Scripture that Christ and his Apostles had no altars, but tables, and did institute and administer the Sacrament on a table in an upper chamber, and not at an altar in a church. And again, according to this doctrine the Church of England for this fourscore years hath had no Sacraments, for it hath had no altars, and without altars, saith he, no Sacraments.

Again, he speaks farther, St. Cyprian tells you, saith he, that the use of altars is to sup-tify the Eucharist upon, and that without an altar it cannot be consecrated, and therefore Heretics have no Sacraments among them, because they have no altars, Alt. Chr. c. 24, p. 17.

Here he affirms that the altar doth sanctify the Sacrament, which is no less than blasphemy: for as by Christ's own words it is plain, that which sanctifies the offering, is greater than the offering which is sanctified; and so he makes a wooden or stony altar greater than Christ, which is, as he saith, the sacrifice offered.

Again, he saith, Heretics have no altars, whereby he intimates that the Church of England is heretical, because that hath no altars.

4. For the place of the altar, he saith, it is Sacrarium or the Holy of Holies, and that the altar is not to stand in the body of the church, among the people; but, saith he, let it stand as the governors of our church appoint it, at the upper end of the quire, or in the highest or most eminent place of the chancel, where reason and piety ever placed it, in the Eastern Church; the practice whereof Englishmen and Britons ought to follow, to express thereby their concord and agreement with the Primitive Church, where St. Peter's chair was set, except some diptiches can be produced for the derivation of our faith and religion, more ancient and authentical than from St. Elutherius and St. Gregory.

So that this man derives our faith and religion not from Christ the Son of God, but from two Popes, Elutherius and Gregory; and this Christian faith and religion, he makes to consist in the placing the Communion-table altar-wise, at the upper end of the chancel.

5. For the matter of altars, he saith, these altars are some of them of stone; 'quia Christus est lapis angularis,' because Christ is a corner-stone: and some of them of wood, the better to express his death on the tree. Sund. no Sab. p. 43.

6. For the ornaments of them, he saith; they are to have their carpets, corporals, veils and rails, Alt. Chr. p. 15.

And touching corporals, he saith thus, Pope Pius maketh mention of altars and of a linen cloth or corporal spread upon altars: whereunto the practice of the church agrees (sure he means here, as in other places, the church of Rome; for it is not the practice of the church of England) for 'Corpus Domini non in sericis sed in syndone munda consecratur:' and to strengthen this, he adds the constitution of Pope Sylvester, who ordained (saith he) that the sacrifice of the altar should not be consecrated in silk or dyed cloth, but only in linen, as his dead body was buried in clean linen. And thus he makes way to Christ's corporal presence in the Sacrament. Alt. Chr. p. 7.

7. For the praise of altars, he saith, that they are the seats and chairs of state, where the Lord vouchsafeth to place himself among us; for what is the altar but the seat of the body and blood of Christ? And these have been in all ages greatly honoured and regarded of the most wise, most learned, and most blessed Saints of God. Alt. Chr. c. 22, p. 143, and 159.

8. For the reverence and worship of altars, he saith, that when the church was consecrated, the altar was the chiefest place, which with most ceremony and devotion was hallowed; and so rites of the greatest sanctity were given to the altar, Alt. Chr. c. 21, p. 141, 142. And that the priests themselves durst not ascend thither, without doing lowly reverence three several times; yea, some, he saith, did willingly fall down and kiss the holy altar. All which he propounds to our imitation; and when all this is done, he saith, altars are no otherwise used in our church than the most holy fathers that ever lived, used them, Alt. Chr. c. 21, p. 144.

And again, c. 22, p. 152, he saith, if the types of these altars were had in singular honour among the Jews, then the substance ought to be had in much more honour among Christians.

The Jews never bowed to or before their altars, though erected and consecrated by God's own institution; much less then should we do it, to or before altars set up and hallowed by men, contrary to Christ's institution.

So that he makes these material altars of wood and stone, superstitiously set up in the church, to be the substance which the Jewish altars did typify, to the great reproach of Christ and Christian religion.

Again, "Sunday no Sabbath," p. 50, he saith, if we do only bend or bow our body to his blessed board or holy altar (here he clearly declares, that the worship he gives, is to the altar itself, which is plain idolatry) but fall flat on our faces before his foot-stool, so soon as ever we approach in sight thereof; what Patriarch, Apostle, blessed Martyr, holy or learned Father would condemn us for it? Or rather would not he delighted to see their Lord so honoured, &c. and concludes it thus, blessed are the servants whom the Lord when he comes shall find so doing, that is, bowing to the altar.

9. Lastly, he gives God thanks for an altar set up at Grantham, p. 121, affirms that there is no doubt but they put their salvation in great hazard, that undermine altars, p. 150, and for his own part, he saith, he would be glad at his heart to be sacrificed for altars, p. 34, and exhorts, that for as much as God had put into the hearts of the Governors of our Church,* to restore the Lord's Table to its ancient and true place it had in the Primitive Church, and also to the honour and reverence which of right belongs unto it; in regard of the presence of our Saviour, whose chair of state it is upon earth, and to inclose it with rails, not only to keep it from all manner of profanation, but to strike the minds of all beholders with some reverence and respect, to keep their true distance, and to make a difference between place and place, that therefore no sacrilegious† and factious persons should disturb so holy and godly a purpose, c. 24, p. 175.

3. Touching the Service of the Church.

1. He teaches a first and second service, and saith that the first service is to be read in Auditorio or body of the church, and the second service ought to be read only in Sacratio, or in the chancel at the holy altar, if the practice of holy Church be enquired after, Alt. Chr. p. 86.

Whereas the Epistle and Gospel which is part of his second service, in Durand's time was read in the pulpit, and reading pew, and by Edward the Sixth's Injunction, at the beginning of reformation, was to be read in the pulpit,

2. He saith, that this second service consisteth in consecrations, oblation and orisons, made unto God the Father only by priests, p. 103.

3. For the postures of his second service, he saith thus; when supplication, intercession, consecration and giving of thanks unto God the Father were finished by the priest, with his face unto the East; and the next office he performed, being to bless the people, who always kneeled below him, and were divided from him, and did not stand about or above him and the holy altar itself. Is it not fit he turn him, after reverence done to the holy altar, and with his face unto the West, bless the congregation of the Lord, and do it upon this ground, 'Aperui os in medio Ecclesie,' I have opened my mouth in the midst of the church, Alt. Chr. c. 17, p. 118.

All the prayers in the canon of the mass itself are 'pro circumstantibus,' for those who stood round about the altar, and priest when he consecrated.

Here he expounds the Scripture, not according to the mind of God, but according to his own carnal mind.

4. For the time when second service is to begin, he saith, that St. Ambrose began not the second service as our church calls it, at the altar, before the first service in the body of the church was finished, which still is the custom in our church, and none will ever go about to put that sweet harmony which we keep with the Primitive Church out of tune but schismatics and sectaries. Sund. no Sab. p. 29.

4. Touching Confession, Penance and Absolution.

1. He affirms and maintains Popish Confession, for he thus describes it, to be an act wherein, we confess our fault to God, not as if he were ignorant thereof; but so far forth as by this confession, the mind is set in readiness for satisfaction; our repentance springs out of it, and by our penance God is appeased, Alt. Chr. p. 54.

So he makes God to be appeased not by the death of Christ but by a man's own penance.

2. He teaches Popish Penance; for he saith it is a discipline used for the humbling and casting down of men, imposing on them such a manner of conversation, as may move pity and commiseration; it giveth law to food and raiment, orders men to lie in sackcloth and ashes; to humble ourselves before the priests, and to fall down upon our knees before God's altars. Penance works all this. And after in the same tenth chapter, "To this purpose" saith he "a solemn day was set apart for taking of public penance for open faults, by imposition of hands and sprinkling of ashes, viz. Ash-Wednesday: this" saith he "is the godly discipline whereof our church speaks in the Communion, of putting notorious sinners to open penance in the beginning of Lent, and wish that it might be restored again, p. 58.

3. For Popish absolution, he saith, that as Ash-Wednesday was appointed for putting notorious sinners to open penance; so Maundy-Thursaday was set apart for their absolution: and this absolution they took on their knees, by imposition of the priests hands. And this he commends, though he saith, he knows it is not pleasing, and they that read it will say, that therein they have endured long penance, p. 58.

5. Touching the Sacraments.

1. In Alt. Chr. c. 25. p. 181. he speaks thus—Come we to the Sacraments, and of two which remain as generally necessary to salvation, we shall not have one at all left us, if they and the rites and the ceremonies about them must not be maintained by the authority, practice and tradition of holy church.

So that he grounds the sacraments not on the Scripture, but on the tradition of holy church, which is plain popery.

2. Touching baptism, he saith, that baptism is not rightly performed, 'nisi signum crucis adhibeatur,' unless the sign of the cross be used.

Though it be evident that the Apostles of Christ never used it, and therefore by his doctrine did never rightly baptise.

3. Touching the Supper of the Lord, he saith, that the Protestant hath the abuses and novelties only which are crept into the Roman church in detestation, not the things themselves, no not the name of the very Mass itself, Alt. Chr. c. 20. p. 138.

Whereas the very name of the Mass is obliterated and expunged out of the book of Common Prayer, the Articles of Religion and the book of Homilies, and is in truth a mere barbarous word.

Again, he saith, c. 16, p. 108, that the people were not so profane and unchristian, to press rudely into the Lord's house, and not to perform their humble and most lowly reverence towards the holy and most sacred altar, where Christ is most truly and really present in the blessed sacrament.

And that we may know that by real presence he means corporal presence, he saith, as he tells us out of Irenæus, that when Christ took the bread and the wine, he gave thanks, and said, that the bread was his body, and confessed the wine to be his blood, and taught a new oblation of the New Testament which the church receiving from the apostles, doth offer unto God in all the world, c. 18. p. 122.

Again, he saith, the priest offers a true and full sacrifice to God the Father, and that when the priest doth use the bread, and pour wine into the chalice, and doth not consecrate water only without wine, he doth offer a pure sacrifice, as Christ himself did, p. 123.

This is just the sacrifice and popish doctrine of the Mass, and indeed pure nonsense; for Christ in the sacrament doth give himself to us, we do not offer him to God: he bids us take and eat the bread, and take and drink of the cup; he doth not bid us offer the bread and the wine.

And yet further, he saith, this sacrifice, the priest standing at the altar, offers unto God for all the world, for bishops, for the church, &c. according to our collect on Good-Friday, and prayer for the whole estate of Christ's church militant here on earth, p. 124.

Whereby it appears that he would fain screw our church into this popish doctrine and practice.

Also that he may make good his Mass, he calls the sacrament the sacred Host, p. 124. and the sacrifice of the altar, p. 127, and p. 128, he saith, Thus you see altars, oblations and sacrifices were in common use among the most holy saints of God that ever lived.

6. Touching prayer for the Dead.

He saith, that because Geminus did appoint a clergyman his executor, whereby he was withdrawn from the altar and sacrifice, therefore it was ordered, that they should not sacrifice for him, nor celebrate a sacrifice for his death.

But on the other side, he saith, that the same holy martyr is careful to have the names of such confessors, who died in prisons to be brought to him, and the particular days of their departures, that sacrifices and oblations might be celebrated for them, c. 18. p. 123. And a little after in the same chapter, he saith, when the sacrifice of our Mediator is offered, it cannot be denied but the souls of the faithful are hereby eased, p. 126, plainly teaching a purgatory.

7. Touching the Cross and Pictures.

1. For the cross, he saith, that the cross ever used to stand on the altar, and that Rhe-nus saith, that in those times Christians had no other images in their churches, but only the cross of Christ, which stood on the altar; and accordingly he hath placed a cross in the midst of his altar, in the church of Yelden.

2. Touching pictures, he saith, that pictures in a chapel cannot but strike the beholders with thoughts of piety and devotion, at the entering into so holy a place, c. 13, p. 87. Whereas St. Paul saith, Christ is not to be known after the flesh, according to which these pictures only represent him, if so be that they were true pictures of him.

8. Touching Obedience.

He maintains popish and blind obedience: for he would have the decrees, constitutions and canons of holy church, absolutely obeyed before scanned and disputed upon, cap. 25, p. 187, and p. 190, he saith, that what canons and laws the lords archbishops and bishops, and the whole convocation house frame and devise, and the king's majesty gives assent unto, under his broad seal, ought not to be banded up and down by vicars, parsons, and parishioners, and questioned at their pleasures, but saith, he believes, that they ought to be allowed and believed, and that before they be maintained rationibus cogentibus.

Therefore the last canons and new oath and benevolence, ought to be obeyed, and neither disputed nor debated, much less renounced and censured, if this be good doctrine.

9. Touching Preaching.

1. He teacheth, that reading is preaching; for (saith he) reading of lessons, and of Epistle and Gospel, is preaching; and the reader is a preacher. Sunday no Sabbath, p. 34. And a little after, Reading then is preaching, nay, heavenly preaching, and there is nothing more profitable for the church and more powerful to make the most perfect men of God, even to make martyrs, p. 34.

He saith, that when Paul preached at Troas, mentioned Acts xx. and continued his speech till midnight, he did but read a homily; and he saith, it is hard for him to say, whether St. Paul made it himself and pronounced it, or whether some other made it, and he only read it. But yet after, he absolutely concludes, that St. Paul's preaching there till midnight, was only the reading the Apostle's decrees, and saith thus: Wherefore I take it for a clear truth, that St. Paul read the decrees, and sure I am that when he read them, and did no more but read them, without adding or diminishing, that he preached by way of homily. Reading of homilies then is preaching, and so is adjudged by the learned bishops in the Council of Rhemes, (which was a Popish Council) Sunday no Sabbath, p. 32, 33.

2. Touching lectures, he saith, that the plot of setting up lectures in every good town, was but a dull device of a foggy brain and willing blunderer, that light upon it in a mist, wherein the brethren were at first involved, Alt. Chr. c. 24, p. 172.

Though Origen and others in the primitive church were lecturers, and lectures in divinity were commonly used, within 300 years after Christ, both in Antioch and other Christian churches.

3. Touching afternoon sermons, he saith, that our Saviour came not to break the law, but to fulfil it, and he being at Capernaum on a sabbath day, preached but once, for he went immediately from the synagogue to Simon's house to dinner, and went no more to the synagogue to preach in the afternoon. The law that enjoined afternoon sermons for the keeping the sabbath, was not then known to the Pharisees themselves, who else were apt enough to have laid it in his dish at supper: no, nor to these men's progenitors, for 1565 years after, Sunday no Sabbath, p. 31.

Though bishop Hooper, bishop Latimer, Adam Damply, and sundry others of our martyrs preached twice every Sunday; and St. Chrysostom, Ambrose, Augustine, and others of the Fathers preached twice every day.

2. Touching the Sabbath.

He most wickedly and vilely reproaches the Sabbath. He saith the Sabbath is old leaven to be cast out of the church, and that it hath soured the affections of too many towards the church, and disturbed the peace, and hindered the pious devotion thereof, c. 22, p. 155.

Again, he saith, It was anabaptized after the mind of some Jew, hired to be godfather thereof, and to call it the Sabbath. Sunday no Sabbath, p. 6.

Though the Lord's day be called a Sabbath by sundry Fathers, Councils and ancient writers, both Protestant and Popish, by the homilies of our church, acts of parliament, proclamations of the king, and by the very canons themselves.

And a little after he saith, for this name Sabbath is not a bare name, like a spot in their foreheads, to know Laban's sheep from Jacob's, but indeed it is a mystery of iniquity intended against the church; for allow them but their Sabbath, and you must allow them the service that belongs to their Sabbath, which saith he, is nothing but preaching, Sunday no Sabbath, p. 6, 7.

And again, p. 20. Hence it is, saith he, that some for want of wit, some for too much, adore the Sabbath as an image dropped down from Jupiter, and cry before it as they did before the golden calf; This is an holy day to the Lord: whereas it is indeed the great Diana of the Ephesians, as they use it.

And a little after, yet to die they will call it a Sabbath; presuming in their zealous ignorance or guileful zeal, to be thought to speak the scripture phrase, when indeed the dregs of Ashdod flow from their mouths; for that day which they nickname the Sabbath, is either no day at all, or not the day that they mean.

Whereas sabbatum signifies a day of sacred rest consecrated to God; whence all such days are in scripture, called sabbaths as well as the seventh day. Therefore the Lord's day may be so termed without any danger of Judaism, as well as Easter is still called Pasca, and Whitsunday Pentecost, though Jewish words and institutions.

11. Touching Martyrs and Witnesses of the Christian faith and truth.

He reproaches and slanders all those blessed martyrs that have resisted and withstood the cursed heresies of the church of Rome, in all ages, and particularly our own English martyrs, as appears in a most remarkable passage that he sets down in his Altare Christianum, c. 16,

p. 114. The words are these, "This was the holy and profitable use of these diptiches, much unlike that list of persons censured by holy church, called with some reproach of truth and Christian religion, "Catalogus testium veritatis."

[This book was set forth by Illyricus, and is thus intituled, A Catalogue of the Witnesses of the Truth, which before our time, have opposed and resisted the primacy of the bishops of Rome, and divers superstitions, errors and deceits of popery; as namely, John Hus, Jerome of Prague, Luther, with divers others, which the church of Rome therefore condemned; which Romish church, this great champion thereof, terms holy church; and these faithful Christians and true martyrs and confessors, he saith were censured by holy church, that is, the church of Rome, for that only censured them; and therefore he saith, they are called witnesses of the truth, to the reproach of truth and Christian religion. Where he plainly and openly declares himself to fight for the church of Rome, against the true church of Christ.]

And then for our own English martyrs, he goes on thus: And as unlike a calender that I have seen, wherein the holy martyrs and confessors of Jesus Christ, who not only had place sometimes in these diptiches, but whose names are written in heaven, are erased out, and traitors, murderers, rebels, and heretics set in their room, if the best of our chronicles deserve credit, that if Penry, Hacket or Legat, had come in time, they might have challenged as orient and scarlet coloured a dye as some of them.

[This he speaks of the calender prefixed to the book of martyrs, where the popish saints are omitted, and our English martyrs names inserted, whom he terms traitors, murderers, rebels and heretics. And that this he means, is most evident, because there is no other calender but it alone, and one almanack taken out of it, of this nature; and because he refers to our English chronicles, and to our English sufferers.]

12. Touching Saint Paul.

He reproaches and slanders this blessed apostle; for he saith, that Saint Paul in setting things in order among the Corinthians, crossed the order used by Christ, and forbad the Corinthians to take their supper before the sacrament, which is utterly false, as appears by the apostle's own words, 1. Cor. 11, 22, and 34. Alt. Chr. p. 163. Again, Sunday no Sabbath, p. 3. he saith, that Saint Paul, contrary to his own rules given to the Corinthians, did administer the sacrament, and preach, where men did both eat and drink (wherein again he slanders the apostle: for he never gave any such rule to the Corinthians, as it is evident by the text itself) and he saith he continued preaching out of order till midnight.

So that he affirms, 1. That Saint Paul crossed Christ's order. 2. That he crossed his own orders, and 3. That he did things out of order.

These among other corrupt, false wicked and popish points, are gathered out of his own books, and out of his own words, and here-presented to the right honourable the Upper House of Parliament.

Seeing then it is most evident, that this wretched man hath come forth as a fierce enemy against Jesus Christ, and his everlasting truth; and as a great and a bold agent and factor for the Devil and Antichrist; may it therefore please this right honourable Assembly of Parliament, that by that strength which Almighty God hath given into your hands, he may be cast forth of the church of England, as dirt and dung, as one of the chief banes and pests thereof, who hath been one busy cause of all those wicked doctrines and Popish rites, and of all those horrible disorders and confusions that are among us, under the heavy burden whereof this whole kingdom groans and sighs for deliverance, that all others by his example may fear, and do no more any such thing.

When many of the chief points here expressed (for the time would not suffer the producing of them all) were brought forth in judgment against the Doctor, at a Committee of many lords, in the Painted Chamber, Feb. 11, the man was not able to make any reasonable Defence; for his parts and learning had quite forsaken him, if ever he had any, and he had nothing left in him but anger and passion to manage his cause; which provoked all good Christians to praise God, who had given his truth such a weak enemy; and error such a foolish patron. Whereupon, the day following, the House sentenced him, as follows*:

12 Feb. 1641.—The Upper House of Parliament did Sentence and resolve upon the question:

"1. That Doctor John Pocklington is by the Judgment of the House prohibited ever to come into the verge of the king's court. 2. That he is deprived of all his ecclesiastical livings, dignities, and preferments. 3. That he is disabled and held incapable hereafter to hold any place or dignity in the church or commonwealth. 4. That his two books, one intituled, "Altare Christianum," the other, "Sunday no Sabbath," be publicly burnt in the city of London, and the two Universities, by the hand of the common Executioner."

* "Dr. Bray, one of the Archbishop's chaplains, who had licensed Pocklington's books, acknowledged his offence at the bar of the House, confessed that he had not examined the books with that caution that he ought, and made a public recantation in the church of Westminster. But Pocklington refusing to recant about thirty false propositions, which the Bishop of Lincoln [Williams] had collected out of his books, was sentenced by the Lord Keeper," &c. Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, vol. 3, p. 374. ed. 1799.

Ordered by the Lords, that all whom it concerns, shall put in execution the Judgment of this House against the said Doctor Pocklington.

Certain Articles against Master Pocklington, found in the records of the University of Cambridge, and truly transcribed by Master Tabor, which shew that the seed which brought forth all this cursed fruit, had taken root in him long ago.

1. After words of consecration, the body of Christ is so essentially, and inseparably present in the sacrament, as that Hoc est corpus meum must be taken plainly as it sounds, not drawing of any manner of trope or figure therein, not thinking that the spirit in so great a mystery should play the vain and idle rhetorician.

2. Hereof being reprehended by master Belcanquall, he more peremptorily defended it; affirming, that except the bare word alone of transubstantiation, he could find no fault at all in Bellarmine's doctrine of the sacrament.

3. He was much offended that this question should be propounded in our schools, 'Secessio ab Ecclesia Romana fuit necessaria.'

4. He wondered at one of our fellows, who having opportunity, would not be present at Mass, it being a thing both requisite and lawful, in as much as there was a lawful ministry, giving no other thing than what we have in our sacrament.

5. He affirmed it to be an evident sign how acceptable the Romish religion was to God in former ages, because there were not then in the times of popery, so many murders, adulteries, robberies, &c. as since have been in the time of protestancy.

6. He counselled younger men beginning to study divinity, wholly to rely upon Cassander's Consultations, as himself there had done, as the safest author for resolution about the true church.

7. On a Gun-powder Treason day, he was offended at an oration made by a scholar, wherein traitor Faux was with fitting terms detested, and his matchless impiety execrated: He said it was a great offence of our church to speak evil of any that are dead.

8. By the masters not regarding it, our College is very ill reported of abroad, for corruption in religion, and scandalous opinions, which is occasioned by the master's deputy, who oftentimes useth, and that before young gentlemen, and other young students, with great earnestness of words and countenance, to argue for pontifical doctrines, never drawing to any contrary conclusion whereby to inform them otherwise.

9. He held that Christ's righteousness could not be imputed to us.

10. That our sins were no way imputed to Christ.

11. That interpretation of Scripture should be made, not by Scripture, but by exposition of holy men.

12. That Bellarmine and Baronius in all worth, far exceeded all protestant divines, wishing that our religion were as well defended by our men, as theirs is by them.

13. That Tortura Torti, and Responsio ad Apologiam Bellarmini were works of small worth, solidity and gravity.

14. He professed also in his sermon, the like belief of the bread and wine in the sacrament, to be verily turned into the flesh of Christ, as he believed Moses rod to be verily turned into a serpent, though the sensible mutation were not there.

15. He laboured also therein to answer the objection which the protestant divines make against the pontifical doctrines of the sacrament.

16. At a public disputation with us, where he maintained 'Romanam Ecclesiam esse veram, visibilem Christi Ecclesiam;' being admonished by master Belcanquell respondent, that doctor Whittakers, doctor Fulke, doctor Abbott, doctor Downham, master Calvin, monsieur de Plessis, Saduel, Moulin, and many more of our divines held the contrary; he notwithstanding with great vehemency slighted all that so said, 'impios, sceleratos, perniciosos' atque in ipsum Christum blasphemos,' with other words to that effect: whereof the master when he was publicly admonished, would take no notice.

17. The college also from whence he came had some jealousies of him, and publicly in a divinity act pro gradu, he was so offensive, that for fear he should lose his degree, he afterwards, whether by command or counsel we know not, made an apologetical retraction in a public sermon, of those offences that he had given in that act of his.

198. The Trial of the Hon. Colonel JOHN PENRUDDOCK,* at Exon, for High Treason: 7 CHARLES II. A.D. 1655. [Written by Himself.†]

UPON Thursday the 19th of April 1655, the Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer being sat in the Castle of Exon, summoned before them myself, Mr. Hugh Grove, Mr. Richard Reeves, Mr. Robert Duke, Mr. George Duke, Mr. Thomas Fitz-James, Mr. Francis Jones, Mr.

* "When Penruddock's trial was brought on, there was a special messenger sent to Judge Hale, requiring him to assist at it. It was in vacation time, and he was at his country house at Alderley; he plainly refused to go, and said, The four terms and two circuits were enough, and the little interval that was between was little enough for their private affairs, and so he excused himself; but, if he had been urged he would not have been afraid of speaking more plainly." Burnet's Life and Death of sir Matthew Hale.

† Clarendon, after speaking of the various insurrections of Charles the Second's friends, which had been projected and proposed to the king a little before this time, says: "There cannot be a greater manifestation of the universal prejudice and aversion in the whole kingdom towards Cromwell, and his government, than that there be so many designs and conspiracies against him, which were communicated to so many men, and that such signal and notable persons could resort to London, and remain there, without any such information or discovery, as might enable him to cause them to be apprehended; there being no body intent and zealous to make any such discoveries, but such whose trade it was for great wages to give him those informations, who seldom care whether what they inform be true or no. The earl of Rochester consulted with great freedom in London with the king's friends; and found that the persons imprisoned were only taken upon general suspicion, and as being known to be of that party, not upon any particular discovery of what they designed or intended to do; and that the same spirit still possessed those who were at liberty. The design in Kent appeared not reasonable, at least not to begin upon; but he was persuaded, and he was very credulous, that in the North there was a foundation of strong hopes, and a party ready to appear powerful enough to possess themselves of York; nor had the army many troops in those parts. In the West likewise there appeared to be a strong combination, in which many gentlemen were engaged, whose agents were then in London, and were exceedingly importunate to have a day assigned, and desired no more than that sir Joseph Wagstaff might be authorised to be in the head of them; who had been well known to them; and he was as ready to engage with them. The earl of Rochester liked the countenance of the North better; and sent Marmaduke Darcy, a gallant gentleman, and nobly allied in those parts to prepare the party there; and appointed a day and place for the rendezvous; and promised to be himself there; and was contented that sir Joseph Wagstaff should go into the West; who upon conference with those of that country, likewise appointed their rendezvous upon a fixed day, to be within two miles of Salisbury: It was an argument that they had no mean opinion of their strength, that they appointed to appear that very day when the judges were to keep their assizes in that city, and where the sheriff, and principal gentlemen of the county were obliged to give their attendance. Of both these resolutions the earl of Rochester, who knew where the king was, took care to advertise his majesty; who, from hence, had his former faint hopes renewed; and in a short time after they were so improved, that he thought of nothing more, than how he might with the greatest secrecy transport himself into England; for which he did expect a sudden occasion.

Edward Davis, Mr. Thomas Poulton, and Mr. Francis Bennet. Being all called to the bar, we were commanded to hold up our hands, and

“Sir Joseph Wagstaff had been formerly a Major General of the foot in the king’s Western army, a man generally beloved; and though he was rather for execution than counsel, a stout man, who looked not far before him; yet he had a great companionableness in his nature, which exceedingly prevailed with those, who, in the intermission of fighting, loved to spend their time in jollity and mirth. He, as soon as the day was appointed, left London, and went to some of his friends houses in the country, near the place, that he might assist the preparations as much as was possible. Those of Hampshire were not so punctual at their own rendezvous, as to be present at that near Salisbury at the hour; however, Wagstaff, and they of Wiltshire, appeared according to expectation. Penruddock, a gentleman of a fair fortune, and great zeal and forwardness in the service, Hugh Grove, Jones, and other persons of condition, were there with a body of near two hundred horse well armed; which, they presumed, would every day be improved upon the access of those who had engaged themselves in the Western association, especially after the fame of their being up, and effecting any thing, should come to their ears. They accounted that they were already strong enough to visit Salisbury in all its present lustre, knowing that they had many friends there, and reckoning that all who were not against them, were for them; and that they should there increase their numbers both in foot, and horse; with which the town then abounded; Nor did their computation and conjecture fail them. They entered the city about five of the clock in the morning: they appointed some officers, of which they had plenty, to cause all the stables to be locked up, that all the horses might be at their devotion; others, to break open the gaols, that all there might attend their benefactors. They kept a good body of horse upon the market-place, to encounter all opposition; and gave order to apprehend the judges and the sheriff, who were yet in their beds, and to bring them into the market-place with their several Commissions, not caring to seize upon the persons of any others.

“All this was done with so little noise or disorder, as if the town had been all of one mind. They who were within doors, except they were commanded to come out, stayed still there, being more desirous to hear than to see what was done; very many being well pleased, and not willing that others should discern it in an Indictment of High Treason was read against us: And being asked whether we would plead Guilty or Not Guilty to the Indictment, in the their countenance. When the judges were brought out in their robes, and humbly produced their commissions, and the sheriff likewise, Wagstaff resolved, after he had caused the king to be proclaimed, to cause them all three to be hanged, who were half dead already, having well considered, with the policy which men in such actions are naturally possessed with, how he himself should be used if he were under their hands, choosing therefore to be beforehand with them. But he having not thought fit to deliberate this before-hand with his friends, whereby their scrupulous consciences might have been confirmed, many of the country gentlemen were so startled with this proposition, that they protested against it; and poor Penruddock was so passionate to preserve their lives, as if works of this nature could be done by halves, that the major general durst not persist in it; but was prevailed with to dismiss the judges, and, having taken then their commissions from them, to oblige them upon another occasion to remember to whom they owed their lives, resolving still to hang the sheriff; who positively, though humbly, and with many tears, refused to proclaim the king; which being otherwise done, they likewise prevailed with him rather to keep the sheriff alive, and to carry him with them to redeem an honest man out of the hands of their enemies. This seemed an ill omen to their future agreement, and submission to the commands of their general; nor was the tenderheartedness so general, but that very many of the gentlemen were much scandalised at it, both as it was a contradiction to their commander in chief; and as it would have been a seasonable act of severity to have cemented those to perseverance who were engaged in it, and have kept them from entertaining any hopes but in the sharpness of their swords.

“The noise of this action was very great both in and out of the kingdom, whither it was quickly sent. Without doubt it was a bold enterprise, and might have produced wonderful effects, if it had been prosecuted with the same resolution, or the same rashness, it was entered into. All that was reasonable in the general contrivance of insurrection and commotion over the whole kingdom, was founded upon a supposition of the division and faction in the army; which was known to be so great, that it was thought Cromwell durst not draw the whole army to a general rendezvous, out of apprehension that, when they should once meet together, he should no longer be master of them. And thence it was concluded, that, if there were in any one place such a body brought together as might oblige Cromwell to make the army, or a considerable part of it to march, there would at least be no disposition in them to fight to strengthen his authority, which they abhorred. And many did at that time behalf of myself and of the gentlemen therein charged, I spake as followeth:

Col. Penruddock. My lords, though my education hath been such, as not to give me those advantages which the knowledge of the laws would have assisted me with, for the defending myself; yet upon the hearing this very Indictment, my reason tells me that it is illegal; and therefore I do demand counsel, that may dispute the illegality thereof.

Serjeant Glyn. Sir, you desire that which believe, that if they had remained with that party at Salisbury for some days, which they might well have done without any disturbance, their numbers would have much increased, and their friends farther West must have been prepared to receive them, when a retreat had been necessary by a stronger part of the armies marching against them. Cromwell himself was alarmed; he knew well the distemper of the kingdom, and in his army, and now when he saw such a body gathered together without any noise, that durst, in the middle of the kingdom, enter into one of the chief cities of it, when his judges and all the civil power of that country was in it, and take them prisoners, and proclaim the king in a time of full peace, and when no man durst so much as name him but with a reproach, he could not imagine, that such an enterprise could be undertaken without a universal conspiracy; in which his own army could not be innocent; and therefore knew not how to trust them together. But all this apprehension vanished, when it was known, that within four or five hours after they had performed this exploit, they left the town with very small increase or addition to their numbers.

"The truth is, they did nothing resolutely after their first action; and were in such disorder, and discontent between themselves, that without staying for their friends out of Hampshire (who were, to the number of two or three hundred horse, upon their way, and would have been at Salisbury that night) upon pretence that they were expected in Dorsetshire, they left the town, and took the sheriff with them, about two of the clock in the afternoon: but were so weary of that day's labour, and their watching the night before, that they grew less in love with what they were about, and differed again amongst themselves about the sheriff; whom many desired presently released; and that party carried it in hope of receiving good offices afterwards from him. In this manner they continued on their march Westward. They from Hampshire, and other places, who were behind them, being angry for their leaving Salisbury, would not follow, but scattered themselves; and they who were before them, and heard in what disorder they had left Wiltshire, likewise dispersed: so that after they had continued their journey into Devonshire, without meeting any who would join with them, horse and men were so tired for want of meat and sleep, that one single troop of horse, inferior cannot be granted; therefore give your answer, whether you are Guilty or Not Guilty of the Treason of which you stand charged.

Penruddock. Sir, by your favour, it is that which hath been granted to my interiors, viz. to Mr. Lilburne, and to one Rolf a shoemaker; and I have as great a right to the laws, as any person that sits here as my judge: I do therefore challenge it as my right. Judge Nicholas, whom I there see, will tell you he himself was counsel for this Rolf: And it is a hard case, if in number, and commanded by an officer of no credit in the war, being in those parts by chance, followed them at a distance, till they were so spent, that he rather intreated than compelled them to deliver themselves; some, and amongst those Wagstaff, quitted their horses, and found shelter in some honest men's houses; where they were concealed till opportunity served to transport them into the parts beyond the seas, where they arrived safely. But Mr. Penruddock, Mr. Grove, and most of the rest, were taken prisoners, upon promise given by the officer that their lives should be saved: which they quickly found he had no authority to make good. For Cromwell no sooner heard of his cheap victory, than he sent judges away with a new commission of Oyer and Terminer, and order to proceed with the utmost severity against the offenders. But Roles, his chief justice, who had so luckily escaped at Salisbury, had not recovered the fright; and would no more look those men in the face who had dealt so kindly with him; but expressly refused to be employed in the service, raising some scruples in point of law, whether the men could be legally condemned; upon which Cromwell, shortly after, turned him out of his office, having found others who executed his commands. Penruddock, and Grove, lost their heads at Exeter; and others were hanged there; who having recovered the faintness they were in when they rendered, died with great courage and resolution, professing their duty and loyalty to the king: many were sent to Salisbury, and tried and executed there, in the place where they had so lately triumphed; and some who were condemned, where there were fathers, and sons, and brothers, that the butchery might appear with some remorse, were reprieved, and sold, and sent slaves to the Barbadoes; where their treatment was such, that few of them ever returned into their own country. Thus this little fire, which probably might have kindled and enflamed all the kingdom, was for the present extinguished in the West; and Cromwell secured without the help of his army; which he saw, by the countenance it then shewed when they thought he should have use of them, it was high time to reform; and in that he resolved to use no longer delay."

In the third volume of Thurloe's State Papers are several letters and other documents relative to this and the contemporaneous insurrections.

a free-born gentleman of England cannot have the same privilege that his inferiors have had before him.

Attorney General (Mr. Prideaux). Sir, there is a great difference between treason acting and acted; the latter is your case: Therefore flatter not yourself, and do not think your being mute shall save your estate in case of treason; for if you plead not to the Indictment, Sentence will be pronounced against you, as if you had been found guilty of the fact you are charged with.

Penruddock. I observe your distinction: But all the logic you have, shall not make me nor any rational man acknowledge, that this was either acting or acted, before it be proved. Sir, it is but a bare suspicion, and I hope you will not condemn me before I am convicted: I say the Indictment is illegal, and I do demand counsel.

Att. Gen. Sir, the Court must not be dalled withal: I do peremptorily demand of you, are you Guilty or Not Guilty? If you plead, you may have favour; otherwise we shall proceed to Sentence.

Penruddock. Sir, put case I do plead, shall I then have counsel allowed me?

Att. Gen. Sir, the Court makes no bargains; refer yourself to us.

[Hereupon my fellow-prisoners persuaded me to plead Not Guilty: Which being done, I demanded counsel, as being partly promised it. Mr. Attorney told me, I could have none. Then I replied;]

Penruddock. Sir, durus est hic sermo, it is no more than I expected from you; but rather than I will be taken off unheard, I will make my own Defence as well as I can.

[The Jurors being then called, I challenged about 24 of the 35 I might have challenged. The rest of the gentlemen were sent from the bar, I was left alone upon my Trial: And the Jurors were so packed, that had I known them the issue had been the same that it was. The Jurors being sworn, and the Indictment again read, Mr. Attorney demanded what Exception I could make to it.]

Penruddock. Sir, I except against every part thereof; for I take it to be illegal in toto composito.

Recorder Steel. Sir, it is not usual for any Court to admit of general Exceptions, therefore we expect that you should make it to some particular.

Penruddock. Sir, I desire a copy of my Indictment, and time until to-morrow to make my Defence.

Att. Gen. Sir, you cannot have it; the Court expects you should do it now.

Penruddock. Then if I cannot have time, if my general Exception might have been admitted, it would have told you, that there can be no High-Treason in this nation, but it must be grounded either upon the common or statute law. But this is neither grounded upon the common law, or the statute; ergo, no treason (against a Protector, who hath no power according to law): Neither is there any such thing in law as a Protector, for all treasons and such pleas are propria causa regis.

Serj. Glyn. Sir, you are peremptory, you strike at the government; you will fare never a whit the better for this speech: Speak as to any particular Exception you have to the Indictment.

Penruddock. Sir, if I speak any thing which grates upon the present government, I may confidently expect your pardon: My life is as dear to me, as this government can be to any of you. The holy prophet David, when he was in danger of his life, feigned himself mad, and the spittle hung upon his beard: You may easily therefore excuse my imperfections. And since I am now forced to give you my particular Exception, more plainly, to the Indictment, I am bold to tell you, I observe in the latter part of the Indictment, you say I am guilty of High-Treason, by virtue of a statute in that case made and provided: If there be any such statute, pray let it be read; I know none such. My actions were for the king; and I well remember what Bracton saith [5 Tract. de Delictis cap.], 'Rex non habet superiorem nisi Deum; satis habet ad poenam, quod Deum expectat ultorem.' And in another place he saith, [Bract. Rem. H. 3, cap. 3, sect. 24.] 'Rex habet potestatem et jurisdictionem super omnes qui in regno suo sunt: Ea quæ sunt jurisdictionis et pacis, ad nullum pertinent, nisi ad regiam dignitatem; habet etiam coercionem, ut delinquentes puniat et coerceat.' Again he saith, 'Omnes sub rege, et ipse nullo nisi tantum Deo; non est inferior sibi subiectis; non parem habet in regno suo.' This shews us where the true power is: You shall find also, That whoever shall refuse to aid the king when war is levied against him, or against any that keep the king from his just rights, offends the law, and is thereby guilty of treason. [Parl. Rol. num. 7.] Again, All men that adhere to the king in personal service, are freed from treason by law: [Rex et consuetudo Parliament. 11 H. 7, cap. 1.] And yet you tell me of a statute, which makes my adhering to my king according to law, to be High-Treason: Pray let it be read.

Att. Gen. Sir, you have not behaved yourself so as to have such a favour from the Court.

Penruddock. I require it not as a favour, but as my right.

Att. Gen. Sir, you cannot have it.

Penruddock. If I cannot have it, these gentlemen that are the Jurors, have not offended you, their verdict reaches to their souls, as to my life; pray let not them go blind-fold, but let that statute be their guide.

Att. Gen. Sir, the Jury ought to be satisfied with what hath been already said, and so might you too.

Penruddock. Sir, I thank you; you now tell me what I must trust to.

Mr. Attorney then made a large speech in the face of the Court, wherein he aggravated the offence with divers circumstances; as saying, I had been four years in France, and held a correspondency with the king my master, of whom I had learned the Popish religion: That I endeavoured to bring in a debauched, lewd young man, and to engage this nation in another bloody war; and that if I had not been timely prevented, I had destroyed them (meaning the Jurors), and their whole families. I interrupted him, and said, Penruddock. Mr. Attorney, you have been heretofore of counsel for me; you then made my case better than indeed it was; I see you have the faculty to make men believe falsehoods to be truth too.

Att. Gen. Sir, you interrupt me; you said but now you were a gentleman.

Penruddock. I have been thought worthy heretofore to sit on the bench, though now I am at the bar.

[Mr. Attorney then proceeded in his speech, and called the witnesses.]

Then I said, Sir, you have put me in a bear's skin, and now you will bait me with a witness. But I see the face of a gentleman here in Court (I mean captain Crook) whose conscience can tell him, that I had Articles from him which ought to have kept me from hence. Captain Crook hereupon stood up, and his guilty conscience, I suppose, advised him to sit down again, after he had made this speech, that is to say, he opened his lips and spake nothing. The several witnesses now come in. Mr. Dove the sheriff of Wilts and others; my charity forbids me to tell you what many of them swore: I shall therefore omit that, and only tell you that one of our own party, and indeed I think an honest man, being forced to give his evidence; I said, My lords, it is a hard case that when you find you cannot otherwise cleave me in pieces, that you must look after wedges made of my own timber. The virtuous crier of Blandford being asked what were the words I used in the proclaiming king Charles at the market? he said, I declared for Charles the second, and settling the true protestant religion: for the liberty of the subject, and privileges of parliaments.

Then I said to the Attorney General and the whole Court, You said even now, that I had learned of the king my master the popish religion, and endeavoured to bring him in: your own witness tells you what and whom I would bring in; and that it was the true protestant and not the popish religion his majesty is of, and intends to settle. I urged divers cases to make the business but a riot, as my lord of Northumberland's, pretending that it was for the taking of taxes; and that the power was not declared to be where they say it is. I required the judges to be of counsel for me, and told them it was their duty. Commissioner Lisle told me, I should have no wrong, (but he meant right); but judge Rolle and Nicholas confessed themselves parties, therefore would say nothing. Then I told the Court, if I had seen a crown upon the head of any person, I had known what had been treason: The law of England would have taken hold of me, out of the respect it has to monarchy: There were no such land-marks before me, therefore I conceive I cannot be guilty of what I am charged with. And my lord, and Mr. Attorney, you here indict me for a treason committed at South-Moulton in Devonshire; and gentlemen, ye swear witnesses against me for facts done in other countries; Sarum, Blandford, and South-Moulton, are not in a parish. You puzzle the jurors with these circumstances, pray go to the kernel. And you, gentlemen of the jury, save your labour by taking those notes. Mr. Attorney then addressed himself to the jury; and to be short after the space of half an hour long, gave them directions to bring me in guilty. This being done, I craved the favour from the Court, that I might speak to the jury: which being allowed, I said to them as followeth, or to the same effect:

Gentlemen; You are called a jury of life and death; and happy will it be for your souls, if you prove to be a jury of life. You have heard what hath been said to make my actions treason; and with what vigour many untruths have been urged to you. I have made appear to you, that there can be no treason but against the king; that the law knows no such person as a Protector. Mr. Attorney pretends a statute for it, but refuseth the reading thereof either to me or you; vilifies me at pleasure, and tells you that I am a papist, and would bring in the popish religion; and that if I had not been timely prevented I had destroyed you. I hope you are also satisfied of the contrary, from the mouth of one of the bitterest witnesses. You are now judges between me and these judges. Let not the majesty of their looks, or the glory of their habits, betray you to a sin which is of a deeper dye than their scarlet; I mean that sin, blood: which calls to heaven for vengeance. Gentlemen, you do not see a hair on my head but is numbered, neither can you make any one of them, much less can you put breath into my nostrils, when it is taken out. A sparrow doth not fall to the ground without the providence of God, much less shall man, to whom he hath given dominion and rule over all the creatures of the earth. Gentlemen look upon me, I am the image of my creator, and that stamp of his which is in my visage, is not to be defaced, without an account given wherefore it was. I have here challenged, as I am a gentleman, and free-born man of England, the right which the law allows me; I demanded a copy of my Indictment and Counsel, but it is denied me. The law which I would have been tried by, is the known law of the land, which was drawn by the wise consultation of our princes, and by the ready pens of our progenitors. The law which I am now tried by, is no law, but what is cut out by the point of a rebellious sword; and the sheets in which they are recorded, being varnished with the moisture of an eloquent tongue, if you look not well to it, may chance to serve for some of your shrouds. If the fear of displeasing others, shall betray you to find me guilty of any thing, you can at the most but make a riot of this. Pray, by the way, take notice, that the last parliament would not allow the legislative power to be out of themselves; seventeen of twenty in this very county were of that opinion, and deserted the House; they were your representative; if you should find me guilty, you bring them in danger, and in them yourselves. Have a care of being drawn into a snare. Gentlemen, your blood may run in the same channel with mine: If what I have said do not satisfy you, so as to acquit me; if you bring a special verdict, you do in some measure acquit yourselves, and throw the blood that will be spilt upon the judges. Consider of it, and the Lord direct you for the best!

The jury, after a quarter of an hour's retirement, brought me in Guilty: The Lord forgive them, for they knew not what they did.

Upon Monday the 23d of April, we were again called to the bar, being then in number twenty-six. Serjeant Glyn asked of me first, what I could say for myself, that I should not have sentence according to law? Then I said,

My Lords and Gentlemen, you ask what I can say for myself, that I should not have Sentence passed upon me. The Jury found me Guilty: If I should go about to make a Defence now, it would signify no more than as if my friends should petition for my pardon after I am executed. I could have offered you Articles here, but I thought them inconsistent with this Court. When I look upon my offence (as to the Protector), I conclude myself a dead man; but when I reflect upon the favour he hath shewed to others of my condition, and the hopes I have of your intercession, methinks I feel my spirits renewed again. My lords, death is a debt due from me to nature; the Protector has now the keeping the bond, and has put it in suit by his Attorney; if he please to forbear the serving me with an execution, and let me keep it a little longer, I will pay him the interest of thanks for it as long as I live, and engage my posterity and a numerous alliance to be bound for me. So the Lord direct you all for the best. If I have found favour, I shall thank you; if not, I shall forgive you!

This being done, serjeant Glyn, after a most bitter and nonsensical speech, gave Sentence against us; viz. to be drawn, hanged and quartered. A pretty exchange for unworthy Crook's Articles for life, liberty, and estate; which I can prove, and will die upon. My Trial held at least five hours. This is as much as at present I can remember of it; excuse the errors.

One of the Jury being asked by a gentleman, why he found me guilty? answered, He was resolved to hang me, before he did see me.

I observe treason in this age to be an individuum vagum, like the wind in the Gospel, which bloweth where it listeth; for that shall be treason in me to-day, which shall be none in another to-morrow, as it pleaseth Mr. Attorney.

The Judges are sworn to do justice according to the law of the land, [3 Part. Inst. 22. 2 Part. Inst. 47, 48. Prince's Case, 8 Report.] and therefore have miserably perjured themselves in condemning me contrary to law: And (not so contented) must cause the jury (so wise they were) through their false and unjust directions, to destroy their own rights and properties, and set up a new, arbitrary and tyrannical government.

The judges would not give me their advice in point of law (as was their duty,) because they said they were parties; yet could sit still on the bench in their robes, to countenance and approve of my sentence. No man can be a judge where he is a party in the same cause; [Hobart. fol. 120. Dr. Bonam's Case, 8 Part. of Coke's Reports.] therefore my trial was contrary to law. The Judges being parties, ought not to sit upon the bench, but stand by; therefore my trial was illegal: The rest being no judges, but the Protector's immediate servants, so could not be my judges in case of High-Treason; for none but the sworn judges of the land are capable of it by law.

One thing of col. Dove, the reverend sheriff of Wilts, who, that the jury might be sufficiently incensed, complaining of the many incivilities he pretended were offered him by our party, being upon his oath, said, That one of our men did run him through the side with a carabine. Surely it was a very small one, for the wound is not discernible.

A great deal of pains every man in his place took for the carrying on his master's work.

'Be merciful unto me, O Lord, be merciful unto me: Under the shadow of thy wings will I hide myself till this tyranny be overpast.'

'Glory to God on high, on earth peace, goodwill towards men; and so have mercy on me, O Lord!'

The Sentence was ordered to be executed the 16th of May following.

As he was ascending the scaffold, he said, This, I hope, will prove to be like Jacob's ladder; though the feet of it rest on earth, yet I doubt not but the top of it reacheth to heaven.

When he came upon the Scaffold, he spoke to the people as follows:

Gentlemen; It hath ever been the custom of all Persons whatsoever, when they come to die, to give some satisfaction to the world, whether they be guilty of the fact of which they stand charged. The crime for which I am now to die, is Loyalty, but, in this age called High Treason. I cannot deny but I was at Southmoulton, in this county; but whether my being there, or my actions there, amount to so high a crime as High Treason, I leave to the world and to the law to judge: truly, if I were conscious to myself of any base ends that I had in this undertaking, I would not be so injurious to my own soul, or disingenuous to you, as not to make a public acknowledgment thereof. I suppose that divers persons, according as they are biased in their several interests and relations, give their opinions to the world concerning us: I conceive it impossible, therefore, so to express myself in this particular, as not to expose both my judgment and reputation to the censure of many whom I shall leave behind me; because I will not put others, therefore, upon a breach of charity concerning me, or my actions. I have thought fit to decline all discourses which may give them a capacity either to injure themselves or me. My trial was public, and my several examinations, I believe, will be produced when I am in my grave: I will refer you therefore to the first, which I am sure some of you heard; and to the latter, which many of you, in good time, may see. Had Captain Crook done himself and us that right which a gentleman and a soldier ought to have done, I had not now been here. The man I forgive with all my heart: but truly, gentlemen, his protesting against those Articles he himself with so many protestations and importunities put upon us, hath drawn so much dishonour and blood upon his head, that I fear some heavy judgment will pursue him; though he hath been false to us, I pray God I do not prove a true prophet to him; nay, I must say more, that coming on the road to Exon, he, the said Captain Crook, told me, Sir Joseph Wagstaff was a gallant gentleman, and that he was sorry he was not taken with us; that then he might have had the benefit of our Articles; but now, said he, I have beset all the country for him, so that he cannot escape, but must be hanged. He also questioned me, as I passed through Salisbury from London, whether he had given me conditions; which I endeavouring to make appear to Major Butler, he interrupted me, and unwillingly confessed it, saying I proffered him four hundred pounds to perform his Articles; which had been a strange proffer of mine, had I not really conditioned with him; and I told him then, having found him unworthy, I would have given him five hundred pounds, believing him to be mercenary. To make it yet farther appear I injure him not, by stiling him unworthy; after these Articles were given, he proffered to pistol me, if I did not persuade another house to yield, which then were boldly resisting; to which my servant, John Biby, now a prisoner, replied, I hope you will not be so unworthy as to break the law of arms. Thus much I am obliged to say to the honour of the soldiery, that they have been so far from breaking any Articles given to others, that they have rather bettered them than otherwise. It is now our misfortune to be made precedents and examples together: but I will not do the Protector so much injury, as to load him with dishonour, since I have been informed, that he would have made our conditions good, if Crook, that gave them, had not abjured them. This is not a time for me to enlarge upon any subject, since I am now become the subject of death; but since the Articles were drawn by my hand, I thought myself obliged to a particular justification of them. I could tell you of some soldiers which were turned out of his troop for defending those conditions of ours; but let that pass, and henceforward, instead of life, liberty and estate, which were the Articles agreed upon, let drawing, hanging and quartering bear the denomination of Captain Crook's Articles. However, I thank the Protector for granting me this honourable death. I should now give you an account of my faith; but, truly, gentlemen, this poor nation is rent into so many several opinions, that it is impossible for me to give you mine, without displeasing some of you; however, if any man be so critical as to enquire of what faith I die, I shall refer him to the Apostles, Athanasius, and the Nicene creed, and to the testimony of this reverend gentleman, Dr. Short, to whom I have unbosomed myself: and if this do not satisfy, look in the thirty-nine Articles of the Catholic Church of England, to them I have subscribed, and do own them as authentic. Having now given you an account concerning myself, I hold myself obliged in duty to some of my friends, to take off a suspicion which lies upon them; I mean, as to some persons of honour; which upon my examination I was charged to have held correspondence with; the marquis of Hertford, the marquis of Winchester, and my lord of Pembroke, were the persons nominated to me: I did then acquaint them, and do now second it with this protestation, that I never held any correspondence with either, or any of them, in relation to this particular business, or indeed to any thing which concerned the Protector or his government: as for the marquis of Winchester, I saw him some twelve years since, and not later; and if I should see him here present I believe I should not know him; and for the earl of Pembroke, he was not a man likely to whom I should discover my thoughts, because he is a man of contrary judgment. I was examined likewise concerning my brother Freke, my cousin Hastings, Mr. Dorrington, and others: it is probable their estates may make them liable to this my condition; but I do here so far acquit them, as to give the world this further protestation, that I am confident they are as innocent in this business as the youngest child here: I have no more to say to you now, but to let you know that I am in charity with all men, I thank God; I both can and do forgive my greatest persecutors, and all that ever had any hand in my death. I have offered the Protector as good security for my future demeanour, as I suppose he could have expected; if he had thought fit to have given me my life, certainly I should not have been so ungrateful as to have employed it against him. I do humbly submit to God's pleasure, knowing that the issues of life and death are in his hand; my blood is but a small sacrifice; if it had been saved, I am so much a gentleman as to have given thanks to him that preserved it, and so much a Christian as to forgive them which take it; but seeing God by his providence hath called me to lay it down, I willingly submit to it, though terrible to nature ; but blessed be my Saviour, who hath taken out the sting ; so that I look upon it without terror. Death is a debt, and a due debt ; and it hath pleased God to make me so good a husband that I am come to pay it before it is due. I am not ashamed of the cause for which I die, but rather rejoice that I am thought worthy to suffer in the defence and cause of God's true church, my lawful king, the liberty of the subject, and privilege of parliaments ; therefore I hope none of my alliance and friends will be ashamed of it ; it is so far from pulling down my family, that I look upon it as the raising of it one story higher ; neither was I so prodigal of nature, as to throw away my life, but have used, though none but honourable and honest, means to preserve it. These unhappy times indeed have been very fatal to my family, two of my brothers already slain, and myself going to the slaughter ; it is God's will, and I humbly submit to that providence. I must render an acknowledgment of the great civilities that I have received from the city of Exon, and some persons of quality, and for their plentiful provision made for the prisoners. I thank Mr. Sheriff for his favour towards us, in particular to myself, and I desire him to present my due respects to the Protector, and though he had no mercy for myself, yet that he would have respect to my family. I am now a stripping off my clothes to fight a duel with death, I conceive no other duel lawful ; but my Saviour hath pulled out the sting of this mine enemy, by making himself a sacrifice for me, and truly I do not think that man deserving one drop of his blood that will not spend all for him in so good a cause. The truth is, gentlemen, in this age treason is an individuum vagum ; like the wind in the gospel, it bloweth where it listeth : So now treason is what they please, and lighteth upon whom they will. Indeed, no man, except he will be a traitor, can avoid this censure of treason. I know not to what end it may come, but I pray God my own and my brother's blood, that is now to die with me, may be the last upon this score : Now, gentlemen, you may see what a condition you are in without a king ; you have no law to protect you, no rule to walk by, when you perform your duty to God, your king and country : you displease the arbitrary power now set up, (I cannot call it government). I shall leave you to peruse my Trial, and there you shall see what a condition this poor nation is brought into ; and (no question) will be utterly destroyed, if not restored, by loyal subjects, to its old and glorious government ; I pray God he lay not his judgments upon England for their sluggishness in doing their duty, and readiness to put their hands in their bosoms, or rather taking part with the enemy of truth. The Lord open their eyes that they may be no longer led or drawn into such snares, else the child that is unborn will curse the day of their parents birth. God Almighty preserve my lawful king, Charles 2, from the hands of his enemies, and break down that wall of pride and rebellion, which so long hath kept him from his just rights ! God preserve his royal mother, and all his majesty's royal brethren : and incline their hearts to seek after him ! God incline the hearts of all true Englishmen to stand up as one man to bring in the king, and redeem themselves and this poor kingdom out of its more than Egyptian slavery. As I have now put off these garments of cloth, so I hope I have put off my garments of sin, and have put on the robes of Christ's righteousness here, which will bring me to the enjoyment of his glorious robes anon.—Then he kneeled down and kissed the block, and said thus : I commit my soul to God my Creator and Redeemer. Look upon me, O Lord, at my last gasping, hear my prayer, and the prayers of all good people ; I thank thee, O God, for all their dispensations towards me.—Then kneeling down, he prayed most devoutly as follows :

“ O Eternal, Almighty, and most merciful God, the righteous Judge of all the world, look down in mercy on me a miserable sinner. O blessed Jesus, Redeemer of mankind, which takest away the sins of the world, let thy perfect manner of obedience be presented to thy heavenly Father for me. Let thy precious death and blood be the ransom and satisfaction of my many and heinous transgressions. Thou that sittest at the right hand of God make intercession for me. O holy and blessed Spirit which art the Comforter, fill my heart with thy consolations. O holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity, be merciful to me, confirm my faith in the promises of the Gospel, revive and quicken my hope and expectation of joys prepared for true and faithful servants. Let the infinite love of God my Saviour, make my love to him steadfast, sincere, and constant.

“ O Lord, consider my condition, accept my tears, assuage my grief, give me comfort and confidence in thee : impute not unto me my former sins, but most merciful Father receive me into thy favour, for the merits of Christ Jesus. Many and grievous are my sins, for I have sinned many times against the light of knowledge, against remorse of conscience, against the motions and opportunities of grace. But accept, I beseech thee, the sacrifice of a broken and contrite heart, in and for the perfect sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction of thy son Jesus Christ. O Lord receive my soul after it is delivered from the burthen of the flesh, into perfect joy in the sight and fruition of thee. And at the general resurrection, grant that my body may be endowed with immortality, and received with my soul into glory.

“ I praise thee O God, I acknowledge thee to be the Lord, O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy on me. Thou that sittest at the right hand of God, hear my prayer. O Lord Jesus Christ, God and man, Mediator betwixt God and man, I have sinned as a man, be thou merciful to me as a God. O holy and blessed Spirit, help my infirmities with those sighs and groans which I cannot express."

Then he desired to see the axe, and kissed it, saying, I am like to have a sharp passage of it, but my Saviour hath sweetened it unto me. Then he said, If I would have been so unworthy as others have been, I suppose I might by a lye have saved my life, which I scorn to purchase at such a rate; I defy such temptations and them that gave them me. Glory be to God on high, on earth peace, goodwill towards men, and the Lord have mercy upon my poor soul! Amen.

So laying his neck upon the block, after some private ejaculations, he gave the headsman a sign with his hand, who at one blow severed his head from his body.

The night before his Execution he received the following Letter from his Lady:

'My dear Heart:

'My sad parting was so far from making me forget you, that I scarce thought upon myself since, but wholly upon you. Those dear embraces which I yet feel, and shall never lose, being the faithful testimonies of an indulgent husband, have charmed my soul to such a reverence of your remembrance, that were it possible, I would, with my own blood, cement your dead limbs to life again; and (with reverence) think it no sin to rob heaven a little while longer of a martyr. O my dear! you must now pardon my passion, this being my last (oh fatal) word that ever you will receive from me; and know, that until the last minute that I can imagine you shall live, I will sacrifice the prayers of a Christian, and the groans of an afflicted wife. And when you are not (which sure by sympathy I shall know) I shall wish my own dissolution with you, that so we may go hand in hand to heaven. It is too late to tell you what I have, or rather what I have not done for you; how turned out of doors because I came to beg mercy; the Lord lay not your blood to their charge. I would fain discourse longer with you, but dare not; passion begins to drown my reason, and will rob me of my devoir, which is all I have left to serve you. Adieu therefore ten thousand times, my dearest dear! and since I must never see you more, take this prayer; may your faith be so strengthened, that your constancy may continue, and then I know heaven will receive you; whither grief and love will in a short time, I hope, translate, My dear, Your sad, but constant wife, even to love your ashes when dead.

'ARUNDEL PENRUDDOCK.'

'May the 15th, 1655, eleven o'clock at night. Your children beg your blessing, and present their duties to you.'

To which he wrote this Answer.

'Dearest, best of Creatures!

'I had taken leave of the world when I received yours: It did at once recall my fond'ness for life, and enable me to resign it. As I am sure I shall leave none behind me like you, which weakens my resolution to part from you; so when I reflect I am going to a place where there are none but such as you, I recover my courage. But fondness breaks in upon me; and as I would not have my tears flow to-morrow, when your husband and the father of our dear babes is a public spectacle; do not think meanly of me, that I give way to grief now in private, when I see my sand run so fast, and I within few hours am to leave you helpless, and exposed to the merciless and insolent, that have wrongfully put me to a shameless death, and will object that shame to my poor children. I thank you for all your goodness to me, and will endeavour so to die, as do nothing unworthy that virtue in which we have mutually supported each other, and for which I desire you not repine that I am first to be rewarded; since you ever preferred me to yourself in all other things, afford me, with cheerfulness, the precedence in this.

'I desire your prayers in the article of death, for my own will then be offered for you and yours.

'J. PENRUDDOCK.'

In S Thurloe's State Papers, p. 391, is the following curious Article, intituled, "The Prisoners' Plea for themselves, at Exeter, April 18, 1655:"

1. We must enquire by friends of the jurors' names, and challenge any, whom we conceive engaged against us, and challenge them particularly, and give them no reason, for the law alloweth us to challenge 35 without shewing reason; but we must not challenge above 35, lest judgment pass against us as mutes, refusing legal trial, and so be pressed.

2. Besides the 35 challenged without cause shewn, we may challenge any, against whom we can shew cause; but the judge will declare whether it be a sufficient cause or no.

3. If any man hath named to the sheriff any one of the jurors remaining by any (saving his sworn officers, whose duty it is) and if two can prove it, the indictment and proceedings may be avoided by statute 11 Hen. 4, chap. 9.

4. We must not immediately upon the reading of the indictment plead Not Guilty, for then we can have no counsel allowed, nor be admitted afterwards to plead the illegality of the indictment; but so soon as we have heard the indictment read, we may say, we conceive the indictment not sufficient in law, and that therefore we desire counsel to speak for us at law, and this before we say Not Guilty.

5. If the judge ask us, why the indictment is insufficient, seeming to deny us counsel, we must say, it is neither grounded on the common law, nor statute; and the judges are sworn to execute only the laws.

6. If the indictment (as it will) do call the jury, jurors for the Lord Protector, then again let us alledge, that we are not legally indicted, for there are no such persons by the law of England; for neither the common law, nor acts of parliament, do know or acknowledge any jurors for the Lord Protector.

7. If any alteration be made in the indictment by the judges, then desire, that the evidence to the grand inquest may be given at the bar in open court.

8. If one of the grand inquest stands outlawed, it makes void the indictment; and if we know any such, we may challenge them, and demand the indictment to be vacated by virtue of a statute, 11 Hen. 4, cap. 9, and if the judges bid us prove them to be outlawed, we may demand time, and we will bring it under seal.

9. We may desire a copy of the indictment, though the judges positively deny it, and urge my lord Coke for authority.

10. If we can find any incertainty in the indictment either in time or place, let us alledge it against the sufficiency of the said indictment.

11. If the indictment express not particularly some open deed we did in levying war, except against it as insufficient, and still insist upon the assignment of counsel to argue the whole, because it is a scruple in law worthy of great debate.

12. If the judges deny us counsel, tell them, others usually have had it, and particularly Mr. Norbury was counsel for col. Lilburne, and the now judges Nicholas and serjeant Maynard were counsel for capt. Rolph, when he was accused for treason against the king.

13. If the judges require it, give the exceptions in writing, but expunge what makes against us, if seen, and still obtain counsel, and urge Humphrey Stafford's cause in the 1st of Hen. 7, for precedent.

14. If after arguing the case by counsel, or before, the judge overrule the plea, then insist upon the same plea to the jury, and put it upon their consciences, that God hath made them our judges to judge between us and the judges; and that, if we be found guilty by the jury, our blood will lie upon the jury, and the judges be acquitted; but if the jury find us not guilty, the jurors are innocent, if we die.

15. If the jury seems fearful to clear us absolutely, tell them the judges have overruled them; that it is safest for the jury to find a special verdict, which leaves the point in law to all the judges, whether or no it is treason, whereby also the jurors will leave all the danger that can follow, and all the bloodshed on the judges.

16. Tell the jury, that they are now to judge, whether or no we have committed treason; and if they judge that to be treason, which is no treason, our blood will be upon them; and there can be no treason, nor ever was in England, but such as is made so by the common law, or act of parliament.

17. Let every prisoner allow of one juror, whom another person hath challenged, and challenge him, whom another prisoner hath allowed, whereby every one of us shall have almost a whole distinct jury for himself, which juries possibly will differ in their opinions, at least it will puzzle the prosecutors to get so many several juries; therefore let every prisoner have pen and ink ready to note the names of the several jurors for several persons, who for one, and who for another.

18. They cannot indict and try us all in one day, as it is in Kelloway, fol. 159, 6, which the Lord Chief Justice Rolle declared to be law in the case of the Portugal ambassador's brother.

19. If they indict us for felony, we may say it is no felony, except it be done with a felonious intent; and the country knows, we did not intend to steal, but only to borrow the horses, which is usual now a-days, and as the soldiers did now at London and elsewhere, who came against them; and the sheriff of the county was present, when divers horses were seized, and did himself seize some, which were none of ours.

20. Also ask the prosecutor upon the trial, whether he can take his oath, that we took the horses with a felonious intent; and if he will not swear it, then ask the jury, whether they can take it upon their oaths we stole the horses, where the prosecutor himself will not swear it.

21. Ask the prosecutor, whether he came voluntarily to prosecute against us; and if he did not, but was forced, then desire the jury to judge, whether, they that are come hither from London purposely, have not an intention to take away our lives.

22. If they indict us as traitors by any act of the long parliament, it will be for treason against the king, or against the commonwealth, and keepers of the liberty; we have done nothing against either of them, and let them prove it.

23. If they ground the indictment on any act or ordinance since the long parliament was dissolved, which was April 20, 1653, deny it to be an act; for the two last parliaments made no acts at all concerning treason, and there can be no treason by an ordinance. Therefore leave it upon the conscience of the jury, whether there be any laws to guide them in their verdict, besides common law and acts of parliament.

24. Tell the jury, that if the king had formerly with his council made a proclamation, order, or ordinance, declaring something to be treason, which neither the common law nor any act of parliament had so declared, that no jury hereupon durst have found any man guilty.

25. Alledge the case of Chief Just. Tresilian, sir Robert Belknappe, and other judges in 11 Rich. 2, who gave their opinions, that other facts were treason than what had been declared by authority of parliament, and did it to please the then present governor, were attainted of treason for their opinions, and by the parliament following 11 Rich. were made examples for their treason. And in the 21 Rich. 2, the judges giving the like opinion, had no other excuse to avoid the attainder of treason in parliament the 1 Hen. 4, than that they durst say no otherwise for fear of death; but it was hereupon enacted; that no justice or other person whatever shall from thenceforth be admitted to say, that they durst not for fear of death speak the truth; so that no force nor fear can excuse any person, if he shall now declare any fact to be treason, which cannot be warranted by authority of parliament. Therefore leave it upon the conscience of the jury, whether they do believe we are indicted for any breach of any common law, or act of parliament; and if for neither, whether they can in conscience take our blood upon their heads.

26. If the judge pretend, that we alledge not matter of law sufficient for assignment of counsel, then urge, that the ordinance, whereupon the indictment is grounded, is not pursued: that at the time of the indictment there were not two lawful accusers or witnesses to the grand jury, which ought to be by the law. Or a prisoner may alledge, he is not rightly named in the indictment, or hath not his right title or addition, or the fact is not set down with sufficient certainty, and by some or all these we may get counsel assigned.

27. If the indictment be for levying war, alledge, that there is no such open deed set down as is sufficient in law, and in such case, desire counsel to argue it, and endeavour to make our bearing of arms only a riot or unlawful assembly, and not a levying of war; for every bearing of arms in a warlike manner is not by the law a levying of war, as was adjudged in the earl of Northumberland's case, 5 Hen. 4.

28. If we could say we met together upon some private revenge against the sheriff, or some private man, and not for the destruction or reformation of any law of the land, or to oppose any lawful authority, then unless two witnesses shall swear that we did declare some other end, the case must be resolved in law, whether it be a levying war; yet this point must not be insisted on, until the grand point in law be overruled by the court, viz. that the indictment is sufficient in law, notwithstanding it is not grounded upon the common law, or any act of parliament; for we ought to lose ground by inches.

29. If they proceed upon the indictment to give evidence against us, insisting upon it, that the matter of fact be proved by two sufficient lawful witnesses; then let their witnesses depose openly in court face to face, for the law exacts two lawful witnesses in case of treason by statute 1 Edw. 6, and 5 Edw. 6, cap. 11, and 1 and 2 Ph. and Mar. cap. 11. Let the witnesses be strictly examined, and put to swear punctually to the fact, &c. charged in the indictment as the open deed, declaring and levying of war: and that both witnesses swear to the same fact, and at the same time and place, else they are but single testimonies to two facts of the same nature.

30. Insist upon it to make them prove the act or ordinance is a true copy of the parliament roll, and examine them upon oath, whether they examined it by that roll; (for it is possible they may have forgot to do it,) alledging that we are not to be tried by every private or printed paper, and demand it may not be read or given in evidence, until it be proved.

31. If they offer to prove by any intercepted letters, whereof they have copies, that we levied war, then deny those copies, and demand the originals; and if the originals could (which cannot) be produced, they can never prove them to be any of our hands, if we put them to it.

32. If the Commissioners that try us be serjeant Glynne or recorder Steele, or any other, who are not the ordinary judges at Westminster, tell the jury, that these are not the sworn judges of the law, but practitioners and pleaders, servants to the Lord Protector, and are made judges only for this purpose, to take our lives contrary to law, because the sworn judges refused it. If baron Thorpe comes, he is a sworn judge.

33. If the judges say, that the Lord Protector is invested with the same power, that the late governors, whether king or parliament, were invested with, tell the jury boldly, that the laws of England cannot be altered but by act of parliament, and therefore there was an act of parliament to change the government from the king, to the keepers of the liberties, anno 1649; but there is no act of parliament since to change the keepers of the liberty into a Lord Protector, so that there can be no treason to bear arms against the Lord Protector.

34. Tell the jury, that it is now our case, and they know not how soon it may be their own, for many were zealous for the present government, as the jury now can be, who have already felt, and others like to feel, the effect of their new ordinances: how safe and honourable it is for them to stick to the law, rather than take our blood upon them; and instance in John Lilburne's several juries; and if not to acquit us, yet to acquit themselves, by finding a special verdict, which leaves us to law, and lays the guilt of our blood upon the judges; and especially, how dangerous it is for the jury to prove, by shedding our blood, that the Lord Protector hath a legislative power, and that his ordinances are laws, when the late representative of the whole people in parliament refused to acknowledge them.

36. If indicted for treason upon the 25 Edw. 3, for levying war against the king, demand the statute to be read, beg the jury to observe when it is read, and then remember how all kingly government and authority was abolished by the act 1649, of the long parliament; and the Protector himself in several speeches declared, he was not, nor would be king. If they bid us shew the speeches, where he saith so, it is in the late speech, Jan. 22, 1654, p. 24, and in his declaration in April, 1653, where he saith, he desired the long parliament to prevent monarchy.

The Copy of the SUMMONS for Henry Vane, Knight, his first appearance at Whitehall.

IN pursuance of an Order of his Highness and the Council, you are to attend the Council, on Thursday the 12th of August next, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon. Dated at Whitehall this 29th of July 1656.—Subscribed by HENRY LAWRENCE President.

To Sir Henry Vane knight.

Belleaw, Aug. 4, 1656.

Sir; Lest my silence might be mis-interpreted upon the last paper, I have received, subscribed (as I suppose) with your hand, appointing my attendance at Whitehall the 12th instant: I have held myself obliged to return you this account, that my purpose is (God willing) to set forward from this place to my house in the Strand, the beginning of the next week, which is as soon as I can expect to have a coach to meet me half way, this very hot season for travel, and my own being in no condition to perform so long a journey upon so short a warning given to Your humble servant,

HEN. VANE.

To Henry Lawrence, esq. President of the Council at Whitehall.

* From a pamphlet, intituled,

"THE PROCEEDS OF THE PROTECTOR (so CALLED) AND HIS COUNCIL,

"Against sir Henry Vane, knt. a late eminent Member of the Council of State of the Commonwealth of England: as touching his imprisonment in the Isle of Wight. Together with his Testimony delivered in writing to the said Protector, by way of a peculiar address to himself, and faithful advice of an old friend and acquaintance. Faithfully transcribed and attested out of the original copies, and published by a real well-wisher to Sion's Prosperity and England's Liberty."

"He that being often reprov'd, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy." Prov. xxix. 1.

"For if I build again the things that I have destroyed, I make myself a transgressor." Gal. ii. 18.

The following Address was prefixed to the account:

"Reader; Thou hast here a true narrative of the whole proceedings against sir Henry

Sir Henry Vane's letter to Mr. Jessop, Clerk to the Council at Whitehall, presently after his coming to London.

Charing Cross house, Aug. 20, 1656.

Sir; It being declared by parliament (as is very well known) that it is against the laws and liberties of England, that any of the people thereto should be commanded by the king (when there was one, to attend him at his pleasure) but such as are bound thereunto by special service (which others therefore are not) it will I hope be permitted me without offence, to claim the same privilege and liberty in these times, and in the case of the summons sent me, wherein I find no cause for my appearance expressed but mere will and pleasure: Yet in vindication of the innocent, and peaceable department I live in according to the laws; I have not refused to be upon the place at my house here in the Strand ever since Thursday night last, as I made known unto you by this bearer the next morning. And as ever since I have been, so I am still ready to appear when I shall be sent for, until the pressingness of my occasions, in reference to my family concerns, which at this time by reason of my father's Vane, knt. and his imprisonment in the Isle of Wight. Occasion being taken (as thou wilt find) from his writing and publishing a discourse entitled, "An Healing Question," &c. tending to the composure and uniting all honest men's hearts and spirits, who from the first beginning of all the war all along have been engaged in the cause of true freedom, against oppression and tyranny, unto which he was invited by the Declaration for a Solemn Fast, set forth by those in power, the 13th day of March, 1655, exciting the good people of England and Wales to wait upon the Lord for light and conviction, professing in the sight of God and man, a most willing mind readily to receive, when convincingly offered by any.

"This being in short the true state of the case, and falling providentially into my hands, out of duty to my country, and respect to that worthy patriot (who at this day so eminently suffers for the cause of God, and true freedom, and that from the hands of those he hath deserved better measure) I have exposed the whole to public view, that thereby thou mayest be informed of the truth, and the nation may know what is become of so considerable a member, who may deservedly be a pattern for all true Englishmen to imitate, in this apostatizing and back-sliding age."

debts are very great and heavy upon me, shall require my attendauce upon them in other places of the nation. All which I held myself obliged to make known unto you in the relation you stand in, especially not having heard from you yesterday, as I suppose I might,

I am your servant,
HEN. VANE.

For Mr. Jessop, Clerk to the Council at Whitehall.

Thursday Aug. 21, 1656. At the Council at Whitehall.

Sir Henry Vane having this day appeared before the Council, and they having taken consideration of a seditious book by him written and published, intituled 'A Healing Question' propounded and resolved, &c. the same tending to the disturbance of the present government, and the peace of the Commonwealth. Ordered that if sir Henry Vane shall not give good security in five thousand pound bond by Thursday next to do nothing to the prejudice of the present government, and the peace of the Commonwealth, he shall stand committed, and that orders be drawn up accordingly.

W. JESSOP Clerk of the Council.

Sir Henry Vane's Letter to Mr. Jessop upon the receipt of this Order of the Council.

Sir; It is a great quiet to my mind, and satisfaction to my conscience in the sight of God and man; to perceive at the first entrance into my sufferings, that the Witness owned by me, under the title of 'A Healing Question' (when I was at Whitehall 21 present) which asserts the principles, spirit, and justice of the cause we have professed and fought for in our late wars, is now thought fit by those that are in power to have the name given to it of seditious, especially considering that the healing nature, and great tendency, that clearly shineth forth throughout that discourse, to the uniting the whole party of honest men in the true public interest warranted by the laws of the land, and in array of safety against common danger, doth with its own evidence wipe off the blemish of that reproach, with the same breath that it is cast on.

Nay I can truly say, I am very well content to take this as a mark of honour from those that sent it, and as the recompence of former services, as knowing a better reward is laid up for me in his hands, through the wisdom of whose providence, this may be the means prepared to keep me unspotted, and undefiled from the evils of these backsliding times, unto the day of Christ's appearance, which shall be my joy, when my enemies shall be ashamed.

Nor can I but observe in this proceeding with me, how exactly those that have made this Order do in this (as in many other things at this day) tread in the steps of the late king, whose design being (as is express in the Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom 15 December 1642,) to set the government free from all restraint of laws concerning our persons and estates, and to render the monarchy absolute, did think he could have no better means to effect it, than to cast into obloquy and disgrace, all those that desired to preserve the laws and liberties of the nation, and to maintain religion in the power of it, under the names of Puritans, factions and seditious persons, as well knowing that the light of their principles and practices, were like to stand most in the way of bringing to pass such an evil design.

And truly it is with no small grief, at this time to be lamented, that the evil, and wretched principles of the misgovernment, which the king then aimed to work out his design by, but could not effect, should now revive, and spring up so evidently in the hands of men professing godliness, to the great profaning and reproach of God's name, and arrived at maturity in practice, which former times abhorred to think of, and the designers themselves with all their policy and power could never reach.

This appearing but with too much evidence in my conscience, when the present governors held themselves obliged to call the people of these three nations unto a day of public humiliation, and to invite to the giving in of light and conviction, with a free and open profession of a ready subjection of mind thereunto, was a chief motive that induced me to prepare my witness, as I did, which being asked for from me by one of the Council, I delivered in writing, and it continued in their hands about a month's space, without any prohibition to print, and then was put to the press in the ordinary way of all other books, and had the usual warrant for the coming forth, and nothing laid to its charge ever since, till, for what reason of state I know not, it is now thought meet to be called seditious, and occasion is taken thereby to threaten me with bonds, unto which I say the will of the Lord be done; through whose supporting grace I am made not careful in this matter, and therefore have been willing, without any circumlocation or advantage I might have taken, to own with all readiness that witness for which the Lord hath given me a heart most freely to suffer whatsoever he shall call me unto, in the faithful discharge of a good conscience therein. And this being said, as is needful in my own vindication, my Answer to the Paper, that ordereth me to stand committed, unless I will give security by bond, &c. and so by my own voluntary act, do that which may blemish and render suspect my innocency, and the justice and good of the cause I suffer for; is this, That my purpose is, God willing, to give no such bond, but rather expose myself to the commitment mentioned; although I must ingeniously profess, I neither know, nor acknowledge the authority, which those that have made the Order, do exercise over me in this case: Nor do I conceive their Votes and Orders have a binding force by the laws of the nation. This is my Answer to the Paper I received from you, which I desire may be accordingly presented to their view, that ordered my commitment ; my intentions being to make use of the little time of liberty, which is remaining to my own dispose, for the visiting of my near relations in Kent, where I shall be sure to be heard of, and however do propound to myself not above a week's stay, before my return again to my house in the Strand, so subscribes HENRY VANE.

A true Copy of the first Warrant.—To Edward Dendy, Esq. Serjeant at Arms attending the Council, or to his Deputies and every of them.

Whereas upon consideration of a seditious book written and published by sir Hen. Vane knight, intituled "An Healing Question propounded and resolved, &c." tending to the disturbance of the present government and the peace of the Common-wealth. It was ordered by his Highness and the Council on the 21st of August last, that if he should not give good security in 5,000*l.* bond by Tuesday then next coming, to do nothing to the prejudice of this present government, or of the peace of the Common-wealth, he should stand committed. And whereas he hath not given security according to the tenor of that Order, but refuseth to do the same. These are therefore to will and require you forthwith to apprehend, and take into your charge, the body of the said sir Henry Vane, and him to convey in safe custody to the Isle of Wight, and there to deliver him to the governor of that Island, or to his deputy, to be by him disposed of according to the Order of his Highness and the Council. Hereof you are not to fail: And for so doing this shall be your sufficient Warrant.—Given at White-hall this 4th day of September 1656.

Signed in the name and by order of his Highness and the Council.

HENRY LAWRENCE, Pres.

A Copy of the Warrant to the Governor of the Isle of Wight or his Deputy.

Whereas upon consideration of a seditious book written and published by sir Henry Vane knight, intituled, "An Healing Question propounded and resolved, &c." tending to the disturbance of the present government and the peace of the Commonwealth. It was ordered by his Highness and the Council on the 21st of Aug. last that if he should not give good security in 5,000*l.* bond by Tuesday then next coming, to do nothing to the prejudice of the present government, or of peace of the Commonwealth, he should stand committed. And whereas he hath not given security according to the tenor of that Order, but refuses to do the same, these are therefore to will and require you, to receive into your charge from the bearer hereof, the body of the said sir Henry Vane, and him to secure, and keep in safe custody in such place within the Isle of Wight under your command, as you shall judge most convenient, not suffering him to speak with any person during his abode there, but in the presence of some officer, and to continue him thus under custody till you shall receive other order ; whereof you are not to fail. And for so doing this shall be your warrant. Signed in the name and by Order of his Highness and the Council, HEN. LAWRENCE, Pr.

Given at Whitehall this 4th day of Sept. 1656.

Here follows the TESTIMONY of Sir Henry Vane, delivered in writing by his own hands.

My Lord : Having something in my mind to speak by way of more peculiar address and concernment to your lordship than the rest of your company, I have chosen to do it by these lines, as the testimony which upon this occasion I desire to speak before your own conscience in the sight of God.

The Scripture saith, he that will save his life shall lose it, and he that will lose his life for Christ's sake and the gospel (in faithful witness bearing) shall save it ; this word of the Lord is in especial manner fulfilling amongst the Saints and people of God at this day, whom the Lord is bringing very eminently upon the stage of trial and sufferings, and that not only from open enemies, that sin in a declared profane spirit, but from equals and friends that have gone into the house of God in company, and taken sweet counsel together in all their concerns, but yet come at last to hate their brethren, and cast them out under a pretence of zeal and glorifying God therein.

And to come a little nearer the case in hand, this great truth is hastening apace to be made good in those principles, that spirit, and course of action your lordship is sound in, and in those which the Lord enables me to own and profess, and is bringing me through his rich grace in some weak measure, to the practice of, which are to cleave to what is right and good, though power be on the other side to oppose it.

The message which in former times you sent me, is in my memory still, it was immediately after the Lord had appeared with you against duke Hamilton's army, when you bid a friend of mine, tell your brother Vane (for so you then thought fit to call me) that you were as much unsatisfied with his passive and suffering principles, as he was with your active ; and indeed I must crave leave to make you this reply at this time, that I am as little satisfied with your active, and self-establishing principles, in the lively colours wherein daily they shew themselves, as you are or can be with my passive ones, and am willing in this to join issue with you, and to beg of the Lord to judge between us and to give the decision according to truth and righteousness.

And having named truth and righteousness, surely it may but too truly be said, that amongst us remains nothing but the name, the power and life thereof seems to be ceased from our land, and is banished from the societies of most men ; yet my lord, it is that whereby the actions and practice of all men are to be ruled, as well of governors as of the governed. Governors themselves are neither to be, nor make themselves more than what in truth and righteousness they are and ought to be: when they swerve from this rule, they become sinners, and must look by transgression to fall, as well as the lowest of the people.

That which in truth of fact you were, is visible enough to every eye, that is to say, under the legislative authority of the people represented in parliament, duly chosen and rightly constituted: you and the force under your command are the nation's strength, and formed military power, kept up by a derived authority from them, at a settled pay to be employed for the nation's use and service, and theirs only, and over this military body you are by them placed as the head.

This then is the power, which duly and properly you are, and more than this, I am not satisfied in my conscience is in truth and righteousness, appertaining unto you; to use this power lawfully, is your honour, your duty, your safety, as well as their welfare and preservation, for whom it was raised, and is still paid. To use this unlawfully, as evidently you do, when you go about to assume and establish to yourself the power of your head, and at best will but allow them but to share with you in their known right to the legislative authority, unto you, whom yourself and the army under your command acknowledged the whole to be due, when as a scale set to this their authority, they caused justice to be done upon the late king; you then become like that one sinner, which Eccles. 9, 19, is said to destroy much good, and do forget that wisdom which teaches and restrains from such unlawful use of force and strength, is better than weapons of war managed never so successfully in a way of destroying that which is right and good, whatever worldly gain and advantage in other respects to be obtained thereby.

And although your own conscience cannot but consent to the truth of what is here told you, in the name and fear of the Lord, yet being strong and trusting to the power of your sword, which is flesh and not spirit, is man and not God, your heart is lifted up, if you speedily repent not, unto your destruction; for you are not able to bear the reproofs of the Lord, nor the faithful witness and advice of his saints and people that in love and true friendship dissuade you from going on in this way, as foreseeing and foretelling your ruin and destruction therein: And the fears they have, that you will not ruin alone, forasmuch as their outward safety and welfare is so very far included in yours.

Nor doth the witness of the saints which they bear against you rest here; but it is too evident to those of them, that have a spirit of discerning, that in reference as well to Christ your heavenly head, as to the good people of this nation in parliament assembled, and rightly constituted, who were, and ought to be your earthly head: you lift up your heel, and harden yourself every day more than other, in a fixed resolution not to become subject, as is your duty, nor to hold and keep yourself in your due station allotted to you in the body: but are aiming at the throne in spirituals, as well as temporals; and to set up yourself in a capacity, of not holding your head either in the one consideration or the other.

And if this evil be in you at the bottom, be assured the Lord will speedily lay it open as before the sun, and none of the webs you are weaving will prove garments to cover your nakedness; neither will your agreements or covenants with death stand; even those politic contrivances and conjunctions with those that are the enemies, whether open or secret, against the spirit of life, and the workings and manifestations thereof, in the suffering saints and anointed ones of the Lord Jesus, whom the Lord is about to own for his wisdom in the midst of the earth, unto which excellent spirit that shall be found in those holy ones of the Lord, not only this nation's wisdom in their very supreme assembly, but the ruling powers of the whole world shall yield subjection, and think it their glory to become subservient to the bringing forth of the new heavens and that new earth, wherein dwells righteousness and truth; this is the foundation stone, elect and precious, which through faith is seen to be laid already in our Sion at this day, which those that believe, and make not haste, shall arrive to the experience of, and shall discern that this stone is in cutting out amongst us without hands, to its becoming a great mountain, and filling the whole earth.

Take then in good part before it be too late, this faithful warning and following advice of an ancient friend, but is now thought fit to be used and dealt with as an enemy.

Break off timely your sins by repentance, do judgment, execute justice, and walk humbly before the Lord; yea, rent your hearts and not your garments, for those are the fasts the Lord hath chosen, break every yoke, and let the oppressed go free; in one word, proceed no further in lifting up yourself against the Lord of heaven, but instead of causing the vessels of his house, even his most precious saints to be brought before you, as you do daily, for to exercise public scorn and triumph over them, see that your true interest lies with them and in them, as well now as heretofore, and endeavour to recover their hearts to you, and their prayers for you, lest your God in whose hands your breath is, and whose are all your ways, whom you have not cared to glorify as you ought, should arise suddenly and tear you in pieces, by the immediate stroke of his own vengeance, and there be none to deliver, even such of you who live in pleasure on the earth, and have been wanton, and nourished yourselves as in a day of slaughter, who have condemned, and in your hearts killed the just One, and he doth not resist you: But behold the Judge standeth at the door.

Ludlow, in addition to the passage extracted in the Note to Streater's Case, ante, p. 365, says of this matter :

" Sir Henry Vane, according to his promise, being come to his house near Charing-cross, the Council sent a messenger thither to require him to attend them; which he did; and was there charged by Cromwell with disaffection to the government, which he had demonstrated by a late writing published by him, with a seditious intention. The paper was called, "A healing Question proposed and resolved;" and contained the state of our controversy with the king, the present deviation from that cause for which we engaged, and the means to unite all parties in attaining the accomplishment of it. It was written upon an invitation given in a Declaration published by Cromwell for a General Fast, wherein it was desired, that the people would apply themselves to the Lord to discover that Achan which had so long obstructed the settlement of these distracted nations. When it was finished, he shewed it to lieutenant general Fleetwood; who, seeming to approve it, desired to take it with him, and promised to communicate it to Cromwell, upon the first opportunity that should be offered. Sir Henry did not disown either his dissatisfaction with the present state of affairs, or the publication of the discourse before mentioned. So that Cromwell thought fit to require him, by a day limited, to give security not to act against him. Which time being expired, he appeared again before the Council; and delivered into Cromwell's own hand another paper, containing the reasons of his disapproving the present usurpation, and a friendly advice to him to return to his duty, with some justification of his own conduct with relation to the public. But notwithstanding all this, and divers reasons alleged by him to excuse himself from giving the demanded security, he was sent prisoner to Carisbrook castle in the Isle of Wight."

" Sir Henry Vane being still a prisoner in Carisbrook castle, an order was sent thither from the Council to bring him from thence, and to permit him to enjoy his liberty, which was done; and he arrived at London in a short time after; where he met with another kind of persecution: for Cromwell perceiving that the former method had proved unsuccessful, privately encouraged some of the army to take possession of certain forest-walks belonging to sir Henry Vane near the castle of Raby; and also gave order to the Attorney-General, on pretence of a flaw in his title to a great part of his estate, to present a bill against him in the exchequer. This was designed to oblige him to expose his title; which if they could get done, they doubted not, by the craft of the lawyers, to find some defect in it, whereby it was hoped he would be forced into a compliance: yet at the same time he was privately informed, that he should be freed from this, or any other inquisition, and that he should have whatsoever else he would desire, in case he would comply with the present authority."

In the 5th volume of Thurloe's State Papers, is the following letter from Vane to Jessop:

Sir H. Vane to Mr. William Jessop.

" Sir; It being declared by parliament, as is very well known, that it is against the laws and liberties of England, that any of the people thereof should be commanded by the king, when there was one, to attend him at his pleasure, but such as are bound thereunto by especial services, which others therefore are not, it will, I hope, be permitted me without offence to claim the same privilege and liberty in these times, and in the case of the summons lately sent unto me, wherein I find no cause for my appearance, but mere will and pleasure; yet in vindication of the innocent and peaceable deportment I live in, according to the laws, I have not refused to be upon the place at my house here in the Strand ever since Thursday night last, as I made known unto you by this bearer the next morning; and as ever since I have been, so I am still ready to appear, when I shall be sent for, until the pressingness of my occasions in reference to my family concerns, (which at this time, by reason of my father's debts, are very great and heavy upon me) shall require my attendance upon them in other places of the nation: all which I have held myself obliged to make known unto you in the relation you stand in, especially not having heard from you yesterday, as I supposed I should. I am your humble servant,

of August, 1656.

" For Mr. Wm. Jessop, Clerk to Council at Whitehall."

Thurloe writing to Henry Cromwell, under date August 26, 1656, says:

" Sir Henry Vane was before the Council upon Thursday last, where he was charged with writing the book called "The Healing Question," which strikes at the foundation of this government, and offers another to the people: he owned the writing of it, as also the publishing, though in terms dark and mysterious enough (as his manner is:) he was hereupon ordered to give in security not to disturb the peace of the nation, or else to stand committed, and he was to do it by this day. I hear he will not give in security."

200. Proceedings in the House of Commons against JAMES NAYLER, for Blasphemy, and other Misdemeanors: 8 CHARLES II.* A. D. 1656. [Commons' Journals. 6 Harleian Miscellany, p. 399.]

December 5, 1656.

MR. BAMPFIELD reported from the Committee, to whom the Information about James Nayler and others, was referred, the state of the Matters of Fact, and the Votes of that Committee as follows:

First, I shall give you the short history of his life, as the Committee had it from his own

* Neal's account of this transaction, is as follows:

"The most extravagant Quaker that appeared at this time was James Nayler, formerly an officer in major general Lambert's troop in Scotland, a man of good natural parts, and an admired speaker among these people; some of whom had such a veneration for him, that they stiled him in blasphemous language, the 'everlasting Son of Righteousness; the Prince of Peace; the only begotten Son of God; the Fairest among ten thousand.' Some of the friends kissed his feet in the prison at Exeter, and after his release went before him into the city of Bristol, after the manner of our Saviour's entrance into Jerusalem: One walked bareheaded; another of the women led his horse; others spread their scarves and handkerchiefs before him in the way, crying continually as they went on, 'Holy, Holy, Holy, is the Lord God of Hosts; Hosanna in the Highest; Holy, Holy, is the Lord God of Israel.' Upon this the magistrates of Bristol caused him to be apprehended, and sent up to the parliament, who appointed a committee to examine witnesses against him, upon a charge of blasphemy; 1. For admitting religious worship to be paid to him. And 2. For assuming the names and incommunicable titles and attributes of our blessed Saviour, as the name Jesus, 'the Fairest among ten thousand, the only begotten Son of God, the Prophet of the most High, the King of Israel, the everlasting Son of Righteousness, the Prince of Peace.' All which he confessed, but alledged in his own defence, that these honours were not paid to him, but to Christ who dwelt in him.

"The Committee asked him, Why he came in so extraordinary a manner into Bristol? To which he replied, that 'he might not refuse any honours which others who were moved by the Lord gave him.' Being further asked, Whether he had reproved the persons who gave him those titles and attributes? He answered, 'If they had it from the Lord, what had I to do to reprove them? If the Father has moved them to give these honours to Christ, I may not deny them; if they have given them to any other but to Christ I disown them.' He concluded his defence thus; mouth. He saith he was born in the parish of Ardisloe, near Wakefield in Yorkshire, where he lived 22 or 23 years, till he was married, according to the world, as he expressed it. Then he removed into the parish of Wakefield, where he continued till the last wars began: during which time he was under several commands,

'I do abhor that any honours due to God should be given to me as I am a creature; but it pleased the Lord to set me up as a sign of the coming of the righteous One, and what has been done to me passing through the town, I was commanded by the power of the Lord to suffer to be done to the outward man, as a sign; but I abhor any honour as a creature.'

Neal then relates the appearance of Nayler before the House, and the Sentence there passed upon him. After which he proceeds thus:

"December 18. James Nayler stood in the pillory in the Palace-yard, Westminster, and was whipped to the Old Exchange; the remainder of his Sentence being respited for a week, in which time the Reverend Mr. Caryl, Manton, Nye, Griffith, and Reynolds, went to him, in order to bring him to some acknowledgment of his crime, but not being able to reclaim him, the remainder of his Sentence was executed December 27, when some of his followers licked his wounds, and paid him other honours both ridiculous and superstitious. He was afterwards sent to Bristol, and whipped from the middle of Thomas-street, over the Bridge to the middle of Broad-street. From Bristol he was brought back to Bridewell, London, where he continued sullen for three days, and would not work, but then begged for victuals, and was content to labour.

"At length, after two years imprisonment, he recanted his errors so far as to acknowledge, That the honours he received at his entrance into Bristol were wrong; 'and all those ranting, wild spirits which gathered about me,' says he, 'at that time of darkness, with all their wild acts, and wicked works against the honour of God, and his pure spirit and people, I renounce. And whereas I gave advantage, through want of judgment, to that evil spirit, I take shame to myself.' After the Protector's death, James Nayler was released out of prison, and writ several things in defence of the Quakers, who owned him as a friend, notwithstanding his extravagant behaviour; but he did not long survive his enlargement, for retiring into Huntingdonshire, he died there towards the latter end of the year 1660, about the 44th year of his age. Mr. Whitelocke observes very justly, That many thought he was too furiously prosecuted by some rigid men."

and at last was quarter-master in major general Lambert's troop; in which service he continued till disabled by sickness in Scotland, and so retired to his own home: about which time he was a member of an independent church at Horbery in Yorkshire, of which church Mr. Christopher Marshall was pastor; and by the same church, since cast out, as himself confesseth he hath heard; by which church he was charged as guilty of blasphemy and uncivil and wanton carriage with one Mrs. Roper a married woman, as that she should sit on his knee, and kiss him before divers other persons; and that it was his opinion, he might lie with any woman that was of his judgment. And then after some time went to visit the Quakers in Corawall, and by his way was by major Saunders committed to the common gaol in Exon, as a vagrant. And thence he and his company being delivered by an order from the Council, they travelling to Bristol, in the way Nayler took upon him, as was alledged against him. And as he passed through Chewstoke in the county of Somerset, towards Bristol, it is informed upon oath certified by three justices to the committee, That staying in that town one night, he was there in a chamber with three women of his company, leaning upon the bed with one of them at night when the servant of the house left them: and in the morning the servant found Nayler on the bed with one of the women, and the curtains drawn; and some of the company wished the servant to make no noise to awake them*.

* It seems likely, that Hume had not looked into this report of Nayler's case. He does not refer to it, or mention it. Some of the circumstances related in the text, would have enabled him to enrich the sneering account which he gives of the enthusiasts of the time. He notices this case at the conclusion of his mention of the Quakers:

"Baptism and the Lord's Supper, by all other sects believed to be interwoven with the very vitals of Christianity, were disdainfully rejected by them. The very sabbath they profaned. The holiness of churches they derided; and would give to these sacred edifices, no other appellation than that of shops or steeple-houses. No priests were admitted in their sect. Every one had received from immediate illumination, a character much superior to the sacerdotal. When they met for divine worship, each rose up in his place, and delivered the extemporary inspirations of the spirit: Women also were admitted to teach the brethren, and were considered as proper vehicles to convey the dictates of the Holy Ghost. Sometimes a great many preachers were moved to speak at once: Sometimes a total silence prevailed in their congregations.

"Some quakers attempted to fast forty days in imitation of Christ; and one of them bravely perished in the experiment. A female Quaker came naked into the church where the Protector sat; being moved by the spirit, as she

The way taken in this Report will be, first, To give you the Articles charged against him.

Secondly, The evidence, wherein there will be a little mention of the examinations and informations upon oath taken at Bristol; against which because there lies a seeming Objection I shall first clear that upon the matter of fact.

The Objection was, That they were not read again to the parties, as is usual in such cases.

Answer. That two witnesses, both of more than ordinary good repute, in that place were both put, and took characters of the questions and answers there; and comparing their notes did both of them publicly avow to the committee, as that which they were ready to depose, That every material passage was read unto the parties once or twice after they writ it down; and that they were the same which were offered to the committee, attested under the mayor of Bristol's hand to every of the said examinations and informations, and the city seal annexed to the whole. And besides, there is nothing in the said examinations and informations taken there but what is generally more clearly made out upon their examinations before the committee.

said, to appear as a sign to the people. A number of them fancied, that the renovation of all things had commenced, and that cloaths were to be rejected together with other superfluities. The sufferings, which followed the practice of this doctrine, were a species of persecution not well calculated for promoting it.

"James Nayler was a Quaker, noted for blasphemy, or rather madness, in the time of the Protectorship. He fancied that he himself was transformed into Christ, and was become the real Saviour of the world; and in consequence of this frenzy, he endeavoured to imitate many actions of our Saviour related in the evangelists. As he bore a resemblance to the common pictures of Christ; he allowed his beard to grow in a like manner; He pretended to raise a person from the dead. He entered Bristol, mounted on a horse; I suppose, from the difficulty in that place of finding a horse; His disciples spread their garments before him, and cried, 'Hosanna to the Highest; Holy, Holy is the Lord God of Sabaoth.' When carried before the magistrates, he would give no other answer to all questions, than, 'Thou hast said it.' What is remarkable, the parliament thought that the matter deserved their attention. About ten days they spent in enquiries and debates about him. They condemned him to be pilloried, whipt, burned in the face, and to have his tongue bored through with a red hot iron. All these severities he bore with the usual patience. So far his delusion supported him. But the sequel spoiled all. He was sent to Bridewell, confined to hard labour, fed on bread and water, debarred from all his disciples, male and female. His illusions dissipated; and after some time, he was contented to come out an ordinary man, and return to his ordinary occupations."

Other evidence will be from Nayler's examination, wherein is most of this whole matter, which was taken in characters by five of the committee, who were appointed to, and did compare their notes.

Thirdly, The Opinion of the Committee.

The whole fact will fall under one of these two Articles.

First, James Nayler did assume the gesture, words, honour, worship, and miracles of our blessed Saviour. Secondly, The names and incommunicable attributes and titles of our blessed Saviour.

As to part of the first Article, that James Nayler riding through a town in Somerset, his company spread their garments and sang, Holy, Holy, before him; and also sang the like at his entrance into Bristol, one going bare-headed before his horse:

The Evidence was, That Dorcas Erbury, in her examination before the Committee in the Painted Chamber, confessed, that she did spread garments before him. And Martha Simmons in her examination at the same time, saith, that those garments that she did spread she spread in obedience to the Lord. And Hannah Stranger being then also examined, said, she threw two handkerchiefs before him, which she did, because he that is Lord of all commanded her so to do. And John Stranger confesseth, That he saw others spread garments before him in the way from Exon to Bristol. And James Nayler himself confesseth (upon the question whether garments were spread before him?) That some clothes were cast down and afterwards, that some gloves and other things.

The evidence for singing Holy, Holy, was thus:

Dorcas Erbury in her examination at Bristol, being then asked, Why she passed along singing? said, She did not do it; but they that did it were commanded to do it: and the Lord hath made it manifest that they were moved of the Lord to do it. And being asked to whom they sang? and whom they called the Holy One of Israel? she said, Him that rode upon the horse; and she would maintain it with her blood. And being examined by the Committee as to this part of the examination, and advised to deny, if it were false; yet did not deny it though she did some other part of that examination.

Martha Simmons being examined in the Painted Chamber, whether she did sing the words, Holy, Holy, before the said James Nayler? answered, It is my life to praise the Lord, whether he be before me, or from me; it is my life to praise the Lord. And being asked, Whether she heard any person sing Holy, Holy, before the said James Nayler? she answered, it is our life to praise the Lord.

Hannah Stranger being examined in the Painted Chamber, whether she sang the words, Holy, Holy? answered, she could not well remember the words; but if she did not sing Holy, Holy, she witnesseth the Holy of Holies was risen, which moved her so to do: but said further, she did not stand there to accuse herself.

James Nayler being examined by the committee, whether any sang Holy, Holy, before him as he rode? answered, There were praises sung to the Lord. And being asked, Whether those words, Holy, Holy, were sung? answered, That he heard those words. And being asked as to the singing before him when he rode into Bristol, answered, That there was a psalm sung, such a one as the Lord was pleased to give into the hearts of them that sang. And being asked as to the words of the psalm, whether they were not Holy, Holy? said, It may be it was; very like it might be so.

And in his Examination at Bristol, being asked why he came in there in such an unusual manner, two women leading his horse, and singing, with one bare before him? said, It was for the praises of his Father; and that he may not refuse any thing that is moved of the Lord; and that he did think the Father did command them to do it. And being then asked, whom they meant by the word Holy that they sang? he answered, That they that sang were all of age to answer for themselves.

And this speaks something for the proving of another part of the first Article, vindicating one going bare-headed before him, and women leading his horse, which is more fully proved by the informations upon oath of George Witherly and Richard Hart, taken at Bristol, before the mayor there, and certified as aforesaid; and upon the confession of one Thomas Woodcock before the said mayor, who went bare-headed before James Nayler, and said he was moved by the spirit so to do. And James Nayler himself, upon his examination by the Committee, when he was asked, whether any went bare-headed before him as he went into Bristol? answered, he did not know, he took little notice of it, but heard some say it was so. And being asked, whether any woman led his horse? answered, there was a woman took hold of the bridle of the horse.

Resolution of the Committee upon this whole Evidence.

The Committee were of opinion, that the first Article was proved.

One thing also, being part of the matter of fact, we think worthy your knowledge, though much stress will not be laid on it; and that is, That the description of our Saviour by Publius Lentulus, to the Senate of Rome in writing (which is also imprinted), was taken upon one of James Nayler's attendants, which is also certified by the said mayor. And for Nayler's hair, both colour and manner of wearing it, as also the fashion of his beard, and feature, and person, did much agree with that description; which also was taken notice of by many of the Committee, how much he resembled (as they apprehended with some afflictation) the picture usually drawn for our Saviour.

That in divers Answers he imitated our Saviour Jesus Christ, using the same expressions title of the Everlasting Son of Righteousness? He answered, where God is manifested in the flesh, there is the Everlasting Son of Righteousness. And being asked twice, whether God was manifested in the flesh in him? Answered both times, God manifest in the flesh I witness, and may not deny.

"Prince of Peace."

This we find given him in a letter by the said Hannah Stranger; and in her examination at Bristol she owned him to be the Prince of Peace. The same title was also given him by Martha Simmons, as it appeared by her examination at Bristol, which was confessed by her, before the Committee. And being particularly asked, what she called the man whom we call James Nayler? Answered, I call him a perfect man. And being further demanded, whether she did not call him the Prince of Peace? Answered, He that is a perfect man, he is the Prince of Peace. And Nayler being examined by the Committee, whether he owned the title of Prince of Peace? answered, The Prince of Peace I own, the everlasting Peace is begotten in me.

"Sent to judge and try the cause of Israel."

The evidence of this was, in the same letter of Jane Woodcock's we find it given to him; and in his examination at Bristol, whether that title was given to him, he would make no answer. And being examined by the Committee, whether he assumed to judge and try the cause of Israel? Answered in these words: The judge of Israel is but one, and that judge I witness in me, which is the Christ: And further answered, If thou speak of him whom the Father hath sent into the world and begotten in me, the Holy Ghost, the spirit of the Father, and the Son in me, which is in me; if thou speak of it, this I own. And being asked, in what respect he was sent? He answered, no otherwise but as God manifest in the flesh, though not as mortal. And being asked, by whom he was sent to try the cause of Israel? Answered, By him who hath made all creatures, and hath sent his spirit into me, his Son into me to try the cause; though he said he was no judge in carnal matters. And being asked whether he were more sent to judge and try the cause of Israel, than another? Answered in these words; As to my saying I am sent; mind, that no otherwise than as the Father, and the Son is in me: and to that I say further, that no other man is sent in that sense but he that knoweth the indwelling of that God, and according to the measure of his knowledge of the living God, so far is judgment committed to him, and no further.

And being urged to answer, whether any other had the same measure of judgment, to judge the cause of Israel, as he had? He answered, That he had not at present any thing given him of his Father to answer unto that.

Resolution of the Committee.

That James Nayler hath assumed to be sent to judge and try the cause of Israel.

"JESUS."

And for this the Evidence was,

John Stranger, in a postscript in his wife's letter directed to, and found upon James Nayler, used these words: Thy name is no more to be called James, but Jesus. Which postscript being shewed to Stranger by the Committee, he owned it written by him: and being asked, wherefore he called him Jesus? answered in these words: I was moved of the Lord, and afterwards by the spirit of the Lord. And being asked whether by Jesus he meant the Saviour of the world? He would give no answer. And Martha Simmons in her examination at Bristol saith, that she hath heard some call him Jesus; which examination being read unto her, she denied not that, though she denied another part of that examination. And James Nayler being examined, whether any person had called him by the name of Jesus? answered in these words: As I am visible here before you, I believe they have not; but that the name of the Lord is in me, that I dare not deny: and further said, that they have given that name to him who is the Jesus, but if they have given it to any other than to the Son of God that is in me, I do deny what they have spoken. And being asked, whether he denied that they gave him the name of Jesus? Answered, As I am a creature, I believe they did not: And afterwards confessed that the name of Jesus was given him in a letter; and if he had understood it of any other than the Jesus, he should have denied it. Being demanded, whether they gave the name of Jesus to him? He answered in these words: No otherwise than as to the Son of God. Being demanded, whether any had given him the the name of Jesus? answered, Not as to the visible. And being demanded, to what then they gave the name of Jesus? Answered in these words: I understand they gave that name to the Jesus, to the Christ that is in me.

Upon his second Examination, being asked whether he owned the name of Jesus; and if that title belonged to him, as to Christ within? He answered, That name was never published to be called by me, neither do I call myself by that name; but what my Father hath published, is another thing.

Resolution of the Committee.

Upon this evidence the Committee were of opinion that James Nayler assumed the name of Jesus.

"He in whom the Hope of Israel standeth."

And for this, the evidence was in the letter of Martha Simmons, found upon James Nayler, where were these words, Thou well-beloved Lamb of God, in whom the hope of Israel stands. And James Nayler, in his examination at Bristol, being asked, whether he were the Lamb of God in whom the hope of Israel stands? answered, That if I were not his Lamb, I should not be so sought to be devoured; and that the true hope of Israel stands in the righteousness of the Father, in whomsoever it is. And being asked, whether Israel's hope were in any measure in him? he answered, Yea. Which examination of his at Bristol being read to him by the Committee, he denied not this part of it. And being examined by the Committee whether their hope of Israel did stand in him? answered in these words, It stands only in Christ Jesus, and as Christ Jesus is known in me. And being asked again, whether he were he in whom the hope of Israel stands? answered in these words, No way but as Christ is in me. And being then asked, Whether as Christ is in you, so are you he in whom the hope of Israel stands? answered, Nay, do not add to my words; I speak as plain as I can, that all the glory may be given to God, and none to the creature; that the whole glory may be given to my Father, and none to me, as you look upon me as a creature. And the next question was, Whether as Christ is in you, are you he in whom the hope of Israel stands? To which he answered, Christ in me, the hope of glory. And being examined, what hopes Israel had in him beyond any other person? answered, None can know, but they that are of Israel: They can give an account of their hopes; Israel must give an account of their hopes themselves.

The Resolution of the Committee.

That James Nayler assumed to beseech him "in whom the Hope of Israel stands."

The Committee being desirous to inform themselves how far the said Nayler was consenting unto that worship and those titles, before given unto him, besides the former evidence, they did find in his examination at Bristol, where being asked why he came in so unusual a manner, as the woman leading his horse, and singing before him? he answered, That he might not refuse any thing that's moved of the Lord: Which being read unto him at the Committee, he denied not. And for the better clearing of this, the Committee examined Hannah Stranger, whether Nayler reproved ~~her~~ for casting her garments before him, or for could go or kissing his feet? From whom they not accuse other answer than this, She would also find in their ~~any~~. The Committee did asked by them, whether ~~the~~ of Nayler, being for spreading their garments ~~reproved~~ the women him, answered in these words, I singing before unto them, take heed that they only I said but what they were really moved of ~~nothing~~. And being also examined by the Committee, whether he reproved those that gave him the titles before-mentioned? answered, That he had not at all spoken unto them concerning that thing, only the letters he had, wherein the titles were given; and did not think at all that any should have seen them, because he knew there was things in them that many could not bear; but now he saw his Father purposed they should not be hid.

Nayler, at his second examination before the Committee, being demanded, whether he had reproved the persons that gave him those titles and attributes? he would not say he had reproved them. Being demanded, whether he owned them, or disclaimed them? answered in these words: If they had it from the Lord, what am I, that I should judge it? And being pressed again with the same question, answered thus; If the Father move them by his spirit to give them to Christ, I may not deny; if they give that to any other but Christ, I disown it. And being asked again, whether he reproved them or not? answered, If attributed to the creature, then it is reprobable; if they did it to the Lord, then I dare not reprove it. And being asked whether he thought not Christ robbed of his honour, by that honour or worship given unto him? answered, That he looked upon it to be really to the true honour of Christ, or else he would utterly have denied it. And being asked, whether he had at any time whatsoever reproved those persons? he answered, I never understood that they gave that honour but to God.

Here we thought to have concluded this report; but the Committee meeting with some further evidence, they were willing you should be partakers of it. And it is this: John Baynham, deputy to the Serjeant of the house, to whose custody Nayler and his company are, committed, informed, That the usual posture of James Nayler is sitting in a chair, and his company, both men and women, do sometimes kneel; and when they are weary of kneeling, they sit upon the ground before him, singing these and divers other words to the like purpose, viz. Holy, holy, to the Almighty, to the true God, and great God; and glory to the Almighty, &c. And thus they do usually all the day long: But the informer never heard Nayler sing as aforesaid. And saith, There is great resort to the said Nayler by divers persons, who, most of them, do kneel before him in the manner aforesaid. And Martha Simmons, in the posture aforesaid, sung, This is the joyful day: behold the King of Righteousness is come. And further, the informer saith, That he never knew the said Nayler shew any dislike, either by reproof or otherwise, of that honour or worship which John Stranger and his wife, Martha Simmons, and Dorcas Erbury, and the rest, gave him as aforesaid. And a member of the house, being lately at the place, where Nayler is now a prisoner, informs the committee, that he saw Nayler and his company in the posture, aforesaid: ~~sing~~ heard John Stranger and one of the women holy, holy, holy, holy Lord God; and, Holy, whilst John ~~Stranger~~ thee, thee, thee, Lord God. And ~~Stranger~~ sang these words, he ~~did~~ sometimes look upwards, and sometimes upon James Nayler. Another member informed us, as upon his own view, to the same purpose. And at Nayler's last examination before the Committee, being Wednesday the 3d instant, one William Piggot did inform, That Nayler sitting in a chair where he is now a prisoner, one Sarah Blackbury came to him, and took him by the hand, and said, Rise up, my love, my dove, my fair-one, and come away: Why sittest thou among the pots? And presently put her mouth upon his hand, and suuk down upon the ground before him.

To which Nayler, himself, being examined by the Committee, confessed she took him by the hand, and spoke the words aforesaid; but denies the putting her mouth upon his hand, and such bowing down: But saith, That he sat low; and that he was not free to go with her. And Nayler being asked to whom she directed that speech? answered, To the Lord, and to him that raiseth from the dust, and casteth them down that are exalted. And being asked whether he reproved her for that expression? he answered, He reproved her not. And further, William Piggot informed the Committee, that the last week he was at the place aforesaid, where Nayler is now a prisoner; and that one Stranger and Martha Simmons were, with others, sitting upon their heels before and about Nayler; and that Stranger rose up, and stood and sung just before Nayler, according to their usual manner of singing, when and where a man Quaker (being present) asked Nayler, Dost thou own that voice? Nayler answered, Yea, I do. And Nayler being asked by the Committee, if this were so, answered, If I tell you the truth, you will not believe me. And Nayler being pressed to answer, whether he owned the voice aforesaid? answered, That voice I will not deny.

To sum up all: The Committee asked Nayler what he had more to say? (that being likely to be the last time of hearing him, before the Committee reported the whole fact to the house) he thus answered:

I do abhor that any of that honour which is due to God should be given to me, as I am a creature: But it pleased the Lord to set me up as a sign of the coming of the righteous one; and what hath been done in my passing through the towns, I was commanded by the power of the Lord to suffer such things to be done to the outward as a sign. I abhor any honour as a creature.

The said James Nayler was by order of the house brought into the bar; where the Speaker acquainted him of the heinousness of the crime of which the parliament found him guilty; and accordingly did pronounce the Judgment against him; upon which he withdrew. *

* Upon this occasion there was published, by Authority of the Parliament, the following Paper, intituled, 'A brief Account of James Nayler, the Quaker; and the uttering of many horrible Blasphemies, the like, for all Circumstances, never heard of in any Age before, with the Judgment pronounced upon him by Mr. Speaker, he being brought to the Bar in the Commons House, for those high Crimes whereof he had been guilty, Dec. 17, 1656.' At the top of this Sheet is a Print engraved by Hollar, representing the manner of Nayler's sentence being put in execution. Then follows the Account itself, in hæc verba: "James Nayler, the Quaker, having been released out of Exeter goal, he began immediately to play his pranks at divers places in the West; among the rest, he passed by Wells and Glastonbury, through which towns he rode on horseback, a man going bare before him, and others walking on foot on each side of his stirrup, and others strewing their garments in the way; from thence he took his way towards Bristol, and coming to a little village called Bedminster, about a mile from Bristol, he rode through that place likewise, a young man bare-headed leading his horse by the bridle, and another man before with his hat on. There accompanied him two men, with each a woman behind him on horseback; which women alighted when they came to the suburbs of Bristol, and footed it along on each side of Nayler's horse, the man still bare-headed leading the horse; and as they advanced along they sung, and entered Bristol singing, 'Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Israel;' and then the women led the horse with the reins in their hands, up to the high-cross of Bristol, and from thence to the White-Hart inn in Broad street. The magistrates sending for Nayler and his companions, they came singing all the way 'Hosannah;' and 'Holy, Holy, Holy, &c.' His name that went bare before him was Timothy Wedlock, a Devonshire man. The one woman was named

Which Sentence was accordingly executed upon him; and some of his followers were so prodigiously impious and silly as to lick his wounds, kiss his feet, lean in his bosom, &c.

When he came first to Bridewell, to carry on the Imposture he fasted three days; but flesh and blood being able to hold out no longer, he fell to work to earn himself some food. Upon the return of the Rump he obtained his liberty, and died soon after without any signs of repentance.

Martha Symonds, wife of Thomas Symonds, stationer of London: the other Hannah Stranger, wife of John Stranger, of London, comb-maker. The magistrates having convened Nayler and the rest, divers strange blasphemous Letters and Papers were found about them, wherein it appeared, that this deceiver had so far gained upon his followers by his impostures, that they ascribed to him divine honours, and gave him in Scripture phrase the same titles which are applicable to none but Christ himself. In a Letter of one Richard Fairman, from Dorchester goal, to Nayler, were these horrid expressions, 'I am filled with joy and rejoicing when I behold thee in the eternal unity. O my soul is melting within me, when I behold thy beauty and innocency, dear and precious son of Zion, whose mother is a virgin, and whose birth is immortal.' Another writes of him thus, 'All the wise men shall seek for him, and when they have found him, they shall open their ears, and shall give unto him of their gold, frankincense, and myrrh.' The same woman, in another letter to him, proceeds thus, 'O thou fairest of ten thousand; thou only begotten son of God, how my heart panteth after thee, O stay me with flagons, and comfort me with wine. My well-beloved, thou art like a roe, or young hart, upon the mountains of spices.' Then by way of Postscript, her husband, John Stranger, adds this, 'Thy name is no more to be called James but Jesus.' Also a maid named Dorcas Erbury, being examined, declared James Nayler, to be the Holy one of Israel, the only begotten Son of God; and that she pulled off his stockings, and put her cloaths under his feet, because he was the Holy Lord of Israel, and that she knew no other Saviour but him; affirming moreover, That the Spirit of the Lord within her commanded her to call him Lord and Master, and to serve him: That, in Exeter gaol, he had raised her from the dead after she had been dead two days; and that James Nayler shall sit at the right hand of the Father, and judge the world. Thus you see how this wretched Impostor hath prevailed upon his followers, to bewitch them to the committing of strange absurdities. An account whereof I had hitherto forbore, but have now given it in brief, that the honour and justice of the Parliament's Sentence passed upon him, may be evident to the people." 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1490.

In the Debate upon the Question, Whether James Nayler should be punished with Death? Lord Commissioner WHITELOCKE delivered his Opinion, to this effect, viz.

The arguments of those gentlemen who would have James Nayler put to death, are chiefly drawn from these three grounds; 1. From the law of nature. 2. From the law of God. 3. From the law of the land. And I hold that he ought not to suffer death by any of these laws.

First, As to the law of nature:

1. It is held among the politicians. That the subject thereof is Conservatio sui; for that every creature by the law of nature seeks his own conservation. Then, Whether the conservation of the people and Commonwealth of England do depend upon the life or death of James Nayler? is the question. It is likewise held among the politicians, That there is no judge of the law of nature, but only the supreme magistracy of each particular Commonwealth; and that within their own bounds only; and of a present case, not of a past or future case.—As in England; the parliament only is the judge of the law of nature, in England, and of the present case before them; wherein if the parliament shall adjudge, That it is necessary for the being and preservation of the people and Commonwealth of England, that James Nayler be put to death, then he ought to die by the law of nature. But I suppose that no gentleman is of opinion, That it is necessary for the being and preservation of the people and Commonwealth of England, that James Nayler should be put to death; and therefore on that head or principle of the law of nature, he is not to die.

2. If by the law of nature a blasphemer is to die, How comes it to pass that Moses was so doubtful in the case of the Egyptian, in the 24th chapter of Leviticus? He put him in ward, and asked counsel of God what should be done with him. Moses was a man of great knowledge and wisdom, and as able to understand the law of nature as any of us are; and if the case of the Egyptian had been against the law of nature, he was surely capable to have found it out, and not to have made so much difficulty as he did of it, so as to know the immediate pleasure of God in it.

3. The crimes of James Nayler cannot be against the law of nature, because they are against the second person of the Trinity, the knowledge of whom is not by the law of nature, but by the law of grace only; and therefore cannot be an offence against the law of nature, by which there cannot be any knowledge of him.

But it hath been objected, that the papists put to death those who deny the real presence, and other of their opinions held contrary to the truth; and that the very heathens, by the light of nature, did put to death such as denied or reproached their idol gods; and how much more zeal ought we to have for the honour of the only true God whom we worship!

This may be answered in the parallel, That neither are we to follow the examples of those bloody, persecuting papists; nor is James Nayler worthy the honour to be ranked amongst the holy martyrs. And, as to the judgments of the heathens, they were against such as denied their gods to be gods; but James Nayler at the bar did acknowledge, that Jesus Christ, who died at Jerusalem, was the son of God and the Saviour of the world.

And some of the heathen princes, by their light of nature, when flattery and their own strength did bear them out, assumed the names and titles of the gods of their countries, and were worshipped by their vassals.

Herein, James Nayler came towards them, permitting, and not reproving those who did adore him; which he would evade by the distinction, That as he is a poor creature, and visible, no adoration is due to him: but, as to that power which is invisible, that Christ within him, he is to be worshipped. That Christ is in the heart of a true believer, is not so strange a doctrine, as that a man is to be worshipped, who saith, That Christ is in him. But yet it cannot be warranted by the law of nature, to put a man to death for these assertions.

Then secondly,

The second ground is the law of God: By which it is objected, That this man being guilty of horrid blasphemy, ought to be put to death. And the case of the Egyptian is instanced in, and much insisted on as a positive rule and law for us to do the like, in the case of James Nayler. Herein I think it not improper, first to consider the signification of the word Blasphemy, and what it comprehends in the extensiveness of it; and I take it to comprehend, The reviling or cursing the name of God, or of our neighbour. And Gregorius Turonensis, in his Appendix, cap. 51. hath this expression, 'Liberare poteras de blasphemia hanc causam.' From whence the French word, Blasme; and our English Blame. Spelman saith it is 'increpare, vel convitiis aliquem afficere.' Paræus derives it from βλάπτω τὴν φωνήν i. e. Lesio Fama. And is this in relation to men, as well as to God.

And therefore the great Objection is taken away, That the parliament having voted him guilty of horrid blasphemy, cannot in honour and conscience inflict upon him a less punishment than death, for this offence. They have not voted it blasphemy against God; and it appears the word extends to men, in the genuine signification of it. But I shall take it according to the usual acceptation among us, and, as I suppose, it is intended by the Vote, That he is guilty of horrid Blasphemy against God. Yet I do not find myself convinced, that by the law of God, whosoever is guilty of horrid blasphemy amongst us, is to be put to death.

That we ought all of us as magistrates and Christians, to bear our testimony against these abominable crimes, and against this poor wretch, I do agree; but that the punishment for those offences must be death, I am not satisfied. That the law of God is so, many gentlemen have urged the case of the Egyptian, the Israelitish woman's son striving with the Israelite, in the 24th chapter of Leviticus, because God determined that he should die; and therefore, as their argument is, James Nayler must also die, By the same argument he must be stoned to death; and so must every rebellious son, and even he that gathereth sticks on the sabbath day and the like. Very learned divines are of opinion, and I think it not to be confuted, That no part of the law of the Jews doth bind any other nation, but that part of it only which is moral. The laws of the Israelites were by the wisdom of God, suited to the inclinations and dispositions of that people; and others (as there is great difference between the inclinations of people) must have different laws: and none hath ever yet affirmed, that this or that punishment of any offence is moral, though the offence itself be so.

But to come to a more particular disquisition of the case of this Egyptian. He was one bred up in the worship of the idol gods of Egypt; and in striving with the Israelite, it is conceived, that he preferred his own god before the God of Israel, and said, that their god did not bring them out of the land of Egypt, nor was able to do it. There is a difference to be observed in this chapter between the offence of this Egyptian, and the offence of blaspheming, or cursing of God in another case. In the 15th verse of this 24th chapter of Leviticus it is said thus 'And thou shalt speak to the children of Israel, saying, עֵקֶב אִישׁ אִישׁ man, man,' i. e. 'Whosoever of whosoever man shall עֵקֶב curse God shall be punished: that is shall be punished as the name of God shall require; so saith Aynsworth in locum, shall bear the punishment due for his sin.

The word 'curse' in Hebrew is עֵקֶב Jicallél, the root of which signifieth, 'to count light of;' and in the conjugation Piel is found to signify to 'curse out of evil will,' to speak ill of, or to imprecate; and also, to speak evil, so as by speaking to bring it.

This 15th verse in Grotius's opinion (in his exposition upon this text) is to be understood of him that curseth, but not distinctly naming the sacred name Jehovah, nor taking from him his reverence and deity, as if he were no God, and so is to be punished with an arbitrary punishment, as stripes, or the like.

But the 16th verse is thus, 'And he that blasphemeth נֹקֵב Nokeb' from the root נָקַב Nacabb, which signifies, 'to run through,' or to 'bore through,' and also to speak or name to one's disgrace; and is the same with the Latin phrase, 'configere nomen alicujus maledictis.' The emphasis is not in this word, but in the other שֵׁם Shem, and יְהוָה Jehovah; and when that name was named, it was a most immediate and direct blaspheming of God; detracting from him his honour and deity.

'He that blasphemeth the name Jehovah, or the name of Jehovah, shall surely be put to death, and all the congregation shall stone him.' Upon this, Aynsworth is of opinion, that the Hebrews some of them will not sentence this blasphemer with death, unless Jehovah be named; which opinion he disalloweth, saying, That the word is not so much, but the thing is to be respected. But he seems to require, that the blasphemer must immediately speak ill of God, or blaspheme him, or else he is not subject to this punishment.

Grotius agrees with the Rabbins, who say, that every cursing of God was not punishable with Death, but that the punishment in some cases was arbitrary, as the godly Judgment of those, who were to censure, should determine. But if Jehovah were named by a Jew, or others under their government, and so expressly and immediately dishonoured, that was to be punished with death. Wherein he doth distinguish between immediate and express blasphemy, and that which is so interpretatively only; and signifieth, that the punishment by stripes was only inflicted upon him that did blaspheme but interpretatively, and not maliciously nominating Jehovah.

This judgment of Grotius seems to me to be reasonable, and that the offence of James Nayler is within the 15th verse of this text, a blasphemy interpretatively only, and therefore punishable with stripes or the like. But that it is not within the 16th verse, an immediate and direct reproaching of the name of God; for at your bar he did acknowledge Jesus Christ to be the Saviour of the world, &c.

And if it be not within the 16th verse, then it is not punishable by death according to that law of the Jews, admitting the same to be binding amongst us Christians; as with submission to better judgments I think it is not, no more than those other laws of theirs of the like nature. Nor can any sort of punishment be construed to be moral. I (therefore) conclude this point, that there is no binding rule or law of God, that for these offences James Nayler ought to be put to death.

And if the matter be but doubtful, we should, in favorem vitæ, incline to the way of most mercy.

Thirdly, The Third Ground is, The Law of the Land.

And hereupon hath been observed, That by the laws of other nations blasphemy is punishable with death; And shall we do less for the honour of God, than others? And a worthy gentleman reported a case, which did lately happen in France, where the parliament of Bourdeaux adjudged an Englishman to death, upon the complaint of the protestants there, for blasphemy, in saying, 'That he was Christ.'

I know not what might be lately done there, but I find the laws of France concerning Blasphemy, in the code of foreign decisions, and of Henry 3, to be this: That for the first four offences, a blasphemer may be committed to prison to bread and water; for the fifth offence, to have his under lip slit; for the sixth, that his under lip should be cut so that his teeth be seen; for the seventh, his tongue to be bored; and for the eighth offence he is to be put to death.

It is true, that the Popish countries, where the inquisition is in force, do put Protestants to death as blasphemers; but I hope that will be no precedent for us to imitate. The Lutherans do hold the Ubiquity of Christ in such sort, that the news of James Nayler's being put to death for these offences, would not be pleasing to them. But to come to that which is most proper for your consideration, and for my discourse, The law of England.

I must acknowledge my own ignorance, that I do not know any law of this nation now in force, for the putting of James Nayler for these offences to death.

It is held that the Ordinance* of the Long Parliament concerning blasphemy is not now in force, and I do agree to that opinion; nor do I know any other law in that case. That ordinance cost much debate, and therein was a great diversity of judgments; and so I presume we shall again find it, whensoever these matters shall fall under consideration. The objection was very weightily urged, That there is a law in force against Heresy, as appears by the writ De Heretico comburendo, which (they say) was by the common law; and that blasphemy is an Heresy within that law; by which he may be put to death. This objection may receive a clear answer.

I am not of opinion, That Heresy was punishable by the common law with death, notwithstanding the writ De Heretico comburendo be in the Register; for it is not in the ancient manuscript registers, which indeed, is a true part and demonstration of the Common Law†.

But this Writ was of later date, and brought in by Arundel archbishop of Canterbury, in Henry the 4th's time, for the punishment and suppression of Lollards, who were good Christians, and of the same profession that we are. But the bloody practice of that prelate did not work the effect he intended, as appears (blessed be God) at this day. Yet if it should be admitted that Heresy was punishable by death at the Common Law, that cannot include Blasphemy.

They are offences of a different nature; Heresy is Crimen Judicii, an erroneous opinion: Blasphemy is Crimen Malitiæ, a reviling the name and honour of God. Heresy was to be declared in particular, and by the four first general Councils. But the Blasphemy in this Vote is general; and I do not find it reckoned in those Councils for Heresy.

I remember a Case in our Book of H. 7, where the bishop committed one to prison for a heretic, and the heresy was, denying 'that tythes were due to his parson.' This at that time was a very great heresy; but now I believe some are inclinable to think, that to say, 'Tythes are due to the parson,' is a kind of heresy.

So in this Case, That which now may be accounted Blasphemy, and the offender to be put to death for it; in another age the contrary may be esteemed Blasphemy, and the offender likewise put to death for that; which may be warranted by the present case before you, if James Nayler should be put to death upon the general Vote for being guilty of horrid Blasphemy, the particulars thereof not being exprest.

And what mischief and inconvenience in the consequence thereof may ensue to the people of England, and to posterity, is worthy the care of a parliament, and to be avoided, we being sent hither to provide for the good and safety of the people; and not to do that, which may bring them into snares and dangers. If this wretch be put to death, it must be either by judgment of the parliament, as the supreme court of justice; or by act of parliament to attain him of the crimes, and to inflict the punishment of death upon him for those crimes.

If you shall think fit to proceed in the judicial way, I hope you will be pleased to consider the weight of the consequences thereof, and to be very clear in the foundation, we being here in a constitution different from the former. And whosoever will take the pains to read the Records of the Parliament-Rolls in Edward the 2nd, and Richard the 2nd's time, of the Judgments then given in parliament, (with quickness and sharpness enough) and the speedy executions thereupon, will be the more tender of making new precedents of such proceedings in parliament.

I am far from derogating from the honour and authority of parliaments, and of this especially; but I humbly inform you what I have observed, and submit it to your better judgment. It is held, That antiently the judicatory of parliaments was in the lords' house, and particularly in criminal causes, which was very frequent; but seldom without an impeachment by the then house of commons, who were as the grand jury in that respect of the whole nation.

You are now the sole parliament of England,

* This Ordinance bears date May 2, 1648, and ordains, that whoever should maintain any one of the several opinions (there called Errors), unless he would abjure the same, or after Abjuration shall relapse, should be guilty of Felony without benefit of Clergy.

† See the preceding cases of Heresy in this Collection, particularly that of William Sautre, vol. 1. p. 163, and the authorities referred to in the notes. See also in Blackst. Comm. B. 4, c. 4, a succinct account of our laws concerning Heresy, in the course of which that learned Judge takes occasion to observe that, "Christianity being upon the continent thus deformed by the Demon of Superstition, we cannot expect that our own island should be entirely free from the same scourge."

and have the sole power in you; yet probably some may object, whether in a judicial proceeding the Lord Protector ought not to join with you. I do not know any Judgment given in parliament, but where there was a known law then in force against the offence adjudged, and the Judgment given according to that known law.

In this case of James Nayler there is no known law in force for the punishment of his offence with death, and therefore I am not satisfied, that we should by Judgment of parliament condemn him to death; nor to make a new law for the punishment of an offence by death, which law was not known nor made at the time of the offence committed; and this to be done by a Judgment.

Perhaps it will be said, That this may be done by a Bill of Attainder, and I perceive many gentlemen inclined thereunto; they have remembered the cases of the earl of Strafford, and of the archbishop of Canterbury, who were attainted by Bill; and the offences by them committed were not treason by the known law at the time when they were committed, and yet by act of parliament they were attainted of treason for those offences.

But here we are to observe, That in those Acts of Attainder is a clause, That they shall not be drawn into precedent; and I hope they shall not.

And further give me leave to inform you, That there is a great difference between those cases, and that now before you. By the stat. 25 E. 3, Treasons are enumerated, and a power is left in the parliament to declare any other facts to be treason. And the facts of the earl of Strafford, and of the Archbishop, in the general was the same, endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws of the land, and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government; which were maintained by the arguments of a very learned and honourable person, now a chief justice, to be treason by the common law of England.

But it will be hard to maintain, that the offences of James Nayler are punishable by death by the common law of England, and therefore it will be very dangerous in the consequence of it to inflict this punishment upon him by a new law.

I shall not mention the loss of time (whereof too much hath been already spent about this matter) in case you shall proceed by Bill. All the matter must be again debated and examined by you, and after that by my Lord Protector. But the mischief which it may produce to the people of England in the precedent of it, wherein no man can be safe, that by a law now to be made you should inflict the punishment of death upon James Nayler for offences which were not by the law of England punishable by death at the time when they were committed, is the strong argument with me to be against the question for the putting of James Nayler to death for these offences.

TO THE READER.

Courteous Reader; I do here give thee an account of what passed between James Nayler and his judges, as thinking it a part of my duty, towards God and Man; that thereby, thou mayest see and know, there is but one only God, and one only Jesus, which is the Christ, who was crucified by the Jews at Jerusalem; which whosoever denies, let him be accursed.

It hath been the custom, in former times, to immure, stone, or otherways punish with death, such as did falsely stile themselves the only Sons of the most High God; as thou mayest see in that faithful Chronologer, John Speed; who affirmeth, That, in the Reign of King Henry the Third, there appeared a grand impostor, somewhat, in wickedness, resembling this, of whom we are to treat: this man (or rather Devil) thinking himself to be somebody, boasted himself to be nobody in the eyes of the world, but as being sent from Heaven; and, having a grave and impudent aspect, pretended himself to be no less than the Saviour of Mankind: and to strike a belief into the easily seduced people, he had wounded his hands, feet, and side; affirming these to be the wounds, which the Jews had given him at Jerusalem. For which blasphemous and horrid doctrine, he was sentenced to be starved to death, between the walls of a strong prison, where he and his doctrine died: even so let thine enemies perish, O Lord.

Thou wilt, in his Examination, discover some difference to be between him and George Fox; but I suppose they are again reconciled.

I shall not trouble thee with all the many letters, which were conveyed from him to others, or from them to him, lest I make my relation swell too big: I shall only give thee two or three of the chiefest; out of which if thou canst pick but a little sense, and less truth, thou canst do more than,

Dec. 16, 1656.

Thy loving Friend.

Reader; Thinking it a very good foundation to my building, to give you the manner of his progress, before you come to his confession, or before his blasphemy aspires to the Stool of Repentance, I shall thus begin: James Nayler of Wakeheld, in the county of York, a deluded and deluding Quaker and impostor, rode, October last, through a village called Bedminster, about a mile from Bristol, accompanied with six more, one whereof, a young man whose head was bare, leading his horse by the bridle, and another uncovered before him, through the dirty way, in which the carts and horses, and none else, usually go: and with them, two men on horseback, with each of them a woman behind him, and one woman walking on the better way or path. In this posture, did they march; and in such a case, that one George Witherly, noting their condition, asked them to come in the better road, adding that God expected no such extremity: but they continued on their way, not answering in any other notes, but what were musical, singing, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Sabaoth, &c." Thus continued they, till, by their wandering, they came to the alms-house, within the Suburbs of Bristol, where one of the women alighted, and she, with the other of her own sex, lovingly marched on each side of Nayler's horse. This Witherly saith, he supposes, they could not be less deep in the muddy way, than to the knees; and, he saith, they sang, but sometimes with such a buzzing melodious noise, that he could not understand what it was. This the said Witherly gave in, upon his oath. Thus did they reach Ratcliffe-gate, with Timothy Wedlock of Devon bare-headed, and Martha Symonds with the bridle on one side, and Hannah Stranger, on the other side of the horse; this Martha Symonds is the wife of Thomas Symonds, of London, book-binder; and Hannah Stranger is the wife of John Stranger of London, comb-maker, who sung Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Israel. Thus did he ride to the high Cross in Bristol, and after that, to the White-Hart in Broadstreet, where there lie two eminent Quakers, by name Dennis Hollister and Henry Row; of which the magistrates hearing, they were apprehended and committed to prison.

Long it had not been, after their confinement in the Gaol at Exeter, from whence, passing through Wells and Glassenbury, this party bestrewed the way with their garments. But, to be short, they were searched, and letters were found about them, infinitely filled with profane nonsensical language; which letters I shall not trouble you with, only some of the chief, lest your patience should be too much cloyed. We shall haste now to their Examinations; and, because Nayler was the chief actor, it is fit he have the pre-eminence of lending the way in their Examinations; we shall therefore give you a full account of what passed between the magistrate and him, which take as followeth:

The Examination of James Nayler, and others.

Being asked his name, or whether he was not called James Nayler, he replied, The men of this world call me James Nayler.

Quest. Art not thou the man that rid on horse-back into Bristol, a woman leading thy horse, and others singing before thee, Holy, holy, holy, Hosannah, &c.?

Ans. I did ride into a town, but what its name was I know not, and, by the spirit, a woman was commanded to hold my horse's bridle, and some there were that cast down clothes, and sang praises to the Lord, such songs as the Lord put into their hearts; and it is like it might be the Song of Holy, holy, holy, &c.

Q. Whether or no didst thou reprove those women?—A. Nay but I bade them take heed, that they sang nothing but what they were moved to by the Lord.

Q. Dost thou own this letter (whereupon a letter was shewed him) which Hannah Stranger sent unto thee?

A. Yea, I do own that letter.

Q. Art thou (according to that letter) the Fairest of Ten-Thousand?

A. As to the visible, I deny any such attribute to be due unto me; but if, as to that which the Father has begotten in me, I shall own it.

But now, reader, before I pass further I hold it not impertinent to deliver you the words of the same letter, with another, which were these:

A Letter to James Nayler at Exeter, by Hannah Stranger.

J. N.

In the pure fear and power of God, my soul salutes thee, thou everlasting Son of Righteousness and Prince of Peace. Oh! how my soul travelleth to see this day, which Abraham did, and was glad, and so shall all that are of faithful Abraham: O! suffer me to speak what the Lord hath moved. There is one Temptation near, the like unto the first, and is like the Wisdom of God, but it is not, and therefore it must be destroyed, Oh! it defileth and hateth the innocent; I beseech thee wait, my soul travelleth to see a pure Image brought forth, and the enemy strives to destroy it, that he may keep me always sorrowing, and ever seeking, and never satisfied, nor never rejoicing: but he in whom I have believed will shortly tread Satan under our feet, and then shalt thou and shine return to Zion with everlasting rejoicings and praises. But, till then, better is the house of mourning than rejoicing, for he that was made a perfect example, when he had fasted the appointed time of his Father, was tempted to eat, and to shew a miracle, to prove himself to be the Son of God: but man lives not by bread, said he, and now no more by that wisdom shall he live, on which he hath long fed, as on bread; and, as his food hath been, so must his fast be, and then, at the end, temptation, to as low a thing as a stone, that, if it were possible, the humility and the miracles would deceive the elect, innocent, and righteous branch of holiness. But, be his wills never so many, the time comes he shall leave thee, for he is faithful, who hath promised he will not leave the Throne of David without a man to sit thereon, which shall judge the poor with righteousness, and the world with equity. This shall shortly come to pass, and then shall the vision speak, and not lye. Oh! let innocency be thy beloved, and righteousness thy spouse, that thy Father's lambs may rejoice in thy pure and clear unspotted Image of Holiness and purity, which my soul believeth I shall see, and so in the faith rest. I am in patience, wait, and the power will preserve from subtlety; though under never so zealous a pretence of innocent wisdom it be, yet shall the Lord not suffer his Holy One to see corruption, nor his soul to lie in hell, but will cause the mountains to melt at his presence, and the little hills to bring him peace: Oh! I am ready to fear as a servant, and to obey as a child. If I have spoken words too high, love hath constrained me, which is as strong as death; and with the same spirit cover them as they are spoken with, and then shall the spirit of David be witnessed, who refused not words, though from his servants mouth; if they were in the fear, I am his servant, and he my master whom I love and fear, and trust I shall do unto the end.

HANNAH STRANGER.

From London, 16th day of the 7th month.

Another of the same.

Oh! thou fairest of ten thousand, thou only begotten Son of God, How my heart panteth after thee? O stay me with flaggons, and comfort me with wine. My beloved, thou art like a roe, or young hart, upon the mountains of spices, where thy beloved spouse hath long been calling thee to come away, but hath been but lately heard of thee. Now it lies something upon me, that thou mindest to see her, for the spirit and power of God is with her; and there is given to her much of excellent and innocent wisdom arisen, and arising in her, which will make all the honest-hearted to praise the Lord alone, and no more set up self. And therefore let not my Lord and Master have any jealousy again of her, for she is highly beloved of the Lord, and that shall all see who come to know the Lord. And now he doth bless them that bless his, and curse them that curse his; for this hath the Lord shewed me, That her portion is exceeding large in the Lord; and, as her sorrow hath been much, so shall her joy be much more; which rejoiceth my heart, to see her walk so valiantly and so faithfully in the work of the Lord, in this time of so great trials as hath been laid upon her especially. And I am

HANNAH STRANGER.

The Postscript.

Remember my dear love to thy master. Thy name is no more to be called James but Jesus.

JOHN STRANGER.

This John Stranger is husband to this Hannah Stranger; and this was added as a Postscript by him to his wife's letter, as is acknowledged, Remember my love to those friends with thee. The seventeenth day of the eighth month, superscribed this to the hands of James Nayler.

We shall now return to his Examination.

Q. Art thou the only Son of God?

A. I am the Son of God, but I have many brethren.

Q. Have any called thee by the name of Jesus?

A. Not as unto the visible, but as Jesus, the Christ that is in me.

Q. Dost thou own the name of the King of Israel?

A. Not as a creature, but if they give it Christ within, I own it, and have a kingdom but not of this world; my kingdom is of another world, of which thou wotest not.

Q. Whether or no art thou the Prophet of the Most High?

A. Thou hast said, I am a Prophet.

Q. Dost thou own that attribute, the Judge of Israel?

A. The judge is but one, and is witnessed in me, and is the Christ, there must not be any joined with him: if they speak of the spirit in me, I own it only as God is manifest in the flesh, according as God dwelleth in me, and judgeth there himself.

Q. By whom were you sent?

A. By him who hath sent the Spirit of his Son in me to try, not as to carnal matters, but belonging to the kingdom of God, by the indwelling of the Father and the Son, to judge of all spirits, to be guided by none.

Q. Is not the written word of God the guide?

A. The written word declares of it, and what is not according to that is not true.

Q. Whether art thou more sent than others, or whether others be not sent in that measure?

A. As to that I have nothing at present given me of my Father to answer.

Q. Was your birth mortal or immortal?

A. Not according to the natural birth, but according to the spiritual birth, born of the immortal seed.

Q. Wert thou ever called the Lamb of God?

A. I look not back to things behind, but there might be some such thing in the letter; I am a lamb, and have sought it long before I could witness it.

Q. Who is thy mother, or whether or no is she a virgin?

A. Nay, according to the natural birth.

Q. Who is thy mother according to thy spiritual birth?

A. No carnal creature.

Q. Who then?

A. [To this he refused to answer.]

Q. Is the hope of Israel in thee?

A. The hope is in Christ, and as Christ is in me, so far the hope of Israel stands; Christ is in me, the hope of glory.

Q. What more hope is there in thee than in others?

A. None can know but them of Israel, and Israel must give an account.

Q. Art thou the everlasting Son of God?

A. Where God is manifest in the flesh, there is the everlasting Son, and I do witness God in the flesh; I am the Son of God, and the Son of God is but one.

Q. Art thou the Prince of Peace?

A. The Prince of everlasting Peace is begotten in me.

Q. Why dost thou not reprove those that give thee these attributes?

A. I have said nothing unto them, but such things are written.

Q. Is thy name Jesus?

[Here he was silent.]

Q. For what space of time hast thou been so called?

Q. Is there no other Jesus besides thee?

[These questions he forbore either to confirm or to contradict them.]

Q. Art thou the everlasting Son of God, the King of Righteousness?

A. I am, and the everlasting righteousness is wrought in me; if ye were acquainted with the Father, ye would also be acquainted with me.

Q. Did any kiss thy feet?

A. It might be they did, but I minded them not.

Q. When thou wast called the King of Israel, didst thou not answer, thou sayest it? A. Yea.

Q. How dost thou provide for a livelihood?

A. As do the lillies without care, being maintained by my Father.

Q. Whom dost thou call thy Father?

A. He whom thou callest God.

Q. What business hadst thou at Bristol, or at way?

A. I was guided and directed by my Father.

Q. Why wast thou called a Judge to try the cause of Israel?

[Here he answered nothing.]

Q. Are any of these sayings blasphemy or not?

VOL. V.

A. What is received of the Lord is truth.

Q. Whose letter was that which was writ to thee, signed T. S.

A. It was sent me to Exeter gaol by one the world calls Tho. Symonds.

Q. Didst thou not say, if ye had known me, ye had known the Father?

A. Yea, for the Father is my life.

Q. Where wert thou born?

A. At Anderslow in Yorkshire.

Q. Where lives thy wife?

A. She, whom thou callest my wife, lives in Wakefield.

Q. Why dost thou not live with her?

A. I did, till I was called to the army.

Q. Under whose command didst thou serve in the army?

A. First, under him they call lord Fairfax.

Q. Who then?

A. Afterwards, under that man called col. Lambert: and then I went into Scotland, where I was a quartermaster, and returned sick to my earthly habitation, and was called into the North.

Q. What wentest thou for to Exeter?

A. I went to Lawson to see the brethren.

Q. What estate hast thou?

A. I take no care for that.

Q. Doth God in an extraordinary manner sustain thee, without any corporal food?

A. Man doth not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Father: the same life is mine that is in the Father; but not in the same measure.

Q. How art thou cloathed?

A. I know not.

Q. Dost thou live without bread?

A. As long as my heavenly Father will: I have tasted of that bread, of which he that eateth shall never die.

Q. How long hast thou lived without any corporal sustenance, having perfect health?

A. Some fifteen or sixteen days, sustained without any other food except the word of God.

Q. Was Darcas Erbury dead two days in Exeter, and didst thou raise her?

A. I can do nothing of myself: the Scripture beareth witness to the power in me which is everlasting; it is the same power we read of in the Scripture. The Lord hath made me a sign of his coming: and that honour that belongeth to Christ Jesus, in whom I am revealed, may be given to him, as when on earth at Jerusalem, according to the measure.

Q. Art thou the unspotted Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world?

A. Were I not a lamb, wolves would not seek to devour me.

Q. Art thou not guilty of horrid blasphemy, by thy own words?

A. Who made thee a judge over them?

Q. Wherefore camest thou in such an unusual posture, as, two women leading thy horse; others singing, Holy, holy, &c. with another before thee bare-headed, knee-deep in the highway-mud, when thou mightest have gone in the causey; and at such a time, that, it raining, thy companions received the rain at their necks, and vented it at at their hose and breeches?

A. It tended to my Father's praise and glory, and I ought not to slight any thing which the spirit of the Lord moves.

Q. Dost thou think the spirit of the Lord moved, or commanded them?

A. Yea.

Q. Whom meant they by Holy, holy, holy, &c.?

A. Let them answer for themselves, they are at age.

Q. Did not some spread their cloaths on the ground before thee, when thou riddest through Glastenbury and Wells?

A. I think they did.

Q. Wherefore didst thou call Martha Symonds mother, as George Fox affirms?

A. George Fox is a liar and a firebrand of hell; for neither I, nor any with me, called her so.

Q. Thou hast a wife at this time?

A. A woman I have, who by the world is called my wife; and some children I have which according to the flesh are mine.

Q. Those books which thou hast writ, wilt thou maintain them, and affirm what is therein?

A. Yea, with my dearest blood.

Martha Symonds's Examination.

She confesseth, she knew James Nayler formerly; for he is now no more James Nayler, but refined to a more excellent substance; and so she saith she came with him from Bristol to Exeter.

Q. What made thee lead his horse into Bristol, and sing Holy, holy, holy, &c.? And to spread thy garments before him?

A. I was forced thereto by the power of the Lord.

Q. He is stiled, in Hannah Stranger's letter, The Fairest of Ten-thousand, The Hope of Israel, and The only begotten Son of God: dost thou so esteem him?

A. That James Nayler, of whom thou speakest, is buried in me, and he hath promised to come again.

Q. Dost thou like of that attribute, as given to him?

A. I cannot tell, I judge them not.

Q. Whether didst thou kneel before him?

A. What I did was in obedience to a power above.

Q. Dost thou own him to be the Prince of Peace?

A. He is a perfect man; and he, that is a perfect man, is the Prince of Peace.

Q. Hast thou a husband?

A. I have a man, which thou callest my husband.

Q. What made thee to leave him, and to follow James Nayler in such a manner?

A. It is our life to praise the Lord, and the Lord my strength (who filleth heaven and earth) is manifest in James Nayler.

Q. Oughtest thou to worship James Nayler, upon thy knees?

A. Yea, I ought so to do.

Q. Why oughtest thou so to do?

A. He is the Son of Righteousness; and the new man within him is the everlasting Son of Righteousness; and James Nayler will be Jesus, when the new life is born in him.

Q. By what name callest thou him?

A. Lord.

Q. Why dost thou call him Lord?

A. Because he is the Prince of Peace and Lord of Righteousness.

Q. What reason canst thou shew for thy calling him king of Israel?

A. He is so anointed.

Q. Who hath anointed him?

A. A Prophet.

Q. What Prophet was that?

A. I will not tell thee.

Q. Thou confessest that thou didst spread thy cloaths?

A. Yea, I did.

Q. Tell me; doth that spirit of Jesus, which thou sayest is in Nayler, make him a sufficient Jesus to others?

A. I tell thee, there is seed horn in him, which above all men I shall (and every one ought to) honour.

Q. Is he King of Israel, as thy husband saith?

A. If he saith so, thy testimony is double.

Hannah Stranger's Examination.

She saith, she came from Bristol to Exeter with James Nayler; and that she flung her handkerchief before him, because commanded so of the Lord; and that she sung Holy, &c. and that the Lord is risen in him.

Q. Wherefore didst thou sing before James Nayler?

A. I must not be mute when I am commanded of the Lord.

Q. Wherefore didst thou sing to him?

A. My conscience tells me I have not offended any law.

Q. Was that letter thine: and didst thou spread thy garments before him?

A. Yea, and my blood will maintain it.

Q. Dost thou own him for the Prince of Peace?

A. Yea, he is so.

Q. What dost thou call his name?

A. It hath been said already, I have told of his name.

Q. Dost thou not know it to be Blasphemy to give him such and such attributes?

A. If I have offended any law, &c.

Q. Didst thou send him that letter wherein he was called the Son of God?

A. Yea, I do own the whole letter.

Q. Didst thou call him Jesus?

A. [She would not answer.]

Q. Didst thou kiss his feet?

A. Yea.

Thomas Stranger's Examination.

He owneth the Postscript of the letter, in which he calleth James Nayler Jesus; but could not be got to answer to any more questions, any further than, If I have offended any law. He confesseth he called James Nayler Jesus, and saith he was thereto moved of the Lord.

Timothy Wedlock's Examination.

Q. Dost thou own James Nayler to be the only Son of God?

A. I do own him to be the Son of God.

Q. Wherefore didst thou and the rest sing before him, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Israel?

A. I do own the songs of Sion.

Q. Thou wilt go through a great rain bare-headed, Why then wilt thou not be uncovered to a magistrate?

A. What I did was as the Lord commanded.

Q. What is your opinion concerning Religion?

A. I own no opinions, nor any judgments.

Q. Wherefore didst thou honour him in towns, and not elsewhere?

A. We did as well in commons; but in both, as the Spirit of the Lord directed us.

Q. Wherefore didst thou kneel before him?

A. The truth.

Dorcas Erbury, the Widow of William Erbury, once a Minister, but a seducing Quaker, her Examination.

Q. Where dost thou live?

A. With Margaret Thomas.

Q. Wherefore didst thou sing Holy, &c.?

A. I did not at that time; but those that sang did it in discharging of their duty.

Q. Dost thou own him that rode on horse-back to be the Holy One of Israel?

A. Yea, I do; and with my blood will seal it.

Q. And dost thou own him for the Son of God?

A. He is the only begotten Son of God.

Q. Wherefore didst thou pull off his stockings, and lay thy cloaths beneath his feet?

A. He is worthy of it; for he is the holy Lord of Israel.

Q. Knowest thou no other Jesus the only begotten Son of God?

A. I know no other Saviour.

Q. Dost thou believe in James Nayler?

A. Yea, in him whom thou callest so, I do.

Q. By what name dost thou use to call him?

A. The Son of God; but I am to serve him, and to call him Lord and Master.

Q. Jesus was crucified; but this man you call the Son of God, is alive?

A. He hath shook off his carnal body.

Q. Why, what body hath he then?

A. Say not the Scriptures, Thy natural body I will change, and it shall be spiritual?

Q. Hath a Spirit flesh and bones?

A. His flesh and bones are new.

Q. Christ raised those that had been dead; so did not he.

A. He raised me.

Q. In what manner?

A. He laid his hand on my head, after I had been dead two days, and said, Dorcas, arise; and I arose, and live as thou seest.

Q. Where did he this?

A. At the Gaol in Exeter.

Q. What witness hast thou for this?

A. My mother, who was present.

Q. His power being so much, wherefore opened he not the prison-doors, and escaped?

A. The doors shall open, when the Lord's work is done.

Q. What Apostles hath he?

A. They are scattered, but some are here.

Q. Jesus Christ doth sit at the right hand of the Father, where the world shall be judged by him.

A. He, whom thou callest Nayler, shall sit at the right-hand of the Father, and shall judge the world with equity.

Here followeth a Relation concerning one of his companions:

One of James Nayler's disciples, having attained to some knowledge in the French tongue, went over into France to a city called Bourdeaux, where, after entering into a congregation of the Protestants, he began, after his wonted manner here in England, to cry out, in the open congregation, against the minister, calling him conjurer, lyar, impostor, deceiver; and the elders and people being astonished at the novelty, and reputing him a madman, came and told him that they had laws in France to protect the congregations, either of Papists or Protestants, from any disturbance; and thrust him forth of their church.

Upon which, he went into the church-yard, and, upon a stone, continued his discourse, which drew the whole congregation out of the church, after him, and caused the minister to give over; and the Elders, coming again to him, told him, that, he being a stranger, they were willing to favour him; but, seeing he did continue his disturbance, they would commit him to justice; he told them, justice was never in that place until his appearance.

Upon that, they took him away to the governor; where, being brought, with his hat on, he asked the governor what he was; who told him, he was the governor of that place under the king of France: he said, That he would not answer him as governor, his government being carnal: and a certain bishop being with the governor, who was a Papist, desiring that he might question him, and demanding what he was, he told him, he was an Englishman, and sent of the Lord to prepare his way: he demanded of the bishop what he was; who told him, he was a bishop; whereupon he replied, That against him he was sent, who was one of the locusts that was sent forth of the bottomless pit; and that the weapons he had with him were fitted to destroy him and the whole kingdom of Antichrist, who was held in darkness and blindness; and that he was to pour out vials of the Father's wrath upon him. The governor of Bourdeaux, perceiving several of the people to be infected with his doctrine, demanded if there was any ship ready to sail for England; which being informed of, he therein shipped him, being not willing to use extremity to a stranger, but caused some six or seven, who had been infected with his doctrine, to be whipped through the streets.

A relation concerning some others of the same tribe:

Seven or eight others went over in a vessel to New England, where, being arrived, they began to spread themselves; but the governor, having notice, caused them to be clapped up close in a castle, and would not suffer any to come to see them under penalty of five pounds: in the mean time, he sent for the master of the ship that brought them, and commanded him immediately to carry them back into old England, which he refusing, was also clapped up close prisoner, until he consented, and took them a-board again.

Now, reader, I shall close up all with a word or two of his life and actions:

James Nayler is a man of so erroneous and unsanctified a disposition, that it is hard to say whether heresy or impudency beareth the greater rule in him; as will appear:

First, In what he testifieth before sufficient witnesses; see the Brief Relation of the Northern Quakers, p. 22, That he was as holy, just, and good, as God himself. And,

Secondly, That he, in a letter to one in Lancaster, expressly saith, That, he that expected to be saved by Jesus Christ that died at Jerusalem, shall be deceived: see Mr. Billingsly's Defence of the Scriptures, p. 16. The perfect Pharisee, p. 8. And so said another of that sect: he was not such a fool, as to hope to be saved by Jesus Christ that died at Jerusalem sixteen-hundred years ago: see Mr. Farmer's Mystery of Godliness and Ungodliness. Thus they glory in their ignorance, and count that foolishness which is the true wisdom.

Thirdly, In a letter I had in my possession, but now lent to a friend, subscribed by the Pastor, and other members of that congregation in the North, whereof Nayler once was a member, till, for his apostacy, he was excommunicated, it is offered to be proved, and by them testified to be true, that one Mrs. Roper, her husband being gone, on some occasion from her, a long voyage, this Nayler frequented her company, and was seen to dandle her upon his knee, and kiss her lasciviously; and, in that time of his society with her, she was brought to bed of a child, when her husband had been absent seven and forty weeks, to a day, from her; and, on a time, he was seen to dance her in a private room; and, having kissed her very often, she took occasion to say, "Now, James, what would the world say if they should see us in this posture?" To which he said somewhat, but he was so low, that it could not be heard. This was objected against him, but he denied to answer it before the said church; objecting, That he would not speak to them, that spoke not immediately by the spirit.

Fourthly, In that, when I had discourse with him concerning perfect perfection, at the Bull and Mouth, he said, I was a liar to say he owned it; then I proved it from his own writings, as that he said, "They that say they have faith, and their life is not the life of Christ, and them that say they have faith, and yet they cannot be saved from their sins but in part in this world, them and their faith I deny, &c." To which, he hypocritically said, that I was a liar to say that he owned it in himself, though he disowned it in others. And, when I had objected any thing against what he said, he would deny it as soon as he had spoke it; which, to convince the people of his lying deceits, I desired them that stood by me, to remember that he said, "All that are in the world are of the world," in direct opposition to that saying of Christ, John xvii, "I pray not, holy Father, that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but preserve them from the evil of the world;" which I presently accused him with, for which he called me liar; for he said, He said not so; I then desired them that heard him testify to the truth, against the liar and his deceit, which they did; but his seared impudence was such, that he said should a thousand say so, they were all liars; with much more to the like effect.

He is a man of a ruddy complexion, brown hair, and slank, hanging a little below his jaw-bones; of an indifferent height; not very long visaged, nor very round; close shaven; a sad down look, and melancholy countenance; a little band, close to his collar, with no band-strings; his hat hanging over his brows; his nose neither high nor low, but rising a little in the middle.

Something concerning some others of them also:

Disborough, not much inferior to Nayler himself, attempting to lie with one Rebeccah (who was first seduced to be, and then was of their heresy) she asked him, what his wife would say if she should know what he attempted? Disborough replied, That he gave her the same liberty that he took himself (that was, to be a whore, as he was a whoremaster) but, in short, he having obtained his desire of her, she asked him, How if she should prove with child? He answered she must be content to be numbered with the transgressors, and to make her grave with the wicked (so that he followed not that light which is pure, but sinned against knowledge) as she, the said Rebeccah, as bewailing her sin, confessed unto one Mr. White, a Lincolnshire gentleman, to whom she added, That Nayler attempted to defile her also; so that, instead of perfect Saints, they are rather perfect sophisters.

This relation under the said gentleman's hand, and the aforementioned letter from the church, whereof Nayler was once a member, were offered to be proved and made good, in the public meeting at the Bull and Mouth to Nayler's face, more than once or twice, who was unable to say aught unto it. but left his standing, and sat down silent. They, that offered it so to public trial, were, one Mr. Persivall, and Mr. John Deacon, author of the Public Discovery of their Secret Deceit.

Some of their Opinions are these :

1. They deny the Scriptures are the Word of God.
2. They esteem their own speakings to be of as great authority.
3. They hold it unlawful to expound or interpret the Scriptures.
4. They say, that he, that preaches by a text of Scripture, is a conjurer.
5. That the holy Letter is carnal.
6. That the Bible ought to be burned.
7. That Jesus Christ inhabits in their flesh as man.
8. Some have said, that Christ never ascended into Heaven.
9. That to pray that their sins may be pardoned, is needless.
10. They believe not that there is another world.
11. Some of them deny the Resurrection.
12. That they cannot sin, but that they are perfect.
13. They make no distinction of persons.

A friend of mine being desirous of being resolved of a doubt; as, whether that which was reported, of that heretical sect, were more than they erred in, or less than they erroneously maintained contrary to the truth? He went unto their meeting, within Aldersgate, where he had no sooner entered that Synagogue of Satan, but the then Speaker (namely, George Fox) cried out, but on what occasion he knoweth not, Quakers, Quakers, Earth is above God, in the open house, before hundreds then present. At which, my friend wondered, and pressing forwards a little into the multitude, he saw some disputing upon the same words; who demanding what was the matter, one answered, That George Fox said, Earth is above God; and here is one saith, that whatsoever George Fox should do or say, he would maintain (pointing to a young man then standing by) to whom, my friend replied, he had undertaken a harder task, then he was able to perform: for God was the creator of the earth, and all things else; and therefore above the earth, and not the earth above him, that created it; forasmuch as the workman is above his work: for, although an artificer shall by art compose any thing, that is never so excellent, yet it can claim no equality with the maker, in regard that what is excellent in it, is the maker's excellency, and not its own: for, destroy the work, and the workman can make the like; but destroy the workman with the work, and both perish. To which he replied, He did not mean the earth under our feet, but earthly sin in man. To which my friend replied, that now his blasphemy was worse than it was before; for take the earth simply in itself, it hath no prejudice towards God; but sin is that, which seeks God's destruction, and therefore he was not to be conversed with, being of so diabolical an opinion.

One Stephens of London, being on a time at their meetings, with an intent to oppose what he should there hear not agreeing with truth; which, at his first coming, he did for a short time, till one of them, taking him by the hand, and rubbing his wrist very hard; which put him to very sore pain, and so altered his resolution, that he was so transformed by their enchantments, that he since confessed, that, should any one whatsoever have dared to oppose or resist them, as he just before did, he would have stabbed them to the heart, whatsoever had come of it.

There is one Stephens (and it is supposed, the same) a Quaker, that now lieth stark mad, and hath so been a pretty while, through the disturbances of that spirit, which ruleth in the old Quakers. JOHN DEACON.

January, 1657.

MILES SINDERCOME was committed close prisoner to the Tower of London, for High-

* "The principal person employed in the traitorous design, for the destruction of his highness's person, was a notable desperate fellow, named Sindercome, one who heretofore had been a quarter-master under sir John

Treason; and sir John Barkstead, knt. lieutenant of the Tower, gave order to Mr. David Steer, one of the warders of the Tower, to be

Reynolds in the army, and was about two years ago cashiered by general Monk, among others in Scotland. He associated to himself one Cecil, and many others were engaged in the business. For the carrying on their work, his keeper; with strict orders from the lieutenant to be most careful of him. But Mr. Steer perceiving the desperateness of his disposition, by many violent and threatening speeches, which he often used, acquainted sir John Barkstead therewith, and desired more assistance, as well for the security of his own person, as of the said prisoner. Wherefore, from that time forward, a guard of a commission officer and soldiers, were ordered to assist the said keeper, and secure the prisoner; so that Sindercome finding no means possible for him to make an escape by force, endeavoured afterwards to corrupt his keeper, offering him 200*l.* or so much as his place should be worth, to assist him in making his escape; and desired him, if he would undertake the matter, to furnish him with a black suit of clothes, a peruke, and a short dagger, to pass him through the water-gate, within the Tower, and said, that then he would trouble him no farther, but kill any man that should oppose him in going. But his keeper faithfully discharging his trust, not only refused this proffer, but acquainted the lieutenant therewith; who was therefore more vigilant and careful for his security. The officers and soldiers that dally attended in his chamber with him, would often advise him to make his peace with God, and to look after the eternal concerns of his soul; which discourse he would always divert by the speaking of his own valour and courage, and how many he had slain while he was a soldier, boasting greatly therein, and of his knowledge in the law of this nation: and would often say, That he doubted not to make a very good defence, if he might be tried by a jury, according to the ancient law of England, and to come off as well as John Lilburne.

Feb. 6, 1657, Miles Sindercome had notice of his Trial to be the next Monday following, and had liberty given to prepare himself for it; and for that purpose to send for, and converse with, what persons he would; and to have the use of pen, ink, and paper, and to write as he pleased; which he had, and did use accordingly.

Feb. 9, 1657, Sindercome was brought to his Trial at the Upper Bench Bar in Westminster-hall, the particulars whereof are as follow:*

they held correspondence with some in Flanders, received directions thence from time to time, and for their encouragement, Don Alonso, the late ambassador of Spain in England, returned them over sums of money, with which they were enabled to proceed." See a Brief Relation of the late dangerous Plot. Printed in A further Narrative of the Passages of these Times in the Commonwealth of England, v. 7.

* Thurloe, in a letter to Henry Cromwell, dated Whitehall, February 10, 1656-7, says:

"Sindercome was tried yesterday at the Upper Bench by a jury. His jury was a very substantial company of men, most of them being justices of the peace. The evidence was

The INDICTMENT was for High-Treason, to this effect, viz.

'That Miles Sindercome, alias Fish, and one William Boyes, with divers other rebels and traitors, against the Lord Protector, and Government of the Commonwealth; not having the fear of God in their hearts; but moved and seduced by the instigation of the Devil; on the 17th of September,† 1656, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, at Westminster, and divers other places in the county of Middlesex, falsely, maliciously and traitorously did conspire, compass, and imagine the death of the said Lord Protector; and to subvert and alter the government of the Commonwealth, and to raise war within the same.—For effecting whereof, 1. They took a room in the house of one Edward Hilton, and divers rooms in the house of one James Midhope, in Westminster; whither they brought guns, harquebusses and pistols, charged with leaden bullets, and iron slugs, to shoot, kill and murder him. 2. Jan. 1, 1657, they provided horses and weapons of war; and 3. Took a house and banqueting-house at Hammersmith, of one Henry Busby, for the same purpose. 4. Jan. 9, 1657, they conspired to burn Whitehall, where his Highness was in his own person; and to that end brought a basket filled with match, brimstone, gunpowder, and other combustible stuff and materials, and set the same on fire in the chapel there; to the great danger and disquietment of his Highness, and ill example of others, in contempt of the law, against their due obedience to his Highness and government, against the peace, and form of the statute, &c.

Thus far the Indictment.

Whereupon being arraigned, he pleaded Not Guilty, and for his trial put himself upon his country; and the issue being joined, there was immediately impannelled a jury of gentlemen of worth and quality to pass upon his life and death: he challenged several of them; and twelve being sworn, with his own consent, his Highness's Attorney-General (the Indictment being opened) proceeded to the Evidence, which was very full and clear, and two Witnesses at the least to all the points of the Indictment, with many aggravating circumstances: the particulars whereof are hereinafter mentioned.

The Evidence to prove the Indictment.

There was one Toope of his Highness's Life-guard, who was drawn into the business; and most clear and full; and they found him guilty with [without] difficulty. He is to be executed to-morrow. He appears to be a most desperate fellow; and since his conviction, he would have poisoned himself to escape hanging." 6 Thurloe's St. Pap. 53.

he proved fully, 1. What person Sindercome is; how he inveigled him, the said Toope, with money in hand, and promises of more, and great preferment, to join with him to murder his Highness; saying, Spain could never obtain a peace with us, till he were taken out of the way. 2. The circumstances of time, place, means and manner designed for this murder. 3. That he, the said Toope, was to give notice when his Highness went forth; and at what end of the coach he sat. 4. Their buying and keeping of fleet horses. 5. Their intent to fire Whitehall, the fire-work placed in the chapel, and other circumstances. 6. Sindercome's resolution, if the fire did not take, to kill the Protector, whatever came of it.

Also one John Cecil proved the whole design of Sindercome and Boyes, how long it was in hand; that Sindercome engaged him, the said Cecil, in it; what words were used, how it should be done; what the consequence of the murder would be; the money provided, and that when it should have been done, he, the said Cecil, was designed to go to col. Sexby, and to share with Sindercome in his honour and profit. That the first thing agreed on, was to provide good horses. What moneys were paid by Sindercome; Sindercome's resolution to assassinate his Highness when he went abroad; and the manner how. That they were upon the road five or six times on purpose; and in Hyde-park with swords, and pistols charged, and had notice given them by Toope of his Highness's coming. That the hinges of Hyde-park gate were filed off in order to their escape. That they took an house with a hanqueting-house at Hammersmith, to shoot him with guns, made on purpose to carry ten or twelve bullets at a time. That Toope was to give notice of his Highness's passing that way, and at which end of the coach he sat. That he, the said Cecil, saw one of the guns provided, which would carry twelve carbine bullets and a slug. He spake fully to the design of firing Whitehall; described the fire-work prepared, and the nature and intention of it, and other circumstances. Moreover, that Boyes assured them, that when the Protector should be dispatched, forces would come from Spain and Flanders; and a great part of the fleet would fall off. And that he believed Sexby to be the main agent herein at Brussels*. He proved also the discourse

* In col. Edward Sexby's Narrative, which he delivered to sir John Barkstead, lieutenant of the Tower, Oct. 12, 1657, printed in "A further Narrative of the Passages of these Times in the Commonwealth of England," p. 21, he says, "Sir John, I sent to you to tell you, that I am guilty of the whole business of Sindercome, as to the design of killing the Lord Protector, &c. and to that purpose I furnished Sindercome with about 500*l.* in money, and also with arms, and tied him to an engagement, that he should not reveal the design." And further he said, "The letters they have of mine, they could not prove them to be mine;

Boyes had about seizing Portsmouth, or some other port in the West, and of a great sum for that purpose. That thirty or forty are engaged in this design to kill the Protector, and it was so ordered, that not above two should know each other, until the matter should be ripe for execution; and that Boyes knew the whole number. He spoke fully to that design to kill his Highness the first day of the parliament; and their taking houses for that purpose at Westminster; and bringing arms thither, and other circumstances*. That Boyes goes by several names, and in several habits; sometimes as a poor priest in ragged clothes; sometimes well clad as a gentleman.

It was farther proved by the said John Cecil, and col. James Midhope, that in order to the destroying of his Highness, he, the said Cecil, Sindercome, and Boyes, took the said Midhope's house near the Abbey at Westminster; and when they took it, Sindercome called himself John Fish, clerk to one Mr. Havers a pretended gentleman of Norfolk; and Cecil went by the name of Mr. Havers's coachman.

It was proved likewise, that the first day of parliament, after they had taken Midhope's house, he being there: Sindercome and Cecil went thither to him, from one Edward Hilton, a Sempster's house in King-street, Westminster, where they left a great trunk full of arms, brought from Flanders; and carried with them in a viol-case, one harquebuss, and some pistols, charged with leaden bullets, and slugs, about sermon-time, to Midhope's house; which they found very convenient for their purpose, and resolved to buy it, and to build a room in the yard next the street; there being several back-yards and doors:† and resolved also to secure Midhope, or otherwise to deal with but by my own confession, which I now confess, and acknowledge that they are mine. And that I was with Charles Stuart, and acquainted him, that I was an enemy to the Lord Protector; and I also declare that I received a large sum of money from the Spaniard to carry on my said design, and to make what confusion I could in England, by endeavouring the killing of the Lord Protector, and by what other ways I had in design; and to that end, the better to effect it, I came into England in a disguised habit, and was the principal in putting on others in the said design." And p. 22, he says, "That he was the only man, that set on Sindercome to kill the Lord Protector; and that book, called Killing no Murder, he owned: and said he was still of that judgment; yet said, it was both foolishly and knavishly done in that Book to charge the lieutenant of the Tower touching Sindercome's death." This colonel Sexby died a prisoner in the Tower, Jan. 13, 1658.

* This Sindercome had engaged to kill general Monk in Scotland, and would have engaged the said Mr. Cecil therein also.

him that he might not discover them, nor hinder their design.

It was proved, moreover, by Cecil and Midhope, that sermon being ended, all three of them, viz. he, the said Cecil, Sindercome, and Boyes, went into the yard of the house next the Abbey, to shoot his Highness, as he passed from the Abbey to meet the parliament in the Painted Chamber; and to that end, he, the said Cecil stood on the wall with his pistol charged, and Sindercome walked in the yard; but other company coming in thither, they were prevented, and Boyes went out of the yard into the throng of people.

It was further proved by Cecil that this enterprise not succeeding, they resolved to murder his Highness some other way, to wit, to furnish themselves with fleet horses, to kill him as he rode forth. That Sindercome engaged Toope, who constantly gave him notice of the Life-guards going abroad, or of the saddling of the Pad Nags. That the first time they rode forth to kill him, was the latter end of September last (viz.) the Saturday after he had left going to Hampton-court. That the second time was when he rode to Kensington, and thence, the back way to London. The third time, when he went to Hyde-park in his coach. The fourth time, when he went to Turnham-Green, and so by Acton home; at which time they rode forth to kill him, and resolved to break through all difficulties to effect it. The fifth time when he rode into Hyde-park, where his Highness alighting, asked him, the said Cecil, whose horse that was he rode on, Sindercome being then on the out-side of the park; and then Cecil was ready to have done it, but doubted his horse, having at that time got a cold. That Sindercome rode forth once himself to kill his Highness, and told Cecil of it. That all proving ineffectual, they resolved to desist till the Spring, and in the mean time to fire Whitehall. That the said Cecil put on a thin holland shirt, and thin clothes, for his better escape, when he rode forth to kill his Highness; and prepared his horse as if he had been to run a race.

To prove the taking of the house and banqueting-house at Hammersmith, of Henry Busby, coachman to the earl of Salisbury, there was beside Cecil, the testimony of Henry Busby himself, William Page, and William Neal, Sindercome's servant.

To prove the basket of stuff for firing the chapel, there was the testimony of Cecil and Toope, and others who were persons of quality.

To prove the buying and keeping of the horses, there was the testimony of Henry Busby, who sold them one horse for fourscore pounds; also of William Page, and William Neal, Sindercome's servant.

To prove the hinges of Hyde-park gate being filed off, and the pales cut, there was the testimony of John Cecil, and Thomas Shell.

The Prisoner seeing the Evidence so clear against him, had nothing material to say for himself by way of defence, yet carried himself very insolent at the bar; and when the Court asked him touching any of the matters proved against him, he would confidently deny what was laid to his charge. And after all the Evidence given, and the prisoner heard what he had to say for himself; the court summed up the whole to the jury of Life and Death, and declared, that by the common-law, to compass or imagine the death of the chief magistrate of the land, by what name soever he was called, whether Lord-Protector or otherwise, is high-treason; he being the chief magistrate, and the spring of justice, in whose name all writs run, all commissions and grants are made: and that the statutes of treason made 25 Ed. 3 as to this, did only declare what the common law was before the making of that statute and was not introductive of a new law: * and more to that effect; and then proceeded to judgment against the prisoner in this manner.

The Sentence.

'It is considered by the Court, that the said Miles Sindercome, alias Fish, be sent from hence to the prison in the Tower of London, from whence he came, and from thence be drawn upon a hurdle through the streets of London to Tyburn; there to be hanged on the gallows till he be half dead, and then to be cut down, and his entrails and bowels taken out, and burnt in his own sight, and his body divided into four quarters, and be disposed of as his Highness the Lord Protector shall think fit.'

The same day, after he was brought back again to the Tower, he was much enraged, and in a great passion; his keeper, and Elizabeth Herring, one of his sisters, being in the chamber with him, he did swear, 'That they should never have his life,' and then desired his keeper to help him to some poison, that he might make away himself; which he refusing, Sindercome then desired his sister to buy him some for the same purpose. But she crying at that present, gave him no answer; but taking her opportunity, when the keeper did not so much mind them, had some private discourse with him, which cannot be known what it was about. Presently after, his said sister left him, and before her going, spake to his keeper, saying, 'Lord, what shall I do? Did you hear what my brother said of the poison?' Thereupon, the keeper charged her not to bring him any, telling her, if her brother were poisoned

* "Sindercome was tried at the Upper-Bench bar, found guilty, and condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered: the Court declared, That by the common-law, to compass or imagine the death of the chief magistrate, by what name soever he was called, whether Lord Protector or otherwise, is high-treason, and that the statute 25 Edw. 8, was only declaratory of the common-law." Whitelocke.

in his house, he would accuse her for assisting him in it.

The Lieutenant of the Tower then being fully acquainted with the desperateness of Sindercome, commanded a file of soldiers to watch in the room below his chamber, and a guard of officers to be with him in his chamber, that all means for the making his escape might be prevented.

Sindercome the same day endeavoured to corrupt his keeper, as formerly, and with much earnestness prest him to be helpful to him in his greatest distress; and asked, if it were not possible for him to make an escape, telling him if he would assist him in it, he would make good unto him 200*l.* that night: And if he would go along with him he would make that 200*l.*, seven hundred pounds; or, what more he should desire; further requesting him to furnish him with a black suit, peruke, and dagger, for that purpose. But by reason that the officers aforesaid were in the chamber with him he had not liberty so freely to converse with his keeper about this business as he desired, and therefore earnestly desired the said guard of officers, and all in the chamber with him, to withdraw; in which time he wrote and delivered privately to his Keeper a note, whereof the next following words is a copy;

‘ Mr. Steer; You see my condition, it is no time to dally with it; I have already provided 200*l.* for you; and if you will let me make my escape, and that you will go with me, or set me forth, I shall give you, were it 500*l.* more, I do not care; if you will do any thing, let me know your mind; I hope God will work my deliverance by your means; let me hear your judgment, that we may conclude; for if you and I do conclude, I will have other clothes brought into the room below, with a peruke, and I will take up a board (meaning, as is conceived, one of the boards of his chamber, to go down into the room below it, where his black clothes should lie; though therein he would have been frustrated, by reason of the file of soldiers, which the Lieutenant had commanded to watch there), and I do judge that must be the way. For God’s sake do what you can, and do not distrust my not performing to give you the money; for I can this night order you 200*l.* to any body that you shall appoint: but if you should—’

You may observe, that the reason of his breaking off so abruptly, was, that the guard of officers whom he had for that time desired to withdraw, finding that he made them stay somewhat longer than ordinary, prest in upon him, so that he had not time to write further. His keeper for answer, endeavoured to take him off from those thoughts, telling him the impossibility of it, and desired him to consider his present condition, and prepare himself for another world: whereupon Sindercome finding he could no ways prevail, moved these things no more afterwards.

From which time, several pious and able divines, some of which were appointed by his Highness, and others that were desired by the Lieutenant of the Tower, daily came to him; as Mr. George Griffith, Mr. Thomas Brooks, Mr. John Hodges, Mr. Slater, Mr. Barker, and others. But before they or any others entered into discourse with him, he would wave all questioning of him about the business for which he was condemned: they laboured much with him for his soul’s good, but with no satisfaction to the greatest part, and with very little to others of them; he having before declared his judgment or rather opinion, by reason of his inconstancy and unsettledness in them, sometimes owning the universal point of redemption; at other times, that the soul died with the body, or slept with the body till the Resurrection, and then it may be it should rise; that by the grave hell was meant: with several other detestable tenets. And indeed there is scarce any erroneous opinion known in our times, that he had not a general notion of, and would pretend unto. In several of his discourses with those ministers he would not hear but that Judas was in as good a condition as Peter; and of that in the xviith of John, v. 12, where Christ saith, ‘ While I was with them in the world, I kept them in thy name; those that thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost but the son of perdition; that the Scripture might be fulfilled:’ he would say, it was meant to all men, who as they were sinners, were sons of destruction and perdition. And as to that text, speaking of the disciples, which saith, ‘ one of them was a devil;’ he would startle and say, it was a rugged and harsh saying. He would often put it as a case to them, whether for any person to contrive the death of another, and not to act it, were punishable by man? And being as often resolved, and told of the laws made in that case; he would answer that which they alledged was but the law of man, and that thoughts were not to be punished by man, but God who alone knew them.

Feb. 13. Afterwards he had notice given him, that the next day was appointed for his execution; and about eight o’clock that night, the guard of officers in his chamber, were captain Henry Sharp, captain-lieutenant William Foster, ensign Philip Brown, serjeant Nicholas Stock, and his said keeper. And presently after they came into the chamber, three women came to him, two whereof were Sindercome’s sisters, and the other one said to be his sweetheart, who expressed trouble and sorrow, lamenting his condition. And one of his said sisters, named Elizabeth Herring, told him, ‘ She had rather see him die before she went from him, than he should die so barbarous a death as was intended him,’ or to that effect: whereupon the officers minding her expressions, took what care they could to prevent her in giving him any thing; and as soon as the said women were gone carefully searched the room. Then Sindercome desired the officers and his keeper to withdraw, that he might be private: in which privacy, he continued about a quarter of an hour, then came to the chamber-door, saying to the said officers that stood without, 'They might come in, for he had now done;' which words being not usual with him, were observed by most of them. The first that went in, found him rubbing his hands with his handkerchief, and wiping his nose and mouth therewith; and he walked a turn or two about the room, and then took the Bible and sat down reading therein. A while after, he started up suddenly, saying, 'He must go to bed;' and therewithal he undrest himself, and went into his bed. The said guard of officers in his chamber, being then discoursing together, Sindercome (a quarter of an hour after he had lain still) discoursed very freely with them of what they were talking. About which instant of time, orders were sent from sir John Barkstead, to the said officers, to be careful that he should not make away himself by poison,* in regard it was the last night he was to be there; and they should diligently search all places of his chamber, and about his bed to prevent it. But presently after, Sindercome fell asleep (as was thought), and snorting somewhat unusually, one of the officers desired his keeper to take a candle and look upon him; which he did, and found him almost dead there, which prevented their further search. Whereupon a surgeon was immediately sent for, who applied medicines to him; notwithstanding which after he had continued in that condition speechless about two hours, he died †.

* Sindercome had been an apprentice to a chirurgeon, near St. Catherine's at the Tower, and so it was probable had more than ordinary knowledge of poisons.

† Lord Clarendon, speaking of the uneasiness and apprehension under which Cromwell passed the latter part of his life, says that "When he had discovered the design of Sindercome; (who was a very stout man, and one who had been much in his favour, and who had twice or thrice, by wonderful and unexpected accidents, been disappointed in the minute he made sure to kill him,) and had caused him to be apprehended; his behaviour was so resolute in his Examination and Trial; as if he thought he should still be able to do it; and it was manifest that he had more associates, who were undiscovered, and as resolute as himself; and though he (Cromwell) had got him condemned to die, the fellow's carriage and words were such, as if he knew well how to avoid the judgment; which made Cromwell believe that a party in the army would attempt his rescue. Whereupon he gave strict charge that he should be carefully looked to in the Tower, and three or four of the guard always with him day and night. At the day appointed for his execution, those troops Cromwell was most confident of, were placed upon the Tower-Hill, where the gallows was erected. But when the guard called Sindercome to arise in the morning, they found him dead in his bed, which gave trouble exceedingly to Cromwell: for besides that he hoped that, at his death, to avoid the utmost rigor of it, he would have confessed many of his confederates; he now found himself under the reproach of having caused him to be poisoned, as not daring to bring him to public justice; nor could he suppress that scandal. It appeared upon examination, that the night before, when he was going to bed in the presence of his guard, his sister came to take her leave of him; and upon her going away, he put off his clothes, and leaped into his bed, and said, 'This was the last bed he should ever go into.' His body was drawn by a horse to the gallows where he should have been hanged, and buried under it, with a stake driven through him, as is usual in the case of self-murder: yet this accident perplexed Cromwell very much, and though he was without the particular discovery which he expected, he made a general discovery by it, that he himself was more odious in his army than he believed he had been."

February 14. The Coroner's Inquest, consisting of merchants, and other substantial

The following passage in the famous tract, published under the title of "Killing no Murder," seems to countenance the suspicion that Sindercome was dispatched by Cromwell. "My design is to examine, whether, if there hath been such a plot as we hear of, and that it was contrived by Mr. Sindercome against my Lord Protector, and not by my Lord Protector against Mr. Sindercome, (which is doubtful,) whether it deserves those epithets Mr. Speaker is pleased to give it, of bloody, wicked, and proceeding from the prince of darkness."

"This tract, Killing no Murder," says Harris, in his Life of Oliver Cromwell, "has been almost universally given to colonel Titus, but in a narrative touching col. Edward Sexby, (of whom there is an account in Clarendon, vol. 6, p. 640.) who [had] lately died a prisoner in the Tower, dated Jan. 20, 1657, O. S. it is said, That he owned the book called "Killing no Murder," and said he was still of that judgment." See Mercurius Politicus, No. 399, p. 252. Thurloe, vol. 6, p. 560. The passage in 6 Thurloe, is as follows:

The Information of Thomas D'Oyley, Daniel Steere, and John Hoskins, taken October 14, 1657.

Say, that they were this day at the chamber of col. Edward Sexby, in the Tower of London, together with sir John Barkstead, knight, and Mr. Joseph Caryll, minister, where the said col. Edward Sexby did then and there acknowledge before them all, and own the confession he had before made before the said sir John Barkstead, upon Monday last, being the 12th instant; and said, it was all truth: but withal said, it was very indiscreetly done of him to own the letters at Whitehall, which were charged upon him for his, as he did then acknowledge them to be all his, before he had housekeepers of the Tower liberty, had in charge to inquire of the manner of Sindercome's death, again seen and perused them. And touching Sindercome, the said col. Sexby said, he was the only man, that put Sindercome upon the design to kill the Lord Protector; yet now says, he is much troubled, he should be so unwise, to make that confession upon Monday aforesaid, because, he said, none could else have forced him to it: so, as he saith, he hath wilfully cast away his own life thereby; but yet said, he should be a mad rogue indeed, if he should go about to cast away the lives of others. And therefore as to the confederates, he was unwilling to discover other persons: yet this, he said, he could say, that he is sure they will not meddle any further in the said design, having had their undertaking so frustrated, and seeing plainly, that God was against them. And as touching the books intituled, "Killing no Murder," &c. he said, he owned them as his own work, and was still of that judgment: and said, he might have destroyed the Protector, because he was not chosen nor set up by the people; but that now the case was altered, the parliament having settled the government on him. He confessed, he had correspondence with the Spaniard, and received money from them to carry on his said design against the Lord Protector, but discovered not the sum. As to that passage in the said books, charging sir John Barkstead with having smothered Sindercome in his pillow and sheets, he said, it was foolishly and knavishly done by him in so writing. He saith further, that he hath some of those books in London which he understands are burnt; and he hath 250 of them in Holland. And also said, he was taken in July; yet, he said, the books were made, before the Lord Protector was settled by parliament. And being urged, upon what account he came over, since the act of parliament? and whether it was not to carry on the same design of killing the Protector, notwithstanding his former expression, 'The case was altered, the parliament having settled the same on him?' he presently seemed to fall into his former distraction and wild speeches, and appeared unwilling to discover any further.

JOHN HOSKINS, [his mark].

THOMAS D'OYLEY.

DANIEL STEERE.

According to Clarendon's representation of Sexby, it is very little likely that he composed that most able, logical, artificially constructed, and occasionally eloquent treatise. Clarendon calls Sexby a man who for an illiterate person spoke very well and properly, and used those words very well, the true meaning and signification, whereof he could not understand. Mrs. Macaulay, probably from a careless perusal and indistinct recollection of Harris's account, says that, "according to Clarendon, colonel Edward Sexby, of the party termed Levellers, an old intimate of Cromwell, which they diligently attended; and all such witnesses as could speak materially thereunto before Cromwell usurped the government, asserted, that he was the author." Clarendon says nothing of "Killing no Murder" or of its author.

Of the style and spirit of "Killing no Murder" a judgment may be formed, from the Prefatory Addresses to the Protector, and to the Army:

"TO HIS HIGHNESS OLIVER CROMWELL.

"May it please your Highness:—How I have spent some hours of the leisure your Highness hath been pleased to give me, this following paper will give your Highness an account; how you will please to interpret it. I cannot tell, but I can with confidence say, my intention in it is, to procure your Highness that justice nobody yet does you, and to let the people see, the longer they defer it, the greater injury they do both to themselves and you. To your Highness justly belongs the honour of dying for the people, and it cannot chuse but be an unspeakable consolation to you, in the last moments of your life, to consider with how much benefit to the world you are like to leave it. It is then only, my lord, the titles you now usurp will be truly your's; you will then be indeed the deliverer of your country, and free it from a bondage little inferior to that from which Moses delivered his: you will then be that true reformer, which you would now be thought: Religion shall then be restored, liberty asserted, and parliaments have those privileges they have fought for; we shall then hope that other laws will have place besides those of the sword, and that justice shall be otherwise defined than the will and pleasure of the strongest; and we shall then hope men will keep oaths again, and not have the necessity of being false and perfidious to preserve themselves, and be like their rulers: all this we hope from your Highness's happy expiration, who are the true father of your country: for while you live, we can call nothing ours, and it is from your death, that we hope for out inheritances: let this consideration arm and fortify your Highness's mind against the fears of death, and the terrors of your evil conscience, that the good you will do by your death, will somewhat balance the evils of your life. And if, in the black catalogue of high malefactors, few can be found that have lived more to the affliction and disturbance of mankind, than your Highness hath done, yet your greatest enemies will not deny, but there are likewise as few that have expired more to the universal benefit of mankind, than your Highness is like to do. To hasten this great good is the chief end of my writing this paper; and if it have the effects I hope it will, your Highness will quickly be out of the reach of men's malice, and your enemies will only be able to wound you in your memory, which strokes you will not feel. That your were examined by the coroner. And although there were then very strong presumptions that Highness may be speedily in this security, is the universal wish of your grateful country; this is the desire and prayer of the good and of the bad; and it may be, is the only thing within all sects and factions do agree, in their devotions, and is our only common prayer. But amongst all that put in their requests and supplications for your Highness's speedy deliverance from all earthly troubles, none is more assiduous nor more fervent than he, that, with the rest of the nation, hath the honour to be,

May it please your Highness,
Your Highness's present slave and vassal,
W. A."

"To all those OFFICERS and SOLDIERS of the ARMY, that remember their Engagements, and dare be honest.

"I heartily wish, for England's sake, that your number may be far greater than I fear it is; and that his Highness's frequent purgations may have left any amongst you, that by these characters are concerned in this dedication. That I and all men have reason to make this a doubt, your own actions, as well as your tame sufferings, do but too plainly manifest. For you that were the champions of our liberty, and to that purpose were raised, are not you become the instruments of our slavery? And your hands that the people employed to take off the yoke from our necks, are not those the very hands that do now put it on? Do you remember that you were raised to defend the privileges of parliament, and have sworn to do it? and will you be employed to force elections, and dissolve parliaments, because they will not establish the tyrant's iniquity and our slavery by a law? I beseech you, think upon what you have promised, and what you do, and give not posterity, as well as your own generation, the occasion to mention you with infamy, and to curse that unfortunate valour, and success of yours, that only hath gained victories, as you use them, against the Commonwealth. Could ever England have thought to have seen that army, that was never mentioned without the titles of religious, zealous, faithful, courageous, the fence of her liberty at home, the terror of her enemies abroad, become her gaolers? not her guard, but her oppressors? not her soldiers, but a tyrant's executioners, drawing to blocks and gibbets all that dare be honest than themselves? This you do, and this you are; nor can you ever redeem your own honour, the trust and love of your country, the estimation of brave men, or the prayers of good, if you let not speedily the world see you have been deceived; which they will only then believe, when they see your vengeance upon his faithless head that did it: This, if you defer too long to do, you will find too late to attempt, and your repentance will neither vindicate you, nor help us. To let you see you may do this as a lawful action, and to persuade you to it as he had poisoned himself; yet in regard the surgeons, who had then only opened his body, a glorious one, is the principal intention of the following paper; which, whatever effects it may have upon you, I shall not absolutely fail of my ends; for if it excites not your virtue and courage, it will yet exprobate your cowardice and baseness. This is from one that was once one amongst you, and will be so again when you dare be as you were."

In the work, the author after an introductory notice of Sindercome's business, and the congratulations of the Parliament to the Protector, on his happy deliverance from that wicked and bloody attempt, proceeds to consider three questions, 1. Whether my Lord Protector be a tyrant. 2. Whether, if he be, it is lawful to do justice upon him without solemnity, that is, to kill him. 3. If it be lawful, whether it is likely to prove profitable to the Commonwealth. Each of these questions he determines in the affirmative. He closes his work thus:

"To conclude this already over long paper, let every man, to whom God hath given the spirit of wisdom and courage, be persuaded by his honour, his safety, his own good and his country's, and indeed the duty he owes to his generation, and to mankind, to endeavour, by all rational means, to free the world of this pest. Let not other nations have the occasion to think so meanly of us, as if we resolved to sit still and have our ears bored, or that any discouragements or disappointments can ever make us desist from attempting our liberty, till we have purchased it, either by this monster's death, or by our own. Our nation is not yet so barren of virtue, that we want noble examples to follow amongst ourselves. The brave Sindercome hath shewed as great a mind as any old Rome could boast of; and, had he lived there, his name had been registered with Brutus and Cato, and he had had his statues as well as they.

"But I will not have so sinister an opinion of ourselves, (as little generosity as slavery hath left us) as to think so great a virtue can want its monuments even amongst us. Certainly, in every virtuous mind there are statues reared to Sindercome. Whenever we read the eulogies of those that have died for their country; when we admire those great examples of magnanimity that have tired tyrants' cruelties; when we extol their constancy, whom neither bribes nor terrors could make betray their friends; it is then we erect Sindercome statues, and grave him monuments; where all that can be said of a great and noble mind, we justly make an epitaph for him: and though the tyrant caused him to be smothered, lest the people should hinder an open murder, yet he will never be able either to smother his memory, or his own villainy. His poison was but a poor and common device, to impose only on those that understood not tyrant's practices, and are unacquainted (if any be) with his cruelties and falsehoods. He may therefore, if he please, and finding no usual symptoms accompanying the taking of sharp poisons, could not positively deliver their opinions, otherwise than hereafter is expressed, the jury deferred the giving up their verdict till Monday following.

The same day afterwards, at the desire of the lieutenant of the Tower, sir Richard Napier, doctor of physic, and Dr. Fern, reader of anatomy at Gresham college, opened Sindercome's head, and gave their opinions thereof also. Which was likewise afterward viewed by Mr. Charles Stamford, Mr. Nicholas Brethens, wardens to the company of surgeons; and Mr. Lawrence Loe; all able and knowing persons in their profession, which remain with the said coroner under their hands.

"February 14, 1657. Being then desired by sir John Barkstead, knt. lieutenant of the Tower, to see the head of Miles Sindercome opened, his body having been opened before our coming by the surgeons, and to give him our observations and sense thereof:

"We found the brain much inflamed, red, and distended with blood, swollen as full as the skull could well hold; besides much grumous and clotted blood out of the veins, which must be the effect of some very violent and preternatural cause. Yet are we not able positively to determine what that is or whence it did proceed, the motion being much more take away the stake from Sindercome's grave; and, if he have a mind it should be known how he died, let him send thither the pillows and feather-beds with which Barkstead and his hangman smothered him. But, to conclude, let not this monster think himself the more secure that he hath suppress one great spirit;* he may be confident that 'longus post illum sequitur ordo idem petentiam decus.'

"There is a great roll behind, even of those that are in his own muster-rolls, and are ambitious of the name of the deliverers of their country; and they know what the action is that will purchase it. His bed, his table, is not secure, and he stands in need of other guards to defend him against his own. Death and destruction pursues him wherever he goes; they follow him every where, like his fellow-travelers, and at last they will come upon him like armed men. Darkness is hid in his secret places, a fire not blown shall consume him; it shall go ill with him in his tabernacle that is left. He shall flee from the iron weapon, and a bow of steel shall strike him through; because he hath oppressed and forsaken the poor; because he hath violently taken away a house which he built not. We may be confident, and so may he, that ere long all this will be accomplished; for the triumphing of the wicked is but short, and the joy of the hypocrite but for a moment. Though his Excellency† mount up to the heavens, and his head reaches unto the clouds, yet he shall perish for ever like his own dung. They that have seen him shall say, Where is he?"

sudden and violent than that of Apoplexies, and other known diseases of the brain, except when caused by contusion, and other the like extraordinary violences.

RICHARD NAPIER, CHRISTOPHER FERN."

"We, whose names are here subscribed, being ordered to open the body of Miles Sindercome, prisoner in the Tower of London, do hereby declare, according to the best of our judgments and experiences, that we could not find out or discover any, the usual or common symptoms or effects, accompanying the taking of known and sharp poisons causing sudden death; but by the distention and swelling of the brain, and vessels in the head, with much coagulated blood which we found there, more than in ordinary diseases, our opinions are, that the said prisoner hath caused the same by some extraordinary means, for the hastening of his death.

CHARLES STAMFORD, } Wardens.

LAURENCE LOE"

February 15, 1657. Being Sabbath-day, Sindercome's keeper, with others, having removed the body out of the chamber where he died, into a more airy place, and taken several things out of that chamber, removed the close-stool, and under it was found a paper subscribed with his own hand as followeth:*

"God knoweth my heart, I do take this course, because I would not have all the open shame of the world executed upon my body; I desire all good people not to judge amiss of me; for I do not fear my life, but do trust God with my soul. I did this thing without the privity of any person in the world: I do, before God and the world, clear my keeper, my sisters, mother, or brother, or any other of my relations, but it was done alone by myself. I say by me, the 13th day, 1657.

MILES SINDERCOME."

February 16, 1657. The jury sate again according to adjournment, to whom the aforesaid testimonies of the physicians and surgeons, and also Sindercome's own note were apparent; so that they did then unanimously resolve and agree, that he, by some extraordinary means, had caused his own death, and that they verily believed the same to be by poison. But for their further direction, as to the formal part of their verdict, they at that time deferred the giving of it, and adjourned till seven o'clock the next morning, at the Lord Chief-Justice's house, where they accordingly met; and having received his lordship's direction touching matter of form, did all unanimously agree on, and give up their Verdict, to the effect following:

"February 17, 1657. Middletex ss. We find that upon the 13th day of February, in the year of our Lord, 1657, about the hour of nine in the night, Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fish, late of the parish of Peter in Bonds, in the county of Middlesex; God not having before his eyes, but by the instigation of the devil being moved and seduced, at the Tower of London, in the parish and county aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice towards himself, aforethought, as a felon against himself, then and there feloniously upon himself did make an assault. And that the said Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fish, then and there, certain poisoned powder, through the nose of him the said Miles, into the head of him the said Miles, feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice towards himself aforethought, as a felon of himself, feloniously did snuff and draw. By reason of which snuffing and drawing of the poison aforesaid, so as aforesaid, into the head of him the said Miles Sindercome; he the said Miles Sindercome, by the strength and operation of the poison aforesaid, himself did mortally poison; of which said mortal poisoning, he the said Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fish, within three hours after died. And so we find that the aforesaid Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fish, the said 13th day of February, in the year aforesaid, at the Tower of London aforesaid, in the parish and county aforesaid, in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice towards himself aforethought, as a felon against himself, feloniously himself did kill and murder. We find no goods or chattels, that the said Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fish had, at the time of the felony and murder aforesaid, in manner and form aforesaid, upon himself done and committed. In witness hereof, we have hereunto set our hands, this 17th day of February, 1657, &c."

* "It is printed to a tittle just as he wrote it himself." Original Narrative.

And thereupon the said Coroner issued forth his warrant for the burial of Sindercome, the copy whereof followeth:

"Middlesex ss. Whereas the jury impanelled and sworn to enquire of the death of Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fish, did present upon their oaths, that the said Miles, the 13th of this instant February, did feloniously poison himself: these are therefore in the name of his highness, the Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to require you to bury the corpse of the said Miles Sindercome, according to law, in the next common highway. Hereof you are not to fail, as you will answer the contrary at your perils, dated the 17th day of February, 1657.

THOMAS EVANS, Coroner."

To the Constables and Headboroughs within the Liberty of the Tower of London.

On the same day, February 17, Miles Sindercome aforesaid, being found to have murdered himself, his body was according to law drawn to the open place upon Tower-hill, at a cart's tail, with his head forward, and there the scaffold of common execution a hole being digged, he was turned in stark naked, and a stake spiked with iron, was driven through him into the earth; that part of the stake which remained above ground being all plated with iron.

The Examination of Elizabeth Herring, the Wife of William Herring, of the Precinct of St. Catherine's, Mariner; taken upon Oath, the 14th of February, 1657.

She saith, that Miles Sindercome now dead was her brother, and that he was a prisoner in the Tower of London the space of three weeks last past, or thereabouts, to her knowledge; and that for the space of a fortnight she was at the Tower several times to see the said Miles, and could be admitted but once to see him, until the 5th day of February, she this informant was sent for to come to the said Miles. When she came to the said Miles, she found two gentlemen in the room with him; who, as soon as this informant came in, did say unto the said Miles Sindercome, that he was not to speak any thing in private to this informant; then this informant came away. And that she came several times after to the said Miles; that on Monday the 9th of this instant February, she came to the said Miles after he had received sentence to die; and lamenting his condition, she said, that he would bring his mother's gray hairs with sorrow to the grave, and what an open shame it would be to him and all his friends. The said Miles Sindercome then did answer, saying, that before they should have his life so shamefully (meaning his highness the Lord Protector, as this informant believeth) he would poison himself first, and desired her, this informant, to buy him some poison, which she refused. And that at times when this informant hath been with the said Miles, she did see some strange faces which she did not know, and that she came every day since Monday, once a day or more to the said Miles: and saith, that he the said Miles did not speak any more words to her of any poison, or any other words of discontent, as if he intended to destroy himself; and that he never did complain to this informant of any sickness or diseases that he was troubled withal. And that on Friday, the 13th of this instant February, she being alone with the said Miles Sindercome, did persuade him to confess who had a hand with him in the plot against his highness the Lord Protector; that if he would confess, his Highness would grant him his life, and wished him to trust to God and man; and the said Miles answered, he would have it under black and white, and that he would trust no man. And that about eight of the clock at night she parted from the said Miles, and left him in good health, being prepared to die, as she thought; and that he found in his own conscience he had made his peace with the Lord: and this informant denieth that she ever brought him any poison, or did buy any other thing to destroy him; yet confesseth that on Friday night she did say unto the said Miles, that she desired with all her heart, to see him die a natural death in that chamber. And further saith not.

The mark of 2 Elizabeth Herring.

The Information of Martha Wickham, Spinster, taken upon Oath, as aforesaid.

She saith, that she hath known Miles Sindercome for the space of four years last past, and that he lodged at the house of Daniel Stockwel, haberdasher of hats on London-Bridge, where this informant lived; and that the night before he was taken into custody, and imprisoned, he lay at his lodging in the said house. And this informant denieth, and saith, that she doth not know any of the company that used to come to the said Miles, while he lodged there; and saith, that she hath been several times to see the said Miles at the Tower of London, while he remained there; and saith, that she doth not know of any poison, or any other violent thing, which was brought or sent to the said Miles Sindercome, to destroy himself; and further saith not.

MARTHA WICKHAM.

The Information of Anne Pierce, Wife of Stephen Pierce, of Deptford, in the County of Kent, Mariner, taken upon Oath, as aforesaid.

She saith, That she was several times to see Miles Sindercome, the time he was in the Tower: Saith, That she doth not know of any poison, or any other violent thing that was brought to the said Miles to destroy himself; and she did never hear the said Miles speak any words, as if he intended to destroy himself by poison, or any other way: And further saith not.

Middlesex ss. The Information of William Foster, taken upon Oath, the 14th day of February, 1656, before Thomas Evans, gent. one of the Coroners of the county of Middlesex.

He saith, That on Friday, the 13th of Feb. about nine of the clock at night, he was in the chamber where Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fish, lodged, within the Tower of London; saith, That the said Miles Sindercome did desire this informant, and four more that were with him, that they would withdraw out of the chamber whilst he went to prayers; and within less than a quarter of an hour after, he called in this informant, and those that were with him, into the chamber again; and a quarter of an hour after that, the said Miles did take a book into his hands to read, and said, that he would go to bed, and that that was the last night he should go into a bed, and the last bed he should go into. And then he lay down in his bed, and, to this informant's thinking, fell asleep, and snored. And this informant desired Daniel Steer, Miles Sindercome's keeper, to take a candle, and to see how the said Miles did lie in his bed; and the said Daniel Steer did tell this informant, that the said Miles Sindercome, alias Fish, was almost dead as he lay in the bed; but the said Miles Sindercome did lie in that condition speechless the space of two hours, and then died.

The mark of F WILLIAM FOSTER.

The Information of Philip Brown, taken upon Oath, as aforesaid.

He saith, that on Friday, the 13th day of February, about ten of the clock in the forenoon, he was with Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fish, in his chamber, and staid there at dinner; and in the same time, while that they were at dinner, the said Miles Sindercome did say these words, that that was the last meal's meat that ever he should eat, as he thought. And after, two of the said Miles's sisters, a cousin, and another gentlewoman with them, came to see the said Miles, and did then persuade him, the said Miles, to confess to them, and to declare whom they were, who had brought him into those troubles, and sorrows that he was like to undergo. And he answered them, saying, to whom should he confess? He could not expect mercy from him, who was resolved to give him none; saying, that Cromwell said to him, when he was taken and brought before him, Sindercome, have I caught you? You that have sought many ways to take away my life, I will have no consideration at all of thy life. And when he had uttered these words, he was in a great passion, and said, that he might go and declare against the lord Fleetwood, the lord Lambert, sir John Barkstead, sir Thomas Pride, or any other member of the army, if he were minded to destroy innocent blood. And about seven of the clock that day, orders were brought to this informant from the major, that the said Miles Sindercome might have some time allowed him a-part, to prepare himself, if he desired it. And this informant went out of the chamber, and left the said Miles alone; and a quarter of an hour after, this informant standing at the chamber door, did see the said Miles kneeling on his knees on the ground by the bed-side, and presently after one of the centinels that stood at his chamber-door, did tell this informant, that the said Miles did cough and kick, as if he was a vomiting; and this informant opened the chamber-door, and went in, and found the said Miles walking about the chamber. And capt. Foster, and capt. Sharp, who were ordered to be there that night, then came into the room; and about nine of the clock at night, the said Miles did desire this informant, and the other company that were there, to withdraw out of the room, and about a quarter of an hour after, he called them in again; and the said Miles did then take a book into his hand to read, and said, that he would go to bed, and that that was the last night he should ever go to bed, and the last bed he should lie in: and then laid him down in his bed. And then capt. Sharp did desire Daniel Steer, the said Miles's keeper, to see how he did lie in his bed; and the said Daniel Steer looking upon the said Miles, did say unto this informant, and the rest there, that the said Miles was almost dead: and yet the said Miles Sindercome did lie in that condition the space of two hours, and then died.

Middlesex ss. The Information of Daniel Steer, gent. taken upon oath as aforesaid.

Saith, that about the end of January, Miles Sindercome, alias Fish, being a prisoner in the Tower of London, under the custody of sir John Barkstead, knight, having some discourse with this informant who was his keeper, did then say unto this informant, that if he would be faithful to him, the said Miles, he would give him to the value of his place, what it was worth, were it a hundred or two of pounds; and desired him, this informant, if he would undertake the business, and accept his proffer, to provide him the said Miles a black suit of cloaths, a peruke, and also a short dagger, and to pass him out of the Water-gate, and he would kill any man that should oppose him; and the same day that he was at his trial, being the 9th of this instant February, after he came back again to the Tower, the said Miles was in a great passion, his sister Elizabeth Herring being then in his company; he the said Miles then did swear, that they should not have their ends (meaning as this informant believeth, that the sentence pronounced against him that day should not be executed). And then the said Miles Sindercome did desire this informant to help him to some poison, that he might make away with himself; and this informant refusing to do any of those things which he desired, the said Miles then did speak to the said Elizabeth Herring, his sister, who was there, to bring some poison; but she the said Elizabeth crying, gave him no answer. And afterwards the said Miles, and the said Elizabeth, had some private discourse together in the room, which this informant did not hear. And the said Elizabeth parting from the said Miles, came down stairs, and did speak to this informant, saying, Lord, what shall I do, did you hear him what he said of the poison? And this informant answered, that he did hear what he said, and wished her not to bring him any; and further said to the said Elizabeth Herring, that if the said Miles was poisoned while he continued in this informant's house, that he this informant answered, he would charge her the said Elizabeth with helping the said Miles to poison. And then the said Elizabeth went away from this informant; and this informant went up into the chamber to the said Miles Sindercome; who asked this informant, if it was not possible for him to help the said Miles to make an escape now in his great distress: and further said, that if this informant would do it, he would make good to him 200*l.* this night: and then said, that if he this informant would go along with the said Miles, when he escaped, he would make that 200*l.* 700*l.* or what more he should desire; further requiring earnestly this informant to help him to a black suit, and a peruke. This informant then said to the said Miles Sindercome, that it was impossible for him to make an escape, there being such strict guard kept about him; and had no further discourse at that time. And that on Friday, the 13th day of February, about ten of the clock at night, this informant then was with the said Miles in his chamber, together with captain Henry Sharp, captain-lieutenant William Foster, ensign Philip Browne, serjeant Nicholas Stock: And the said Miles did desire this informant, and the rest of the company, to withdraw out of the room, which they did; and about a quarter of an hour after, he the said Miles did desire them to come again into his chamber: he walking a turn or two about the room, did take into his hand a bible to read in; and a while after, he started up suddenly from the place where he sat, saying, he would go to bed, that that was the last time he should go to bed, and the last bed he should lie in. And when the said Miles had lain a while in his bed, he fell asleep, and snorted, and after that he had a rattling in his throat, and this informant was bid to take a candle, and see the said Miles as he lay in his bed; and when this informant had looked upon the said Miles, he found him almost dead as he lay in his bed. And this informant being further asked, if he knew of any poison, or other means, which the said Miles did use to take away his life, saith, That he did not see any, neither doth he know any more touching the said Miles's death, but what he hath already declared in this information.

DANIEL STEER.

The Information of Henry Sharp, gent. taken upon Oath, as aforesaid.

Saith, That between seven and eight of the clock on Friday night being the 13th of Feb. being in the chamber with Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fish, three women, whose names this informant doth not know, came crying into the chamber to the said Miles, lamenting his condition; the said Sindercome then reading in a bible, did so continue reading about half an hour, while the said three women were there. One of the said women said to him, the said Miles, that she would be glad to see him dead in the room before she went from thence, rather than to have him die such a barbarous death as was appointed for him to die. And after they were gone out of the room, this informant caused Daniel Steer, the said Miles's keeper, to search the bed and the room, lest any thing might be left there for the said Miles to hurt himself withal; and the room being searched, nothing was found. And also upon enquiry of the said Steer, this informant found that all instruments were taken from him; only the said Steer brought him up a knife to cut his meat withal, and carried it away when he had done. And that about half an hour after, he the said Miles desired this informant, and the rest of the company that were with him, to withdraw out of the room; and about a quarter of an hour after, he called them into the chamber again, and took a book into his hand to read in it, and after a little time, he said he would go to bed, and lie down in his bed; and he hearing this informant and captain Foster talking together, the said Miles talked very freely with him; and in the time of their discourse together, there came a messenger to this informant from sir John Barkstead, requiring this informant to have a special care of the said Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fish, that he did not poison himself. This informant did declare unto the other that were there, what order he had received for the said Miles; and about a quarter of an hour after, this informant hearing him the said Miles snore, desired Daniel Steer, the said Miles's keeper, to see how the said Miles did then. The said Daniel taking a candle to look on the said Miles Sindercome, did tell this informant that he was almost dead; yet the said Miles did live in that condition, speechless, the space of two hours after, and then died.

HENRY SHARP.

The Information of Elizabeth Sindercome, of Deptford, in the County of Kent, Widow, taken upon Oath, the 14th of Feb. 1656.

She saith, That she was three several times to see Miles Sindercome, her son, while he was prisoner in the Tower of London; and saith, she doth not know of any violent means or ways used by the said Miles Sindercome, or any other, to hasten his death; neither did she ever hear him speak any words to that purpose: And that the last time she was with the said Miles, he did then tell her, this informant, that he was prepared to die. And that two Ministers being then in the chamber with him, she had no further discourse with him, or did see him any more, until on Friday night, about twelve of the clock, she did hear she was sent for; and did hear that he was very sick and weak, of which sickness he died presently after; and further saith not.

The Mark of 2 ELIZABETH SINDERCOME.*

* Mrs. Macaulay says, "Cromwell could never sift the bottom of Sindercome's design, or detect any of his accomplices; and though the intention of assassination was fully proved on his trial, yet it was with difficulty that the jury could be brought to condemn him. On the morning destined for his execution, he was found dead in his bed of poison he had voluntarily taken, as it was given out by the friends of Cromwell; but his enemies did not scruple to assert that Sindercome was smothered, to prevent the probable mischief which might ensue from a public execution. That despicable convention of Cromwell's adherents, who called themselves a parliament, were not sparing of their adulation on the occasion: They ordered a day of thanksgiving, to be first held by the house, and then by the three nations; they voted thanks to secretary Thurloe for his great diligence in tracing out the plot; and,

VOL. V.

Some light is thrown on this business, by the following Examinations published in Thurloe:

The Examination and Information of John Toop, taken this 9th of Jan. 1656, [taken by Secretary Thurloe.]

Saith, that about eight or nine weeks since, one Miles Sindercome, who was a soldier in the army, and was cashiered, as this examinant hath heard and believes, in Scotland for some disturbance, which was designed in the army, about two years since, came to his lodging, and fell into discourse with him about the affairs of the nation; saying, there was a design to alter the government, and to that end take away the life of the Lord Protector. And the discourse was such, that the examinant believed he was paid, and set on work by the king of Spain; for he said, that it was better for this nation to be in league with Spain, than with France; which he said could never be; and that Spain could never obtain a peace with us, till this tyrant was taken away; and told this examinant, that if he would engage therein, he should be made for ever; and for his own part, he said, he was sure to be a colonel of horse within half a year; and promised to this examinant, that he should have a troop, and also 1500*l.* in money, when the Protector should be killed.

He further said, that it was better to have Charles Stuart to reign here, than this tyrant. And at the several meetings, which the examinant had afterwards with the said Sindercome, he told him, that they would attempt to kill the Protector upon the road, as he went to Hampton-court, assaulting him to that purpose, when he was on horse-back; and that there was five of them besides this examinant, who knew of this design, and were engaged to effect it. And said, that he and Cecil had been several times upon the road to endeavour the killing him; but found not their opportunity. He further said, that they had hired a house in Hammersmith, where Mr. Frevill heretofore lay, which by reason of its standing upon the road, was very convenient for their purpose; and it having a little house upon the wall, their intention was to shoot the Protector as he passed by, out of the little house, with scrued guns, which were prepared on purpose, which should break the coach in pieces, and kill him where he sat. And spoke to this examinant, to give them notice, when the Protector went forth, and at what end of the coach he sat. And being asked, who the five persons were, with the Speaker at their head, they went to Whitehall to congratulate the Protector in person on his happy deliverance. The Speaker concluded his speech with observing, that if Cicero was living he would want expression to set out the danger or the mercy; so unparalleled, so unprecedented a mercy, that the parliament's hymn was, 'O Cantemus Canticum: O come, let us sing a new song unto the Lord.' who should do this execution, he said, he never told him, nor doth he know any of them, but the said Sindercome himself, and John Cecil, which this examinant never saw but once before this week. And saith, that Sindercome told him, that when they had done the fact, their horses were ready in the stable to escape away on the backside of the house.

This examinant further saith, that Sindercome acquainted him with an intention they had to fire Whitehall, saying, that it was so strong a place, and so many turnings and windings therein, that it was the fittest hole for a tyrant to live in it; and if that were burned, there is never another place in England where he could hide and secure himself; and to that purpose the said Sindercome had provided a firework in a hand-basket (made, as he said, by one that came over from beyond the seas on purpose to make it) and brought it to the lodgings of this examinant, upon this day se'nnight, and thereupon this examinant and he came down together to view what place could be best to place the firework in; and they looked upon a place or two over against captain Rolt's chamber, and the said Sindercome tried with a key he had in his pocket to open a door thereabouts, but could not; and from thence went towards the chapel, and thought to have laid it at the head of the stairs, which comes the back way into the chapel, but resolved not fully of it: this was upon this day se'nnight; whereupon this examinant, the same day, seeing things growing so far, waited to have discovered it to his Highness, but found not means of access to him.

The next day after, the said Sindercome came to the examinant's lodging, and took away the firework, and carried it to Cecil's lodgings; and upon Tuesday after, Sindercome and this examinant met at the sign of the Ben Johnson's in the Strand, where they discoursed of the same business, and of the manner of killing the Protector, and he said, they would fire down Whitehall, and then defer the other business until the spring. He further said, that he should have money come by the next Monday from Flanders.

Upon Thursday after, they met again in the morning at this examinant's lodging, and told him he and Cecil had agreed to lay the firework in the chapel, and appointed a meeting to execute it at five o'clock that night. In the mean time this examinant acquainted his Highness with it, and so they met at five o'clock, and came all there together to the place, to see if all things were as they would have it; and then Sindercome and Cecil went back, and brought with them the firework, and Cecil opened the door of the chapel, and Sindercome put in the firework, this examinant and Cecil standing by to see that nobody came to discover them.

He, this examinant, being asked, whether they had no intention to fire any other place, saith, that he knew not; but saith that Sindercome told him, they had another firework in a box, but knoweth not where it is.

This examinant further saith, that Sindercome told him, that if the fire did not take, he was so far engaged in this business, that he himself would set upon the Protector to take away his life, whatever came of it.

And being further asked, if he received any money of Sindercome in part of what he promised him, saith, that about eight or nine weeks ago, he received of the said Sindercome, the sum of 5*l.*, about a week after that 5*l.* more, about a month since 5*l.* more; and upon this day se'nnight 4*l.* more; which is all the money he, this examinant, received of the said Sindercome, or any other person, for the purpose aforesaid.
JOHN TOOR.

The Examination of John Cecil, taken this 9th of January, 1656, [taken by Secretary Thurloe.]

Saith, that about four months since, one Miles Sindercome, heretofore a soldier in the army, came to this examinant, and told him, that there was a design in hand amongst some very considerable persons, whose names he could not reveal to him, for killing the Lord Protector, which he acquainted this examinant with, to persuade him to engage therein; alledging that now there was a parliament called of the Protector's own naming, having kept out some, and let in others at his pleasure; and that it would be a very acceptable service to take him off, whereby things would come to a confusion; it being certain, that the great ones of the king would never agree, who should succeed, but would fall together by the ears about it, and then in that disorder the people would rise, and so things might be brought to a commonwealth again. And he further said, that there was no attempting him in the field, nor other way, but by falling upon his person at an advantage. And this examinant asking, how they should be able to bear the charge of such attendance, the said Sindercome answered, that money should be provided, in case they could effect their business. This examinant was to escape over sea to col. Sexby, who was to provide for him, and was to have a share in all such honour and profit, which Sindercome should have for this service. Upon these and such like discourses this examinant engaged to join in this work, viz. to attempt and kill the Lord Protector. And the way which was first agreed upon, was to provide good horses, and to attempt him as he went upon the road; for which purpose this examinant bought several horses, one of the earl of Salisbury, which cost him 80*l.*; which horse is now at Cobham with John Clarke, who lives at the house of Thomas Christmas; another horse he bought of one Morgan at Cashalton, which cost him 75*l.*, and is now at the said Morgan's. He bought another of Mr. Vanbrooke, cost him 42*l.*, which he sold again. He bought another of Mr. Harvey by the hands of the said Morgan, cost 34*l.*, which he delivered to Mr. Sindercome. He bought another of Cluffe the horse-seller for 30*l*., which he sold again. And saith, that the money to pay for these horses he had of Sindercome. And when these horses were bought, the intention was to have made a party of horse of about forty to have assaulted him. But that proving a difficult business to get so many in together, it was resolved to be done by a lesser party; and Sindercome and this examinant did agree to take the first opportunity to assassinate the Protector when he went abroad, and to do it as he either came out of his coach to take his horse, or as he did alight from his horse to go into the coach; and one Toop, who is one of the Protector's life-guard, whom the said Sindercome had engaged to serve them in this attempt, was to give them notice when the Protector went abroad. And he saith, that he and Sindercome were upon the road about five or six times, on purpose to have made this attempt, and had notice of the Protector's going abroad by the said Toop; and saith, that he was mounted upon the black horse he bought of Morgan, and Sindercome upon the bay horse he bought of the earl of Salisbury; but they had not opportunity to effect their design. And saith, that he himself went once into Hyde-park, with an intention to have attempted there, having a sword and pistol to that purpose, which were the only arms that he and the said Sindercome rid with, being confident, that if he could come near him, he could have done it, and escaped after by the goodness of his horse. And saith, that there was a gate in Hyde-park, the hinges and hooks whereof were filed almost asunder, on purpose that they might have the better escaped. And he says, that he believes he could have rid his black horse one hundred miles without drawing bit, and ten miles of it with that speed, that he could have left behind him most horses in England, that were not kept. This examinant further saith, that this way proving not effectual, there was a resolution taken to hire a house upon the way to Hampton-court, out of which they might shoot him as he went by in his coach. And accordingly the said Sindercome took a house at Hammer-smith, at this end of the town on the right-hand as we go from London, where there is a garden-wall, and upon the wall a banqueting house, which is upon the street, out of which the intention was to shoot him, as he came by, with guns made on purpose for that business, which should carry twelve or more bullets at a time, and Toop was to give them notice when the Protector went that way, and at which end of the coach he sat. And saith the guns were prepared, one whereof he saw, and was like a harquebus, and would carry about twelve bullets and a slug. And this business was chiefly directed by one Boyes, who was much with Sindercome, and is a man of somewhat a low stature, and small boned, brownish hair curling to flaxen, sanguine complexion, and wore his beard long. Being asked where the said Boyes lodged, and what he was, he saith he cannot tell, nor could ever learn, but often went between this place and Flanders, and that he is now gone thither. And this examinant further saith, that at the same time they had a design to fire Whitehall, and a firework was prepared for that purpose, made up in a hand-basket, with two matches hanging out of each side of above a yard long, which he supposeth was made by the said Boyes, who hath great skill in fireworks; and that this firework when it was made ready, was left at Toop's quarters, Sindercome and Toop having been about it for a good while, and had viewed several places where they might put it in, and Toop undertook to place it himself; and as Sindercome told this examinant he had 20*l*. given him for it, which if he had performed, this examinant believes he had not known of it till it had been executed; but it not being done it was communicated to him about five or six days since, and about Saturday last it was carried from Toop's lodging to the lodging of this examinant in King-street, and yesterday the said Sindercome, Toop, and this examinant met at the Bear in King-street, and there they resolved to bring the said firework, and put it into the chapel, and they came together between five and six o'clock in the evening of yesterday: they came together to the chapel door, and finding all things to their mind, this examinant and Sindercome went back to this examinant's lodging, lighted the match, and brought it with them; and this examinant having opened the door, Sindercome laid it in, and so locked the door again. It was about six o'clock when they laid it in, and they conceived it would have fired about twelve o'clock, or between twelve and one in the night. And being asked what issue they expected of this, said, that at least it would have had this effect, that their party would have been satisfied that they were not idle, but were at work to accomplish what they had designed.

And this examinant further saith, that Boyes did assure them, that when the Protector was dispatched, forces were to come over from Flanders in ships, to be hired of the Dutch with the king of Spain's money, and that then also a great part of the fleet would fall off; but saith he cannot tell the particulars of these things, but hath heard and believes that col. Sexby is the man, that doth agitate these affairs at Brussels.

And he saith, that Boyes hath had much discourse about a port town to be procured and seized upon, where forces might be landed, and they expressed much desire to have Portsmouth or Plymouth, or some place in the west where also there was shipping to be seized upon; and said, that a very great sum of money was to be given to have such a place; but he is not able to say, whether they have any assurance of any such thing, but thinks they have not as yet. But doth believe that their design is going on for taking away the life of the Protector, and that this deficiency will not hinder the prosecution thereof; and that he believes there are thirty or forty men engaged therein, and they will order it so, that not above two shall know of one another, until it be ready to be executed, only there shall be one person, who shall know the whole number; and this person, he thinks, is Boyes. This examinant further saith, that there was a design to take away the Protector's life the first day of the parliament, as he went thither, and there was a trunk of blunderbusses and scrued guns carried into a chamber at a sempster's shop in King-street, on the left hand of the street as we go to Westminster, taken by Boyes for that purpose, the intention being to shoot the Protector as he went by in his coach: but it appearing that there was not any possible way of escaping out of the house, they were discouraged from that enterprize. Then they hired part of an house, which is next to the east door of the abbey-church, and on the right hand, thinking to shoot him as he went from the sermon to the parliament-house: they hired it of a colonel, who knew nothing of the business, he keeping only a room or two himself; but they having not time to make conveniences, and finding so many people standing on both sides the way, before the Protector came by, and as he passed, they durst not do any thing, for fear of being discovered before they shot; but saith, that house stands so conveniently, both for escaping after the fact, and for all other purposes, that it is resolved to make use of it upon the next occasion, if they can get the colonel quite out of it, which they will endeavour to do, and then will fit all things for the purpose. And being asked where money is had for managing those things, he saith, he is not able to say that; it is Boyes, who provided it all. And saith, that he heard Boyes say, that the Protector had got some of their money, but that they should be supplied with more. And being asked, what chief persons in England they relied upon for carrying on the business, saith, that he believes, that col. Overton was the chief, but that he was in prison.

And being further asked about the design of killing the Protector the day he went to the parliament-house, he saith, that he was engaged by Boyes, to be one that should shoot, being brought acquainted with him by Sindercome, and that Sindercome was another; and believes, that they three were all to be present; and saith, that he this examinant saw one blunderbuss at the house by the abbey, which was to be used for the purpose aforesaid. He further saith, that there is one major Wood, who was formerly an officer in sir William Waller's army, who is one of this party, and doth often go between this country and Flanders; but he is not acquainted with any particular business, that he doth or hath transacted.

202. The Trial of Sir HENRY SLINGSBY*, knt. before the High Court of Justice, for High Treason: 10 CHARLES II. A. D. 1658.

THE High Court being set, and the names of the Commissioners being called, the serjeant at

* After mentioning Mr. Mordaunt's acquittal, lord Clarendon proceeds: "Sir Henry Slingsby, and poor Dr. Hewet, had worse fortune; and their blood was the more thirsted after for the other's indemnity; and the court was too severely reprehended, to commit the same fault again. The former had lain two years in prison in Hull, and was brought now up to the Tower, for fear they might not discover enough of any new Plot, to make so many formidable examples, as the present conjuncture required. They had against him evidence enough (besides his incorrigible fidelity to the crown from the first assaulting it) that he had contrived, and contracted with some officers of Hull, about the time that the earl of Rochester had been in Yorkshire two years before, for the delivery of one of the block-houses to him for the king's service: nor did he care to defend himself against the accusation; but rather acknowledged, and justified his affection, and owned his loyalty to the king, with very little compliment, or ceremony to the present power. The other, Dr. Hewet, receiving no information of arms was commanded to fetch the prisoner to the bar. Sir Henry Slingsby was brought ac-

Mr. Mordaunt's declining the way formerly resolved upon (which it was not possible to convey to him in that instant, nobody being suffered to speak with him) and being brought to the bar as soon as the other was removed from it, persisted in the same resolution, and spoke only against the illegality of the court; which, upon better information, and before the judgment was pronounced against him, he desired to retract, and would have put himself upon his trial: but they then refused to admit him; and so sentence of death was pronounced against them both; which they both underwent with great Christian courage.

"Sir Henry Slingsby, as is said before, was in the first rank of the gentlemen of Yorkshire; and was returned to serve as a member in the parliament that continued so many years, where he sat till the troubles begun; and having no relation to, or dependence upon the court, he was swayed only by his conscience to detest the violent and undutiful behaviour of that parliament. He was a gentleman of a good understanding, but of a very melancholic nature, cordingly to the bar. Then proclamation made for silence, and the commission for trial of the

and of very few words: and when he could stay no longer with a good conscience in their councils, in which he never concurred, he went into his country, and joined with the first who took up arms for the king. And when the war was ended, he remained still in his own house, prepared and disposed to run the fortune of the crown in any other attempt. And having a good fortune and a general reputation, had a greater influence upon the people, than they who talked more and louder; and was known to be irreconcilable to the new government; and therefore was cut off, notwithstanding very great intercession to preserve him. For he was uncle to the lord Falconbridge; who engaged his wife and all his new allies to intercede for him, without effect. When he was brought to die, he spent very little time in discourse; but told them, 'he was to die for being an honest man, of which he was very glad.'

"Dr. Hewet was born a gentleman, and bred a scholar, and was a divine before the beginning of the troubles. He lived in Oxford, and in the army, till the end of the war, and continued afterwards to preach with great applause in a little church in London; where, by the affection of the parish, he was admitted, since he was enough known to lie notoriously under the brand of Malignity. When the lord Falconbridge married Cromwell's daughter, who had used secretly to frequent his church, after the ceremony of the time, he was made choice of to marry them according to the order of the church; which engaged both that lord and lady, to use their utmost credit with the Protector to preserve his life; but he was inexorable, and desirous that the churchmen, upon whom he looked as his mortal enemies, should see what they were to trust to, if they stood in need of his mercy.

"It was then believed that, if he had pleaded, he might have been quitted, since in truth he never had been with the king at Cologne or Bruges; with which he was charged in his indictment; and they had blood enough in their power to pour out; for, besides the two before-mentioned, to whom they granted the favour to be beheaded, there were three others, colonel Ashton, Stacy, and Bettely, condemned by the same court; who were treated with more severity; and were hanged, drawn, and quartered, with the utmost rigour, in several great streets in the city, to make the deeper impression upon the people, the two last being citizens. But all men appeared so nauseated with blood, and so tired with those abominable spectacles, that Cromwell thought it best to pardon the rest who were condemned, or rather to reprieve them; among whom Mallory was one, who was not at liberty till the king's return; and was more troubled for the weakness he had been guilty of, than they were against whom he had trespassed." prisoner read. Proclamation for silence again was made. Then Mr. Attorney-General Prideaux exhibited a Charge of High-Treason against sir Henry Slingsby the prisoner; which was read: the substance of which Charge was as followeth, viz.

'That the town of Kingston upon Hull, in the county of Kingston upon Hull, in England on the 11th of October, 1656, and ever since, unto the day of the exhibiting of this charge, was and hath been, and is yet, a town belonging to this Commonwealth; where there is a garrison, and a great part of the army and forces belonging to this Commonwealth: that sir Henry Slingsby, late of Redhouse, in the county of York, knight, minding and intending to imbroil this Commonwealth in intestine wars, the 30th of April last, and divers times since the 10th of October 1656, and before the said 30th of April last, as a false traitor and enemy then and yet to his highness Oliver, Lord Protector of these nations, together with one Robert Gardiner and Edward Chapman, and with one William Smith, of the said county of York, gentlemen, and divers others, did traitorously, advisedly, and maliciously combine together, and plot and contrive to betray and yield up the said garrison of Hull unto Charles Stuart, eldest son of the late king Charles, now an enemy to this Commonwealth.

'That the said sir Henry Slingsby, by like traitorous combination, the said 30th of April last, and divers times after the said 10th of Oct. 1656, did traitorously and maliciously plot, and contrive, and endeavour to stir up mutinies within the said garrison, to withdraw Ralph Waterhouse, John Overton, George Thompson, &c. officers of the same, from their obedience to his highness Oliver Lord Protector.

'That then and there, and at divers other times, as well before as after the said 30th of April last, and after the said 10th of October, 1656, he the said sir Henry Slingsby did traitorously, advisedly, and maliciously plot, contrive, and endeavour to stir and raise up forces against Oliver Lord Protector, and against the government of this Commonwealth, as the same is established, and to alter the same.

'That the said sir Henry Slingsby did traitorously, &c. then and there declare, publish, and promote the said Charles Stuart to be king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions thereto belonging, and held correspondence with him. All these things the said sir Henry Slingsby, at Kingston upon Hull aforesaid, did maliciously, &c. carry on by conferring with the said officers how to effect the aforesaid treason, and encouraging the said officers thereto by promising to them, and every of them, rewards and sums of money to join with him in the treason aforesaid, and by delivering to the said Ralph Waterhouse, one of the officers of the garrison, a certain instrument under seal, which the said sir Henry Slingsby said was from Charles Stuart,

‘ and did purport to be a commission from the ‘ said Charles Stuart, to him the said Ralph ‘ Waterhouse, to be governor of the castle. All ‘ which said treasons are contrary to the statute
‘ in that case made and provided. With which ‘ treasons the said Attorney-General, on behalf ‘ of the Lord Protector, &c. doth charge the ‘ said sir Henry Slingsby, and prays that the ‘ said sir Henry Slingsby may be put to answer ‘ thereto; averring that the said sir Henry ‘ Slingsby is the person by name appointed by ‘ his highness the Lord Protector to be tried and ‘ proceeded against. Signed May 25, 1658.

‘ EDM. PRIDEAUX.’

Lord President. (Lisle) Thou here standest charged for High Treason: this Court requires that thou give a positive answer, whether Guilty or Not Guilty.

Sir Henry Slingsby. I desire to have counsel assigned me.

Ld. Pres. There is matter of fact laid to your charge, which amounts to treason; and there is no law allowed in matters of fact.

Slingsby. There is also matter of law: and I desire to be tried by a jury, which is according to the law of the land.

Ld. Pres. We are all here your jury, as well as your judges: we are the number of two or three juries. And your jury is well known; for they are chosen by the parliament. You are to plead to your Indictment.

Slingsby. I desire to know whether there can be any conviction, unless it be by confession?

Ld. Pres. If you had looked upon the act of parliament, that would have told you: it speaks of Examination of Witnesses; it speaks of your confession and answer, and of your default; and if you do not plead to it, it will be very penal to you.

Slingsby. If it be by the laws of the land, that the trial should be by a jury, I desire I may have that privilege.

Ld. Pres. Acts of parliament make justice and law: they are both. They think fit to change the custom of trials that have been in former times, and all persons must submit to it. And the parliament hath thought fit to make this court both Jury and Judges.* And therefore I require that you answer, whether Guilty or Not Guilty.

* “ April 27th, 1658. The Commissioners of the Seal and of the Treasury, the Judges and many others were nominated Commissioners under the Great Seal for the trial of the present conspirators against the Protector and Governor; and Whitelocke was one of them, but he never sate with them, it being against his judgment.—June 30th, 1658. According to Whitelocke’s former advice to the Protector, wherein Thurloe agreed, divers others of the new Conspirators were referred to be tried at the Upper Bench Bar after the course of the Common Law.” Whitelocke’s Memor. See Dr. Hewet’s Case, infra. See what Hume says of the use of the High Court of Justice in the Note to the Case of Gerard and others, supra.

Slingsby. I desire that the act of parliament may be read.

Ld. Pres. You are before your jury and judges. Parliaments have great care of the rights of the people, and have appointed this Court; and his Highness hath appointed you to be tried by us; you ought therefore to plead to your indictment.

Slingsby. The law gives liberty in case of juries to the party accused, to make his exceptions against the jury; which he cannot do here, where you are both judge and jury.

Ld. Pres. If you have any particular exception to any man, you may make it: you were, Sir, of the parliament when this act was made.

Slingsby. I was a prisoner at the same time.

Ld. Pres. Although a prisoner, yet you are bound by act of parliament.

Mr. Phelps, Clerk. You have heard your charge read, and plea demanded: the Court again requires of you that you give a positive answer, whether Guilty, or not.

Slingsby. I am, my lord, of an opinion (though you account it a paradox), that I cannot trespass against your laws, because I did not submit to them.

Ld. Pres. All the people of England must submit to the laws of England, to the authorities of England; all must submit to my Lord Protector and acts of parliament. We sit here by authority of his Highness, by a commission under the Great Seal of England, and by authority of parliament; and you must submit to our authority.

Slingsby. The laws have been so uncertain with me, that I could not well know them; and when I was a prisoner, I could not take notice of them: I could have no benefit by your laws, because that is no law to me which doth not give me interest and property to what I have. It is the benefit of laws, that they do distinguish between meum and tuum: but when you take all from me, in my case it is not so.

Attorn. Gen. (Prideaux.) He may enjoy as much benefit by the laws as any, if he have not forfeited it; and I desire he may be put to answer.

Ld. Pres. The Court again require you to plead to your Indictment.

Slingsby. Not Guilty.

Mr. Phelps. Your plea then is, That you are Not Guilty? To which sir H. Slingsby answered, Yes.

Mr. Lechmere. Mr. Attorney-General having exhibited a Charge of High-Treason against this gentleman, sir H. Slingsby, the prisoner at the bar, the Charge doth set forth, That the town of Kingston upon Hull, October 11, 1656, and ever since, to the time of exhibiting the Charge, was a town of this Commonwealth’s; and that within that town, in all that time, there is and hath been a garrison, and part of the army of this Commonwealth; and during that time, Ralph Waterhouse, John Overton, George Thompson, &c. were officers of the forces of that garrison. That sir H. Slingsby, minding to embroil the Commonwealth in war, April 30 last, and divers other times since October 10, 1656, as a false traitor and enemy to his highness the Lord Protector, did plot, contrive, and endeavour to betray the said town and garrison to Charles Stuart, an enemy to this Commonwealth. It sets forth further, That sir H. Slingsby, the time and place aforesaid, did contrive and endeavour to stir up mutinies among the soldiery of that garrison, and to raise forces against this Commonwealth; and that he did publish and declare the said Charles Stuart to be king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, &c. and hath held correspondence with him; and that he delivered to the said Ralph Waterhouse a certain instrument, which he said was a Commission from Charles Stuart: All which treasons are contrary to the form and effect of the act of parliament. And the prisoner having pleaded Not Guilty, which plea is recorded, we are ready to prove him guilty, and ready to call our witnesses.

Att. Gen. You have heard the Charge, and plea Not Guilty; it rests upon us to prove it to you. This gentleman himself, I believe, when he hath heard them particularly opened, will be convinced that of these acts he hath been guilty. It would not have been expected from him to have tasted of the mercy of this Court: For had he had justice done formerly, he had not been to have answered this here. I do believe it was expected from those that did govern, to have got him off by mercy, not to take him off by justice. But he ceased not to interpose on the behalf of Charles Stuart, and endeavoured to bring him in again, and had like to have withdrawn the faithful officers of that garrison to betray their trust: If money would have done it, that was not wanting to be offered; if preferment would have wrought upon them, that was proffered; if hopes of higher preferment under Charles Stuart would have wrought upon them, it would have been done. But to our witnesses.

Att. Gen. What discourse had you with sir Henry Slingsby, touching the delivering up of Hull?

Waterhouse. I had several discourses with him; particularly about the latter end of December last, being a-hunting, sir Henry Slingsby's son came to me in the field, and told me his father presented his service to me, and gave me a book; which I looked on about an hour after, and found it was a printed book. At the beginning was a Paper thus written, 'Put this out with your finger, and then tell me whether Rob. Gardiner had not spoke to me to serve the king,' &c. Presently after I acquainted col. Smith, who advised me to discover, if I could, whether sir H. Slingsby was carrying on any plot. I went to sir H. Slingsby, and sir H. S. took me to the window-side, and hugged and embraced me; and asked me if Robert Gardiner had not spoke to me to serve the king: And then began with a great many good words, and said that one (meaning his Highness) had put a disrespect upon me, and if I would I might right myself; with many other words; and promised me a sum of money, to secure the South-house for the service of the king. About a week after, he sent the book again, and in the same leaf wrote a few lines more, which I also shewed to col. Smith; he promised me 5,000*l.* in land or money here or elsewhere. I made many queries, and told him I thought it was to no purpose: He told me, that if that house were secured, in a little time he would bring an army to besiege Hull; and then half our work would be done. He after sent me another paper, which was to this purpose, That if the governor sought for him, he would give security for his peaceable living; and said, if I would give him a piece, he would make it twenty if he did not procure me a Commission from Charles Stuart within fourteen days. He said further, That a great party were engaged in Scotland. Upon the 2nd of April he delivered me a Commission, which he said was from the king; and the Commission being read in Court, the said Mr. Waterhouse averred it to be the same he received of sir H. Slingsby, and which ran thus:

'C. R. Charles by the grace of God,' (with the old usual title, &c.) 'To our right trusty and well-beloved major Ralph Waterhouse: We do by these presents constitute and appoint you to be governor of the castle and two block-houses near Hull, and to put such a garrison of horse and foot therein, as you shall judge necessary for the defence of the same; and to command the garrison and governor thereof, and to do all things necessary for the preservation of the same place. Given at Bruges, March 12, 1657.'

Sir H. Slingsby also said to me, That he had spoken with captain Overton, and promised to furnish him with money to lay in provision, and engaged by a bond to repay such money as I should lay out for the victualling of the South-house: and also read a letter from Charles Stuart, running thus, 'I can never be enough sensible of your favours,' &c. I demanded how the army should come; he answered, that the duke of York had 7 or 8,000 men, that the king of Spain would furnish them, if there was a place of security. And asking what way of correspondence he had with C. Stuart, he said he had a way of having Commissions from C. Stuart, which he would not discover. [Here sir H. Slingsby stood up, and disowned any such expression.]

Att. Gen. What officer were you, Mr. Waterhouse?

Waterhouse. I have the command of a company, and of the South block-house.

Att. Gen. Mr. Waterhouse, what letter was that sir H. Slingsby sent to his son?

Waterhouse. The contents were thus: 'That Harry would speak to the two men to be very importunate with the twelve.' Sir H. Slingsby promised so many men, that he offered captain Overton 20*l.* to raise forty men.

Att. Gen. How many men did he tell you should be at Paul near Hull?

Waterhouse. Six hundred to march into Hull.

Att. Gen. What men did he tell you Andrew would raise?

Waterhouse. He said Andrew would raise 50 or 60 men when he pleased, and that captain Overton should have a deputation to command the castle under me; he said he had good hopes of col. Smith, and that he had a Commission for him, if he would accept of it.

Slingsby. This which is here spoken in seriousness, was then spoke in mirth, a mere discourse, as those that are in good fellowship may have, and what I said or did was but in jest.

Ld. Pres. There ought to be no good fellowship in Treason.

Waterhouse. I never visited him but by col. Smith's commission. Sir H. Slingsby according to his engagement, upon receipt of a piece, gave me another Commission running thus: 'Oli-ver, Lord Protector, &c.' took it again, and burned it.

Att. Gen. Sir Henry, was it you that filled up that blank Commission.

Slingsby. It is more than any man knows: But it is not the Commission I gave Waterhouse, which is dated March 12, 1657.

Capt. John Overton sworn.

Mr. Phelps shewed him the Commission dated 12 March, 1657.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you see that Commission delivered to Waterhouse by sir Henry Slingsby?

Capt. Overton. Yes, I did; he delivered it to him in the Castle about the second of April last.

Slingsby. Mr. Overton, what date did that Commission which I then delivered bear?

Overton. This is the same Commission, and (having it in his hand) I here see it is dated 12 March, 1657.

Slingsby. I deny that the Commission I then delivered did bear that date.

Waterh. and Overton. My Lord, we are upon our oaths.

Overton. I saw sir H. give it to major Waterhouse in his own chamber in the Castle of Hull, and major W. bid me read it, which I did.

Slingsby. Was that Commission, which you read, dated 12 March?

[Captain Overton reads the copy of it, which he then wrote from the original, which agreed with this.]

Slingsby. I deny that the Commission then delivered was of that date.

Waterh. and Overton both deny the altering of the date.

Slingsby. Major Waterhouse desired me to alter the date of the Commission, and I scraped out April and the day, and put in March.

Capt. Overton examined.

Att. Gen. What treaty was between sir H. and you at Hull? Are you an officer there?

Overton. Yes.

Att. Gen. How long have you been an officer there?

Overton. About ten years.

Att. Gen. What proceedings was there between sir H. and you? What meetings had you, &c. Was he your prisoner?

Overton. He was my prisoner. The first time he spake any thing to me, was on Feb. 18, last, when he told me, he thought me the strictest man alive with prisoners, but now would believe the contrary: Said, that I searched a man of his for a letter; but afterwards, to prevent me, he gave his letter in a purse with some money to his Laundress, who carried it into the town, and sent it away; and after that (he told me) I never found any letter. I told him, if he wanted any thing necessary, I would go to the governor about it: He told me, it was not much for that, but that I might very much befriend him. He wrote me, that a colonel (naming him) was engaged to bring six regiments from the king; asking whether I knew my men were right for me, and particularized one Clerk: I told him he was right. He asked me what I thought of 100*l.* to give them: I told him they did not use to have such great gratuities. This was 18 Feb. 1657.

28 Feb. He asked me where the Sally-port was; I told him it was twenty yards from the Castle. He told me, some prisoners not long ago intended to make an escape that way, but were prevented, and asked me which way it entered into the Castle, which way I could let in any men into the Castle, that I should not want money, whether I could tell how to victual the Castle, he would be glad if I could do it. He told me, that the king kept his designs so close, that none knew of them, and that it was not known whether he would land at Hull or Scarborough.

3 March. He asked me whether I continued my command: I told him I knew nothing to the contrary; to which he shewed much gladness. He told me, Duke Dassy was to bring a considerable party, but staid so long that the rest were gone.

6 March. He asked me what news, and said that Chapman had assured his son the town was too strong for the garrison; and asked me who I knew in the town to be right: I told him, Edw. Chapman was not for the Soldiery.

14 March. I told him, that his old Master C. Stuart was about to set sail with 7 or 8,000 men. He said, that the king was more private than to let any man know his design; but asked me, whether I was ready to receive him?

23 March. Sir H. Slingsby being below in our chamber, told me that I had a fit opportunity to receive such men as might be right for me. I told him, I thought I could not have have half my number. He told me, he was glad I would serve the king; and said, that if he had any favour from the king, I should not want anything. He told me he had assurance, that any that assisted the king when he first came to kiss his mother earth, he would give them 4 or 5,000*l*. That he would furnish me with money; and desired that I would not shoot any great bullets at king Charles's men when they were landing. And further told me, That if I would take a deputation to command under major Waterhouse, he would procure it.

On April 2. Sir H. S. told major Waterhouse, That he had a Commission for him to be governor of Hull, and I saw him deliver a parchment Commission to major Waterhouse.

Att. Gen. If sir H. hath any thing to object, he may.

Slingsby. I see that I am trepanned by these two fellows: They have said that seriously against me, which was spoken in mirth between us: I never sought to them, but they to me: the Commission was procured by no intercourse with any persons beyond the seas, but a blank which I had for four years together. Nor had I any correspondence beyond sea, to carry on any design here.

Lieut. George Thompson sworn.

Being asked what officer he was, he answered, I am a lieutenant to major Waterhouse. I was desired to go and see sir H. Slingsby, April 16, who told me, That he had great confidence in me. I said to him, why? He told me, he thought I had good thoughts of the king. His son told me, he heard the king was to come in, and to bring in a considerable army, but knew not when. Next day I went again to sir H. and asked him if he would walk on the leads, which he did; and there I told him, I had been pondering on the words he last spoke to me: Who then bugging me, said, I have a great deal of confidence in you, there is a design in agitation to bring in the king with a considerable army, but he did not know how soon it would be; but told me, I should have notice of it: and said that the king had promised pardon to to all officers but the Lord Protector and lord Bradshaw.

Slingsby. I confess such like discourses; but Waterhouse spoke to me, that I would speak to Thompson to try whether he would be assistant; but I told him I would not, lest he should not accept it, and then turn him out of his place. Waterhouse pressed me to go to Thompson, and major Waterhouse invited us to his house to dinner: after dinner he spoke to Thompson to go with me on the leads, to shew me the guns; we walked about, and came down again. Then said Waterhouse to me, Did not you speak to Thompson? I said not. You had a good opportunity, said he. At last Thompson came to me, and I had some discourse with him about it.

VOL. V.

Ld. Pres. Sir H. S. have you any thing else to say?

Slingsby. No, my lord.

[Then Mr. Serjeant Maynard summed up the Charge, Plea, and Evidence, and eloquently set forth the fulness and clearness of the Evidence, with the heinousness of the offence, and demanded the Judgment of the Court.]

Att. Gen. I shall not trouble you with repetition, the matter being clearly laid open. The place where this acting was, and where the design was laid, was. I may safely say, the most considerable place in England for Charles Stuart's design; a place strongly seated and situated, and remote from this city: and had he prevailed there, as he endeavoured, it had not been peace with us that now are here. And truly, my lord, I cannot but pity those gentlemen that are thus drawn into designs which I am confident will never take; and I am sorry that people should be so seduced as they are, for their seducers bring them to the gallows, and then laugh at them. And my lord, I pity this gentleman, (pointing to sir H.) that those grey hairs should thus go to the grave. I have no more to say, but crave the justice of this Court.

The Serjeant at Arms was commanded to take away the Prisoner.

Proclamation for adjournment of the Court into the Painted Chamber. After a little private debate in the Painted Chamber they adjourned till Thursday next, nine in the morning.

Thursday, May 27, being appointed for the meeting of the same Court, about ten of the clock they accordingly met in the Painted Chamber, Westminster; where after about two hours private debate, they adjourned untill Tuesday next, the 1st day of June.*

Of this matter Ladlow writes thus:

"Another plot much more dangerous" (he had just before mentioned a conspiracy of some Fifth Monarchy-men against Cromwell) "was about the same time carried on by the Royalists, and discovered to him by his spies.

"The persons concerned in it he used with more severity, because he accounted them to be of a more formidable party, and therefore referred them to be tried by those persons whom his last assembly had nominated to be a High Court of Justice. The prisoners were, Dr. Hewet, sir Henry Slingsby, and Mr. Mordaunt, with some others of the meaner sort. The general charge against them was for endeavouring to levy war against the government on the behalf of Charles Stuart. The particular charge against Dr. Hewet, was for dispersing commissions from the son of the late king, and persuading divers to raise forces by virtue of the same. That against sir Henry Slingsby, was for attempting to debauch some of the garrison of Hull to the service of Charles Stuart, and delivering a commission from him to them. The prisoners of less note, were charged with a design of firing the city in several places at the time appointed for their party to be in arms. Dr. Hewet being brought before the Court, moved that he might be tried by a Jury, and demurred to the jurisdiction of the Court. But the Court over-ruled his demurrer, and told him that unless he would plead to his charge, they would cause his refusal to be entered, and proceed against him as if the fact were confessed. This being twice said to him, he was required the third time to plead. To which he answered, that if the judges would declare it to be according to law for him to plead he would obey, but he was told that the gentlemen then present were his judges, and that if he would not plead they would register his contempt the third time; and upon his refusal did so. Mr. Mordaunt admonished by his example pleaded Not Guilty, and after a full hearing of the witnesses on both sides the Court acquitted him by one voice. Then sir Henry Slingsby was called to the bar, and the witnesses on each side being heard, he was pronounced Guilty; though in the opinion of many men he had very hard measure. For it appeared that he was a prisoner at the time when he was charged to have practised against the government; that he was a declared enemy, and therefore by the laws of war free to make any such attempt. Besides, it was alledged that the persons whom he was accused to have endeavoured to corrupt, had trepanned him by their promises to serve the king in delivering Hull, if he would give them a commission to act for him; which commission was an old one that had long lain by him; but all this being not thought sufficient to excuse him, he was adjudged to die. The rest of the prisoners were also condemned; and, sentence of death being pronounced, sir Henry Slingsby and Dr. Hewet had the favour of being beheaded, and the others being men of a lesser figure were hanged, Cromwell's daughter and favourite, Mrs. Claypole, laboured earnestly with her father to save the life of Dr. Hewet, but without success: which denial so afflicted her that it was reported to have been one cause of her death, which happened soon after, with the concurrence of an ulcer in her womb."

Memoirs of sir H. Slingsby, written by himself, are in print. They are of very little value, of the matters recorded, the greater part relates to mere family transactions. They can scarcely be said to relate to any public matters of later date than 1646, though indeed the death of king Charles the first is mentioned at the end. He tells us that when the parliament was called at the end of the year 1640, (the Long Parliament) there was "great expectance of an happy parliament, where the subjects may have redress of all their grievances." Of his mode of living, he says, 'The number we are at this time (Feb. 1639.) in household is thirty persons, whereof sixteen are men servants and eight women besides ourselves. Our charge every year is much at our certainty, being well accommodated with good, faithful and diligent servants in their several offices, so that at least every year I spend in housekeeping, 500l.'

203. The Trial of Dr. JOHN HEWET, before the High Court of Justice, for High Treason: 10 CHARLES II. the 1st of June,* A. D. 1658.

THE Serjeant at Arms being commanded by the Court to fetch the Prisoners to the Bar; Dr. Hewet was brought to the Bar accordingly. After Proclamation was made for Silence, the Lord President asked Mr. Attorney General what he had to say against the Prisoner at the Bar, Mr. Attorney General thereupon exhibited an Impeachment of High Treason against the Prisoner, and desired it might be read, and prayed that the Court would please to receive his Answer thereunto. The Charge was read by Mr. Phelps the Clerk; the effect of which was as followeth, viz.

* "May 25th, 1658. The trial of Dr. Hewet before the New Commissioners of the High Court of Justice this day. The Doctor did not carry himself prudently." Whitelocke's Memorials. In 1 Thurloe's State Papers, 707, et seq. are some letters from Corker and Morland to Thurloe, and from Corker to Morland about this business.

' That John Hewet, late of the parish of Gregory's in the city of London, Doctor of Divinity, minding and intending to embroil this Commonwealth in new and intestine wars, the 30th of April now last past, and at divers times since the 10th of October, which was in the year of our Lord 1656, and before the said 30th of April last past, as a false traitor and enemy to Oliver then and yet Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, and to the said Commonwealth; together with one Trelawney late of London, gent. Henry Bishop of Lewes in Sussex, gent. and other their complices, at the parish of Gregory's aforesaid, and at Lewes in Sussex, did traitorously, advisedly, and maliciously plot, contrive, and endeavour to stir up force, and levy war against the said Oliver Lord Protector, and against the government of this Commonwealth, as the same is now established, and to subvert and alter the same.

‘ And did also then and there, and at divers
 ‘ other times and places, as well before as after ‘ the said 30th day of April now last past, and ‘ after the said 10th of October 1656, traitor-‘ ously, advisedly, and maliciously declare, pub‘ lish, and promote Charles Stuart, eldest son
 ‘ to the late King Charles, to be King of Eng‘ land, Scotland, and Ireland, and the domi‘ nions thereunto belonging: and did then and ‘ there traitorously, advisedly, and maliciously ‘ hold intelligence and correspondence with the ‘ said Charles Stuart. All which said Treasons
 ‘ he the said John Hewet, at the parish of Gre‘ gory’s in the said city of London, and also at ‘ Lewes and elsewhere, did traitorously, advi-‘ sedly, and maliciously declare, at the times
 ‘ and places aforesaid, by conferring with John ‘ Stapely and Henry Mallory how to effect the ‘ same; and by encouraging the said John ‘ Stapely and Henry Mallory thereunto, and by ‘ delivering commissions to them from the said
 ‘ Charles Stuart, concerning the levying war ‘ against the said Oliver Lord Protector of the ‘ Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ire‘ land, &c.—All which said Treasons are ‘ contrary to the Statute in that case made and ‘ provided. With which said Treasons com‘ mitted and done, the said Attorney General,
 ‘ for and on the behalf of his highness the Lord ‘ Protector and the Commonwealth, doth charge
 ‘ and impeach the said John Hewet; and for
 ‘ and on the behalf of the said Oliver Lord Pro‘ tector, and the Commonwealth, prayeth that
 ‘ the said John Hewet may be put to answer;
 ‘ that such trial, judgment, and proceedings
 ‘ may be had against him, as to justice doth ‘ appertain. And the said Attorney General ‘ doth aver that the said John Hewet is the per‘ son by name appointed by his highness the ‘ Lord Protector to be tried and proceeded ‘ against according to the Act.’

[Dr. Hewet, the Prisoner, sitting covered whilst his Impeachment was reading, the Lord President commanded his hat to be taken off; which the Doctor observing took it off himself. Then Mr. Phelps, Clerk to the High Court, addressed the Prisoner to this effect:]

Mr. Phelps. John Hewet, D. D. thou stand-est here charged of High Treason; this Court requires you to give a positive answer, whether Guilty or Not Guilty.

Dr. Hewet. My Lord, if I have already misbehaved myself here, my error is the more pardonable, because I have not had any counsel; and I dare not presume to have any knowledge in any faculty, especially in the law. I never did change my cassock into a jump; I am better acquainted with a pulpit than a bar; better read in St. Austin than my lord Coke; and in the Fathers, than Bastal’s Entries, or Plowden’s Commentaries. In all my life I never studied any law case till now; that necessity that hath no law hath made me thus far to become a lawyer, as to think to plead (not for my livelihood but) for my life. God forgive them that have occasioned this unusual and unaccustomed study, that hath put me into such a pulpit as I never saw before. And therefore, my lord, inasmuch as I have often heard that there are such niceties in the law, that a man may be lost in the severity of it for a word spoken in mere simplicity; I shall crave that there may be nothing taken, in prejudice to my innocency, from words spoken in simplicity; And I hope you will please to grant me that.

Ld. President (Lisle). Dr. Hewet, I am sorry, truly very sorry, to see such a one as you in that place; but you are impeached of High Treason: All favour will be shewn you according to the rules of justice. I think you desire counsel?

Hewet. No, my lord, it is first, that I knowing nothing of the law, may have nothing (simply spoken) prejudice me; and that you will allow me counsel.

Ld. President. The Court is counsel for you, your business is to plead to the Indictment;
 you are required by the Court to answer whether Guilty or Not Guilty.

Hewet. My lord, you sit there as Judge, I beseech you let me know by what Commission you sit there.*

Ld. President. Dr. Hewet, we sit here by a Commission under the Great Seal of England, in pursuance of an Act of Parliament; that is our Commission.

Hewet. Pray give me the favour to have the Commission read, my lord.

Ld. President. Dr. Hewet, we know our own authority, it is not usual to read Commissions to prisoners; the laws of England and acts of parliament are to be submitted to.

Hewet. I am not to own every person that will sit to judge me, therefore I desire to know by what Commission you sit, and who are the judges, and then I shall say no more.

Ld. Pres. Those that are to judge you, are very well known; you consented yourself to the judges, we are all chosen by act of parliament, the parliament hath consented to it; we are chosen judges, and are your judges by act of parliament.

Hewet. My lord, I must know the persons, whether they be all here; I see but very few.

Ld. Pres. Here be very many, and we have been all called this morning, as the course is,
 and we sit now as your judges.

Hewet. Under favour, my lord, as I remember, the Commission by the act is directed to 150, and there are the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal, with the lords of his Highness’s Treasury, and all the judges, and divers other persons, are named in the act of parliament: I do not see so many faces as are mentioned in that act.

Ld. Pres. Dr. Hewet, I must tell you the Quorum is any seventeen or more of them: If we are here seventeen or more, we are a ante, p. 875.

Quorum by that Commission: We are here I believe forty or fifty.

Hewet. My lord, with submission, the case is true, in case the Commissioners were but seventeen, and they all present, then they might hear and determine; but if one were absent, they cannot, my lord, as I conceive.

Ld. Pres. You are a person of parts, and therefore we may delight to hear you; but we must keep ourselves to the business of the Court: You are required by the Court to answer the Impeachment.

Hewet. My lord, if you sit by the act, sit according to the act, and then I shall submit. It was resolved by all the judges of the King's-Bench in the 13th of Eliz. in the earl of Leicester's Case.

Att. Gen. (Prideaux.) The Doctor did profess his ignorance of the laws, yet pretends more knowledge than the Court: The Court are here, and know themselves lawfully authorised to try you. Dr. Hewet, if you please to proceed to give your Answer, whether guilty or not, you will find the justice of the Court to be according to the laws of England.

Hewet. This learned gentleman, I know his face, though not his name; he speaks according to worth, but I cannot answer him according to law, and therefore still plead ignorance of the law, but desire to be tried according to law; and I have given you a law precedent, if you will go against it I shall say no more.

Att. Gen. This gentleman hath it by tradition, not by his own knowledge; but the case he mentions cannot parallel this. The act of parliament saith, an hundred and fifty, or any seventeen, here are three seventeens.

Mr. Sol. Ellis. I think the Commission is directed to your lordships, or any seventeen: ['Which Commissioners, or any Seventeen, &c.'] The meaning whereof is, That those seventeen, or more respectively, should hear, &c. There were several Quorums for England, Scotland and Ireland; Seventeen for England, Thirteen for Scotland, &c. That Case out of Plowden differs clearly from this: For if a Commission be directed, and there be no Quorum, then the Commissioners must all certify. We humbly conceive, that if your lordships be here seventeen, or more, you are fully authorised to proceed.

Att. Gen. In many Cases you have a Quorum of persons, such and such men: It is true, here is no Quorum of persons but a Quorum of the number; and if there be a Quorum of seventeen, it is warrantable.

Hewet. This learned gentleman, he is better able to speak what is law than I; but under favour, and with submission, I do not think he may judge of the laws, or the other (that spoke his private conception) to interpret the meaning of the parliament. And, my lord, if your lordship please, I shall make this my humble appeal to the learned judges of the law, That if they will say, in this respect, that this is a lawful judicature, I shall proceed.

Ld. Pres. You have heard the words of the act of parliament read, authority is given to the Commissioners, or any seventeen or more of them; ['Which said Commissioners respectively'] that is, for England seventeen, or more of them: and you have heard the judgment of the Court upon that. That which you speak of in relation to my lord Leicester's Case is true; if a Commission be directed to Commissioners, and no Quorum appointed, then all must certify; but by the act of parliament, and the Commission made in pursuance of it, the Quorum is seventeen: but here are three Quorums.

Hewet. My lord, in as much as all the Commissioners are named in that act, and that Commission is according to the act, they are all commissioned to sit; and unless all sit, the rest cannot try and examine, &c. And I shall refer it to the Judges of the laws.

Ld. Pres. We did not call ourselves to be your judges; by being named your judges by act of parliament, we have power to declare to you what the law is by that act of parliament. I have declared it.

Hewet. My lord, if the Quorum had been named, then it were somewhat; but it being directed to seventeen, or more, when more or seventeen are commissioned, all must sit: I refer it again to the Judges of the Laws.

Ld. Pres. Dr. Hewet, what you say now, or what you say hereafter, besides this, you have time to speak to, as to matter of law, after matter of fact hath been tried; if you plead to matter of fact, what you say to the Court as to matter of law, we shall be ready to hear it; apply yourself to the Court in matter of fact. The Court asks you, whether Guilty or Not?

Hewet. My lord, I must first know whether the Court be a lawful judicature, before I give in my Defence.

Ld. Pres. Dr. Hewet, you have offered very much touching the jurisdiction of the Court, in conclusion you must acquiesce; I must put you up to plead; you know the danger, if you do not plead, being required: if you stand mute and do not plead, it is equally as dangerous to you, as if you had confessed the crimes.

Hewet. I am so highly sensible of the privileges of an Englishman, that both for the satisfaction of my own conscience, and all persons, I would not willingly give up the liberties and privileges of any English freeman to any body that demands it; I am very loth that there should be any just imputation laid upon me, that I should seek a disturbance in point of self-interest, to divide myself from the communion of those that are my fellow-freemen; and I should (as I have always) abhor to be both a schismatic from the church, and singular from the state. My lord, I am so concerned for the privileges of an English freeman, and public interest, that I should be loth to do any thing towards the giving them up, that might make my heart ache. I shall desire it may be determined by the Judges.

Ld. Pres. You speak of common friendship; what is common friendship, but to be a friend to the public government? If you have been a friend to the government and peace of this nation, you need not fear to plead to the indictment: and therefore I require you to plead to it.

Hewet. Whenever you shall come to a particular examination of the business, it will not appear that I have been an enemy; I desire, that whereas there are many niceties in the laws, I humbly crave the engagement of your honours, that there may not be any advantage taken.

Att. Gen. God forbid.

Hewet. My lord, I think I have not spoken any thing unreasonably, or against law, and therefore humbly crave my former request.

Att. Gen. If you please, the Doctor knows that there must be a judgment, in which we must acquiesce: this is that judicature that calls you before them; you sit by the highest authority of England; an act of parliament in the first place, a Commission under the Great Seal in the second place, and a Commission of his Highness, against whom, of which the Doctor is one; I desire he may give an answer to the impeachment; that being done, we shall have liberty on both sides to speak to what is justice, and law, and fact: if you are not guilty, be you assured that this Court will not take your blood upon them; you have a very fair court.

Hewet. This learned person speaks very fairly; it shall be far from me to question any act of a lawful parliament: but under favour as yet it doth not appear to me, that you have by that act by which you sit, power to hear and determine concerning the matters of which I am charged: I refer it, and appeal again and again to the learned judges of the laws, even his highness's judges.

Ld. Pres. Dr. Hewet, the Court has had much patience in hearing of you thus long, you having not so much as owned their authority; if you will not own us, we will own you: therefore I require the clerk to enter it, that we have required you to plead.

Mr. Phelps, Clerk. John Hewet, you here stand charged of high-treason against his Highness the Lord Protector and the Commonwealth; the Charge hath been read to you, the Court have demanded whether Guilty or Not Guilty; they again demand of you whether Guilty or Not Guilty.

Hewet. My lord, I shall be very loth to do any thing to save my life, and forfeit a good conscience; and I shall not, for my private interest, give up the privileges of those that are equal freemen with myself: I am looked upon in a double capacity, as a clergyman, and as a commonwealth's man; I should be very loth to be scandalous in either: and pray be pleased to do that justice to yourselves, as to vindicate the legality of your judicature, and then I will proceed.

Att. Gen. My lord, you was pleased to tell the Doctor, That you will own him when he doth not own you; but, my lord, his flying in your face, and taxing you thus, is not to be endured: I wish he would have that consideration of himself, that if he doth not own your authority, you expect to be owned, otherwise he will be supposed to be guilty of all those crimes that are laid to his charge; and by not pleading, he doth confess them; that will be an high scandal, Mr. Doctor: therefore to vindicate yourself, I desire you to answer.

Hewet. This learned gentleman hath urged it with a great deal of civility and respect to me, which I must own, and thankfully acknowledge: but, my lord, withal, I dare not, for the saving of myself, give up others; so many thousands of others, by my precedent, that might likewise be involved in the same condition that I am in: therefore, my lord, let it appear that it is a lawful judicature, and I have done.

Att. Gen. I beseech Mr. Doctor to consider his case; he is not brought as a champion for the people of England; as he stands charged, he appears to you to be contrary affected: I humbly beg that he may be put to plead, that so his innocence may be cleared.

Hewet. My lord, I said before that I am no lawyer, I understand nothing of it, neither desire to be judge in my own cause; but I do not desire likewise to be judged by every person that would sit to judge me; neither would I give up that right that belongs to an Englishman, to every one that demands it: therefore I desire you to grant this petition, That you will make appear that you are a lawful judicature. I would rather die ten thousand times than I will be guilty of giving up my fellow-freemen's liberties and privileges.

Att. Gen. My lord, some of his own coat have acknowledged the like authority before him; but if Mr. Doctor be peremptory in this, that he will not own your authority, and plead to his Charge. I must do my duty; that is, humbly to pray the Court, that if he refuse to answer, I must pray their judgment, and acquaint him with the words of the act; [which accordingly were read.] So that, my lord, in default of answer, if Mr. Doctor will not plead to this, my lord, I must thereupon pray that you will proceed according to the act, as in cases of high-treason, which is very penal. I have no more to say.

Hewet. My lord, I suppose these learned gentlemen, who are so learned in the laws, will be cautious what they do against law; and I hope they will remember what condemnation and execution befel Tresilian* in the 11th of Richard the 2nd, that did there misadvise the king to do such and such things; that is much like to this case of mine: and withal, I hope they will remember what befel the Judges in the Case of Ship-Money,† in the time of the late king; and therefore I hope they will be cautious themselves in doing any thing that is contrary to law.

* See No. 18. vol. 1. p. 89. † No. 147. vol. 3. p. 285.

Ld. Pres. Dr. Hewet, you have heard the clause of the act of parliament read to you, whereby you may understand, that either we must proceed upon your Answer, or else to judgment upon your refusal; if upon your Answer you clear your innocency, then those freemen you speak of, may faithfully embrace you: but if you will not answer, we must proceed to judgment. I am sorry for your robe-sake, but if you will not answer, you cannot acquit yourself: you thereby confess it: therefore let me advise you, for your robe-sake, to follow the best counsel; that is, to put yourself upon that which prisoners must do. Answer to it, Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Hewet. My lord, I hope it is not the sense of the whole Court, that they should proceed against me, either to sentence, or any other way, till first they clear themselves to me.

Att. Gen. Pray, who is the judge? You must clear yourself to him.

Lord Pres. If there be any here that are of another opinion, let him declare himself. Dr. Hewet, you lose yourself mightily in saying this one thing so often, and we lose our time: I require you again to plead.

Hewet. My lord, I cannot speak of that too often, that is so dear and precious to me and every person.

Att. Gen. I can say no more, but pray your justice.

Ld. Pres. Dr. Hewet, I am called upon by the Court, because of your refusal to answer; but I pity you very much, and therefore desire once more the patience and favour of the Court, that they would give you leave to answer: therefore, Mr. Doctor, that we may not record your standing mute, and refusing to answer, I shall once more, in favour to you, require you to answer. Clerk, stay your hand a while.

Hewet. My lord, both the Court and all these persons will thus clear me to the whole world, that I have referred myself, and appealed to his Highness's judges of the law, to resolve whether this be a lawful judicature: this appeal is denied, therefore I must proceed to some other thing, seeing you all deny me that.

Phelps, clerk. John Hewet, D. D. you stand here charged on behalf of his highness the Lord Protector, of treason against him and his Commonwealth; you have heard the Charge, the Court hath several times demanded your answer, and you refuse; they the third time require your answer, whether Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Hewet. Pray, my lord, is there any Indictment found against me by a grand jury, by which I am to be tried? For by the fifth and sixth of Edward the 6th all Treasons are to be enquired into, and presented by twelve men: the Commission by which you sit, doth not declare any other way; I beseech you, is there any other Indictment?

Ld. Pres. You have a very great grand jury, forty persons, and we have power upon a special act of parliament, to give order for a Charge to be brought in against you; and we have, according to that power and authority, given order for this Charge to be brought in against you, and you are to answer to it.

Hewet. My lord, with submission, you are not a competent jury.

Att. Gen. My lord, now it is the second part to the same tune; I know there are many others upon the same string when this is resolved. Sir, this is the grand jury, the petty jury, and your judge; they require you to give your answer, whether Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Hewet. My lord, this is likewise denied me, I now humbly crave a copy of my Charge, time to answer to it, and counsel assigned me.

Ld. Pres. For the copy of your Charge, it was never granted to any prisoner indicted for high-treason. For counsel, you are now upon matter of fact, whether Guilty or Not Guilty.

Att. Gen. I have a word to inform him, I would not press any thing against him, which in my judgment I thought not legal; you have given him your resolution as to the jurisdiction, there is nothing now to say, but Guilty or Not Guilty: he must bring himself to be a party, or else nothing can be asked.

Hewet. I think the prisoner cannot be charged and tried on one and the same day, no more than a man can be indicted and tried the same day, as in Kelway's Reports; and this was declared to be law in the case of the Portugal Ambassador's brother.*

Att. Gen. You are not upon your trial, you must plead and join issue, and then we will consider whether we will try you now or no; yet there is many a man hath been brought to prison the same day, found the same day, and tried the same day.

Hewet. I desire a copy of my Charge; if not that, I desire time to speak, and counsel assigned me, which hath been the course of former times; for counsel it hath been usually allowed, as in the case of Humphry Stafford in the time of Henry the 7th, and in the case of Lilburne. Baron Nicholas and serjeant Maynard were of counsel for major Rolph, who endeavoured to poison the late king. And for matter of law, it ought to be allowed, as in my lord Coke's sixth book of his Reports, 14 fol. is of the same opinion. Arundel had counsel assigned him for murder, in matter of law.

Sol. Ellis. For matter of fact, it was never allowed; but if he plead, and any matter of law do arise that's doubtful to the Court, then the Court, if they doubt of it, assign counsel; but the prisoner must plead first to the matter of fact. For a man to be accused the same day, and tried the same day, is no new thing. For counsel, if any thing arise in matter of law, then it may be considered. The Portugal ambassador's brother came, and was accused and tried the same day. We shall humbly pray that he may plead Guilty or Not Guilty; if any matter of law arise, your lordships may do him justice.

* See the Case of Don Pantaleon Sa, at p. 468 of this volume.

Hewet. My lord, with submission, this learned gentleman hath understood me but in part; my request was for counsel for matter of law in general, as well as particular for matter of fact. I humbly conceive that there are several acts of parliament that do free me from this charge, and particularly the Great Charter of England; for which I humbly crave I may have counsel assigned me.

Ld. Pres. You are now in generals; you speak of several acts of parliament, and you would have counsel to plead; counsel was never allowed in this case upon such a general desire; many that stand about you may have a prejudice to you, and think you are loth to plead: I have called upon you often; if we should once record the refusal, it would be very penal. I would advise you to plead to the indictment.

Hewet. My lord, since you have denied me counsel, I shall desire to speak something in my own behalf.

Att. Gen. This is a very ill precedent to the justice of England: I suppose that you will allow him all favour, but the justice of England must be preferred against all persons whatsoever. The jurisdiction is settled to the satisfaction of the Doctor himself; if he will bring himself a party, and ask any thing of you, that must be by pleading; till then he can ask nothing.

Hewet. My lord, the judicature is not yet cleared to me, for the legality of it; and if you please to give a little patience, I shall give you the reasons why.

Att. Gen. I shall desire it may be no more thus.

Ld. Pres. I shall say no more to you, we must make our authority appear to you either by trying of you, or judging of you: will you be tried?

Hewet. My lord, the Charge depends upon an act of parliament, which was made about two years since, (17 Sept. 1656,) the members of which parliament were chosen by the people, yet notwithstanding one hundred and fifty of them were not permitted to sit.

Att. Gen. My lord, we must not suffer this; pray, if he will not be otherwise satisfied, I must require your strict justice. Your words they are seditious; this shews the spirit of the man.

Hewet. I hope you will have patience to hear me for vindication of myself, and satisfaction of my own conscience and all persons whatever; and withal for the clearing of yourselves, that you do not bring blood upon yourselves by taking that power that is not justifiable.

Att. Gen. Truly, my lord, this is insufferable: Mr. Doctor hath had as much respect as ever any had. I have attended many, I never saw the like in my time; you have had the patience to hear him oppose yourselves, your authority, your persons, and to strike at the root of all. Mr. Doctor, I would have you to carry yourself with more respect. This shews, that much of what is charged against you, is true; if you will scorn the Court, say it positively.

Hewet. My lord, I humbly submit myself to the laws of the land; I shall not dispute acts of parliament, but I conceive (if you please to give me a little patience) an House of Commons is not authority enough—

Ld. Pres. Mr. Doctor, pray remember that text, 'He that seemeth to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, his religion is vain.' Will you plead or not?

Hewet. My lord, whilst I speak for the laws of the land, this is not an evil speech.

Att. Gen. My lord, if you please, I did receive your commands to prepare this Charge against this Doctor; in obedience to you I have done it, not willingly against your person, Mr. Doctor; I have some others to proceed against, if you will please that Mr. Doctor may dispatch one way or other. I must pray your final sentence, if he do not plead immediately.

Hewet. My lord, what I petitioned for before, I do again, That seeing you will not please to give me leave to speak either as to the privileges of Englishmen, nor as to the act, I desire time to speak to the Charge, and counsel.

Ld. Pres. You have heard that I must require your answer; you must plead Guilty, or not Guilty.

Hewet. Hath your lordship assigned me counsel in matter of fact, when matters of law arise?

Ld. Pres. We shall then take the consideration of it, now is not a time.

Hewet. My lord, I am in a great straight, I pray God assist me; and I here appeal to Almighty God, and to all the world, that I do against my soul and conscience nothing that shall be to the prejudice of the privileges of the laws of England; if there shall be any thing in these proceedings that shall be to the disadvantage of others, my soul be clear of it, the guilt be upon others; seeing I am necessitated upon this, and cannot have counsel assigned me for the judicature, for the legality of it, I referring myself to the judges of the land: I durst refer myself to his Highness's own counsel, that if they will say that this particular that I have urged, that this is a lawful judicature, I will go on.

Ld. Pres. I am required by the Court, before I enter your refusal, to require your Answer.

Hewet. I am in a great dispute, and I pray God direct me what to do in this case; though I do not at all dispute my own innocency, which I hope I shall clear; yet I could petition again (though I am tedious to you, that I can never importune enough) to take into your thoughts yourselves and posterity, and all the people of England.

Ld. Pres. I shall desire, because you may see what I say comes from the act of parliament, I shall desire the words may be read to him, what is to be done, if he refuse to answer.—Clerk, read the Clause.

‘oath (which the said respective Commissioners are hereby authorised to administer) and thereupon, or upon confession of the party, or in default of such answer, to proceed to conviction and final Sentence, as in cases of High-Treason, and Misprision of Treason, according to justice and the merits of the cause; and such final Sentence to execute, or cause to be executed, speedily and impartially.’]

Hewet. My lord, this is a printed paper which is called an Act of Parliament—

Ld. Pres. I must take you off, you have been required to answer, often required; and having refused, in the name of the Court I require the Clerk to record it; and pray take away your prisoner.

Hewet. My lord—

Court. Take him away, take him away.

Dr. Hewet had prepared a Plea and Demurrer to the jurisdiction and proceedings of the Court, and Exceptions to their Judgment, drawn up in form by counsel, which was ready engrossed, and which he designed to have tendered the Court, had he not plainly perceived their peremptory resolution to overrule him:

THE PLEA AND DEMURRER of John Hewet, Doctor of Divinity, to the Jurisdiction and Proceedings of the Commissioners in pursuance of an Act for the Security of the Lord Protector's Person, &c. and to the Sentence of Death pronounced against him by them.

This Defendant saith, That he is by birth a Freeman of England, and that it is the undoubted antient inseparable Birth-right, Privilege, and Inheritance of every English Freeman, both by the Common Laws, Franchises, Great Charters, Statutes, and Usages of this land, ratified from age to age by the Votes, Resolutions, Declarations, Judgments of the High Court of Parliament, and other public Courts of Justice, the Oaths of the Kings of England and their Justices, and by many other solemn public Confirmations, Protestations, Oaths, Vows and Covenants: (a) ‘That no Freeman of England may or ought to be taken or imprisoned, or disseized, or disinherited of his freehold, liberties, or free customs; or be outlawed, exiled, or any way destroyed, passed upon, dealt with or forejudged of life or limb, or put to death, upon any accusation whatsoever, but by the lawful Judgment of his Peers, or by the Law of the Land; and that he shall not be put to answer without presentment before the justices, or thing of record, or by due process of the law, or by Writ Original, according to the old Law of the Land; (b) And that all

Parl. n. 47, the Commons petitioned the King, and Lords, ‘That the Constable and Marshal of England’ (then encroaching upon this privilege of the Commons, by holding pleas of Treason and Felony before them after the course of Martial Law) might from thenceforth surcease to hold places of Treason and Felony before them, done within the realm, and that the same may be determined only before the King's Justices, according to the Great Charter; which was then assented to: and that upon the like Petitions of the Commons in the Parliaments of 1 H. 4, and 2 H. 4, Rot. Parl. n. 89, it was assented to, and enacted by the King and Lords, ‘That the King's liege people (d) should not be put to answer before the Constable or Marshal in courts of Chivalry, for any thing done within the realm, but that (as before in the times of his progenitors) the same might be tried and determined only before his Justices in his Courts, as it ought to be according to the common law of law of the realm, and in no other place or manner.’ Upon which considerations many of the King's loyal lords, gentlemen and other subjects in the general insurrection of the villains, and other rebels against the King, in the fifth year of Richard the second, having inflicted divers punishments upon the said villains and traitors without due process of the law, and otherwise than the laws and usages of the realm required; though they did it out of no malice prepensed, but out of mere loyalty to the King, and to appease and cease the present mischief, and out of ignorance of the said laws and usage, in which if they had been learned, yet at that time they ought not to have tarried the process of the law in those punishments of their good discretion; yet those punishments and executions of them, in a summary way being contrary to, and not warranted by the laws and usages of the realm, they were enforced for their future indemnity against the King and his heirs, and the heirs, wives and friends, of those they punished, to petition the King and Parliament, for a general Pardon by Act of Parliament, to secure and indemnity themselves; which was granted them, in 5 R. 2, Parl. 1, ch. 5. else they might have been impeached and punished for the same, as well as king Richard the second himself; who in the Parliament of 1 H. 4, Rot. Parl. n. 44, (wherein he was enforced to resign his crown, and then deposed for his misgovernment) was amongst other Articles impeached of this in particular by that parliament, 'for that against the Great Charter (ch. 29.) and his Coronation Oath, he suffered many of his liege people to be maliciously accused, apprehended, imprisoned, and tried before the Constable and Marshal of England in their military Court, for words secretly spoken, or acts privately done, to the scandal of his royal person, where they were enforced to acquit themselves by duel; whence the destruction not only of the nobles and great men, but likewise of all and every the persons of the Commons of the realm might probably have ensued.' And this Defendant further saith, that one Peter Burchet of the Temple, in the thirteenth year of queen Elizabeth's reign, having wilfully stabbed that famous sea-captain John Hawkins, for not being of his opinion in religion, (Burchet being persuaded in conscience that it was lawful for him to kill every one who was not of his opinion) the queen being much incensed against him for this horrid fact, commanded him to be forthwith tried and executed for it by Martial Law: But her Judges and Council informing her, 'That he could not be so tried by Law, it being done not in an Army, but in time of peace, when her Courts of Law and Justice were open;' thereupon she desisted from this way of trial; After which he was tried according to law for this, and his murdering his keeper in the Tower, as Mr. Camden records in his Annals of queen Elizabeth, p. 242, 243. And whereas in the parliament of the fourth of king James holden at Westminster, there was some kind of motion made; 'That to extirpate and reform the inveterate evil customs, disorders, feuds, blood-sheds, thefts and spoils, wherewith the worst sort of inhabitants near the Borders and Limits of both realms of England and Scotland, were infected and inured, that they might be tried by a Summary Proceedings, by way of Martial Law, or by the laws of the kingdom into which they fled to purchase their impunity:' This parliament was so far from approving thereof, that they specially enacted, in this case (even of these worst sort of men) 'That* in regard of some difference and inequality in the laws, trials, and proceedings in cases of life, between the justice of the realm of England and that of the realm of Scotland, it appearing to be be most convenient for the contentment and satisfaction of all his majesty's subjects, to proceed with all possible severity against such offenders in their own country, according to the laws of the of the same whereunto they are born and inheritable; and by and before the natural born subjects of the same realm; by whom their murders, felonies, rapes, &c. should be inquired of, heard and determined before his majesty's Justices of Assize, or Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, or Gaol Delivery, by good and lawful men of the three countries therein specified, and none other. And that at all such trials the jury then and there sworn, shall have in their power and election, according to their conscience and discretion upon their oaths, to receive and admit only such sufficient good and lawful witnesses upon their oaths, either for or against the party arraigned, as shall not appear to them, or the greater part of them, to be unfit and unworthy to be witnesses in that cause, either in regard of their hatred and malice, or their favour and affection either to the party prosecuting, or to the party arraigned, or of their former evil life and conversation.' Which common equal, indifferent justice allowed to the worst malefactors, as their Birth-right and Inheritance by this Parliament and Act, this Defendant now only craves, and hopes you cannot in law or justice deny him; nor proceed against him by way of Martial Law. And so much the rather, because since this statute, king Charles in the third year of his reign, by the advice of his Council (to suppress the insolencies of Soldiers and Mariners then billeted in sundry parts of the realm) having issued out Commissions to sundry persons of quality, in time of peace, 'To execute Martial Law upon those Soldiers and Mariners, and other dissolute persons (only) joining with them, for murder, robbery, felony, mutiny, and other outrages committed by them, by such summary course and order as is agreeable to Martial Law, and as is usual in armies in time of war; to proceed to the trial and condemnation of such offenders, and then to cause them to be executed and put to death, according to the Law Martial; By pretext whereof some of the said soldiers and subjects were put to death by some of the said Commissioners, when and where, if by the laws and statutes of the land they had deserved death, by the same laws and statutes also they might; and by no other ought to have been judged, (before the king's justices) and executed.' Upon complaint of these Commissions, as illegal, in the Parliament of 3 Caroli, they were, after a full debate by both Houses, voted to be against law. And in the Petition of Right itself, it was then prayed by the Lords and Commons, assented to by the late beheaded King himself, and enacted by this law, 'That hereafter no Commissions of like nature may issue forth to any person or persons whatsoever, to be executed as aforesaid, lest by colour of them any of his ' Majesty's subjects be destroyed or put to death, contrary to the laws and franchise of the land: which the Lords and Commons then prayed, and the King granted, confirmed by Act of Parliament, ' as their right and liberty according to the laws: ' which Act stands yet in its full force. Upon consideration of which late excellent law, the last long Parliament, in the cases of the lord Connor Maguire and Mac-mohun, and the Court of King's Bench wherein they were tried by their special order, in Michaelmas and Hilary Terms 20 Caroli, were so just, punctual and honourable, in confining themselves to the rules of law and justice; that though these were principal conspirators, and actors in the late most horrid, barbarous, bloody Treason, Rebellion, and Massacre in Ireland, and taken in its prosecution; yet they were so far from trying them by Martial Law in a Council of War, or High Court of Justice, even in a time of open war both in England and Ireland, that they assigned the said Maguire counsel, to argue against the very jurisdiction of the King's Bench itself; Whether he, being a Peer of Ireland, could in point of law or justice by the statute of 35 H. 8, ch. 2, or any other Act, be outed of his Trial by his Peers, and tried by a Jury of good and lawful men of the county of Middlesex for a Treason committed in Ireland, being sent a prisoner from thence against his will? Which was there (e) publicly argued at the bar by counsel pro et contra; and then by the Judges, and over-ruled at last against him, before he was put to plead Guilty or Not Guilty to his Indictment: after which they both were admitted to take both their peremptory and legal Challenges to the Juries returned; (f) (according to law, admitting such Challenges even in cases of High Treason;) and all just exceptions to the witnesses produced; and had a most fair and free Trial; being found Guilty by the Jury, before any Judgment passed against them. Which justice he humbly craves in his case, of less heinousness and importance than theirs, being a native English Freeman, and they only Irish rebels; because this his inherent Birthright and Liberty, can (g) neither be forfeited by him for any real or pretended Treason or Offence whatsoever, nor yet be denied or deferred to him (after all the premised laws, statutes, charters, judgments, resolutions, precedents) without the highest injustice. And he further saith, that to proceed against, try, condemn, execute him in this High Court, without a legal Indictment, Presentment, and Trial by the Oaths of twelve good and lawful men, according to the due order and course of the common laws of this realm (and that in Westminster-hall itself, the place of law and public justice, in time of peace, when and where all other Courts of Justice are open) or in any other form by way of Martial Law, or otherwise than a just Jury of his equals, is not only illegal, erroneous, and against all rules of justice (the Commissioners themselves being both his grand and petty Jury, and his Judges likewise; if not parties interested, to whom he can take no peremptory nor legal Challenges, which the (h) law allows him if tried by a Jury in cases of High Treason at this day;) but also wilful and malicious Murder by the laws of England, being against Magna Charta, c. 29, and done by such power and strength as he this Defendant cannot defend himself against, as is resolved in sir Edward Coke's 3 Instit. p. 52, and 224, (printed by special Order of the House of Commons, dated 12 May, 1641,) and long before in Andrew Horn his Mirrour of Justices, c. 5, p. 296, 297, who records, that our noble king Alfred caused no less than 44 of his Justices to be hanged in one year as Murderers, for condemning and executing some of his people without a legal Indictment and Trial by a sworn Jury; and others of them for offences not capital by the known Laws of the Land, and without clear and pregnant Evidence. And this Defendant likewise saith, that the Commons themselves sitting at Westminster, after the late king's execution, in their printed Declaration of 17 Martii, 1619, (expressing the grounds of their proceedings against the said king, and for settling the present Government in way of a Free State, to which many in present power and sitting here were assenting and gave their Votes) did thereby faithfully promise and engage to the whole English nation, ' That the good old laws and ' customs of England, the Badges of our Freedom, (the benefit whereof our ancestors enjoyed long before the Conquest, and spent much of their blood to have confirmed by the ' great Charters of their Liberties) which have ' continued in all former changes, and being ' duly executed, are the most just, free, and ' equal of any other laws in the world; shall be ' duly continued and maintained; the liberty, ' property, and peace of the subject being so ' fully preserved by them;' adding, that, ' If ' these laws should be taken away, all industry ' must cease, all misery, blood and confusion would follow; and greater calamities, if ' possible, than fell upon us by the late king's ' misgovernment, would certainly involve all persons, under which they must inevitably perish.' And moreover, the General Council of the Officers and Army themselves (whereunto most officers and soldiers in present power and some Commissioners here sitting were parties) in the Declaration of their engagements, remonstrances, representations, proposals, desires, and resolutions for settling the Parliament in their just privileges, and the subjects in their liberties and freedoms (printed by their own Orders, and reprinted all together by Order of the Lords in Parliament, 27 September, 1647) pag. 11, 36, 37, 38, 39, (especially in their Declaration and Representation tendered to the Parliament concerning the just and fundamental Rights and Liberties of the Kingdom, 14 May, 1647) do profess and declare, 'That they were 'not a mere mercenary Army, hired to serve 'any arbitrary power of state, but called forth 'and conjured by several Declarations of Parliament, to the defence of their own and the 'peoples' just rights and liberties, and that they 'took up arms in judgment and conscience to 'those ends, and have so continued them, and 'are resolved, according to the Parliament's 'just desires in their declarations, and such 'principles as they have received from their 'frequent informations, and their own common 'sense concerning those fundamental rights and 'liberties, to assert and vindicate the same 'against all arbitrary power, violence and oppression, and against all particular parties and 'interests whatsoever; that so all the free-born 'people of this nation may sit down in quiet 'under the glorious administration of justice 'and righteousness, and in full possession of 'those fundamental rights and liberties; without which we can have little hopes (as to human considerations) to enjoy any comfort of 'life, or so much as life itself, but at the pleasure of some men ruling according to will and 'power. That they desire the establishment of 'such good laws, as may duly and readily render 'to every man their just rights and liberties.' And more particularly, in their Proposals to the Commissioners of Parliament, in order to the clearing and securing of the rights and liberties of the kingdom, Aug. 1, 1647, s. 10, p. 114, they proposed, 'That the rights and liberties of the 'Commons of England, may be cleared and vindicated from any other judgment, sentence, or 'proceeding against them, other than by their 'equals, or according to the law of the land.' And this Defendant finally saith, that by the Instrument of Government itself, 16 December 1653, Artic. 6, and the Oath therein prescribed to, and accordingly taken by his highness, Oliver Cromwell Lord Protector, he is limited and sworn, 'not to alter, suspend, abrogate or repeal the laws, and to govern these nations according to the laws, statutes and customs; 'causing justice and law to be equally administered: whereunto he is likewise obliged and 'sworn again, by his Oath prescribed in the 'late printed Humble Petition and Advice.' Neither doth that pretended Act, by which you here sit as Commissioners to try this Defendant (made by no legitimate, nor free Parliament of England, and that when near one hundred and fifty members thereof were causelessly and forcibly secluded) authorize you (as he humbly conceiveth) to proceed against him for any crime therein specified, to conviction or final sentence, but only as in cases of High Treason, and Misprision of Treason, and according to justice; and that you cannot do but only by proceeding against him by a lawful Indictment and Trial by a Grand and Petty Jury, according to the Great Charter, Laws, and Statutes of the Land, and the late Petition of Right, which this new Act cannot repeal or null. All which this Defendant is ready to aver, justify, and make good, when and where this High Commission Court, or his highness the Lord Protector shall appoint: which being a mere matter of law, wherein both the liberties and lives of all the free-born people of England are so universally, highly, and equally concerned, as well as the liberty and life of this Defendant, proper only to be debated before, and resolved by the Judges of the Law or the High Court of Parliament; This Defendant thereupon humbly prayeth, That it may be referred to, openly argued by his learned Counsel, before all the Judges, or a Parliament, and by them determined; and in the mean time humbly demandeth the judgment of this High Commission; Whether they may, can, or ought in point of law and justice, to proceed against, condemn, or execute this Defendant, upon any illegal Accusation or Impeachment whatsoever, here exhibited or read against him, without a legal Indictment, Presentment and Trial by a Jury of his Equals; Or can take any further cognisance of the Charge against him, for the premised authorities and reasons; which he in all humility referreth to, and imploreth you to take into your saddest considerations, and that in the name and dreadful presence of the Omniscient, Omnipotent, Sovereign 'Judge of all the earth,' (Gen. xviii, 25.) 'before whose glorious tribunal you must all 'ere long appear' (stript of all earthly honours, pomp, guards, and power,) 'to give a strict account of all your actions, whether good or 'evil,' (2 Cor. v. 10.) and of your proceedings in this very cause; when this his Plea and Demurrer will rise up in judgment against, and condemn you in case you wilfully prejudge, misjudge, or reject it now, without due and full examination according to law, justice, conscience: And if the consideration of this terrible Day of Account and just Retribution before Christ's own Tribunal, shall not prevail with you to admit of this his Legal Plea and Demurrer, (as being after your deaths perhaps many years yet to come, and no ways endangering the loss of your lives, lands, honours or estates in this present world,) he shall then humbly intreat you for your own future indemnity (he hopes, without offence) seriously to consider, That in the Parliament of 11 R. 2, c. 1, 5, 21 R. 2, c. 11, 12. Tresilian Chief Justice of the King's Bench, Belknappe, Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, John Care, John Holt, Roger Fulthorpe, William de Burgh, Judges, and John Locton the King's Serjeant, were all impeached of High-Treason, condemned, and some of them executed as traitors and enemies to the king and realm, the rest perpetually banished, their lands and estates confiscated to the king, and all access of their wives, children or others to them during their exile, prohibited by Judgment and Act of Parliament, only for delivering their opinions, through menaces and fear of death at Nottingham Castle, under their hands and seals, against the Law of the Land; that the Lords and Commons who procured the Commission in the Parliament of 10 R. 2, for the better government of the realm, and moved the King to consent thereto, deserved to be punished as traitors, by capital pain of death*. That so by colour of these their opinions, Robert de Veer duke of Ireland, Nicholas Brambre, knight, and others of the King's ill counsellors, might take occasion to destroy and take away the lives of the lords who procured and executed that Commission, and others of the king's people, by undue and illegal Indictments and Proceedings, without any lawful Trial by their Peers as traitors to the king. And the said Sir (i) Nicholas Brambre for enforcing the Judges, with others of the King's ill counsellors to deliver their opinions against law, and for his beheading and executing 22 prisoners of Newgate impeached and indicted of felony, (or suspicion of felony) at Foul-Hoke in Kent by regal and tyrannical power incroached by him, without warrant, or due process of the law, against the Great Charter and usage of the realm of England, was in the same parliament condemned for High-Treason, and beheaded at Tower-hill on the same block, with the same ax he had prepared to cut of the heads of others he intended there to execute as his enemies. And that in the last parliament of king Charles, the two Chief Justices, Brampton and Finch, the Chief Baron Davenport, and all the rest of the Judges and Barons, except two, were by the whole house of commons, and some of the commissioners here sitting, and counsel pleading against this Defendant, impeached of High-Treason, dis-judged and put to fines and ransoms, for that they had traitorously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental Laws and Government of the realm of England, and instead thereof to introduce an Arbitrary and Tyrannical Government against law; which they had declared by traitorous words, opinions and judgments in the case of Ship-Money, against Mr. John Hampden; Which Judgment and Opinions concerned only the property of the subjects goods, not the hazard of their lives, inheritances and forfeiture of their estates, as your present proceedings do, being of a more high and dangerous consequence; In which parliament, by the like Impeachment and Prosecution, William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Thomas Earl of Strafford Lord Deputy of Ireland, were condemned and executed by Judgment of Parliament, and some here present, as 'Traitors, guilty of High-Treason, for that they endeavoured traitorously to subvert the Fundamental Laws and established Government of this Realm, and instead thereof to bring in and set up an Arbitrary and Tyrannical Power, against Law. To prove which Charge, their arbitrary proceedings contrary to the Laws and Great Charters of England, both at the Council Table, in the High-Commission, Star-Chamber, and elsewhere, were given in evidence against them; and more particularly, the Earl of Strafford's proceeding against the Lord Mount Norris in Ireland, by a Council of War, in time of peace, and condemning him to Death therein without any legal Indictment and Trial by his Peers against the Great Charter and Laws of the Land, though he did not execute him thereupon: And whether your present Proceedings of like nature against this Defendant, in case you reject or over-rule this his Plea and Demurrer, and condemn and execute him by pretext of an illegal Act (made by no free and lawful Parliament of England,) for offences not treasonable by the known laws and statutes of the land, nor legally proved against him by any one witness produced in Court before his face, without consulting the present Judges of the Land (who refuse to join or sit with you in this new illegal way of trial) will not much more involve you in the crime and guilt of the very self-same High Treasons, for which they were thus anciently and lately impeached, condemned, executed by Judgment of Parliament, and so expose you to the like capital censures, forfeitures, confiscations of your real and personal estates, as they underwent, in future Parliaments, by your endeavouring to subvert all the premised Fundamental Laws and established legal proceedings in the land, and to introduce and set up a mere Arbitrary and Tyrannical Power, contrary to law, to the endangering not only of the properties, but lives, liberties, and inheritances of all the noblemen, gentlemen, clergymen, and other freemen of England, by such exorbitant, martial proceedings, after all these statutes, judgments, with the late Remonstrances, Declarations, Leagues, Covenants, and solemn Oaths of the Lord Protector himself and others against them, yea after the many years wars and heavy taxes imposed on the nation for the maintaining an inviolable preservation of these fundamental laws, liberties, and rights against all Arbitrary Commissions and Proceedings whatsoever; he humbly submits to your own impartial resolutions and consciences. And thereupon this Defendant prays his dismissal from any such further proceedings against him, without a lawful Jury and Trial by his Peers. And that you will be pleased, after deliberate consideration of the premises, to reverse and recal that arbitrary, unrighteous, bloody Sentence of Death, ye have newly passed against him, without any lawful Indictment, Presentment, Trial, Confession or Conviction of Treason, which strikes at the root of the Fundamental Laws, Liberties, Franchises of all English Freemen, and cuts off all their necks at one stroke, transcending all the arbitrary, tyrannical proceedings of Strafford, Canterbury, and the late king Charles (whom some of yourselves have impeached, censured, condemned, decapitated as the very worst, and greatest of Tyrants,) lest it become a most pernicious fatal precedent to posterity, to others, or your own destruction, and render you as execrable to all succeeding generations, as any formerly guilty of the like exorbitant proceedings.

Just and legal EXCEPTIONS to the Cause and Manner of the Illegal Judgment given against Dr. John Hewet; humbly tendered by him to the consideration of those Commissioners who denounced it.

That it is specially enacted by the Statute of Westminster the 1, ch. 12. and accordingly resolved in Brook Pain 1, 2, 4, 5, 8, 9, 12, 13, 14, 15, 19, and the Year-Books therein abridged, by Stamford's Pleas of the Crown, l. 2. c. 60. Dyer, f. 205. a. 300. b. Coke's 2 Institutes, p. 177, 178, 179. and 3 Institutes, p. 217. 'That no man ought by law to be condemned, or put to death in case of treason and felony, for standing mute or refusing to plead, or put himself open his trial, or for challenging more than 36 of the jury peremptorily; but only in these cases.'

1. When and where the person accused and arraigned, is a (a) notorious traitor or felon, and openly of evil name, and defamed thereof: But Dr. Hewet is no such person.

2. When and where the treason or felony for which he stands accused, is (b) notorious, evident, certain, or at least very probable, and already found upon oath against him by the presentment, or indictment of an honest lawful Grand Jury, of his equals of the same county wherein he is arraigned, or confessed by himself: all which circumstances and evidences of guilt were wanting in Dr. Hewet's Case.

3. When and where the judges, (c) for the better satisfaction of their consciences, and discharge of their duties, do (as they ought by law,) first openly examine the evidences and witnesses, which prove the person arraigned guilty of the fact of treason or felony for which he stands indicted, before they proceed to give judgment against him for not pleading, or standing mute. Which was not done in this Case, there being neither witnesses nor evidence produced in open Court to prove him guilty.

4. When and where there is a legal Indictment found against the party arraigned, which being read openly to him in Court, the traitor or felon thereupon doth either (d) wilfully or maliciously stand mute, refusing to answer or plead thereunto, (which the (e) jury there im-pannelled to try him, are by law to enquire of, find and return upon oath:) Or, peremptorily challengeth above 35 of his jury, without any legal cause or exceptions; or else obstinately (f) refuseth to put himself upon a legal trial by God and his country, (being a jury of honest and lawful men of the county then and there present, (g) returned by the sheriff alone, not justices or others, for to try him: to whom by law he may take both his legal and peremptory challenges) saying, that he will be tried only by God and the Bench; or, by God and the Court, or judge; or (h) by God and the Virgin Mary, or Holy Church: there being no precedent extant in records, or law-books, of any traitor or felon hitherto condemned to die, for standing mute, or not pleading, only for refusing to be tried by God and the honourable Bench, judges, Court alone, without any indictment or jury; and for earnestly importuning the Court and his judges, that he may be tried only by God and his country, and on an Indictment by a jury of his equals according to law, casting himself wholly upon such a trial, after a lawful presentment and Indictment first found against him by a jury. The only reason rendered in and by the forecited statute and law-books of all judgments hitherto given against any traitor or felon, for standing mute, and refusing to plead, being this, (i) 'Because he peremptorily refuseth to stand to and be tried by the law of the land, and a due and lawful trial by a jury of his equals, according to the course of the common-law, and the great Charter.' But Dr. John Hewet is now condemned to be executed as a traitor by the High Court of Justice, 'contrary to all former precedents, statutes, law-books, and the only legal reason in former times of all judgments rendered against any persons in such cases;' even for his frequent, earnest, importunate demanding and peremptory casting of himself, upon a due legal trial by God and his country, and an indifferent jury of his equals, according to the common statute laws and Great Charter of England, after a legal presentment and Indictment to be first found against him: and for refusing to waive this his legal trial (to the public prejudice of all other English freemen) and, 'cast himself wholly and solely upon a new kind of arbitrary trial, contrary to law, by God and the Bench, Court, and the commissioners themselves, (who would be both his Grand and Petty Jury, as well as Judges) without and before any legal presentment, Indictment, or jury impanelled or returned to try him.' Therefore he humbly conceives this Judgment denounced against him upon this reason and ground alone, to be most erroneous, illegal, unjust, repugnant to all former precedents, and to one this very week at the sessions in the Old-Bailey by judgment of some of his judges at Westminster, and of very dangerous consequence. Whereupon he humbly prays the suspension and reversal thereof as unjust, and merely void in law, by the statutes of 25 E. 1, cap. 2, and 42 E. 3, c. 1, lest the execution of him for a traitor upon this judgment and ground, should prove wilful murder, and a shedding of innocent blood in the account both of God and man.

What therefore the prophet Jeremiah alleged to the Princes of Judah, in a like case, when they resolved him at first to be worthy of death, without a legal hearing or trial, Jerem. xxvi. 11, 14, 15. 'As for me, behold, I am in your hands, to do unto me what seemeth good and meet unto you: but know ye for certain, that if ye put me to death, ye shall surely bring innocent blood upon yourselves, and upon this city, and upon the inhabitants thereof:' whereupon the princes and people, upon second and better advised thoughts, altered their former bloody sentence, saying: 'This man is not worthy to die; for he hath spoken unto us in the name of the Lord our God. And the band of Ahikam was with Jeremiah, that they should not give him into the hand of the people to put him to death;' shall be my allegation to those who have passed this unjust sentence of death against me; and if it produce not the like effect for their reversal thereof, and my preservation from its violent bloody execution, as it did in this prophet's case; I shall then earnestly pray to God, that it may not draw down from heaven that heavy sentence of wrath upon them, nor that sad judgment upon the whole land of England which this prophet denounced against Jehoiakim, Jer. xxii. 17, 18, 19, 'But thine eyes and thine heart are but for thy covetousness, and for to shed innocent blood, and for oppression and violence to do it. Therefore thus saith the Lord concerning Jehoiakim; they shall not lament for him, saying, ah my brother, or ah sister, ah Lord, or ah his glory: but he shall be buried with the burial of an ass drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem.' And that which the prophet Joel threatened to Egypt and Edom, Joel iii. 19. 'Egypt shall be a desolation, and Edom a desolate wilderness, for their violence against the children of Judah, because they have shed innocent blood in the land.' And that against all rules of law and justice, in that they intitle, the High Court of Justice, which will not palliate,* but aggravate the injustice acted in it, and make it more detestable both to man and God himself, who avers this for an undoubted truth;

204. The Trial of JOHN MORDANT, esq. before the High Court of Justice, for High-Treason: 10 CHARLES II.* the 1st of June, A. D. 1658.

THE Serjeant at Arms was commanded to bring John Mordant, esq. to the bar, who was brought accordingly.

* Mordant's name occurs prominently in some of the Examinations respecting this Plot which are published in the 7th volume of Thurloe's State Papers.

"There was a young gentleman, John Mordant, the younger son, and brother, of the earls of Peterborough; who having been too young to be engaged in the late war, during which time he had his education in France and Italy, was now of age, of parts, and great vigour of mind, and newly married to a young beautiful lady of a very loyal spirit, and notable vivacity of wit and humour, who concurred with him in all honourable dedications of himself. He resolved to embrace all opportunities to serve the king, and to dispose those upon whom he had influence, to take the same resolution; and being allied to the marquis of Ormonde, he did by him inform his majesty of his resolution, and his readiness to receive any commands from him. This was many months before the marquis's journey into England.

"Mr. Stapley was well known to Mr. Mordant, who had represented his affections to the king, and how useful he might be towards the possessing some place in Sussex, and his undertaking that he would do so, by a letter to the king, under Mr. Stapley's own hand: and thereupon Mr. Mordant desired, that his majesty would send a commission for the command of a regiment of horse to him; which he would provide, and cause to be ready, against the season he should be required to appear; which commission, with many others, was sent to Mr. Mordant; and he delivered it to Mr. Stapley; who was exceedingly pleased with it, renewed all his vows and protestations; and it is still believed that he really meant all he pretended. But he had trusted some servant, who betrayed him; and being thereupon sent for by Cromwell, his father's fast old friend, was by him so cajoled by promises and by threats, that he was not able to withstand him; but believing that he knew already all that he asked him, he concealed nothing that he knew himself; informed him of those of the same country who were to join with him; of whom some had likewise received commissions, as well as himself; and in the end he confessed, 'that he had received his commission from Mr. Mordant's own hand.' Before this discovery Mr. Mordant had been sent for by Cromwell, and very strictly examined, whether he had seen the marquis of Ormond during his late being in London; which, though he had done often, he very confidently and positively denied, being well assured that it could not be proved, and that the marquis himself was in safety: upon which confident denial, he was dismissed to return to his own lodging. But upon this discovery by Stapley, he was within two days after sent for again, and committed close prisoner to the Tower; and new men were every day sent for, and committed in all quarters of the kingdom; and within some time after, a High Court of Justice was erected for the trial of the prisoners, the crimes of none being yet discovered; which put all those who knew how liable they themselves were, under a terrible consternation.

"Before this High Court of Justice, of which John Lisle, who gave his vote in the king's blood, and continued an entire confident and instrument of Cromwell's, was president; there were first brought to be tried, John Mordant; sir Harry Slingsby, a gentleman of a very ancient family, and of a very ample fortune in Yorkshire; and Dr. Hewet, an eminent preacher in London, and very orthodox, to whose church those of the king's party frequently resorted, and few but those. These three were totally unacquainted with each other; and though every one of them knew enough against himself, they could not accuse one another, if they had been inclined to it. The first and the last could not doubt but that there would be evidence enough against them; and they had found means to correspond so much together, as to resolve that neither of them would plead to the impeachment, but demur to the jurisdiction of the Court, and desire to have counsel assigned to argue against it in point of law; they being both sufficiently instructed, how to urge law enough to make it evident that neither of them could be legally tried by that Court, and that it was erected contrary to law. The first that was brought to trial, was Mr. Mordant. After his arraignment, by which he found that the delivery of the commission to Stapley would be principally insisted on, and which he knew might too easily be proved, he, according to former resolution, refused to plead not-guilty; but insisted, 'that by the law of the land he ought not to be tried by that Court;' for which he gave more reasons than they could answer; and then desired, 'that his counsel might have liberty to argue the point in law; which of course used to be granted in all legal Courts. But he was told, 'that he was better to bethink himself; that they were well satisfied in the legality of their Court, and would not suffer the jurisdiction of it to be disputed; that the law of England had provided a sentence for such obstinate persons as refused to be tried by it; which was, that they should be condemned as mutes; which would be his case,' if he continued refractory: so he was carried back to the Tower, to consider better what he would do the next day. Sir Harry Slingsby was called next. He knowing nothing of, or for the other resolution, pleaded not-guilty; and so was sent to the prison to be tried in his turn. Dr. Hewet, whose greatest crime was collecting and sending money to the king, besides having given money to some officers, refused to plead, as Mr. Mordant had done, and demanded that his counsel might be heard; and received the same answer, and admonition, that the other had done; and was remitted again to prison.

"Those courts seldom consisted of fewer than twenty judges; amongst whom, there were usually some, who, out of pity or for money, were inclined to do good offices to the prisoners who came before them; at least to communicate such secrets to them, as might inform them what would be most pressed against them. Mr. Mordant's lady had, by giving money, procured some in the number to be very propitious to her husband: and in the evening of that day the trial had been begun, she received two very important advices from them. The one, 'that she should prevail with her husband to plead; then his friends might do him some service: whereas, if he insisted upon the point of law, he would infallibly suffer, and no man durst speak for him.' The other, 'that they had no sufficient proof to condemn him upon any particular with which he stood charged, but only for the delivery of the commission to Stapley; and that there was to that point, besides Stapley, one colonel Mallory, whose testimony was more valued than the others.' This Mallory had the reputation of an honest man, and loved Mr. Mordant very well, and was one of those who were principally trusted in the business of Sussex, and had been apprehended about the same time that Stapley was; and finding, upon his first Examination, by the questions administered to him by Thurlow, that all was discovered, he unwarily confessed all that he knew concerning Mr. Mordant;

A Charge of High-Treason against John Mordant of Clement Danes, in the County of Middlesex, Esq. as followeth, viz.

"That John Mordant, late of the parish of Clement Danes, in the said county of Middlesex, esq. having been himself the person principally employed between him and Stapley. He was brought in custody from the Tower, to give in evidence against Mr. Mordant, with an intention in the Court, after he had done that good service, to proceed as strictly against himself, though they promised him indemnity.

"The lady, having clear information of this whole matter, could not find any way that might to advertise her husband, that he should no more insist upon the want of jurisdiction in the Court. For there was no possibility of speaking with, or sending to him, during the time of his trial. Therefore she laid aside the thought of that business till the morning, and passed the night in contriving how Mallory might be prevailed with to make an escape; and was so dextrous, and so fortunate, that a friend of hers disposed the money she gave him so effectually, that the next morning, when Mallory was brought to the hall to be ready to give in his evidence, he found some means to withdraw from his guard, and when he was in the crowd he easily got away.

"She had as good fortune likewise to have a little note she writ concerning the other advice, put into her husband's hand, as he passed to the bar; which having perused, he departed from his former resolution; and after he had modestly urged the same again which he had done the day before, to spend time, and the President, in much choler, answering as he had done, he submitted to his trial; and behaved himself with courage; and easily evaded the greatest part of the evidence they had against him; nor could they find proof, what presumption soever there might be, that he had spoken with the marquis of Ormond; and he evaded many other particulars of his correspondence with the king, with notable address. That of the commission of Stapley was reserved to the last; and the commission being produced, and both the hand and the signet generally known, by reason of so many of the like, which had fallen into their hands at Worcester, and by many other accidents, Mr. Stapley was called to declare where he had it; and seeing himself confronted by Mr. Mordant, though he did, after many questions and reproaches from the counsel that prosecuted, at last confess that he did receive it from Mr. Mordant; yet he did it in so disorderly and confused a manner, that it appeared he had much rather not have said it; and answered the questions Mr. Mordant asked him with that confusion, that his evidence could not be satisfactory to any impartial judges. Then Mallory was called for; but by no search could be found; and they could not, by their own rules, defer their sentence. And it so fell out by one of the judges withdrawing upon a sudden fit of the stone, that the Court was divided, one half for the condemning him, and the other half that he was not Guilty; whereupon the determination depended upon the single vote of the President; who made some excuses for the justice he was about to do, and acknowledged many obligations to the mother of the prisoner, and, in contemplation thereof, pronounced him innocent for ought appeared to the Court. There was not in Cromwell's time the like instance; and scarce any other man escaped the judgment, that was tried before any High Court of Justice." ["Echard affirms that there is not the like instance of acquitting a prisoner by a High Court of Justice, as that of Mordant; what does he take the earl of Norwich and Sir John Owen to be?" Oldmixon.] And he was so offended at it, that, contrary to all the forms used by themselves, he caused him to be kept for some months after in the Tower, and would willingly have brought him to be tried again. For, within a day or two after, Mallory was retaken, and they had likewise corrupted a Frenchman, who had long served him, and was the only servant whom he had made choice of (since he was to be allowed but one) to attend him in the prison: and he had discovered enough to have taken away his life several ways. But the scandal was so great, and the case so unheard of, that any man, discharged upon a public trial, should be again proceeded against upon new evidence for the same offence, that Cromwell himself thought not fit to undergo the reproach of it, but was in the end prevailed with to set him at liberty. And he was very few days at liberty, before he embarked himself as frankly in the king's service as before, and with better success." Clarendon.

And afterwards the noble Historian, in relating the measures taken for effecting the Restoration of Charles the second, says:

"Mr. Mordant, who had so lately his head upon the block, was more active than any man; and was so well trusted by men of all conditions, upon the courage of his former behaviour, that he had in truth very full engagements from very good men in most quarters of the kingdom, 'that if the king would assign them a day, and promise to come to them after they were embodied, they would not fail to appear at the day.' Whereupon, Mr. Mordant ventured himself to come in disguise to the king to Brussels, to give him a clear account how his business stood, and what probability there was of success, and likewise to complain of the want of forwardness in some

Oliver, then and yet Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions thereto belonging, and to this Commonwealth; together with Henry Bishop, late of Parham, in the county of Sussex, gent. Hartgil Baron, and Francis Mansel, and divers others, their complices, at the parish of Clement Danes aforesaid, and at divers other places, did traitorously, advisedly, and maliciously plot, contrive, and endeavour to stir up and raise war against the said Oliver, then and yet Lord Protector of this Commonwealth, and against the government thereof, as the same was established, and to alter and subvert the same; and did also then and there, as well before as after the said 30th of April last past, and after the 10th of October, 1656, traitorously, advisedly, and maliciously declare, publish, and promote Charles Stuart, eldest son of the late king Charles, to be king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, &c. and did then and there traitorously, advisedly, and maliciously hold intelligence and correspondence with the said Charles Stuart. All which said treason and treasons he the said John Mordant, the said 30th of April last, and other the times and places aforesaid, and after the said 10th of October, 1656, at Clement Danes, and other places, did traitorously declare by Overt-Act, that is to say, by conferring with J. Stapley esq. and Henry Mallory, and others, how to effect the same; and did then and there encourage the said John Stapley and Henry Mallory, and others, thereunto; and did deliver Commissions to several persons in the name of, and as from the said Charles Stuart, concerning the raising of forces, and levying war against the said Oliver, then and yet Lord Protector, and against this Commonwealth: All which said treason and treasons are contrary to the statute in that case made and provided. With which said treason and treasons, he the said Attorney-General, for and on the behalf of the said Oliver, then and yet Lord Protector, and on the behalf of the said Commonwealth, as aforesaid, doth charge and impeach the said John Mordant. And the Attorney-General prayeth, That he the said John Mordant may be put to answer; and that such proceedings, trial, and judgment may be had against the said Mordant, as is agreeable to law. And the said Attorney-General doth aver that the said John Mordant of those upon whom the king most relied, to encourage other men, and to desire that his majesty would, by him, require them to concur with the rest. It appeared, by the account he gave, that there were very few counties in England, where there was not a formed undertaking by the most powerful men of that county, to possess themselves of some considerable place in it; and if any of them succeeded, the opportunity would be fairer for the king to venture his own person, than he yet had had, or than he was like to have, if he suffered those who were now in the government, to be settled in it."

is a person by name appointed by his Highness and Council to be proceeded against."

Mr. Phelps. John Mordant, esq. thou standest here charged with High-Treason against his highness the Lord Protector and the Commonwealth. You have heard the Charge read: The Court demands your positive answer thereto, whether Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Mordant. My lord, I desire I may hear the Commission read, by which you sit.

Ld. Pres. You are impeached of high-treason: we require your answer.

Mordant. I desire the Commission may be read, and the Commissioners' names.

Ld. Pres. You are to be tried by the laws of England, act of parliament, and Commission under the great seal of England, in pursuance of that act.

Mordant. I claim it as my right; I am ignorant in law; I desire it may be read.

Ld. Pres. It is not granted to any.

Mordant. My lord, will you take away that liberty, that we shall not know by what Commission we are tried, and who are our judges? I desire I may not be made the first precedent.

Ld. Pres. It is visible who are your judges; they are named by act of parliament: we are your judges.

Mordant. My lord, if the act specify any such thing that it may not be read, I have done. I desire it may be read, that I may have a legal and just proceeding.

Ld. Pres. The act of parliament doth not require it.

Mordant. The Act doth not deny it.

Ld. Pres. You shall have all the privileges that may be: but you must first plead.

Mordant. My lord, I demand this, to hear the Commission read.

Att. Gen. My lord, pray let him know what is done, to warn him, lest he fall into the same condemnation. There was one but a little before you that demanded the same thing, and the Court hath ruled it otherwise; and he hath received his sentence. I tell you of it, that you may beware, and know how to carry yourself. If Mr. Mordant will be pleased to answer whether or no guilty of those crimes, then he shall have a fair trial, and full examination: if otherwise, the same sentence must be required as before; that is, upon refusal, the judgment pronounced for high-treason.

Mordant. My lord, I humbly crave the Act may be read.

Att. Gen. The Act is public; the Court are not to give you an account of their authority, or the way of their proceedings. They require your answer.

Mordant. My lord, shall I not know by what Law I am tried, nor by what Act, nor by what Commission?

Ld. Pres. You seem to be a young gentleman: I wish rather you would plead Not Guilty, or make an ingenuous confession.

Mordant. My lord, this is the first time that I have been before any Court in my life: I desire that my reason may be convinced:

either assign me counsel to argue it with this learned counsel; and if they convince my counsel, I shall submit: or, if this counsel will say the law doth debar me the hearing of the Commission and the Act read to me, I shall refer it to the judges of the law, and by their opinions I will stand or fall.

Att. Gen. My Lord President, you have offered that gentleman very seasonable advice: I wish he may be capable of it. And in these debates, I wish he doth not lose those advantages that are really intended for him. For the Court, it is by act of parliament; and no judicature in England can require an account of their proceedings.

Mordant. My lord, pray give me leave to ask this question, Whether there is any precedent for this?

Att. Gen. By way of advice, I do acquaint you that there is no judicature in England superior to this, but the parliament immediately. You are here impeached of a very high crime, high treason; it may be a strain of youth: the first step to mercy is confession.

Mordant. My lord, I have heard that the judges of the land are the best and proper expositors of the law: and if they declare that this is the sense of the act, I will submit to the Court. If the Court will allow me counsel, I shall submit if my counsel be convinced. I desire to hear the Commission read.

Att. Gen. My lord, this gentleman was a fellow-prisoner with one that went before him; he walks after the same steps: I wish he may not run into the same error. These things were urged by Dr. Hewet, and the Court hath ruled that their authority is sufficient, and therefore, my lord, be pleased that this gentleman may plead.

Mordant. I am over-borne both for jury and counsel: I desire that my reason may be convinced. If this counsel will give it under their hands that this is law by the act of 1656, if you will say under your hands that this is law, that I must be excluded of jury and counsel, and that I must not know the Commission by which I am tried, I will proceed.

Ld. Pres. I am afraid you have received ill advice from others: possibly you know what is become of that prisoner that spake of counsel. We cannot assign you counsel as to matter of fact: the law and act of parliament have made us your judges, and therefore you are to plead.

Mordant. My lord, I desire that that Act may be read, to know whether I am to be excluded of jury and counsel: I refer it to this counsel.

Att. Gen. I doubt the gentleman is in jest: we are here to attend by command of his highness the Lord Protector; these gentlemen are all sworn by act of parliament. It is a little-slighting of the Court, to appeal from the Court to the counsel: but, my lord, I beseech you he may forbear to say he is over-borne. You shall have justice done, if you will plead; if not, there was a Precedent but now.

If you please to put yourself upon the trial, you shall have a fair trial.

Mordant. My lord, convince me by this act that I am to lose the right of jury; I have not heard any reason why I must lose it.

Att. Gen. I do tell you the Court hath given judgment just now in the like case.

Mordant. I ask a precedent for this.

Att. Gen. I tell you a precedent, sir Henry Slingsby and Dr. Hewet.

Mordant. Is it a good precedent? If any give an ill precedent, it is reason I should debate it myself.

Att. Gen. I humbly conceive that this Court is your Court, and you ought to plead it.

Mordant. My lord, I desire I may be heard: the words are, That the respective commissioners, or the major part of them, are to meet, &c. I humbly conceive, without the whole I cannot be tried.

Ld. Pres. All this that you ask of us now, we have declared this morning already to one who was before you at the bar: the Quorum of this commission is seventeen, or any of them. We must require you again to plead.

Mordant. My lord, I desire a little patience. The number of the commissioners is seventeen: I conceive that must be very much strained in reason, that they must try, because it relates to the respective commissioners. Several persons were allowed counsel; I humbly desire counsel.

Ld. Pres. That is when there is matter of law. You have alledged nothing: you are now upon matter of fact.

Mordant. My lord, my Indictment is matter of law, and upon that I may safely demand counsel: I desire to have counsel as to my Indictment.

Ld. Pres. Your reason, and my reason, and all reason, must submit to the law: you are now upon matter of fact: the single question is, Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Att. Gen. My advice to you is, that you would put yourself upon your trial.

Mordant. I am not convinced at all, but forced upon it; and it is a hard thing: it is reason that my reason should be convinced. If this act doth say in any place that I must lose these privileges, or if the judges will declare it to be so, I will submit to it. If the judges will declare that I must be tried thus, God's will be done; I desire to stand and fall by the laws.

Sol. Ellis. I will tell you where his mistake is: he speaks of former trials, which we do not deny. But this gentleman will agree that it is in the power of parliaments, by acts of parliament, to alter those trials. We conceive that this act of parliament hath determined this very question: for, my lord, it is, that you shall examine upon oath, and thereupon proceed to conviction and final sentence, not by jury: and this act of parliament hath entrusted you to be both judge and jury. All Englishmen must submit to what the parliament hath done: and the parliament hath determined this question, that you have power to examine upon oath, and thereupon to proceed to conviction, &c. If a jury was to do it, you were not to proceed to conviction. This gentleman says there is no precedent for it; but we say it was the same in queen Elizabeth's time: they proceeded to conviction and final sentence, when they proceeded against duke Hamilton, lord Capel, and Holland. Did not the parliament approve of what they did in that case as just, honourable, and lawful? Did not duke Hamilton, did they not all petition to the house? Did not the parliament order execution upon some, and cleared others? To say this is without precedent, when precedents are so frequent, I wonder that should be said. To that point of a jury: I must tell this gentleman he speaks of a jury, but hath not put himself upon a trial. After he hath pleaded Not Guilty, then it must be considered the manner of the proceeding; but to come before he plead Guilty, or Not Guilty, to desire a jury, this is a little to anticipate your judgment.

Mordant. I do not shun to be tried by the act of parliament, but refer myself to the judges, that those privileges of the Act may not be taken from me.

Att. Gen. The parliament hath thought fit to go this way, and it is not to be disputed; They that live in this nation are not to dispute it, If that gentleman will please to recollect himself, and not, my lord, thus expostulate and dispute with the court of justice, if he please to put himself upon a trial, if he thinks himself innocent, I think it is best; and if he refuse it, his sentence is from himself.

Mordant. I do not, my lord, dispute the power of the Court; but I desire my reason may be convinced, and that I may have counsel.

Ld. Pres. We are clearly of opinion, we have not power in this Case to appoint any other jury, not to summon a jury; we ourselves have taken an oath. You would do well to plead.

Mordant. My lord, I have but little to say; and that is, that, as that gentleman said, it was referred to the Court what jury I shall have, I desire, my lord, to know whether the Court doth intend to try me by a jury.

Sol. Ellis. They do not.

Mordant. Is the Court judge and jury?

Att. Gen. If you will deal ingenuously with the Court, I think that is best.

Mordant. Seeing I am here over-ruled, though not convinced in my reason, I shall demur to the Court, and plead Not Guilty. I desire a copy of my Indictment, and time to plead.

Ld. Pres. It was never done: for any Indictment of high-treason was never delivered to any prisoner.

Mordant. I urge my lord Coke for authority; for a copy of my Indictment.

Mr. Phelps. John Mordant, esq.; you stand here charged of high treason; to this Charge you plead Not Guilty: Is this your plea?

Mordant. Yes, I beg, my lord, that my ignorance of the laws may not prejudice me, not understanding or knowing any thing of the laws: And this granted me, I shall address to my justification.

Att. Gen. Do you stand to your plea, Not Guilty?

Mordant. Yes.

Mr. Lechmere. My lord, I shall shortly open the Impeachment. The Attorney-General hath exhibited a Charge of high treason against John Mordant, esq. viz. That he the said John Mordant intending to embroil this nation in new and intestine wars, the 30th of April last past, and at divers times since the 10th of October 1656, together with Henry Bishop, Hartgil Baron, &c. at the parish of Clement Danes, in the county of Middlesex, did traitorously, advisedly, and maliciously plot, contrive, and endeavour, First, to stir and raise force, and levy war against his highness the Lord Protector and the Commonwealth, to subvert and alter the government of the same. Secondly, that he did traitorously, advisedly, and maliciously declare, publish, and promote Charles Stuart to be king of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Thirdly, that he did traitorously, advisedly, and maliciously hold intelligence and correspondence with Charles Stuart; and that he did declare these treasons by overt-act, that is to say, by conferring with John Stapely and Henry Mallory how to effect the same, and did deliver several commissions from Charles Stuart to several persons; and this contrary to the statute. To this charge of high-treason the prisoner pleads Not Guilty: we are ready, my lord, to call our witnesses to prove him guilty of these several crimes, and with the leave of the Court, we shall call our witnesses.

Att. Gen. I wish Mr. Mordant had done this before, and made himself capable of more favour.

[Mr. Mordant then desired to have pen, ink, and paper, which was granted him.]

[John Stapely and Anthony Stapely were then called.]

John Stapely sworn.

Att. Gen. We produce this gentleman (I suppose he is well known to the prisoner) to prove the Charge: I desire he may declare what he knows. What do you know concerning the discourses of Mr. Mordant with you, touching the bringing in Charles Stuart?

Stapely. I have been in Mr. Mordant's company several times; and what I can say will not be much. Mr. Mordant did once tell me there was such a design as the bringing in of the king; and he did ask me if I did not know of such a thing. I told him no. He was pleased to tell me somewhat of it. I asked him if he was engaged in it; he told me he was not.

Att. Gen. What did he tell you concerning his being entrusted by the king therein?

Stapely. He told me the king wrote to him, to speak to his friends that they would be ready to assist him when he should come into England with force; which he told me was with 7,000 men. This was the chief of all.

Att. Gen. Did he not say that he had commissions from the king?

Stapely. He did not tell me so; but I have heard him say others had had commissions, two other gentlemen in Surrey.

Att. Gen. Did not he encourage you thereto? What arguments did he use?

Stapely. He spoke to me of it several times.

Att. Gen. After what manner?

Stapely. Only in commendation of the thing: I heard him say that if there were a necessity, Surrey folks would come into Sussex, to assist them.

Att. Gen. Who was present at any of these discourses?

Stapely. There was none but him and myself.

Att. Gen. At what place, and at what time?

Stapely. Near his own house, at several times. I have told you the main of the discourses.

Mordant. Mr. Stapely, about what time was this?

Stapely. Above a year since.

Mordant. Mr. Stapely, at what place was the encouragement made?

Stapely. I do not know what he means by encouragement: he only told me of it.

Mordant. I desire to know when I told you that I had received a letter to encourage my friends from beyond sea, and who was by?

Stapely. There was nobody by.

Ld. Pres. About what time did he tell you of this letter?

Stapely. About half a year since.

Ld. Pres. Who was by?

Stapely. Nobody, my lord.

Sol. Ellis. Did he tell you it was the king that wrote to him; and therefore it was just to assist him?

Stapely. I think I heard him say so; I cannot take my oath of it.

Ld. Pres. Did he tell you what considerable persons were concerned?

Stapely. I have heard him speak of some persons that were engaged in this design; sir Francis Vincent, and one Brown: he said that sir William Waller spake to him to speak to me.

Ld. Pres. When.

Stapely. Above a year since: It was since the parliament.

Mordant. My lord, I do not know sir William Waller.

Anthony Stapely sworn.

Att. Gen. What discourse have you had with Mr. Mordant touching Charles Stuart?

Anthony Stapely. We were about a quarter of a year ago at the Half-Moon tavern in Aldersgate-Street: At that time there was no discourse about the business at all. After that he was speaking to me about the times, losses of privileges, great taxations, &c. wherein I agreed with him, and wished they might be better. I asked him if there was any way to help it. He said, Yea; and said that Charles Stuart was intending for England; and that would be a fair opportunity to redress all grievances. At Berkshire-House, there he was pleased to enquire concerning the affairs of Sussex, and in what preparation they were, in case the king of Scots should land. I told him I did not know; I had not been in the country lately; I did believe that there would not be an appearance suitable to his expectation. He told me something concerning Surrey; that there was a considerable strength there, ready to assist us in Sussex, and join with us when any such thing should happen. He did say that he had delivered out four Commissions, three for horse, and one for foot; but to whom I know not: I dare not swear it; but it is to the best of my remembrance.

Att. Gen. What discourse past between you at the Half-Moon tavern in Aldersgate-Street about March last?

Stapely. It was the day that the Cavalier party were to depart the city: There was Capt. Mallory, myself and this gentleman, Mr. Mordant. And then he spoke again concerning Sussex; that the king of Scots coming was suddenly expected; and desired to know in what readiness we were. I told him I could not tell; but I did believe that things would be in as great a forwardness as the times would permit. It was agreed upon that some of our country should meet Mr. Mordant at Crawly, in Surrey, upon the Tuesday following.

Att. Gen. What was the end of your meeting?

Stapely. It was to consider further how things might be carried on, as to the business of Surrey and Sussex: There was an expectation of the landing of Charles Stuart; and he did say that he heard Charles Stuart was in a readiness. Mr. Mallory, myself, and Mr. Mordant, were to meet, further to debate of things. I understood it was for the business of the king; but it was not positively so expressed. He asked me how things went on in Sussex. I told him I could not satisfy him: Therefore we told him there should some of our country meet him at Crawly, to give him an account. He said there was a considerable force; but I never heard him speak of any number of horse or foot in Surrey.

Mordant. Mr. Stapely, I desire to know when I spoke to you of this?

Stapely. My lord, it was—I cannot tell the days: But it was suddenly after the breaking up of the parliament; all the discourses were since the breaking up of the last parliament.

Mordant. I desire to know where I spoke this, and who was by?

Stapely. As I take it the first discourse was at Long-Acre; but nobody by.

Mordant. I desire to know the time when I met him at the Half-Moon tavern.

Stapely. It was the day set for the departing of the Cavalier party out of town.

Mordant. I desire to know who was by?

Stapely. Captain Mallory.

Mordant. I desire to know whether I did meet at the place appointed.

Stapely. My brother and Mr. Mallory did not meet him, because my brother was sent for to Whitehall.

Mordant. I desire to know the witnesses to all he says?

Stapely. It was all private; only once at the Half-Moon tavern with captain Mallory.

Att. Gen. My lord, there was mention made of one captain Mallory, whom we did intend to have as a witness: He was committed upon this design being privy to it. It hath so fallen out that he is lately escaped. I desire that Mr. Serjeant at Arms, major Ellison, Tho. Tatlock, and Wm. Capput, may be sworn,

All four sworn.

Att. Gen. We do produce these witnesses for this end: Captain Mallory was a prisoner, and we did intend to make use of him here; but it hath so fallen out, that his guilty conscience hath made him to fly. Ask these concerning his being in custody, and endeavour of escape.

Major Ellison. My lord, captain Mallory was in custody, and a guard constantly set upon him, which guard was relieved every twenty-four hours. The manner of his escape I only had by relation. We have used all our endeavours to have found him since he is escaped: We did that night send presently to Southwark, to inns there, and laid wait for him; and sent to captain Mallory's brother-in-law, where he formerly lay, examined him, but all in vain. Where we had any intimation of any relation of his, we did send to search for him.

Serj. Dan. My lord, upon the 28th of May last, since the escape of captain Mallory, I received a warrant from the council, commanding me to use all diligence for apprehending captain Mallory: I have accordingly endeavoured it: Not knowing his relations, I did not speak to them. I have used all means I could; but cannot find him.

Tho. Tatlock. My lord, captain Mallory went away about nine o'clock at night: He went away in a black suit and cloak.

Will. Capput. All that I know, my lord, is, That captain Mallory was a prisoner, and changed his habit and hair, went away, and left money in the window to pay for his lodging.

Att. Gen. My lord, the intention is to shew you captain Mallory was a prisoner, is escaped, and what means have been used for his apprehension. Officer, pray swear Mr. Scobell.

Mr. Scobell sworn.

Att. Gen. My lord, Mr. Scobell was one of the justices of the peace that took captain Mallory's examination upon oath.

Mr. Scobell. My lord, captain Mallory gave in information upon oath, before my lord Goffe and myself, upon the twenty-first of April last; and upon his oath did inform us, That about the beginning of March last capt. Anthony Stapely and himself being at the Half-Moon Tavern, John Mordant, esq. being upon the Exchange, was sent for to Mr. Stapely, and that he came. Thereupon Mr. Stapely presented capt. Mallory to Mr. Mordant as a gentleman that was interested in Charles Stuart's design, together with Mr. Stapely, that was his brother: He said that by that brother he meant John Stapely esq. Thereupon he informed us, That Mr. Mordant did demand of capt. Mallory in what readiness the horse that were to be raised in Sussex were. Mr. Mallory informed us, That to that he returned an answer, that they were not in so good a posture as he did believe Mr. John Stapely had represented to Mr. Mordant, but doubted that it would fall much short. Mallory told us, That at that answer Mr. Mordant did much wonder, because he said Charles Stuart the king was in a very good posture; and that there was a daily expectation of his coming over with forces; and that thereupon Mr. Mordant did desire that there might be a meeting in some convenient place between him and Mr. Stapely, and some others of that county of Sussex, as should he thought fit. My lord, it was (he said) to this end, That they might confer together, and understand how the affairs stood in reference to the counties of Sussex and Surrey, that they might the better assist each other in the intended insurrection. He did inform us, my lord, That accordingly it was agreed there should be a meeting upon the Tuesday following at Crawly; and, in order thereunto, he said that Mr. Anthony Stapely and himself did speak with Mr. John Stapely to have a meeting accordingly at Crawly upon the Tuesday following, and they did agree to it. He said, that they should meet with Mr. Mordant at Crawly; but in the mean time Mr. John Stapely being sent for to Whitehall, that meeting was prevented. My lord, this is all.

Ld. Pres. Mr. Mordant, would you ask Mr. Scobell any question?

Mr. Scobell. I suppose that Mr. Mordant's asking me any question will not advantage him, or that my testimony is disadvantageous to him: For all that I have spoke was the same that Mallory declared unto me, and my lord Goffe, as justices of the peace.

Mordant. My lord, I neither knew this gentleman, nor Mr. Mallory, upon my oath.

Att. Gen. Mr. Anthony Stapely, were you with capt. Mallory and Mr. Mordant at dinner together at the Half-Moon?

Mr. A. Stapely. My lord, capt. Mallory was once there; but not at dinner.

Mr. Sol. Ellis. The Attorney-General hath exhibited a Charge of high-treason against the prisoner at the bar; that was to raise force against the government, and publish Charles Stuart to be king, and held correspondence with him.

Mordant. My lord, you have heard the witnesses. The first gentleman, Mr. John Stapely, he was pleased to urge against me, that I said Charles Stuart writ to me to engage my friends, but said not that he saw the letter, or that any one was by. He did not name the time or place, but at random; but that I said so. Being asked about Commissions, he denies that I told him I either had Commissions, or delivered any. He says I gave him encouragement to this engagement, or what he calls it, I know not; but he doth not say what kind of encouragement it was; he doth not say I promised him money or preferment. He says he heard I engaged two other gentlemen, sir Francis Vincent and col. Brown. He was asked, if any was by at these discourses; he said none was by. My lord, this is a single evidence: he says it was a year or more since; he says I said, I was entrusted by Charles Stuart about the latter end of the last winter. For Mr. Anthony Stapely, he urges against me, that at his lodging I discoursed with him, that the way to help us was to bring in Charles Stuart: he says, that I said in Surry was a considerable strength to join with Charles Stuart, which if true, might prove troublesome to me; but I have not been in Surry this year and half. He says, only to the best of his remembrance; I said I had three or four Commissions; but he says it is to the best of his remembrance, but doth not say he saw the Commissions, and will not swear whether they were for horse or foot. He says, at the Half-Moon I spake with him and Mallory; who that is, I have already spoke to. He says, I did not name the number of any forces that were ready: He says, that we agreed to meet on the Tuesday following at Crawly with Mr. Mallory, but says that I was not there. My lord, I do not know that place; he says it is in our country, but it is not: he says it was his brother John Stapely that was to meet me. He says, it was not about any positive thing why I was to meet there, but in general to carry on things about the intended design. He says not that I said it, but that I said I heard that Charles Stuart would land with a considerable party. He says, it was to debate things in general: He said, it was not said about Charles Stuart, that he was not mentioned, but he supposed it to be so. He says positively, that I spake of any number of horse or foot, or any thing of that kind. I asked him, when I first spoke of this; he returned no time, would not say any positive time, but said all was since the breaking up of the parliament. I asked him who was by; he said nobody, all was private. He says, the time when we were at the Half-Moon was near the time that those that served the late king were banished. He says positively I did not meet at the place appointed, and he gives the reason, a very insufficient one, because his brother was sent for up; that could not hinder me. He waves his own meeting: he says all was private. I submit it all to this honourable court.

Mr. Sol. Ellis. The charge is for levying of war to alter the government, and embroil us again in a new war: to which he pleads Not Guilty. For the proof of this we have offered to you witnesses: I shall take them in order as the gentleman did at the bar. John Stapely said, Mr. Mordant said the king writ to him to encourage and engage his friends to assist him at his coming; but says not the time when this was done. He says he did not see the letter, but says Mr. Mordant told him he had a letter; all the discourses (because he says there was no time) it agrees that they were since the tenth of October 1656, and so it is clear within this act, and within your jurisdiction. Now see how it was carried on: After he had told him this, how doth he encourage him in his telling him the justice of the cause, the persons engaged therein, and of sir William Waller! Then, my lord, he told them, if the forces of Sussex were not sufficient, that the Surry forces would come to assist them for the coming in of Charles Stuart: this both John and Anthony Stapely. So that we conceive, under favour, that John Stapely and Anthony Stapely do agree in most of the circumstances. Anthony Stapely says, that Mr. Mordant came to him, tells him there were great grievances. Ay, says he, but how shall it be remedied? Tells him that Charles Stuart intended to come to England with a great force, which would redress them. He asked him how the business was in Sussex? He said it was not in so good a posture as he expected: he said that Surry forces should join with Sussex. My lord, I leave it nakedly to you; if you find this to be true, we submit it to you, and Mr. Attorney-General will pray what his place requires.

Att. Gen. You have heard the business, this gentleman hath interposed himself where he was not called; it is a happiness this business was discovered. Upon this evidence I leave it to your justice, and as you shall judge. I shall say no more.

Mordant. My lord, I will speak to you very short, it is this: That to all this, though it be urged against me by the ablest men in the land, yet there is but one witness in a manner, and that differing in many circumstances—[Here he was interrupted]. My lord, I leave it to you, I remit my life into your hands, resting and believing your lordships will deal with me as one of this nation, an English freeman. I leave it to you and do submit.

Ld. Pres. Withdraw the prisoner.

Proclamation to adjourn into the Painted Chamber.

After a little debate in the Painted Chamber, they adjourned till the morrow.

June 2, 1658.

The Lords Commissioners met in the Painted Chamber about ten in the morning, and there continued till about four o'clock in the afternoon, and then adjourned into Westminster Hall, where proclamation being made, the names of the Lords Commissioners being read :

Mr. Serjeant was commanded to bring Dr. Hewet, sir Henry Slingsby, and Mr. Mordant to the bar. Which was accordingly done. Proclamation for silence was made.

Att. Gen. My lord, as for sir H. Slingsby, and Mr. Mordant, you have heard the impeachment read, and their pleas ; I have given in the evidence, I pray your Judgment as to them : as for the other, you have heard the impeachment and no defence ; I pray your justice.

Ld. Pres. Sir H. Slingsby, knt. thou hast been impeached on the behalf of the Lord Protector and this Commonwealth, of high treason : to which thou hast pleaded Not Guilty which the Court hath taken into consideration : What hast thou to say further, why this Court should not proceed to Judgment.

Sir H. Slingsby. My lord, I humbly desire I may be tried by a jury, for I must say, you are my enemies, pardon the expression, if not so, why did you sequester me, and sell my whole estate ? And why did you deny me the act of oblivion ? There is no man would willingly appeal to his adversaries : there are some among you that have been instrumental in my sequestration, and in the selling of my estate, for which they gave me no reason but this, That I would not compound, when I thought not fit so to do, when there was no establishment or settled peace : if I had compounded, I had not been sure whether I might not have compounded over again. My estate hath been sequestered and sold. Now to be my judge and jury—I humbly pray, being a commoner, I may be tried by commoners.

Ld. Pres. Sir H. Slingsby, I am not to hear you as to any of these things (you have pleaded already) ; this is not a time for pleading, but a time of judgment ; therefore I must require your silence, and hear me a few words.

The Lord President's Speech.

" Sir H. Slingsby, I am really and truly afflicted for your sad condition ; but when I consider the nature of your offence, with the circumstances and aggravations of your treason committed ; when I consider your person, and that such a person as you are should be instrumental in so detestable a conspiracy, and when I think of that judgment that must be given against you ; methinks you are one of the saddest spectacles that ever I beheld in all my days : I beseech God that you may seriously lay it to your heart with sorrow and repentance, and that you may be more sensible of what you have done, than of what you are to suffer.

" Sir, was it not a great aggravation of the Egyptians, that when God had declared himself by so many signs and wonders on the behalf of the Israelites, that yet notwithstanding they would still pursue Moses and Israel ? was not this a great aggravation of their sins.

" Who is so great a stranger in this nation as to be ignorant what God hath done amongst us, by a series of wonderful providences so many years together, against that very party who are still hatching of treasons and rebellions amongst us ? It grieves my very soul to think of it, that after so many signal providences, wherein God seems to declare himself, as it were by signs and wonders, that your heart should be still hardened, I may say more hardened than the very hearts of the Egyptians : for they at length did not only see, but confessed that the Lord fought against them ; but you, O that you would confess, and give glory to God ! You cannot chuse but see that the Lord fights against you, that the stars in their courses fight against you ; and yet you will not see, you will not confess, until destruction overtakes you. This is a sad lamentation, and I beseech God that you may seriously consider it.

" Sir, if the signal and the wonderful providences of God will not deter you, yet methinks national considerations should deter you from such a treason as this is. Charles Stuart is in confederacy with Spain against England ; he is in confederacy with that great popish interest. Is it imaginable that an Englishman, that a protestant should assist such a confederacy as this is ? Yet that which is not imaginable in itself, is here clearly and evidently proved before us.

" Sir Henry Slingsby, there are three witnesses, major Waterhouse, captain Overton and lieut. Thompson ; two of them full in evidence as to every charge against you, and three of them as to some of the charges ; and besides, your own confession at the bar, full in proof against you. Did it not clearly appear in proof before us, that you promoted Charles Stuart to be king of England ? Did it not clearly appear before us, that you endeavoured to betray the garrison of Hull to Charles Stuart ? Did it not likewise clearly appear before us, that you endeavoured to withdraw the officers, and some of the soldiers of that garrison from their obedience to his Highness, and to make a mutiny in that garrison, and all the circumstances did clearly appear ? Was it not proved before us, that you offered a commission to major Waterhouse, and promised him a commission in the first place, and a second to captain Overton, and a deputation to the third ? and what you promised, did you not make it good ? Did you not with your own hand offer a commission sealed, and said it was from Charles Stuart ? And did you not only encourage him, by telling him that he was coming into England with a considerable force ; but did you not promise also that upon his landing, 5,000*l.* should be paid to major Waterhouse ? all these things were clearly proved before us.

" Sir, what said you to this proof ? You confessed upon the matter all, in effect all ; but only some things you said by way of excuse, and I shall truly relate them all. All you did, you told us was but in jest. What, Sir, if those discontented English that complied with Spain in queen Elizabeth's days in eighty-eight, had said they had been in jest, what would you have thought of that, Sir? What if those Jesuited Papists that would have blown up the Parliament House upon the 5th of November, with barrels of gunpowder, had said that they had brought in those barrels in jest; what would you have thought of it? Sir, be not deceived: As a man sows, so shall he reap; you have sowed treason and rebellion, and you are now come to reap the fruit of it.

"And, Sir, you told me you did not own the government, you were a prisoner, and therefore could not be bound by the laws of that government. Sir, doth not every Englishman owe a natural allegiance to the Supreme Magistrate of England? Is not every Englishman, whether in prison or out of prison, bound by the laws of England? Sir, if you own not the government of England, that is an offence in itself, a great offence; and would you make an offence against the government to be an excuse or justification for treason?"

"The last thing you said was this, You told us you were trepanned into it. Sir, did not you yourself of yourself promise a Commission to major Waterhouse? Did you not of yourself offer five thousand pounds to be paid as soon as Charles Stuart landed upon English ground? I shall name those worthy gentlemen, for honour's sake to them, that had a hand in this discovery. It was that prudent and faithful governor of Hull, colonel Smith, that had a hand in it. There were those worthy and faithful commanders, who were here in court, major Waterhouse, captain Overton, and lieutenant Thompson: Sir, these faithful and worthy gentlemen have carried themselves in this business like the man of understanding that Solomon speaks of.

"I have done, only I would say one word to you, because I hear you are a Protestant: I would only ask you this question, What think you would have become of the Protestant interest, of the Protestants of England, Scotland, and Ireland, if you had had your will; if Charles Stuart had come in? If you had but time (but the Lord knows you have not time) to look over the records of England, to look over the declarations of parliaments since 1640; if you could remember it, Sir, it would tell you what family it was that betrayed the Protestants of France, when Rochel was taken; what family it was that betrayed the Protestants in Germany, and in the Palatinate, when a peace was made with Spain without consent of parliament. What could you think of that family that did tolerate Popery for a match with Spain? What then would that family have done, if it could have gained them England, Scotland, and Ireland.

"And now, Sir, but one word more to you as you are an Englishman: I beseech you consider, what would have become of this nation, if you had had your will; you had brought a new civil war upon England, at the least. I cannot think of a new civil war upon England, but I think of desolation upon desolation to this poor nation, &c.

"I have but one word to say to Dr. Hewet: And, Sir, when I look upon you as a minister, I must confess I do not know how to speak to you, because it has always been my way to speak to men of your profession, as to ministers; I never spake to them but as a child speaks to his father; such reverence and such regard I bear to their office. But to speak so to a minister as a judge speaks to a traitor, I must confess I know not how to do it. But, Sir, there must be words spoken to you, though I do not speak them; and not only to you as a traitor, but a traitor in the highest degree, not as a traitor (as you are intitled, for endeavouring to levy a new war, and to bring desolation and a war in this nation), but such an one as should rather die a traitor, than own the authority of the nation. But, Sir, I know not how to speak to you, and therefore the record must speak to you; and I myself will not any further.

"I have now a word to speak to you, Mr. Mordant: God hath appeared in justice, and God doth appear in mercy; as the Lord is just to them, so he is exceeding merciful to you: And I may say to you, That God appears to you at this time, as he speaks to sinners in Jesus Christ; for, Sir, he doth clear sinners in Christ Jesus, even when they are guilty, and so God cleareth you: I will not say you are guilty, but ask your own conscience whether you are or no. Sir, bless God as long as you live, and bless my Lord Protector, by whose authority you are cleared. Sir, I speak no more, but I beseech you to speak to God.

"And now let me add this word to these two gentlemen: Sirs, when I have done speaking, I shall never have done praying for you, as long as you are alive; that is the last thing I must say to you. And now let the Judgment of the Court be read."

Thereupon the clerk read the Judgment and Sentence of the Court against sir H. Slingsby, knt. which was as follows:

"That the said sir H. Slingsby, as a false traitor to his said highness the Lord Protector and this Commonwealth, shall be conveyed back again to the Tower of London; and from thence through the middle of the City of London directly shall be drawn unto the gallows of Tyburn, and upon the said gallows there shall be hanged, and being alive, shall be cut down to the ground, and his entrails taken out of his belly, and, he living, be burnt before him; and that his head shall be cut off; and that his body shall be divided into four quarters, &c."

In the next place, the same Judgment and Sentence of the Court was read against Dr. Hewet, being ingrossed in like manner.

This being done, the Judgment of the Court was declared concerning Mr. Mordant, which (in short) was, "That upon consideration of the whole matter in reference to the Charge against him, and his Plea thereunto, they did adjudge him Not Guilty.* And so the prisoners were dismissed.

Proclamation being made, the Court adjourned back to the Painted Chamber, where they ordered the Execution of the Sentence upon sir Henry Slingsby and Dr. Hewet to be on Saturday next. And warrants were issued out to the sheriffs of London to see execution done accordingly.

Then the Court adjourned itself until Thursday the 10th instant.

Notwithstanding the former Sentence passed by the High Court, yet his Highness being informed, that Dr. Hewet, prisoner in the Tower of London, who stands attainted of High Treason, before the Commissioners appointed by act of parliament, for levying war against his Highness and the Commonwealth, had Judgment to be hanged, drawn and quartered at Tyburn this instant Saturday; his Highness was graciously pleased, upon humble suit made, to reprieve him until Tuesday the 8th instant, and to order, That the Judgment should be remitted, except the cutting off his head.

The like favour also was extended to sir Henry Slingsby.

Much application was made to save his life by the lord viscount Fauconbridge his nephew, who had lately married one of the Usurper's daughters; but as sir Henry said at the scaffold, he was inexorable; the truth is, the Tyrant supposed, that his not sparing a person so related to him, would make all the world believe there was a reality of some horrid design, which could not be dispensed with, without extreme danger to the public.

They were both accordingly executed on Tower-Hill the said 8th of June.

Sir H. Slingsby was first brought about eleven of the clock from the Tower to the scaffold on Tower-Hill; whither being come, he fell upon his knees, and for a short space prayed privately. Then standing up, he did in a short speech, and with a very low voice, address himself to Mr. sheriff Robinson, telling him, that what he had to say he would speak to him; which was to this purpose:

‘That he had received Sentence to die, upon account of his endeavouring to betray the garrison of Hull: But said, all that he did in that business he was drawn into by others.—That the officers of that garrison did believe he had some greater design in hand, and therefore they would needs pump him to the bottom: But what he spoke to them in private was brought into evidence against him. He likewise said, That he did no more than any person would have done that was so brought on.—That he had made many ‘applications, by his friends, for a reprieve, but found his Highness was inexorable.—He did confess, that he did deliver a commission (as it was charged against him): But said, that it was an old commission, and what he meant was well known to himself; but what constructions others had made of it might appear by his present condition.’

He discovered little sense of sorrow, or fear of death; but said: ‘He was ready to submit,’ or words to like purpose. Then he addressed himself to private prayer again; and kneeling down to the block, he prayed privately for a short space: Then laid his head upon the block, and at the sign given, the executioner severed his head from his body at one blow: and his friends put his body into a coffin, and removed it into a close coach, prepared near the place.

As soon as Sir Henry Slingsby's body was removed as aforesaid, Dr. Hewet was brought forth to the scaffold; whither being come (together with Dr. Wild, Dr. Warnestry, and another divine); he fell upon his knees and prayed privately for the space of a quarter of an hour; after that he prayed audibly for a good space. After which prayer he addressed himself to the people in the following words:

‘I am now become a public spectacle to men and angels, and, I hope God, who is omniscient, is now beholding me with much pity, and great mercy and compassion, and the more, because I am now come to that end that his own Son came into the world for, to bear witness to the truth; he himself said, ‘For this end was I born, for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth.’ I was brought into the world, the Christian world, for to bear witness to the truth of the gospel, as a common christian; I was brought into the world, the church, as a minister of his blessed word and sacraments (blessed be his name for that great honour and dignity!); and I came into the world to die more immediately for the testimony of Jesus, which God hath now called me to. I came into this world (this Commonwealth) to be a member thereof, to bear witness to the truths of the customs, the laws, the liberties, and privileges thereof: so I am a member of the Commonwealth: And methinks it seems to me a strange thing, that in as much as we all plead for liberty, and privileges, and I pleading for the privileges, the laws, the statutes, and the customs of this land, yet I should die by those that should stand for the laws, the statutes, and privileges of the land: And I am here beheld by those that plead for their liberties, and I hope I am pitied, because I here give up myself willingly and freely to be a state-martyr for the public good; and I had rather die many deaths myself, than betray my fellow-freemen to so many inconveniences that they might be like to suffer by being subject to the wills of them that willed me to this death.

‘And it is worthy remembrance, that Mr. Solicitor having impeached me of treason to

* Oldmixon, and after him Hume, says that “just as the sentence was pronounced in his favour, col. Pride, who was resolved to condemn him, came into Court.” This circumstance gives to the story dramatic effect; but they cite no authority for it.

the Commissioners of the Court against his Highness, I did often (when brought before those Commissioners) plead for the liberties of the people of England; though I had no knowledge of the law, yet I had instruction from those that were learned in the law, and had several law cases and precedents put into my hand, though not by them, and urged several law-cases; and made my appeal: First, for the judicature that I was to be tried by, Whether it were according to law? Whether it were according to the act? And whether it were according to the words of the said act? I did appeal to have the said act argued by learned lawyers on both sides, and then to be resolved by his Highness's own counsel, which was denied me: [This by the by] I pressing the argument, made a second appeal, that those Judges, if they would give singly their several judgments that it was a just and lawful Court of judicature, I would answer to my Charge. I did make another appeal to those that were his Highness's counsel, and pleaded against me, that if they would deliver it to me under their hands to be according to law, I would then go on to plead and answer to the Charge. What was then said further, my spirits being faint, I shall not say much, but only this, I was taken in three defaults upon formality of the Court. It seems it is a custom in all Courts (which I did not know before), that if they answered not the third time speaking by the clerk, that then they are guilty of three defaults and proceeded against as mute: [I had no such knowledge of the law.] So they found me guilty of those defaults; And when I would have pleaded, and resolved to begin to plead, I was taken from the bar. I did the next day make my petition to the Court in the Painted-Chamber; two petitions were presented, the same in effect; in the former the title was mistaken: Yet because the title was mistaken, and no answer was given, therefore it was that another petition was drawn up to the same effect, with a new title given (as I remember), presented by the Serjeant at Arms; and one writ it over in such haste, lest they should be drawn out of the Painted-Chamber into the Court, that I had not time to read it over, only I subscribed my name; and there was in the front of the petition a word left out, but what the word was I know not; and this was taken so ill, as if I had put an affront and contempt on the Court; and it was thought they would have heard me plead; and then, because of that mistake, they sent word I should have my answer when I came into the Court, and my answer was the sentence of condemnation. And therefore, I pray with all my soul, that God would forgive all those that occasioned the Charge to be drawn against me, to give such unjust things against me; I pray with all my soul, that God would forgive all those that upon so slender and small grounds adjudged me to die, taking advantage of such simple ignorance as I was in. And I had, at the very beginning of my pleading, engaged their honours no advantage should be taken against me to my prejudice, that in as much as I understood nothing of the law, and having heard that a man in the nicety of the law might be lost in the severity thereof, merely for speaking a word out of simple ignorance; I made it my prayer to them, that no advantage might be taken against me, to the prejudice of my person; and there was to me a seeming consent, for the President told me, there should be no advantage taken against me; and upon these considerations, I am afraid there was too great uncharitableness: But I pray God forgive them, from the very bottom of my soul, and I desire that even those that shed my blood, may have bowels of the God of mercy shed for them.

"And now having given you the occasion of my coming hither, it is fit I should give you somewhat as concerning myself, as I am a Christian, and as I am a Clergyman: first, as I am a Christian, I thank God I was baptized to the Holy Church, so I was baptized to be a member of the Holy Catholic Church; that is, the Church of England, which I dare say, for purity of doctrine, and orderly discipline, till a sad Reformation had spoiled the face of the Church, and made it a query, whether it was a Church or no: I say, it was more purely divine and apostolical than any other doctrine or Church in the Christian world, whether national, or classical, or congregational. And I must tell you, that as I am a member of this Church, so I am a member of the Holy Catholic Church, and shall give a most just confession of my faith, both negatively and affirmatively. Negatively, I am so a member of the Holy Catholic Church, that I abhor all Sects, Schisms, Sedition and Tyranny in Religion. Affirmatively, so that as I hold communion with, so I love and honour all Christians in the world that love the same Lord Jesus in sincerity, and call on his name, agreeing with those truths that are absolutely necessary, and clearly demonstrated in the word of God, both in the Old and New Testament, though in charity dissenting from some others that are not necessary. And I, as I am thus a Christian, I hope for Salvation, through the merits of Christ Jesus; his blood I rely on, his merits I trust to, for the salvation of my own soul. Though to this faith good works are necessary, not meritorious in us, but only made meritorious by Christ's death; by his all-sufficiency, by his satisfaction, and his righteousness, they become meritorious; but in us they are no other than as defiled rags. And truly, as I am a member of the Church, so I told you I was a member of this community, and so pleaded for the liberties and privileges thereof. I must now answer something I am aspersed withal in the world.

"Here I must come to particulars for a plot, of having a design upon the city of London for the firing of it: I so much tremble at the thought of the thing that should have been done, as they say, for the carrying on of such a design, (if my heart deceive me not) had I known it, I so much abhor the thing, I should have been the first discoverer of it: nor ever had I a correspondence or meetings with such persons as would have carried on such a design. It is said likewise, I entertained the earl, the marquis of Ormond; to my remembrance I never saw the face of that honourable person in my life. It is said, one Lord's day I did preach at St. Gregory's, and the next Lord's day I was at Brussels, or Bruges, and kissed the King's hand, and brought I cannot tell what orders and instructions from him: this I shall say, for these three years last past together I have not been sixty miles from this City of London, and I think it is somewhat further to either of those places than threescore miles. It is said that I kept correspondence with one Mallory and Bishop: they are persons I have heard of their names, but never saw their faces, and to my knowledge I do not know they know me; nor do I know them at all, but only as I have heard of their names. And whoever else hath suggested such things against me, I know not.

"His Highness was pleased to tell me, I was like a flaming torch in the midst of a sheaf of corn: he meaning, I being a public preacher, was able to set the city on fire by sedition and combustions, and promoting designs. Here truly I do say, and have it from many of those who are judges of the High Court, that upon examination of the business, they have not found me a meddler at all in these affairs. And truly I must needs say therefore, that it was a very uncharitable act in them (whoever they were) that brought such accusations against me, and irritated his Highness against me: I will not say it was malice, it might be zeal; but it was rash zeal which caused me to be sentenced to this place: the God of mercy pardon and forgive them all! And truly as I am a member of the Church, and as a member of the community where on behalf I have been speaking, I cannot but do as our Saviour himself did for his disciples: when he was to be taken from them, he blessed them, and ascended up to heaven. My trust is in the mercy of the Most High, I shall not miscarry; and however my days are shortened by this unexpected doom, and shall be brought untimely to the grave; I cannot go without my prayers for a blessing upon all the people of this land, and cannot but bless them all in the name of God, and beseech God to bless them in all their ways, and his blessing be upon them."

After this he joined in public prayer with Dr. Wild and Dr. Warmestry, he all the while lying flat upon his breast.

Then he addressed himself to private prayer, wherein he continued a certain time. After this he prepared himself for the block, and with a black ribbon bound over his eyes, lying with his breast over the block, he prayed again for a short while; then laid his neck upon the block, and after some short and private ejaculations, the executioner (having notice that he was ready) at one blow severed his head from his body, which was put into a coffin, and conveyed away by his friends.

Fleetwood, in a letter to Henry Cromwell, dated June 8, 1658, says, "This day is the execution of sir Henry Slingsby and Doctor Hewet. Great endeavours have been made to save their lives. There will be some sudden resolutions touching that party." 7 Thurloe, 189.

The author of the Fourth Part of the History of Independency says, "The sentence was executed on the 8th day of June, at Tower-hill, notwithstanding all the means their friends could use of engagements, persuasions and money, and the deep, earnest and continued intreaties, solicitations and supplications of Mrs. Claypole, his (Cromwell's) best beloved daughter, for so inexorable he continued, that like the deaf adder, he 'stopped his ears to the charmer, charm he never so wisely,' at which unheard-of cruelty, and for that Dr. Hewet's lady (as is said) was then with child; Mrs. Claypole took such excessive grief that she suddenly fell sick, the increase of her sickness making her rave in a most lamentable manner, calling out against her father for Hewet's blood, and the like, the violence of which extravagant passions working upon the great weakness of her body, carried her into another world even at the highest thereof." It seems to be generally admitted, that Mrs. Claypole's death made a very afflicting impression on the mind of Cromwell, and possibly it accelerated his own death: The author of the Fourth Part of the History of Independency, seems indeed disposed to believe, that the latter event was marvellously brought about by the Devil, in pursuance of a personal contract made between him and the Protector, on the morning of the Battle of Worcester, Sept. 3rd, 1651, being exactly seven years before the day on which Cromwell died. There is no reason to doubt that the last part of his life was passed under great discomposure, apprehension and anxiety of mind. Maidston, who had been steward of the household to him, in a letter to Mr. Winthrop, Governor of Connecticut, after mentioning the dissolution of the short parliament which met on the 20th of January, 1658, thus expresses himself; "And that was the last that sate during his life, he being compelled to wrestle with the difficulties of his place so well as he could, without parliamentary assistance, and in it met with so great a burthen, as (I doubt not to say) it drank up his spirits, of which his natural constitution yielded a vast stock, and brought him to his grave." 1 Thurloe's State Papers, 766.

Dr. Hewet, we have seen, was executed on June 8, 1658, and Mrs. (or Lady Elizabeth) Claypole died on August 6, and Cromwell on Sept. 3, in the same year. See Whitelocke's Mem.

"It had been observed in England," says Lord Clarendon, "that, though from the dissolution of the last parliament, all things seemed to succeed, at home and abroad, to the Protector's wish, and his power and greatness to be better established than ever it had been, yet he never had the same serenity of mind he had been used to, after he had refused the crown; but was out of countenance, and chagrin, as if he were conscious of not having been true to himself: and much more apprehensive of danger to his person than he had used to be. Insomuch as he was not easy of access, nor so much seen abroad; and seemed to be in some disorder, when his eyes found any stranger in the room; upon whom they were still fixed. When he intended to go to Hampton Court, which was his principal delight and diversion, it was never known till he was in the coach, which way he would go; and he was still hemmed in by his guards both before and behind; and the coach in which he went was always thronged as full as it could be, with his servants, who were armed; and he seldom returned the same way he went; and rarely lodged two nights together in one chamber, but had many furnished and prepared, to which his own key conveyed him and those he would have with him, when he had a mind to go to bed: which made his fears the more taken notice of and public, because he had never been accustomed to those precautions.

"It is very true, he knew of many combinations to assassinate him. He seemed to be much afflicted at the death of his friend the earl of Warwick, with whom he had a fast friendship; though neither their humours, nor their natures were like. And the heir of that house, who had married his youngest daughter, died about the same time; so that all his relation to, or confidence in that family was at an end, the other branches of it abhorring his alliance. His domestic delights were lessened every day: he plainly discovered that his son Faulconbridge's heart was set upon an interest destructive to his, and grew to hate him perfectly. But that which chiefly broke his peace, was the death of his daughter Claypole; who had been always his greatest joy, and who, in her sickness, which was of a nature the physicians knew not how to deal with, had several conferences with him, which exceedingly perplexed him. Though nobody was near enough to hear the particulars, yet her often mentioning in the pains she endured, the blood her father had spilt, made people conclude, that she had presented his worst actions to his consideration. And though he never made the least shew of remorse for any of those actions, it is very certain, that either what she said, or her death, affected him wonderfully."

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE DURING THE USURPATION OF THE GOVERNMENT.

In the period between the death of Charles the First, and the Restoration of his son, there were other judicial Proceedings, the insertion of which, in this Work, might have been desirable; as for instances, of the case of sir John Stowell, mentioned in the third part of Walker's History of Independency, p. 48: sir John Gell's Case, Hist. of Independency, part 3, p. 4, 23, 31, et seq: Concerning this Case, Walker mentions a publication under the title of, "Sir John Gell's Case stated," printed about August, 1650. It has been diligently sought for, but without success: Prosecutions of several merchants for not paying customs, mentioned in Walker's History of Independency, part 2, p. 257. (Prynne had shortly after the death of king Charles the First, resisted the tax of 90,000*l.* a month, imposed by the Parliament, towards the maintenance of the forces. See his "Legal Vindication of the Liberties of England.")

Mr. Cony's was a remarkable Case: Ludlow gives the following account of it: "What the Lieutenant-General [Fleetwood] said concerning the disorders of England, was not without ground; things running every day more and more into confusion; the cavaliers being enraged to see the throne usurped; and those who had hazarded all for their country, finding themselves cheated; custom and excise raised without authority of parliament; and taxes imposed to no other end, than to support the pride and insolence of a single person. Some there were that openly opposed these oppressions. And, amongst others, Mr. George Cony, a merchant, who having refused to pay custom, it was violently taken from him; and he thereupon sued the collector at the common law. But Cromwell, resolving to put a stop to such dangerous precedents, caused the counsel for Mr. Cony, who were, serjeant Maynard, serjeant Twysden, and Mr Wadham Wyndham, to be sent to the Tower; where they had not been above three or four days, when they unworthily petitioned to be set at liberty, acknowledging their fault, and promising to do so no more; chusing rather to sacrifice the cause of their client, wherein that of their country was also eminently concerned, than to endure a little restraint, with the loss of the fees for a few days. By this means, when the cause came to the next hearing, Mr. Cony was necessitated to plead for himself; which he did in as short a manner as he could; referring it wholly to the judge, whether that tax, being not authorised by parliament, ought to be paid by the law of the land; and declaring that he would abide by his judgment therein. Serjeant Rolls, then Chief Justice of the Upper Bench, though a conscientious man, and a lover of civil liberty, yet not daring to determine it for him, said, that something must be allowed to ease of necessity. To which Mr. Cony replied, That it was never wont to be a good plea in law, for a man to make necessities, and then to plead them. But the judge, wanting courage, would not give judgment against the usurper; and being too much an honest man to give it for him, he took time till the next ensuing term to consider what rule he should give in the case. In the mean time, upon consideration that his continuance in that station was like to ensnare him more and more, he desired, by a letter to Cromwell, to have his quietus; and serjeant Glyn was appointed to succeed him in his employment, as a fitter instrument to carry on the designs on foot. The new Chief Justice, before he came to sit on the bench, took care to have this business accommodated with Cony; who lost his reputation, by withdrawing himself from a cause, wherein the public was so much concerned. Sir Peter Wentworth, a member of the long parliament, caused also a collector in the country to be arrested, and prosecuted at his suit, though he could hardly procure an attorney to appear, or counsel to plead for him. Cromwell, having received notice of this prosecution, sent a messenger, with an order to bring him before the council; where being examined concerning the ground of his proceeding, he told them, that he was moved to it by his constant principle, 'That, by the law of England, no money ought to be levied upon the people without their consent in parliament.' Cromwell then asked him, Whether he would withdraw his action or no? To which he replied, 'If you will command me, I must submit;' and thereupon, Cromwell having commanded it, he withdrew his action. Some time after, taking the liberty, in a discourse with him, to reprove him for that retractation, he made me this answer, That no man could have done more than he did, to the time of his appearing at the council; and that if he had then failed in any thing, it must be attributed to his age of three-score and three years; when, said he, the blood does not run with the same vigour as in younger men."

Lord Clarendon relates the matter thus: "One time when he had laid some very extraordinary taxes upon the city, one Cony, an eminent fanatic, and one who had heretofore served him very notably, positively refused to pay his part; and loudly dissuaded others from submitting to it, 'as an imposition notoriously against the law, and the property of the subject, which all honest men were bound to defend.' Cromwell sent for him, and cajoled him with the memory of 'the old kindness and friendship, that had been between them: and that of all men he did not expect this opposition from him, in a matter that was so necessary for the good of the Commonwealth.' It had been always his fortune to meet with the most rude, and obstinate behaviour from those who had formerly been absolutely governed by him; and they commonly put him in mind, of some expressions and sayings of his own, in case of the like nature; so this man remembered him, how great an enemy he had expressed himself to such grievances, and had declared, 'that all, who submitted to them, and paid illegal taxes, were more to blame, and greater enemies to their country, than they who had imposed them; and that the tyranny of princes could never be grievous, but by the tameness and stupidity of the people.' When Cromwell saw that he could not convert him, he told him, 'that he had a will as stubborn as his, and he would try which of them two should be master.' Thereupon, with some expressions of reproach and contempt, he committed the man to prison; whose courage was nothing abated by it; but as soon as the term came, he brought his Habeas Corpus in the King's Bench, which they then called the Upper Bench. Maynard, who was of counsel for the prisoner, demanded his liberty with great confidence, both upon the illegality of the commitment, and the illegality of the imposition, as being laid without any lawful authority. The judges could not maintain or defend either, and enough declared what their sentence would be; and therefore the Protector's attorney required a further day, to answer what had been urged. Before that day, Maynard was committed to the Tower, for presuming to question or make doubt of his authority; and the judges were sent for, and severely reprehended for suffering that licence; when they with all humility, mentioned the law and Magna Charta, Cromwell told them, with words of contempt, and derision, 'their Magna Carta should not controul his actions; which he knew were for the safety of the Commonwealth.' He asked them 'who made them judges? whether they had any authority to sit there, but what he gave them? and if his authority were at an end, they knew well enough, what would become of themselves; and therefore advised them to be more tender of that which could only preserve them;' and so dismissed them with caution, 'that they should not suffer the lawyers to prate what it would not become them to hear.'"

Thurloe's State Papers abound in the Examinations of different persons, respecting Plots against Cromwell, and his authority.

Harris notices, that "Cromwell packed Juries on occasion, and displaced judges for refusing to follow his directions. Here are my proofs. 'When judge Hale was on a circuit, he understood that the Protector had ordered a jury to be returned for a trial in which he was more than ordinarily concerned; upon this information, he examined the sheriff about it, who knew nothing of it; for he said he referred all such things to the undersheriff, and having next asked the undersheriff concerning it, he found the jury had been returned by order from Cromwell; upon which he shewed the statute that all juries ought to be returned by the sheriff or his lawful officer : and this not being done according to law, he dismissed the jury and would not try the cause : upon which the Protector was highly displeased with him, and at his return from the circuit, he told him in anger, he was not fit to be a judge, to which all the answer he made was, 'That it was very true.'

"That this may be true is rendered very probable by letters to Thurloe, part of which I will here transcribe. The first is from Mr. Dove, high-sheriff of Wilts, dated Sarum, March 29, 1655, relating to the intended trials for rebellion against the Protector. 'I understand a Commission of Oyer and Terminer is issued out for trial of the rebels in the west; and there is a mistrust of my under-sheriff. Sir, I resolve that no one man shall be returned in the one or other juries, but such as may be confided in, and of the honest well affected party to his Highness, and the present government. If there be but enough to be found of them through the whole county, which I hope there is, it is and will be my greatest care for that business, to see it punctually done, and not trust my under-sheriff therewith.' I suppose he was as good as his word, for both the juries I find highly commended by the solicitor, and other of his Highness's agents, in their accounts of the trials of the unhappy sufferers.—Colonel Lilburne in a letter to the secretary, dated York, April 10, 1655, has the following passage, on a like subject. 'As for jurors, happily the law may give liberty to choose them without the liberties of this city, both fact and act rising in the county, and then we shall do pretty well : but, if otherwise, there shall be no diligence or care wanting to pick up such as are right.' Practices of this nature could not but be dangerous to the subject. What is said in the text concerning Oliver's displacing of judges, is founded on the authority of Whitelocke. 'Baron Thorpe, and judge Newdigate, says he, were put out of their places, for not observing the Protector's pleasure in all his commands.' I know not, whether I ought to insert under this head the displacing Whitelocke and Widdrington, commissioners of the great seal, for refusing to proceed according to an ordinance made 'for the better regulating and limiting the jurisdiction of the High Court of Chancery.' Possibly the Protector, however he might be mistaken, really thought his regulation for the public good, and therefore could not be blamed for dismissing such as were not to be prevailed on to concur with him therein. These gentlemen however, as they were deemed by the Protector men of honour and abilities, were employed in other departments, and enjoyed his countenance and encouragement. His speech on the taking away the seal from these commissioners, was remarkable. 'The Protector in the council chamber, very gravely told us, says Whitelocke, that he was sorry some of us could not satisfy our own consciences, to execute the ordinance concerning the Chancery, which they were informed had much good in it to the public, but he confessed, that every one was to satisfy himself in matters to be performed by him, and that he had not the worse opinion of any man for refusing to do that whereof he was doubtful ; but in this particular the affairs of the Commonwealth did require a conformity of the officers thereof, and their obedience to authority, and (being some of us refused to execute this act, as was enjoined) they were compelled thereby to put this charge of the custody of the great seal into the hands of some others, who might be satisfied that it was their duty to perform this command, and to put the ordinance in execution !' I have said the Protector possibly, was not to be blamed for his conduct in this affair: the reader, however, must judge of this.

"He committed men illegally to prison, and permitted them not the benefit of the laws.—The author of "The World's Mistake in Oliver Cromwell," will supply me with sufficient proofs of this. 'To prove,' says he, 'that Oliver's time was full of oppression and injustice, I shall but instance, in a few of many particulars, and begin with John Lilburne, not that I think him in any kind one that deserved favour or respect, but that equal justice is due to the worst, so well as to the best men, and that he comes first in order of time.'

"1. John, in 1649, was, by order of the then parliament, tried for his life, with an intent, I believe, of taking him away, but the jury not finding him guilty, he was immediately, according to law, generously set at liberty by those that had quarrel enough against him. This example in the parliament, of keeping to the laws in the case of one, who was a professed implacable enemy to them, ought to have been copied by Cromwell ; but, in the contrary, to shew that there was a difference betwixt his and his predecessors (the long parliament's) principles, when the law had again, upon a second trial (occasioned by Oliver) cleared Lilburne, the parliament's submitting to the law was no example to him ; for, contrary to law, he kept him in prison, until he was so far spent in a consumption, that he only turned him out to die.'

"2. Mr. Cony's Case is so notorious that it needs but little more than naming: he was a prisoner at Cromwell's suit, and being brought to the King's Bench bar by a Habeas Corpus, had his counsel taken from the bar, and sent to the Tower for no other reason, than the pleading of their client's cause ; an act of violence, that, I believe, the whole story of England doth not parallel.' This was on the 18th of May, 1655. The gentlemen thus committed, were Maynard, Twysden and Windham, men of great eminence in their profession, who could find no release from their imprisonment, but by humbly petitioning the Protector. But to go on.

"3dly. Sir Henry Vane, above any other person, was the author of Oliver's advancement, and did so long and cordially espouse his interest, that he prejudiced himself (in the opinion of some) by it, yet so ungrateful was this monster of ingratitude, that he studied to destroy him, both in life and estate, because he could not adhere to him in his perjury and falseness. The occasion he took was this: he appointing a day of humiliation, and seeking of God for him, invited all God's people in his declaration, to offer him their advice in the weighty affairs then upon his shoulders: Sir Henry taking a rise from hence offered his advice by a treatise called the Healing Question; but Cromwell, angry at being taken at his word, seized, imprisoned, and endeavoured to proceed further against him, for doing only what he invited him to do.

“4thly. In Richard's assembly, certain prisoners in the Tower, under the then lieutenant, and some sent thence to Jersey, and other places beyond the sea, complained of false imprisonment. Their gaoler was sent for, and being required to shew by what authority he kept these persons in hold, produced a paper all under Oliver's own hand, as followeth. ‘Sir, I pray you seize such and such persons, and all others whom you shall judge dangerous men; do it quickly, and you shall have a warrant after it is done.’ The nature of this warrant was by Richard's assembly debated, and having first Richard's own counsel's opinions in the case, as serjeant Maynard, &c. they voted the commitments of the complainants to be illegal, unjust and tyrannical; and that, first, because the warrant by which they were committed, was under the hand of the then (as they called him) Chief Magistrate, who, by law, ought not to commit any by his own warrant. Secondly, because no cause was shewn in the warrant; and thirdly (in the case of those sent out of the reach of a Habeas Corpus, which in law is a banishment), because no Englishman ought to be banished by any less authority than an act of parliament. And, therefore, for these reasons they voted farther, that the prisoners should be set at liberty without paying any fees or charges. But the turning out and punishing the lieutenant by the assembly (for obeying so unjust a warrant) was prevented by their sudden dissolution.’ Most of the facts here recited, are well known to those versed in this part of the English history, and may be established on the best authorities. But on consulting the Journals of the parliament, here referred to, I find a mistake relating to the commitments by Oliver. On Saturday the 26th of Feb. 1658, says the Journals, Mr. Terill ‘reported from the grand committee of the house for grievances and courts of justice, the state of the case concerning Mr. John Portmans, a prisoner in the Tower, as it appeared to the committee; viz. That the lieutenant of the Tower, the 3rd of Feb. 1657, received a letter from the late Lord Protector, early in the morning, directing him to apprehend Mr. John Portmans (amongst others) forthwith: that the same day, in the afternoon, a warrant was sent to the lieutenant of the Tower, under the hand of the late Lord Protector, to require and authorise him to apprehend and imprison Mr. Portmans: that the same night, or shortly after, upon that warrant, Mr. Portmans was taken by a lieutenant and about six soldiers, under the command, and by the order and direction, of the lieutenant of the Tower; and hath ever since remained a prisoner there, without any trial, or other proceedings had against him.’—On the 26th of March following, the warrant for the commitment and detaining major-general Overton in the isle of Jersey was read; and was signed Oliver P.; and directed to the governor of the isle of Jersey or his deputy; and was in these words; viz. ‘These are to will and require you forthwith to receive into your charge the bodies of Robert Overton, major Norwood, and sir Thomas Armstrong, and——Weston, esq.; and them detain, under secure imprisonment, in the castle of Jersey, until you shall receive farther orders from us: and, for so doing, this shall be your warrant. Given at Whitehall, the 8th of January, 1657.’ These commitments were voted by the house illegal and unjust, and the gentlemen were ordered to be discharged from their imprisonment.’ It appears also from the Journal of the same day, that the committee found, ‘that divers commoners of England had, by illegal warrants, been committed to prison into the islands of Jersey, and other the islands belonging to this Commonwealth, out of the reach of the Habeas Corpus. Thus we see that Cromwell, who had opposed and punished Charles for his illegal acts, became an imitator of him, and, in some of these instances, went even beyond him: for I question whether all Charles's reign can produce so daring a violation of the right of the subject, as his imprisoning Maynard and his brethren, for pleading in behalf of Cony their client: nor is there a greater, than the imprisoning and banishing men on his own warrant, and depriving them of the benefit of the laws made for their relief. Vain, indeed, might the unhappy sufferers have said, were the efforts made against the king, when the effect of them was still slavery and oppression!

“The high courts of justice.—The erection of a high court of justice for the trial of Charles gave rise to many others. When the nature of the supposed crime was such as fell not under the cognizance of the common law; when the persons accused were of a quality which might incline a jury to treat them with compassion and regard; or when they had been engaged in actions popular, though illegal, it was then thought proper by those in power to erect high courts of justice, in order that offenders might not escape punishment. These courts were constituted of commissioners named by the government, who performed the several offices of judges and juries, and determined concerning the law and the fact. The Attorney-General generally managed the evidence against the prisoners, and few escaped who were cited before these tribunals. The duke of Hamilton, and the lords Holland and Capel, Christopher Love and Mr. Gibbons, with some others, were sentenced to die by courts thus constituted, who, probably, before another kind of judicature, would have met with a milder treatment, though, as the laws then were, they could not but be deemed offenders. When Cromwell came to the government, he made use of the same methods of trial on several occasions: and in the year 1656, the parliament passed 'An Act for the security of his highness the Lord Protector's person, and continuation of the nation in peace and safety.' In the preamble it is said, 'Forasmuch as the prosperity and safety of this nation—very much dependeth, under God, upon the security and preservation of the person of his Highness; and, for that it hath manifestly appeared, that divers wicked plots and means have been of late devised and laid, to the great endangering his Highness's person, and the embroiling this Commonwealth in new and intestine wars and seditions: therefore be it enacted, that if any person shall attempt, compass or imagine the death of the Lord Protector, and declare it by open deed; or shall advisedly and maliciously proclaim, declare, publish or promote Charles Stuart, or any other person claiming from the late King; or shall aid and assist, hold intelligence with, or contribute money towards the assistance of the said Charles Stuart, his brothers or mother, &c. then all and every the offences abovementioned shall be adjudged to be High Treason: and that in all such cases, and upon all such occasions, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Keeper, or Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal of England for the time being, are authorised and required from time to time, by warrant from his Highness, to issue out one or more Commission or Commissions, under the Great Seal of England, to—&c.—or any seventeen or more of them: which said Commissioners shall have authority to hear, examine and determine all matters, crimes and offences aforesaid; and also to hear and determine all misprisions of the treasons in this act mentioned, and to take order for charging the offender or offenders, with all or any the crimes aforesaid, and for the receiving their personal answer thereunto; and for examination of witnesses upon oath, and thereupon, or upon the confession of the party, or, in default of such answer, to proceed to conviction and final sentence, as in cases of High Treason, and Misprision of Treason, according to justice and the merits of the cause.'—'Commissioners were also appointed for the same purpose in Scotland and Ireland. This act was to continue in force unto the end of the last session of the next parliament, and no longer.' By this last clause it seems sufficiently evident that the framers of this law were sensible of its severity and ill consequences. However, this seemed to give a sanction to it. But what is unreasonable never satisfies. It was urged that trials by juries were the birthrights of Englishmen; that all trials for Treason were to be had and used only according to the due order and course of the common laws of the realm, and not otherwise, upon inquest and presentment by the oaths of twelve good and lawful men, upon good and probable evidence and witness; and that if any thing be done to the contrary, it shall be void in law, redressed and holden for error and nought: and if any statute be made to the contrary, that shall be holden for none. That to proceed against any without legal indictment, presentment and trial, in the way of the high courts of justice, was very unequitable; the Commissioners themselves being both grand and petty jury, and judges likewise, if not parties interested, to whom no peremptory or legal challenges could be made; and finally, that such proceedings were contrary to Magna Charta; the Petition of Right; the Declarations of the Parliament; and to an article in the Instrument of Government which was sworn to by the Protector himself. How good soever these pleas might have been, they were not suffered to be of use to the prisoners. Judges are generally well enough satisfied of the authority by which they act, and will not have it questioned. To demur to the jurisdiction, or refuse to answer, is equivalent to the clearest proof of guilt, and judgment is accordingly given. However, the Protector had his end by this method of proceeding. 'He thought it more effectual,' says Whitelocke, 'than the ordinary course of trials at the common law, and would the more terrify the offenders: and terrify it did; for, on the erection of the last high court of justice, according to Clarendon, 'it put all those who knew how liable they themselves were, under a terrible consternation.' Whitelocke would not sit when nominated as a Commissioner, it being, as he says, against his judgment."

Mr. Burke seems to have had a very lively sense of Cromwell's merit in providing for the able, and upright administration of justice, in cases in which his own interests were not involved. In his "Letter to a Member of the National Assembly," vol. 6, of his Works, pp. 14, 15, ed. 1808, he thus contrasts Cromwell's conduct in this respect with that of the French Revolutionists. "Your rulers brought forth a set of men steaming from the sweat and drudgery, and all black with the smok and soot of the forge of confiscation and robbery, 'ardentis massæ fuligine lippos,' a set of men brought forth from the trade of hammering arms of proof, offensive and defensive, in aid of the enterprises, and for the subsequent protection of housebreakers, murderers, traitors, and malefactors; men who had their minds seasoned with theories perfectly conformable to their practice, and who had always laughed at possession and prescription, and defied all the fundamental maxims of jurisprudence. To the horror and stupefaction of all the honest part of this nation, and indeed of all nations, who are spectators, we have seen on the credit of those very practices and principles, and to carry them further into effect, those very men placed on the sacred seat of justice, in the capital city of your late kingdom. Cromwell, when he attempted to legalise his power, and to settle his conquered country in a state of order, did not look for dispeusers of justice, in the instruments of his usurpation. Quite the contrary. He sought out with great solicitude and selection, and ever from the party most opposite to his designs, men of right and decorum of character, men unstained with the violence of the times, and with hands not fouled with confiscation and sacrilege; for he chose an Hales* for his Chief Justice, though he absolutely refused to take his civic oaths, or to make any acknowledgment whatsoever of the legality of his government. Cromwell told this great lawyer, that since he did not approve his title, all he required of him was, to administer in a manner agreeable to his pure sentiments, and unspotted character, that justice without which human society cannot subsist, that it was not his particular government, but civil order itself, which as a judge he wished to support. Cromwell knew how to separate the institutions expedient to his usurpation, from the administration of the public justice of his country. For Cromwell was a man in whom ambition had not wholly suppressed, but only suspended the sentiments of religion, and the love, as far as it could consist with his designs, of fair and honourable reputation. Accordingly we are indebted to this act of his, for the preservation of our laws, which some senseless asserters of the rights of men, were then on the point of erasing as relics of feudality, and barbarism. Besides he gave, in the appointment of that man, to that age, and to all posterity, the most brilliant example of sincere and fervent piety, exact justice, and profound jurisprudence. But these are not the things in which your philosophic usurpers chuse to follow Cromwell." In another place ("Remarks on the Policy of the Allies," 1793, vol. 7, same edition, p. 196) he says, "The government of Cromwell was to be sure somewhat rigid, but for a new power no savage tyranny. The country was nearly as well in his hands, as in those of Charles the second, and in some points much better. The laws in general had their course, and were admirably administered."

Harris says; "He filled the benches with able and honest judges, &c.—The historians of all parties have, by the notoriety of the fact, been forced to pay this tribute of praise to Cromwell. I could mention many; but will content myself with the authorities of Clarendon and Coke, who, though of different principles, were equally foes to the government and memory of the Protector. The former affirms, 'That in matters which did not concern the life of his jurisdiction, he seemed to have great reverence for the law, rarely interposing between party and party.' The latter assures us, 'That Westminster-Hall was never replenished with more learned and upright judges than by him; nor was justice either in law or equity, in civil cases, more equally distributed, where he was not a party.' The names of his judges, possibly, may not be unacceptable to some readers. They were as follows: the Lord Chief Justices Glyn and St. John; the Justices Warburton, Newdigate, Atkins, Hale, Windham; the Barons Nicholas, Parker, Hill. The Commissioners of the Great Seal, at first, were the famous Mr. Whitelocke, Widdrington and Lenthall; afterwards Fiennes, Lisle and Lenthall. The gentlemen of the long robe still mention the names of some of these persons with great honour. How solicitous Cromwell was to appoint the most able and upright persons to fill the important posts of the law, will best appear by the following quotations. 'Cromwell seeing him (Mr. Hale) possess of so much practice, and he being one of the eminentest men of the law, who was not at all afraid of doing his duty in those critical times, resolved to take him off from it, and raise him to the bench. Mr. Hale saw well enough the snare laid for him, and though he did not much consider the prejudice it would be to himself, to exchange the easy and safer profits he had by his practice for a judge's place in the Common Pleas, which he was required to accept of, yet he did deliberate more on the lawfulness of taking a commission from usurpers; but having considered well of this, he came to be of opinion, that it being absolutely necessary to have justice and property kept up at all times, it was no sin to take a commission from usurpers, if he made no declaration of his acknowledging their authority, which he never did. He was much urged to accept of it by some eminent men of his own profession, who were of the King's party, as sir Orlando Bridgman, and sir Geoffrey Palmer; and was also satisfied concerning the lawfulness of it, by the resolution of some famous divines, in particular Dr. Sheldon and Dr. Henchman, who were afterwards promoted to the sees of Canterbury and London. To these were added the importunities of all his friends, who thought, that in a time of so much danger and oppression, it might be no small security to the nation, to have a man of his integrity and abilities on the bench: and the usurpers themselves held him in that estimation, that they were glad to have him give a countenance to their courts, and, by promoting one that was known to have different principles from them, affected the reputation of honouring and trusting men of eminent virtues, of what per'suasion soever they might be, in relation to public matters.' Another work speaks more plainly on this subject. 'He [Cromwell] studied to seek out able and honest men, and to employ them. And so having heard that my father had a very great reputation in Scotland, for piety and integrity, though he knew him to be a Royalist, he sent to him, desiring him to accept of a judge's place, and to do justice in his own country, hoping only that he would not act against his government, but he would not press him to subscribe or swear to it.' Burnet.—How great! how generous! it was hardly possible, but a man of such a disposition must be well served."

It is observable, that Waller in his spirited Panegyric to my Lord Protector, of the present Greatness and Joint Interest of his Highness and this Nation," does not notice this merit in Cromwell.

Mr. Barrington in his Observations on Stat. 9 Hen. 4, tells us, "It hath been often said, that the worse title the better king."

Ludlow, in relating the events which preceded the Restoration, tells us, "So low were the affairs of the parliament, and their authority so little regarded, even in Westminster Hall, that sir Robert Pye, who had been committed to the Tower by their order, suing for his Habeas Corpus at the Upper Bench, and Judge Newdigate demanding of the counsel for the Commonwealth what they had to say why it should not be granted; the counsel answered, they had nothing to say against it. Whereupon the Judge, though no enemy to monarchy, yet ashamed to see them so unfaithful to their trust, replied, That if they had nothing to say, he had: for that sir Robert Pye being committed by an Order of the parliament, an inferior court could not discharge him."

205. The Trials of TWENTY-NINE REGICIDES, at the Old Bailey, for High Treason, which began the 9th Day of October, A. D. 1660: 12 CHARLES II.

INTRODUCTION.

OF the intrigues at home and abroad which preceded and accompanied the Restoration, many particulars are related by Clarendon and Ludlow. The following six were Instruments dispatched by Charles the Second to England before his arrival. They contain the assurances of mercy alluded to in the Trials of the Regicides, and in that of sir Henry Vane.

The LETTER of the KING to the GENERAL and the ARMY.

To Our Trusty and Well-beloved General Monk, to be by him communicated to the President, and Council of State, and to the Officers of the Armies under his Command.

Charles R.;—Trusty, and well-beloved, We greet you well: It cannot be believed, but that we have been, are, and ever must be, as solicitous as we can, by all endeavours to improve the affections of our good subjects at home, and to procure the assistance of our friends and allies abroad, for the recovery of that right, which, by the laws of God and man, is unquestionable, and of which we have been so long dispossessed by such force, and with those circumstances, as we do not desire to aggravate by any sharp expressions; but rather wish, that the memory of what is past, may be buried to the world. That we have more endeavoured to prepare, and to improve the affections of our subjects at home for our restoration, than to procure assistance from abroad to invade either of our kingdoms, is as manifest to the world. And we cannot give a better evidence that we are still of the same mind, than in this conjuncture; when common reason must satisfy all men, that we cannot be without assistance from abroad, we choose rather to send to you, who have it in your power to prevent that ruin and desolation which a war would bring upon the nation, and to make the whole kingdom owe the peace, happiness, security, and glory it shall enjoy, to your virtue; and to acknowledge that your armies have complied with their obligations, for which they were first raised, for the preservation of the Protestant Religion, the honour and dignity of the king, the privileges of parliament, the liberty and property of the subject, and the fundamental laws of the land; and that you have vindicated that trust, which others most perfidiously abused and betrayed. How much we desire, and resolve to contribute to those good ends, will appear to you by our inclosed Declaration; which we desire you to cause to be published for the information and satisfaction of all good subjects, who do not desire a farther effusion of precious Christian blood, but to have their peace and security founded upon that which can only support it, an unity of affections amongst ourselves, an equal administration of justice to men, restoring parliaments to a full capacity of providing for all that is amiss, and the laws of the land to their due veneration.

You have been yourselves witnesses of so many revolutions, and have had so much experience, how far any power and authority that is only assumed by passion and appetite, and not supported by justice, is from providing for the happiness and peace of the people, or from receiving any obedience from them (without which no government can provide for them) that you may very reasonably believe, that God hath not been so well pleased with the attempts that have been made, since he hath usually encreased the confusion, by giving all the success that hath been desired, and brought that to pass without effect, which the designers have proposed as the best means to settle and compose the nation: and therefore we cannot but hope and believe, that you will concur with us in the remedy we have applied; which, to human understanding, is only proper for the ills we all groan under; and that you will make yourselves the blessed instruments to bring this blessing of peace and reconciliation upon king and people, it being the usual method in which Divine Providence delighteth itself, to use and sanctify those very means, which ill men design for the satisfaction of private and particular ends and ambition, and other wicked purposes, to wholesome and public ends, and to establish that good which is most contrary to the designers; which is the greatest manifestation of God's peculiar kindness to a nation that can be given in this world. How far we resolve to preserve your interests, and reward your services, we refer to our Declaration; and we hope God will inspire you to perform your duty to us, and to your native country; whose happiness cannot be separated from each other.

We have intrusted our well-beloved servant sir John Greenvil, one of the gentlemen of our Bed Chamber, to deliver this unto you, and to give us an account of your reception of it, and to desire you, in our name, that it may be published. And so we bid you farewell.— Given at our Court at Breda, this 4-14th of April, 1660, in the twelfth year of our reign.

The KING'S LETTER to the HOUSE OF COMMONS.

To Our Trusty, and Well-beloved, the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Charles R.—Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well: In these great and insupportable afflictions and calamities, under which the poor nation hath been so long exercised, and by which it is so near exhausted, We cannot think of a more natural and proper remedy, than to resort to those for counsel and advice, who have seen and observed the first beginning of our miseries, the progress from bad to worse, and the mistakes and misunderstandings, which have been produced, and contributed to inconveniencies which were not intended; and after so many revolutions, and the observation of what hath attended them, are now trusted by our good subjects to repair the breaches which are made, and to provide proper remedies for those evils, and for the lasting peace, happiness, and security of the kingdom.

We do assure you upon our royal word, that none of our predecessors have had a greater esteem of parliaments, than we have in our judgment, as well as from our obligation; we do believe them to be so vital a part of the constitution of the kingdom, and so necessary for the government of it, that we well know neither prince nor people can be in any tolerable degree happy without them; and therefore you may be confident, that we shall always look upon their counsels, as the best we can receive; and shall be as tender of their privileges, and as careful to preserve and protect them, as of that which is most near to ourself, and most necessary for our own preservation.

And as this is our opinion of parliaments; that their authority is most necessary for the government of the kingdom; so we are most confident, that you believe, and find, that the preservation of the king's authority is as necessary for the preservation of parliaments; and that it is not the name; but the right constitution of them, which can prepare and apply proper remedies for those evils which are grievous to the people, and which can thereby establish their peace and security. And therefore we have not the least doubt, but that you will be as tender in; and as jealous of, any thing that may infringe our honour, or impair our authority, as of your own liberty and property; which is best preserved by preserving the other.

How far we have trusted you in this great affair, and how much it is in your power to restore the nation to all that it hath lost, and to redeem it from any infamy it hath undergone, and to make the king and people as happy as they ought to be; you will find by our inclosed Declaration; a copy of which we have likewise sent to the house of peers: and you will easily believe; that we would not voluntarily, and of ourself, have reposed so great a trust in you; but upon an entire confidence that you will not abuse it, and that you will proceed in such a manner, and with such due consideration of us who have trusted you, that we shall not be ashamed of declining other assistance (which we have assurance of) and repairing to you for more natural and proper remedies for the evils we would be freed from; nor sorry, that we have bound up our own interests so entirely with that of our subjects, as that we refer it to the same persons to take care of us, who are trusted to provide for them. We look upon you as wise and dispassionate men, and good patriots, who will raise up those banks and fences which have been cast down, and who will most reasonably hope, that the same prosperity will again spring from those roots, from which it hath heretofore and always grown; nor can we apprehend that you will propose any thing to us, or expect any thing from us, but what we are as ready to give, as you to receive.

If you desire the advancement and propagation of the Protestant Religion, we have, by our constant profession, and practice of it, given sufficient testimony to the world, that neither the unkindness of those of the same faith towards us, nor the civilities and obligations from those of a contrary profession (of both which we have had an abundant evidence) could in the least degree startle us, or make us swerve from it; and nothing can be proposed to manifest our zeal and affection for it, to which we will not readily consent. And we hope, in due time, ourself to propose somewhat to you for the propagation of it, that will satisfy the world, that we have always made it both our care and our study, and have enough observed what is most like to bring disadvantage to it.

If you desire security for those who, in these calamitous times, either wilfully or weakly have transgressed those bounds which were prescribed, and have invaded each others rights, we have left to you to provide for their security and indemnity, and in such a way, as you shall think just and reasonable; and by a just computation of what men have done, and suffered, as near as is possible, to take care that all men be satisfied; which is the surest way to suppress, and extirpate all such uncharitableness and animosity, as might hereafter shake and threaten that peace, which for the present might seem established. If there be a crying sin, for which the nation may be involved in the infamy that attends it, we cannot doubt but that you will be as solicitous to redeem it, and vindicate the nation from that guilt and infamy, as we can be.

If you desire that reverence and obedience may be paid to the fundamental laws of the land, and that justice may be equally and impartially administered to all men, it is that which we desire to be sworn to ourself, and that all persons in power and authority should be so too.

In a word, there is nothing that you can propose that may make the kingdom happy, which we will not contend with you to compass; and upon this confidence and assurance, we have thought fit to send you this Declaration, that you may as much as is possible, at this distance, see our heart; which, when God shall bring us nearer together (as we hope he will do shortly) will appear to you very agreeable to what we have professed; and we hope, that we have made that right Christian use of our affliction, and that the observation and experience we have had in other countries, have been such, as that we, and, we hope, all our subjects, shall be the better for what we have seen and suffered.

We shall add no more, but our prayers to Almighty God, that he will so bless your counsels, and direct your endeavours, that his glory and worship may be provided for; and the peace, honour, and happiness of the nation, may be established upon those foundations which can best support it. And so we bid you farewell.—Given at our Court at Breda, this 4-14th day of April 1660, in the twelfth year of our reign.

The KING'S DECLARATION.

C. R. Charles, by the grace of God, king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all our loving subjects of what degree or quality soever, greeting. If the general distraction, and confusion, which is spread over the whole kingdom, doth not awaken all men to a desire, and longing, that those wounds which have so many years together been kept bleeding, may be bound up, all we can say will be to no purpose. However, after this long silence, we have thought it our duty to declare, how much we desire to contribute thereunto: and that, as we can never give over the hope, in good time, to obtain the possession of that right, which God and nature hath made our due; so we do make it our daily suit to the Divine Providence, that he will, in compassion to us, and our subjects, after so long misery and sufferings, remit, and put us into a quiet, and peaceable possession of that our right, with as little blood and damage to our people as is possible; nor do we desire more to enjoy what is ours, than that all our subjects may enjoy what by law is theirs, by a full and entire administration of justice throughout the land, and by extending our mercy where it is wanted and deserved.

And to the end that fear of punishment may not engage any conscious to themselves of what is past, to a perseverance in guilt for the future, by opposing the quiet and happiness of their country, in the Restoration both of king, and peers, and people, to their just, ancient, and fundamental rights; we do by these presents declare, that we do grant a free and general Pardon, which we are ready, upon demand, to pass under our great seal of England, to all our subjects of what degree or quality soever, who within forty days after the publishing hereof, shall lay hold upon this our grace and favour, and shall by any public act declare their doing so, and that they return to the loyalty and obedience of good subjects; excepting only such persons as shall hereafter be excepted by parliament. Those only excepted, let all our subjects, how faulty soever, rely upon the word of a king, solemnly given by this present Declaration, that no crime whatsoever committed against us, or our royal father, before the publication of this, shall ever rise in judgment, or be brought in question, against any of them, to the least indamagement of them, either in their lives, liberties, or estates, or (as far forth as lies in our power) so much as to the prejudice of their reputations, by any reproach, or terms of distinction from the rest of our best subjects; we desiring, and ordaining, that henceforward all notes of discord, separation, and difference of parties, be utterly abolished among all our subjects; whom we invite and conjure to a perfect union among themselves, under our protection, for the resettlement of our just rights; and theirs, in a free parliament; by which, upon the word of a king, we will be advised.

And because the passion and uncharitableness of the times, have produced several opinions in religion, by which men are engaged in parties and animosities against each other; which, when they shall hereafter unite in a freedom of conversation, will be composed, or better understood; we do declare a Liberty to Tender Consciences; and that no man shall be disquieted, or called in question, for differences of opinion in matters of religion which do not disturb the peace of the kingdom; and that we shall be ready to consent to such an act of parliament, as, upon mature deliberation, shall be offered to us, for the full granting that indulgence.

And because in the continued distractions of so many years, and so many and great revolutions, many grants and purchases of estates have been made to and by many officers, soldiers, and others, who are now possessed of the same, and who may be liable to actions at law, upon several titles; we are likewise willing that all such differences and all things relating to such grants, sales, and purchases, shall be determined in parliament; which can best provide for the just satisfaction of all men who are concerned.

And we do farther declare, that we will be ready to consent to any act or acts of parliament to the purposes aforesaid, and for the full satisfaction of all Arrears due to the officers and soldiers of the Army under the command of general Monk; and that they shall be received into our service upon as good pay, and conditions, as they now enjoy.—Given under our Sign Manual, and Privy Signet, at our Court at Brēda, the 4-14th day of April, 1660, in the twelfth year of our reign.

The KING'S LETTER to the HOUSE of LORDS.

C. R. Right trusty and right well-beloved cousins, and right trusty and well-beloved cousins, and trusty and right well-beloved; we greet you well. We cannot have a better reason to promise ourself an end of our common sufferings and calamities, and that our own just power and authority will, with God's blessing, be restored to us, than that you are again acknowledged to have that authority and jurisdiction which hath always belonged to you by your birth, and the fundamental laws of the land: and we have thought it very fit and safe for us to call to you for your help, in the composing the confounding distempers and distractions of the kingdom; in which your sufferings are next to those we have undergone ourself; and therefore you cannot but be the most proper counsellors for removing those mischiefs, and for preventing the like for the future. How great a trust we repose in you, for the procuring and establishing a blessed pence and security for the kingdom, will appear to you by our inclosed Declaration; which trust, we are most confident you will discharge with that justice, and wisdom, that becomes you, and must always be expected from you; and that, upon your experience how one violation succeeds another, when the known relations and rules of justice are once transgressed, you will be as jealous for the rights of the crown, and for the honour of your king, as for yourselves: and then you cannot but discharge your trust with good success, and provide for, and establish the peace, happiness, and honour of King, Lords, and Commons, upon that foundation which can only support it; and we shall be all happy in each other: and as the whole kingdom will bless God for you all, so we shall hold ourself obliged in an especial manner to thank you in particular, according to the affection you shall express towards us. We need the less enlarge to you upon this subject, because we have likewise writ to the House of Commons; which we suppose they will communicate to you. And we pray God to bless your joint endeavours for the good of us all. And so we bid you very heartily farewell.—Given at our Court at Brēda, this 4-14th day of April, 1660, in the twelfth year of our reign.

The KING'S LETTER to the FLEET.

To our Trusty and Well-beloved General Monk, and General Mountague, Generals at Sea, to be communicated to the Fleet.

C. R. Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. It is no small comfort to us, after so long and great troubles and miseries, which the whole nation hath groaned under; and after so great revolutions, which have still increased those miseries, to hear that the Fleet and Ships, which are the walls of the kingdom, are put under the command of two persons so well disposed to, and concerned in, the peace and happiness of the kingdom, as we believe you to be; and that the officers and seamen under your command, are more inclined to return to their duty to us, and put a period to these distempers and distractions, which have so impoverished, and dishonoured the nation, than to widen the breach, and to raise their fortunes by rapine and violence; which gives us great encouragement and hope, that God Almighty will heal the wounds by the same plaister that made the flesh raw; that he will proceed in the same method in pouring his blessings upon us, which he was pleased to use, when he began to afflict us; and that the manifestation of the good affection of the Fleet and Seamen towards us, and the peace of the nation, may be the prologue to that peace, which was first interrupted by the mistake and misunderstanding of their predecessors; which would be such a blessing upon us all, that we should not be less delighted with the manner, than the matter of it.

In this hope and confidence, we have sent the inclosed Declaration to you; by which you may discern, how much we are willing to contribute towards the obtaining the general and public peace: in which as no man can be more, or so much, concerned, so no man can be more solicitous for it. And we do earnestly desire you, that you will cause the said Declaration to be published to all the Officers and Seamen of the Fleet; to the end, that they may plainly discern, how much we have put it into their power to provide for the peace and happiness of the nation who have been always understood by them to be the best and most proper counsellors for those good ends: and you are likewise farther to declare to them, that we have the same gracious purpose towards them, which we have expressed towards the Army at land; and will be as ready to provide for the payment of all arrears due to them, and for rewarding them according to their several merits, as we have expressed to the other; and we will always take so particular a care of them and their condition, as shall manifest our kindness towards them. And so depending upon God's blessing, for infusing those good resolutions into your, and their hearts, which are best for us all; we bid you farewell.—Given at our Court at Breda, this 4-14th day of April, 1660, in the twelfth year of our reign.

The KING'S LETTER to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of the CITY of LONDON.

To our Trusty and Well-beloved the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, of our City of London.

C. R. Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. In these great revolutions of late, happened in that our kingdom, to the wonder and amazement of all the world, there is none that we have looked upon with more comfort, than the so frequent and public manifestations of their affections to us in the City of London; which hath exceedingly raised our spirits, and which, no doubt, hath proceeded from the Spirit of God, and his extraordinary mercy to the nation; which hath been encouraged by you, and your good example, to assert that government under which it hath, so many hundred years, enjoyed as great felicity as any nation in Europe; and to discountenance the imaginations of those who would subject our subjects to a government they have not yet devised, and, to satisfy the pride and ambition of a few ill men, would introduce the most arbitrary and tyrannical power that was ever yet heard of. How long we have all suffered under those and the like devices, all the world takes notice, to the no small reproach of the English nation; which we hope is now providing for its own security and redemption, and will be no longer be witched by those inventions.

How desirous we are to contribute to the obtaining the peace and happiness of our subjects without effusion of blood; and how far we are from desiring to recover what belongs to us by a war, if it can be otherwise done, will appear to you by the inclosed Declaration; which, together with this our letter, we have intrusted our right trusty and well-beloved cousin, the lord viscount Mordaunt, and our trusty and well-beloved servant, sir John Grenvil knight, one of the gentlemen of our bed-chamber, to deliver to you; to the end, that you, and all the rest of our good subjects of that our city of London (to whom we desire it should be published) may know, how far we are from the desire of revenge, or that the peace, happiness, and security of the kingdom, should be raised upon any other foundation than the affections and hearts of our subjects, and their own con-

We have not the least doubt of your just sense of these our condescensions, or of your zeal to advance and promote the same good end, by disposing all men to meet us with the same affection and tenderness, in restoring the fundamental laws to that reverence that is due to them, and upon the preservation whereof all our happiness depends. And you will have no reason to doubt of enjoying your full share in that happiness, and of the improving it by our particular affection to you. It is very natural for all men to do all the good they can for their native country, and to advance the honour of it; and as we have that full affection for the kingdom in general, so we would not be thought to be without some extraordinary kindness for our native city in that particular; which we shall manifest on all occasions, not only by renewing their charter, and confirming all those privileges which they have received from our predecessors, but by adding and granting any new favours, which may advance the trade, wealth, and honour of that our native city; for which we will be so solicitous, that we doubt not but that it will, in due time, receive some benefit and advantage in all those respects, even from our own observation and experience abroad. And we are most confident, we shall never be disappointed in our expectation of all possible service from your affections: and so we bid you farewell. Given at our Court at Breda, the 4-14th day of April, 1660, in the twelfth year of our reign.

Lord Clarendon tells us, that "The Committee who were appointed by the House of Commons to prepare an Answer to the King's Letter, found it hard to satisfy all men, who were well contented that the King should be invited to return; but some thought, that the guilt of the nation did require less precipitation than was like to be used; and that the treaty ought first to be made with the King, and conditions of security agreed on, before his majesty should be received. Many of those, who had conferred together before the meeting of the Parliament, had designed some Articles to be prepared, according to the model of those at Killingworth, in the time of king Harry the Third, to which the King should be sworn before he came home. Then the Presbyterian party, of which there were many members in Parliament, though they were rather troublesome than powerful, seemed very solicitous that somewhat should be concluded in veneration of the Covenant; and, at least, that somewhat should be inserted in their Answer to the discountenance of the bishops. But the warmer zeal of the house threw away all those formalities and affectations: they said, 'they had proceeded too far already in their Vote upon the receipt of the letter, to fall back again, and to offend the King with colder expressions of their duty.' In the end, after some days and debate, finding an equal impatience without the walls to that within the house, they were contented to gratify the Presbyterians in the length of the Answer, and in using some expressions which would please them, and could do the King no prejudice; and all agreed, that this Answer should be returned to his Majesty, which is here inserted in the very words."

The ANSWER of the HOUSE of COMMONS to the KING.

Most Royal Sovereign,

We your Majesty's most loyal subjects, the Commons of England assembled in Parliament, do, with all humbleness, present unto your Majesty the unfeigned thankfulness of our hearts, for those gracious expressions of piety, and goodness, and love to us, and the nations under your dominion, which your Majesty's letter of the 4-14th of April, dated from Breda, together with the Declaration inclosed in it of the same date, do so evidently contain. For which we do, in the first place, look up to the great King of Kings, and bless his name, who hath put these thoughts into the heart of our King, to make him glorious in the eyes of his people; as those great deliverances, which that Divine Majesty hath afforded unto your royal person, from many dangers, and the support which he hath given to your heroic and princely mind under various trials, make it appear to all the world that you are precious in his sight. And give us leave to say, that as your Majesty is pleased to declare your confidence in Parliaments, your esteem of them, and this your judgment, and character of them, that they are so necessary for the government of the kingdom, that neither prince nor people can be in any tolerable degree happy without them, and therefore say, that you will hearken unto their counsels, be tender of their privileges, and careful to preserve, and protect them; so we trust, and will, with all humility, be bold to affirm, that your Majesty will not be deceived in us, and that we will never depart from that fidelity which we owe unto your Majesty, that zeal which we bear unto your service, and a constant endeavour to advance your honour and greatness.

And we beseech your Majesty, we may add this farther for the vindication of Parliaments, and even of the last Parliament, convened under your royal father of happy memory, when, as your Majesty well observes, through mistakes and misunderstandings, many inconveniencies were produced, which were not intended, that those very inconveniencies could not have been brought, without violating the Parliament itself. For they well knew it was not possible to do a violence to that sacred person, whilst the Parliament, which had vowed and covenanted for the defence and safety of that person, remained entire. Surely, sir, as the persons of our kings have ever been dear unto Parliaments, so we cannot think of that horrid act committed against the precious life of our late Sovereign, but with such a detestation and abhorrency, as we want words to express it, and, next to wishing it had never been, we wish it may never be remembered by your Majesty, to be unto you an occasion of sorrow, as it will never be remembered by us, but with that grief and trouble of mind which it deserves; being the greatest reproach that ever was incurred by any of the English nation, an offence to all the Protestant churches abroad, and a scandal to the profession of the truth of religion here at home; though both profession, and true professors, and the nation itself, as well as the Parliament, were most innocent of it; it having been only the contrivance and act of some few ambitious and bloody persons, and such others, as by their influence were misled. And as we hope and pray, that God will not impute the guilt of it, nor of all the evil consequences thereof, unto the land, whose divine justice never involves the guiltless with the guilty, so we cannot but give due praise to your Majesty's goodness, who are pleased to entertain such reconciled, and reconciling thoughts, and with them not only meet, but as it were prevent your Parliament and people, proposing yourself in a great measure, and inviting the Parliament to consider farther, and advise your Majesty, what may be necessary to restore the nation to what it hath lost, raise up again the banks and fences of it, and make the kingdom happy by the advancement of religion, the security of our laws, liberties, and estates, and the removing all jealousies and animosities, which may render our peace less certain and durable. Wherein your Majesty gives a large evidence of your great wisdom; judging aright, that, after so high a distemper, and such an universal shaking of the very foundations, great care must be had to repair the breaches, and much circumspection and industry used to provide things necessary for the strengthening of those repairs, and preventing whatsoever may disturb or weaken them.

We shall immediately apply ourselves to the preparing of these things; and in a very short time, we hope to be able to present them to your Majesty; and for the present do with all humble thankfulness, acknowledge your grace and favour in assuring us of your royal concurrence with us, and saying, that we shall not expect any thing from you, but what you will be as ready to give, as we to receive. And we cannot doubt of your Majesty's effectual performance, since your own princely judgment hath prompted unto you the necessity of doing such things; and your piety and goodness hath carried you to a free tender of them to your faithful parliament. You speak as a gracious king, and we will do what befits dutiful, loving, and loyal subjects; who are yet more engaged to honour, and highly esteem your Majesty, for your declining, as you were pleased to say, all foreign assistance, and rather trusting to your people; who, we do assure your Majesty, will, and do open their arms with their hearts to receive you, and will spare neither their estates, nor their lives, when your service shall require it of them.

And we have yet more cause to enlarge our praise, and our prayers to God for your Majesty, that you have continued unshaken in your faith; that neither the temptation of allurements, persuasions, and promises from seducing papists on the one hand, nor the persecution, and hard usage from some seduced, and misguided professors of the protestant religion on the other hand, could at all prevail on your Majesty, to make you forsake the rock of Israel, the God of your fathers, and the true Protestant religion, in which your Majesty hath been bred; but you have still been as a rock yourself, firm to your Covenant with your and our God, even now expressing your zeal and affection for the protestant religion, and your care and study for the propagation thereof. This hath been a rejoicing of heart to all the faithful of the land, and an assurance to them that God would not forsake you; but after many trials, which should but make you more precious, as gold out of the fire, would restore your Majesty unto your patrimony, and people, with more splendor and dignity, and make you the glory of kings, and the joy of your subjects: which is, and shall ever be, the prayer of your Majesty's most loyal subjects, the Commons of England assembled in Parliament.

The KING'S PROCLAMATION concerning Traitors, June 6, 1660.

Whereas Owen Roe, Augustine Garland, Robert Tichbourne, &c. being deeply guilty of that most detestable and bloody treason, in sitting upon, and giving Judgment against the life of our royal father; and out of a sense of their own guilt, have lately fled and obscured themselves, whereby they cannot be apprehended and brought to a personal trial for their said treasons, according to law. We do therefore by the advice of our Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled, command, publish and declare, by this our Proclamation, That all and every the persons before named, shall within fourteen days next after the publishing of this our royal Proclamation, personally appear, and render themselves to our Speaker, &c. under pain of being excepted from any Pardon or Indemnity, both for their respective lives and estates.

The following Declaration, containing assurances of mercy, had been published by Charles the Second, during his stay in the island of Jersey in 1649:

HIS Majesty's DECLARATION to all his loving Subjects in his kingdom of England and Dominion of Wales, published with the advice of his Privy Council. CHARLES, the Second of that name, by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all persons within our kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, to whom these presents shall come, greeting.

We cannot, without unspeakable grief and sorrow, call to mind, nor, without horror, express, how that our dear and royal father, king Charles of ever blessed memory, hath been most barbarously and most cruelly murdered by the hands of bloody traitors and rebels, within our kingdom of England, with proceedings and circumstances so prodigious, that the particulars induce rather amazement than expression: and although we have hitherto seemed silent in a matter so highly concerning us as not publicly to express to the people of England our grief of heart and high detestation of that heinous fact; yet being now safely arrived in a small part of our own dominions, at the Island of Jersey, we have thought fit rather from hence, where our kingly authority takes place, than from any foreign country, where we have been hitherto necessitated to reside, publicly to declare, That, out of a bitter sense and indignation of those horrid proceedings against our dear father, we are, according to the laws of nature and justice, firmly resolved, by the assistance of Almighty God, though we perish alone in the enterprize, to be a severe avenger of his innocent blood, which was so barbarously spilt, and which calls so loud to heaven for vengeance. And we shall therein, by all ways and means possible, endeavour to pursue and bring to their due punishment those bloody traitors, who were either actors or contrivers of that unparalleled and inhuman murder. And since it hath pleased God so to dispose, as by such an untimely Martyrdom to deprive us of so good a father, and England of so gracious a king, we do further declare, 'That, by his death, the crown of England, with all privileges, rights, and pre-eminences belonging thereunto, is, by a clear and undoubted right of succession, justly and lineally descended upon us, as next and immediate heir and successor thereunto, without any condition or limitation; without any intermission or claim; without any ceremony or solemnity whatsoever: and that, by virtue thereof, we are now in right lawfully seized of the said crown, and ought, by the laws of God, and that nation, to enjoy a royal power there as well in Church as Commonwealth; to govern the people of that kingdom according to the ancient and known laws; to maintain them in peace and justice; and to protect and defend them from the oppression of any usurped power whatsoever. And the people of that nation, by the like laws, owe unto us, and ought reciprocally to pay, duty and obedience, as unto their liege lord and sovereign. This royal right of ours is grounded upon so clear a title, is settled by such fundamental laws, confirmed by so many oaths of allegiance in all ages, is supported by such a long continued succession in our royal progenitors, and by such a constant submission of all the people, that the same can admit of no dispute; no act of our predecessors can debar us of it; no power on earth can justly take it from us; and, by the undoubted laws of that nation, to oppose us, either in the claim or exercise thereof, is a treason of the highest degree.—And although the bloody contrivers of our father's murder, out of a pernicious hatred to all monarchies, have by force, as much as in them lies, disinherited us of our princely right thereunto; banished and proscribed us; seized all our revenues; prohibited all intercourse and supplies to be sent to us; and have, by violence, imposed upon the people of England a new yoke of popular tyranny, to the utter subversion not only of our just rights, but of their laws and liberties; yet we do profess that we cannot persuade ourself that the body of the English nation hath so far degenerated from their antient loyalty and virtue, as to consent to these horrid proceedings against us, or to approve the casting off that kingly Government under which they and their forefathers have happily flourished so many ages past, to the envy of all their neighbour nations. How can that once happy nation of England despair of blessed days under a royal sceptre, and vainly hope for them under the iron rod of an insolent multitude? no, we cannot look upon these sad and dismal changes as the desires or intentions of the better part of our subjects of that kingdom; but rather as the designs and contrivances of those wicked murderers of our father; whose ambition is endless; whose avarice is unsatiable; and whose guilt hath made them desperate: and therefore out of a confidence we have of the loyalty and good affections of many of our subjects of that nation, and as well for their encouragement, who still persist in their natural allegiance and obedience to us, as for the security of such as shall yet return to their duties and loyalties, we have thought fit hereby further to declare.—That we are graciously pleased to receive all persons of our kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, other than such who voted or acted in that bloody murder of our dear father, into our royal grace, mercy, and protection; owning and esteeming them all as our good and loving subjects, whom, upon access to our kingly authority, we shall hold ourself bound, according to the law of God, the known laws of that nation, and the duty of our kingly office, to protect, maintain, and preserve in wealth, peace and happiness. And for a clear evidence of our good intentions towards them, we shall be contented freely to pardon, or otherwise by act to declare or hold indemnified, all persons within our said kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, except as before excepted, for any matters whatsoever relating to the late unhappy wars and distractions. And we shall, according to the example of our dear father, be ready, upon the establishment of our royal throne, to make such further concessions, for the satisfaction and security of our good subjects in general, and of all interests in particular, as shall be adjudged most to conduce to the peace and happiness of that kingdom.—And we do further declare, That we shall give our utmost assistance to restore parliaments to their ancient dignity and honour, and shall preserve their just privileges, and join to repair all those injuries and affronts which have been done to the members of that high court.—And because all ways of gaining a mutual confidence betwixt us and our good subjects are at present obstructed, by the usurped force and power now prevalent in that kingdom, we are therefore resolved to make use of such expedients as shall be necessary for the suppression of that tyrannical and unjust power now exercised over them, and for bringing to their due punishment those bloody murderers of our dear father, for shaking off the heavy burdens and taxes they now groan under, and for restoring our just rights, and the ancient liberties and freedom of the English nation; not doubting but we shall find all our good subjects ready to concur and to assist us in our just and pious undertakings for those ends.—And in the mean time, we require and command all our said subjects, according to their duty to God, their allegiance to us, their several oaths and protestations, and the love and affection they bear to the peace of their native country, that they do not betray their lawful king, nor the glorious liberties and laws of England, into a perpetual slavery, by acknowledgment of, or voluntary submission to, any new forms or models of government, under the name or mask of a Free State, nor under any other title or pretence whatsoever.—Given at our court at Castle Elizabeth, in our Isle of Jersey, 31st Oct. 1649, the 1st year of our reign.

In the next year, Charles was prevailed upon by the Scots, to issue the following Declaration,* likewise containing assurances of mercy:

BY THE KING.

His Majesty taking in consideration that merciful dispensation of divine providence, by which he hath been recovered out of the snare of evil counsel, and having attained so full persuasion and confidence of the loyalty of his people in Scotland, with whom he hath too long stood at a distance, and of the righteousness of their cause, as to join in one Covenant with them, and to cast himself and his interests wholly upon God, and in all matters civil to follow the advice of his parliament, and such as shall be entrusted by them, and in all matters ecclesiastic the advice of the general assembly and their commissioners: And being sensible of his duty to God, and desirous to approve himself to the consciences of all his good subjects, and to stop the mouths of his and their enemies and traducers, doth in reference to his former deportments, and as to his resolutions for the future, declare as follows:

* "A Declaration by the King's Majesty to his Subjects of the Kingdoms of Scotland, England, and Ireland." Edinburgh, printed by Evan Tyler, Printer to the King's most Excellent Majesty, 1660.

Though his Majesty as a dutiful son, be obliged to honour the memory of his royal father, and have in estimation the person of his mother, yet doth he desire to be deeply humbled and afflicted in spirit before God, because of his father's hearkening to and following evil counsels, and his opposition to the work of Reformation and to the Solemn League and Covenant, by which so much of the blood of the Lord's people hath been shed in these kingdoms. And for the idolatry of his mother, the toleration whereof in the king's house, as it was matter of great stumbling to all the Protestant churches, so could it not but be a high provocation against him who is a jealous God, visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children: And albeit his Majesty might extenuate his former carriage and actions, in following of the advice and walking in the way of those who are opposite to the Covenant, and to the work of God, and might excuse his delaying to give satisfaction to the just and necessary desires of the Kirk and Kingdom of Scotland, from his education and age, and evil counsel and company, and from the strange and insolent proceedings of sectaries against his royal father, and in reference to religion and the ancient government of the Kingdom of England, to which he hath the undoubted right of succession, yet knowing that he hath to do with God, he doth ingenuously acknowledge all his own sins and all the sins of his father's house, craving pardon, and hoping for mercy and reconciliation, through the blood of Jesus Christ. And as he doth value the constant addresses, that were made by his people to the throne of grace on his behalf, when he stood in opposition to the work of God, as a singular testimony of long suffering patience and mercy upon the Lord's part, and loyalty upon theirs, so doth he hope, and shall take it as one of the greatest tokens of their love and affection to him and to his government, that they will continue in prayer and supplication to God for him, that the Lord who spared and preserved him to this day, notwithstanding of all his own guiltiness, may be at peace with him, and give him to fear the Lord his God, and to serve him with a perfect heart, and with a willing mind all the days of his life.

And his Majesty having upon full persuasion of the justice and equity of all the heads and articles thereof, now sworn and subscribed the national Covenant of the Kingdom of Scotland, and the Solemn League and Covenant of the three Kingdoms of Scotland, England and Ireland, doth declare that he hath not sworn and subscribed these Covenants, and entered into the oath of God with his people, upon any sinister intention and crooked design for attaining his own ends, but so far as human weakness will permit in the truth and sincerity of his heart, and that he is firmly resolved in the Lord's strength to adhere thereto, and to prosecute to the utmost of his power all the ends thereof, in his station and calling, really, constantly and sincerely all the days of his life:

In order to which he doth in the first place profess and declare, that he will have no enemies but the enemies of the Covenant, and that he will have no friends but the friends of the Covenant. And therefore as he doth now detest and abhor all popery, superstition and idolatry, together with prelacy and all errors, heresy, schism and profaneness, and resolves not to tolerate, much less allow any of these in any part of his Majesty's dominions, but to oppose himself thereto, and to endeavour the extirpation thereof to the utmost of his power; So doth he as a Christian exhort, and as a King require that all such of his subjects who have stood in opposition to the Solemn League and Covenant and work of Reformation, upon a pretence of kingly interest, or any other pretext whatsoever, to lay down their enmity against the cause and people of God, and to cease to prefer the interest of man to the interest of God, which hath been one of those things that hath occasioned many troubles and calamities in these Kingdoms, and being insisted into, will be so far from establishing of the king's throne, that it will prove an idol of jealousy to provoke unto wrath him who is King of Kings and Lord of Lords: The king shall always esteem them best servants, and most loyal subjects, who serve him and seek his greatness in a right line of subordination unto God, giving unto God the things that are God's, and unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and resolveth not to love or countenance any, who have so little conscience and piety, as to follow his interests with a prejudice to the gospel and the kingdom of Jesus Christ, which he looks not upon as a duty, but as flattery, and driving of self-designs, under a pretence of maintaining royal authority and greatness.

II. His Majesty being convinced in conscience, of the exceeding great sinfulness and unlawfulness of that Treaty and Peace made with the bloody Irish Rebels, who treacherously shed the blood of so many of his faithful and loyal subjects in Ireland, and of allowing unto them the liberty of the Popish religion; for the which he doth from his heart desire to be deeply humbled before the Lord: And likewise considering how many breaches have been upon their part, doth declare the same to be void, and that his Majesty is absolved therefrom; being truly sorry that he should have sought unto so unlawful help for restoring of him to his throne, and resolving for the time to come, rather to choose affliction than sin.

III. As his Majesty did in the late Treaty with his people in this kingdom, agree to recal and annul all Commissions against any of his subjects who did adhere to the Covenant, and monarchical government in any of his kingdoms; so doth he now declare, that by commissionating of some persons by sea, against the people of England, he did not intend damage or injury to his oppressed and harmless subjects in that kingdom, who follow their trade of merchandize in their lawful callings, but only the opposing and suppressing of those who had usurped the government, and not only bar him from his just right, but also exercise an arbitrary power over his people, in those things which concern their persons, consciences and estates: And as since his coming into Scotland, he hath given no Commissions against any of his subjects in England or Ireland, so he doth hereby assure and declare, That he will give none to their prejudice or damage, and whatever shall be the wrongs of these usurpers, that he will be so far from avenging these upon any who are free thereof, by interrupting and stopping the liberty of trade and merchandise or otherwise, that he will seek their good, and to the utmost employ his royal power, that they may be protected and defended against the unjust violence of all men whatsoever. And albeit his Majesty desireth to construe well of the intentions of those (in reference to his Majesty) who have been active in counsel or arms against the Covenant; Yet being convinced that it doth conduce for the honour of God, the good of his cause, and his own honour and happiness, and for the peace and safety of these kingdoms, that such be not employed in places of power and trust, he doth declare, that he will not employ nor give Commissions to any such, until they have not only taken or renewed the Covenant, but also have given sufficient evidences of their integrity, carriage, and affection to the work of Reformation, and shall be declared capable of trust by the parliament of either kingdom respective: And his Majesty upon the same grounds, doth hereby recal all Commissions given to any such persons; conceiving all such persons will so much tender a good understanding betwixt him and his subjects, and the settling and preserving a firm peace in these kingdoms, that they will not grudge nor repine at his Majesty's resolutions and proceedings therein, much less upon discontent act any thing in a divided way unto the raising of new troubles; especially since upon their pious and good deportment, there is a regress left unto them in manner above expressed.

And as his Majesty hath given satisfaction to the just and necessary desires of the Kirk and Kingdom of Scotland, so doth he hereby assure and declare, that he is no less willing and desirous to give satisfaction to the just and necessary desires of his good subjects in England and Ireland; and in token thereof, if the houses of parliament of England sitting in freedom, shall think fit to present unto him the propositions of peace agreed upon by both kingdoms, he will not only accord to the same and such alterations thereanent, as the houses of parliament in regard of the constitution of affairs, and the good of his Majesty and his Kingdoms, shall judge necessary, but do what is further necessary for prosecuting the ends of the Solemn League and Covenant, especially in those things which concern the Reformation of the Church of England, in doctrine, worship, discipline, and government; that not only the Directory of Worship, the Confession of Faith and Catechism, but also the Propositions and Directory for Church Government, accorded upon by the Synod of Divines at Westminster, may be settled, and that the Church of England may enjoy the full liberty and freedom of all assemblies and power of kirk censures, and of all the ordinances of Jesus Christ according to the rule of his own Word, and that whatsoever is commanded by the God of heaven, may be diligently done for the house of the God of heaven. And whatever heretofore hath been the suggestions of some to him, to render his Majesty jealous of his parliament, and of the servants of God; yet as he hath declared, that in Scotland he will hearken to their counsel, and follow their advice in those things that concern that kingdom and kirk; So doth he also declare his firm resolution to manage the government of the kingdom of England, by the advice of his parliament, consisting of an house of lords, and of an house of commons there, and in those things that concern religion to prefer the counsels of the ministers of the gospel, to all other counsels whatsoever; And that all the world may see how much he tenders the safety of his people, and how precious their blood is in his sight, and how desirous he is to recover his crown and government in England by peaceable means, as he doth esteem the service of those who first engaged in the Covenant, and have since that time faithfully followed the ends thereof, to be duty to God, and loyalty to him; So is he willing in regard of others, who have been involved in these late commotions in England against religion and government, to pass an Act of Oblivion, excepting only some few in that nation, who have been chief obstructers of the work of Reformation, and chief authors of the change of the government, and of the murder of his royal father; Provided, that these who are to have the benefit of this act lay down arms, and return unto the obedience of their lawful sovereign.

The Committee of Estates of the kingdom, and General Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland, having declared so fully in what concerns the sectaries, and the present designs, resolutions, and actings of their army against the kingdom of Scotland, and the same Committee and Assembly having sufficiently laid open public dangers and duties both upon the right hand, and upon the left: It is not needful for his Majesty to add any thing thereunto, except that in those things he doth commend and approve them, and that he resolves to live and die with them and his loyal subjects, in prosecution of the ends of the Covenant.

And whereas that prevailing party in England, after all their strange usurpations and insolent actings in that land, do not only keep his Majesty from the government of that kingdom by force of arms, but also have now invaded the kingdom of Scotland, who have deserved better things at their hands, and against whom they have no just quarrel, his Majesty doth therefore desire and expect that all his good subjects in England, who are and resolve to be faithful to God and to their king, according to the Covenant, will lay hold upon such an opportunity, and use their utmost endeavours to promote the Covenant and all the ends thereof, and to recover and re-establish the ancient government of the kingdom of England (under which for many generations it did flourish in peace and plenty at home, and in reputation abroad) and privileges of the parliament, and native and just liberty of the people. His Majesty desires to assure himself that there doth remain in these so much confidence of their duty to religion, their king and country, and so many sparkles of the ancient English valour, which shined so eminently in their noble ancestors; as will put them on to bestir themselves for breaking the yoke of those men's oppressions from off their necks. Shall men of conscience and honour set religion, liberties and government at so low a rate, as not rather to undergo any hazard, before they be thus deprived of them? will not all generous men count any death more tolerable, than to live in servitude all their days? and will not posterity blame those who dare attempt nothing for themselves, and for their children, in so good a cause, in such an exigent? Whereas if they gather themselves, and take courage, putting on a resolution answerable to so noble and just an enterprise, they shall honour God, and gain themselves the reputation of pious men, worthy patriots, and loyal subjects, and be called the repairers of the breach, by the present and succeeding generations; and they may certainly promise to themselves a blessing from God upon so just and honourable undertaking for the Lord and for his cause, for their own liberties, their native king and country, and the unvaluable good and happiness of the posterity. Whatever hath formerly been his Majesty's guiltiness before God, and the bad success that these have had who owned his affairs, whilst he stood in opposition to the work of God, yet the state of the question being now altered, and his Majesty having obtained mercy to be on God's side, and to prefer God's interest before his own, he hopes that the Lord will be gracious and countenance his own cause, in the hands of weak and sinful instruments, against all enemies whatsoever. This is all that can be said by his Majesty at present to these in England and Ireland, at such a distance: And as they shall acquit themselves at this time in the active discharge of their necessary duties, so shall they be accepted before God, endeared to his Majesty, and their names had in remembrance throughout the world. Given at our Court at Dumfermline, the 16th day of August, 1650. And in the second year of our reign.

In Thurloe's State Papers, vol. 2, p. 248, is printed the following Instrument, also containing assurances of mercy:

By the King.

Charles the Second, by the grace of God king of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, to all our good and loving subjects, peace and prosperity. Whereas it is apparent to all rational and unbiassed men throughout the world, that a certain mechanic fellow, by name Oliver Cromwell, hath by most wicked and accursed ways and means, against all laws both divine and human, (taking opportunity through the late sad and unnatural wars in our kingdoms) most tyrannically and traitorously usurped the supreme power over our said kingdoms, to the enslaving and ruining the persons and estates of the good people our free subjects therein, after he had most inhumanly and barbarously butchered our dear father, of sacred memory, his just and lawful sovereign: these are therefore in our name to give free leave and liberty to any man whomsoever, within any of our three kingdoms, by pistol, sword, or poison, or by any other ways or means whatsoever, to destroy the life of the said Oliver Cromwell; wherein they will do an act acceptable to God and good men, by cutting so detestable a villain from the face of the earth: and whosoever, whether soldier or other, shall be instrumental in so signal a piece of service, both to God, to his king, and to his country, we do by these presents, and in the word and faith of a Christian king, promise, as a reward for his good service, to give to him and his heirs for ever 500*l.* per annum, free land, or the full sum in money, for which such a proportion may be purchased of the owners, and also the honour of knighthood to him and his heirs; and if he shall be a soldier of the army, we do also promise to give him a colonel's place and such honourable employment, wherein he may be capable of attaining to farther preferment answerable to his merit. And because we know, that great numbers are involved in the same guilt with the said Oliver, more through his crafty ensnaring devices, than their own malicious or wilful inclinations; we do therefore freely pardon and forgive all and every man whatsoever, for all and every thing by them done and committed against our person, crown, and dignity, or whatsoever hath been by them done or committed in the prosecution of the late wars, provided that they or any of them so guilty shall within six days after their certain notice of Cromwell's death, renounce and forsake their rebellious courses, and submit themselves to our mercy and clemency; and also whosoever shall before that time, upon a just and fair opportunity leave partaking with those wicked men, and declare for the just rights and privileges of us and our people, his king and his country, shall not only be pardoned for whatsoever is past, but receive a signal reward, and shall be by us employed and trusted with command answerable to his quality; excepting only from this our pardon, William Lenthall late Speaker of the Commons, and John Bradshaw, president of that bloody court, commonly called the High Court of Justice, and sir Arthur Hazelrig, and no other; but all men else to enjoy the full benefit of this our free pardon, in case they perform the conditions above required. Given at Paris, the 3rd of May 1654. [N. S.]

What Clarendon says of the opinion of some that "conditions of security should be agreed on," is explained by a passage in Burnet's Summary of Affairs, before the Restoration :

"I need not open the scene of the new parliament, (or convention, as it came afterwards to be called, because it was not summoned by the king's writ :) Such unanimity appeared in their proceedings, that there was not the least dispute among them, but upon one single point. Yet that was a very important one. Hale, afterwards the famous Chief Justice, moved that a committee might be appointed to look into the propositions that had been made, and the concessions that had been offered by the late king during the war; particularly at the treaty of Newport, that from thence they might digest such propositions as they should think fit to be sent over to the king. This was seconded, but I do not remember by whom. It was foreseen, that such a motion might be set on foot : So Monk was instructed how to answer it, whensoever it should be proposed. He told the house, that there was yet, beyond all men's hope, an universal quiet all over the nation ; but there were many incendiaries still on the watch, trying where they could first raise the flame. He said, he had such copious informations sent him of these things, that it was not fit they should be generally known : He could not answer for the peace, either of the nation or of the army, if any delay was put to the sending for the king : What need was there of sending propositions to him ? Might they not as well prepare them, and offer them to him, when he should come over ? he was to bring neither army nor treasure with him, either to fright them or to corrupt them. So he moved, that they would immediately send commissioners to bring over the king ; And said, that he must lay the blame of all the blood or mischief that might follow on the heads of those, who should still insist on any motion that might delay the present settlement of the nation. This was echoed with such a shout over the house, that the motion was no more insisted on.

"This was indeed the great service that Monk did. It was chiefly owing to the post he was in, and to the credit he had gained : For as to the Restoration itself, the tide run so strong, that he only went into it dexterously enough, to get much fame, and great rewards, for that which will still have a great appearance in history. If he had died soon after, he might have been more justly admired, because less known, and seen only in one advantageous light : But he lived long enough to make it known, how false a judgment men are apt to make upon outward appearance. To the king's coming in without conditions may be well imputed all the errors of his reign. And when the earl of Southampton came to see what he was like to prove, he said once in great wrath to chancellor Hyde, it was to him they owed all they either felt or feared ; for if he had not possessed them in all his letters with such an opinion of the king, they would have taken care to have put it out of his power either to do himself or them any mischief, which was like to be the effect of their trusting him so entirely. Hyde answered, that he thought the king had so true a judgment and so much good nature, that when the age of pleasure should be over, and the idleness of his exile, which made him seek new diversions for want of other employment, was turned to an obligation to mind affairs, then he would have shaken off those entanglements."

It is true that in the confusions which subsisted after the deposition of Richard Cromwell, the thoughts of the nation in general were directed to the calling in of Charles the second, as the most easy, safe, and certain method of establishing permanent tranquillity, yet the co-operation of the army in that measure, which certainly could not have been effected without that co-operation, was extremely doubtful ; so that it may be questioned by those who most highly respect the good intentions of the upright and patriotic Hale, whether his motion, mentioned by Burnet, was upon the whole expedient. Some delay it must have produced ; and if high debates had arisen, in the course of digesting the propositions, it is by no means improbable that the Restoration might have been prevented. Mr. Burke well observes, that "The king did not in reality grant an act of indemnity ; the prevailing power, then in a manner the nation, granted an indemnity to him. The idea of a preceding rebellion, was not at all admitted in that convention, and that parliament. The Regicides were a common enemy and as such given up." Remarks on the Policy of the Allies, 7th vol. of his works, octavo edition 1808: p. 196. In another place he says : "The man given to us by Monk, was a man without any sense of his duty as a prince ; without any regard to the dignity of his crown ; without any love to his people ; dissolute, false, venal, and destitute of any positive good quality whatsoever, except a pleasant temper, and the manners of a gentleman. Yet the Restoration of our monarchy even in the person of such a prince, was every thing to us, for without monarchy in England, most certainly we never can enjoy either peace or liberty." Letter to a Member of the National Assembly, 6th vol. of his Works, octavo edition, 1808, p. 46.

A very curious Pamphlet respecting the State of England, printed in the year 1659, has in this year (A. D. 1809) been republished by the very learned and indefatigable Baron Maseres, in a volume of "Occasional Essays." The title of the pamphlet is, "The Interest of England stated ; Or a Faithful and Just Account of the Aims of All Parties now Pretending, distinctly treating of the Designments of the Roman Catholic, the Royalist, the Presbyterian, the Anabaptist, The Army, The Late Protector, the Parliament, with their Effects in respect of Themselves, of One Another, and of the Public; clearly evidencing the unavoidable Ruin upon all, from Longer Contest; and offering an Expedient for the Composure of the Respective Differences to the Security, and Advantage not only of every Single Interest, but to the bringing Solid Lasting Peace unto the Nation." The "Expedient" was the calling in of Charles the second, of whom a most favourable representation is given in the pamphlet. Some very shrewd reflections concerning the Restoration are to be found in a 30th of January sermon, preached before the Lords, by the great bishop Butler.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE JUDGES UPON THE CASE OF THE REGICIDES.

(From Kelyng's Reports.)

After the happy Restoration of king Charles the Second, to his right of the Crown of England, which was in May, 1660, several persons who were apprehended for the murder of his father, were now to be indicted for that horrid treason, and in order thereto, the then judges, who, at that time, were only the lord Bridgman, then Chief Baron of the Exchequer; justice Foster, and justice Hyde, then Judges of the Common Pleas, and justice Mallet, then Judge of the King's Bench, met several times at Serjeant's-inn, in Fleet-street, with sir Geoffry Palmer, the King's Attorney, and sir Heneage Finch, the King's Solicitor, sir Edward Turner, Attorney to the Duke of York; Mr. Wadham Windham, of Lincoln's-inn, and myself, being by special order to attend that service as counsel for the king, there being then no king's serjeant, but serjeant Glanvil, serjeant to the late king, who was then old and infirm: and in order to the proceeding in that great affair, I was appointed to make as many queries as I thought fit to be advised upon; which I did accordingly, and upon them, these things following were resolved.

1. That it was better to try those traitors at the Sessions at Newgate by Commission of Gaol-Delivery, than only by Special Commission of Oyer and Terminer, because then they might be proceeded against more speedily, and arraigned and tried immediately, by the Commission of Gaol-Delivery, and Tales might be immediately returned at the Gaol-Delivery. And accordingly writs were ordered to be made and sent to the lieutenant of the Tower, in whose custody the prisoners then were, to deliver them to the sheriffs of London, and writs to the sheriffs of London to receive them, that they might be in Newgate; which was done accordingly. And because by an Act of Parliament or Convention which sat at the king's coming in, English proceedings were continued until Michaelmas now close at hand, but not yet come; therefore those writs to the lieutenant of the Tower and sheriff of London were ordered to be in English.

2. It was agreed that all the prisoners should be arraigned the first day, before any of them were brought to trial; and the next day to proceed to trial with one or more of them together, as should be thought fit upon the place.

3. It was resolved that any of the king's counsel might privately manage the Evidence to the Grand Inquest, in order to the finding of the Bill of Indictment, and agreed that it should be done privately; it being usual in all cases, that the prosecutors upon indictments are admitted to manage the evidence for finding the bill, and the king's counsel are the only prosecutors in the king's case; for he cannot prosecute in person.*

4. It was resolved, that the indictments should be, for compassing the death of the late king, (the very compassing and imagining of the king's death, being the treason within the statute 25 Edw. 3,†) and then that

* Upon the Indictment of Hardy and others for Treason, A. D. 1704, the Solicitor for the Crown attended the Grand Jury for the like purpose, at the desire of the Grand Jury and by leave of the Court. [From the information of Mr. Clarkson, the Attorney employed for Hardy.]

In the Case of the earl of Shaftsbury, A. D. 1681, post, the two Chief Justices, Pemberton and North, said, that it had always been the practice to examine the witnesses before the grand jury in public, whenever it had been requested by those who prosecuted for the king. Mr. Christian apprehends that to be the last instance of such a procedure. See 4 Blackst. Com. 303. 15 Ed. Note 1.

"I know not," says sir John Hawles in his Remarks on Colledge's Case, A. D. 1681, post, "how long the practice in that matter of admitting counsel to a grand jury hath been; I am sure it is a very unjustifiable and unsufferable one. If the grand jury have a doubt in point of law, they ought to have recourse to the court, and that publicly and not privately; and not rely on the private opinion of counsel, especially king's counsel, who are, or at least behave themselves as if they were, parties."

Old Translation.

"Item, whereas divers opinions have been before this time in what case Treason shall be said, and in what not; The King, at the request of the Lords and of the Commons, hath made a declaration in the manner as hereafter followeth; That is to say, When a man doth compass or imagine the death of our Lord the King, or of our Lady his Queen, or of their eldest son and heir; or if a man do violate the King's companion, or the King's eldest daughter unmarried, or the wife of the King's eldest son and heir; or if a man do levy war against our Lord the King in his Realm or be adherent to the King's Enemies in his Realm, giving to them aid and comfort in the Realm, or elsewhere, and thereof be probably attainted of open deed by the people of their condition. And if a man counterfeit the King's Great or Privy Seal, or his money; and, if a man bring false money into this realm, counterfeit to the money of England, as the money called Lushburgh, or other like to the said money of England, knowing the money to be false, to merchandize or make payment in deceit of our said Lord the King, and of his people; and, if a man slea the Chancellor, Treasurer, or the King's Justices of the one bench or the other, Justices in Eyre, or Justices of Assize, and all other Justices assigned to hear and determine, being in their places doing their offices. And it is to be understood, that in the cases above rehearsed that ought to be judged Treason, which extends to our Lord the King and his Royal Majesty: And of such Treason the forfeiture of the Escheats, pertaineth to our Sovereign Lord, as well of the lands and the special circumstances as it was done; and should be made use of as one of the overt-acts, to prove the compassing of his death.

And moreover, there is another manner of Treason, that is to say, when a servant slayeth his master, or a wife her husband, or when a man secular or religious, slayeth his prelate, to whom he oweth faith and obedience: And of such Treason the Escheats ought to pertain to every Lord of his own fee. And because that many other like cases of Treason, may happen in time to come, which a man cannot think nor declare at this present time; it is accorded, That if any other case supposed Treason, which is not above specified, doth happen before any Justices, the Justices shall tarry without any going to Judgment of the Treason, till the cause be shewed and declared before the King and his Parliament, whether it ought to be judged Treason or other felony. And if percase any man of this Realm, ride armed covertly or secretly with men of arms against any other, to slay him, or rob him, or take him, or retain him till he hath made fine or ransom for to have his deliverance, it is not the mind of the King nor his Council, that in such case it shall be judged Treason, but shall be judged Felony or Trespass, according to the laws of the land of old time used, and according as the case requireth. And if in such case, or other like, before this time, any Justices have judged Treason, and for this cause the lands and tenements have come into the King's hands as forfeit, the chief lords of the fee shall have the Escheats of the tenements holden of them, whether that the same tenements be in the King's hands, or in others, by gift or in other manner; Saving always to our Lord the King, the year, and the waste, and the forfeitures of Chattels, which pertain to him in the cases above named; And that the writs of Scire Facias be granted in such case, against the land tenants without other original, without allowing any protection in the said suit: And that of the lands which be in the King's hands, writs be granted to the sheriffs of the counties where the lands be to deliver them out of the King's hands without delay."

Mr. Luders's Translation.

"Also, Whereas there have been divers opinions heretofore, what case, when it happeneth, ought to be called Treason, and in what case not, the King, at the request of the Lords and of the Commons, hath made the Declaration following: that is to say, In case where a man doth compass or imagine the death of our Lord the King, the Lady his Consort, or of their eldest son and heir; or if a man violate the King's Consort, or the King's eldest daughter being unmarried, or the consort of the King's eldest son and heir. And if a man levy war against our said Lord the King in his realm, or be adherent to the enemies of our Lord the King in the realm, giving to them aid and support in

"And if a man counterfeit the great seal of the King, or his money; and if a man bring false money into this realm, counterfeiting the money of England, as the money called Lushburghs, or other like unto the said money of England, knowing the money to be false, to merchandise or make payment, in deceit of our said Lord the King and his people.

"And if a man slay the Chancellor, Treasurer, or Justice of our Lord the King of either Bench, a Justice in Eyre, and of the Assises, and all other Justices assigned to hear and determine, being in their Courts doing the duty thereof.

"And be it known that in the cases above-named there ought to be judgment of Treason, for that it extendeth unto our Lord the King, and his royal majesty. And of such sort of Treason the forfeiture of escheats belongeth to our Lord the King, as well of lands and tenements holden of others as of himself.

"Moreover, there is another sort of Treason, that is to say, When a servant slayeth his master, a wife slayeth her husband; when a man of religion or secular slayeth his prelate to whom he oweth faith and obedience. And such sort of Treason giveth the forfeiture of escheats to every Lord in his own fee.

"And forasmuch as many other cases of like Treason may happen in time to come, which a man cannot think or declare at this present, it is assented, That, if another case, supposed to be treason, which is not above-specified, should happen anew before any Justices, the Justice shall tarry, without proceeding to the judgment of Treason; until the case be shewed before our Lord the King and his Parliament, and it be declared whether this ought to be adjudged Treason or other felony.

"And if it happen that any man of this realm should ride forth in arms, openly or secretly, with armed men against any other, to slay him or rob him, or to seize and detain him until he make fine or ransom for his deliverance, it is not the intent of the King and his Council that in such case it should be adjudged Treason; but it shall be adjudged felony or trespass, according to the law of the land of old time used, and according to what the case requireth. And if in such case or other like before this time, any Justice shall have adjudged it Treason, and for this cause the lands and tenements have come into the hand of our Lord the King as forfeit, the chief Lords of the fee shall have their escheats of the tenements holden of them, whether the tenements be in our Lord the King's hand, or in the hand of others by gift or otherwise.

which belong to him in the cases above-named. And writs of Scire facias against the landholders shall be granted in such case, without other original, and without allowing the protection of our Lord the King in the said suit. And of the lands that are in the King's hand, Writs of Outtermain shall be granted to the Sheriffs of the Shires where the lands may be, without further delay."

* By st. 7 W. 3, c. 3, § 8, it is enacted, "That no evidence shall be admitted or given of any overt-act that is not expressly laid in the indictment against any person or persons whatsoever." Mr. East, (Pleas of the Crown, ch. 2, sec. 57), following Foster, says, "That this rule, though expressly prescribed by the statute, in order to suppress some abuses that had appeared in the heat of prosecutions for treason, is in truth no more than the common law itself directs generally. For in no case is a prisoner bound to answer unprepared for every action of his life, but only to that which is the subject of the indictment against him: and therefore no evidence ought to be admitted in any prosecution but what immediately relates to the crime imputed. This I think was always the law as well as the just rule in this particular case; though it must be owned that some high authorities did seem to countenance a contrary doctrine; which justifies the caution and wisdom of parliament in securing the observance of the rule by a legislative provision. But the meaning of the statute has often been attempted to be strained the other way; and such a construction has been argued for as would, if it had prevailed, have made it necessary to set forth specifically every fact intended to be proved at the trial. The true sense of the clause is, that no overt-act amounting to a distinct independent charge, though falling under the same head of treason, shall be admitted in evidence, unless it be expressly laid in the indictment; but an overt-act may be given in evidence, though it be not expressly laid, or not well laid in the indictment, if it amount to direct proof of any overt-act which is well laid.

"On the other hand, if the overt-act offered in evidence and not laid in the indictment be no direct proof of any of the overt-acts charged, but merely go to strengthen the evidence or suspicion of some of those overt-acts by a collateral circumstance, such evidence cannot be admitted, notwithstanding the opinion of lord Hale to the contrary.

"But though some overt-acts must be laid and proved in the instances before-mentioned, yet it is not necessary that the whole detail of the evidence should be set forth. The common law never required this exactness; and the statute of William does not make it necessary

6. It was resolved that there need not be two witnesses to prove every overt-act, tending to the compassing of the king's death. But one witness to prove one overt-act tending to the compassing of the king's death, and another witness to prove another act tending to the same end, are sufficient; for compassing the king's death, is treason. And then if two several witnesses prove two several acts, tending to the compassing the king's death; the treason is proved by two witnesses, as the law in case of treason requireth.*

7. It was resolved, that if several persons be indicted together in one indictment for one crime, in case some of them be found guilty by one jury, and afterwards some of the same jury be returned for trial of others in the same indictment; it is no challenge for those prisoners to say, that those jurors have already given their verdict, and found others guilty who are indicted in the same indictment for the same offence; for though they are all indicted in the same indictment for the same offence, yet in the law it is a several indictment against every one of them, and the crime is several, and one may be guilty, and not another; and the jury are to give their verdict upon particular evidence, against every several person, and therefore the finding one guilty is no argument or presumption that those jurors will find another guilty.† to charge particular facts where it was not necessary before. It is sufficient that the charge be stated with reasonable certainty, so that the prisoner may be apprised of the nature of it. Thus the laying, that A. and B. met and proposed the means how to effect the king's death, is sufficient, without alleging the particular means upon which they agreed, which is matter of evidence."

"The rule, of rejecting all manner of evidence in criminal prosecutions that is foreign to the point in issue, is founded on sound sense and common justice. For no man is bound at the peril of life or liberty, fortune or reputation, to answer at once and unprepared for every action of his life. Few even of the best of men would choose to be put to it. And had not those concerned in state prosecutions, out of their zeal for the public service, sometimes stepped over this rule in the case of treasons, it would perhaps have been needless to have made an express provision against it in that case; since the common law, grounded on the principles of natural justice, hath made the like provision in every other." Foster's Disc. of High Treason, ch. 2. sec. 9.

8. It was resolved, that if several prisoners be put upon one jury, and they challenge peremptorily, and sever in their challenges, that then he who is challenged by one, is to be drawn against all, because the pannel being joint, one juror cannot be drawn against one, and serve for another. But in such case it was agreed the pannel might be severed, and that the same jury might be returned betwixt the king and every one of the prisoners, and then they are to be tried severally; and there the challenge of one prisoner is no challenge to disable the juror so challenged against another prisoner. And the Case of Dr. Ellis's servant, Flow. Com. 100, 101, was agreed to be good law, as to the severing of the pannels in that Case; and accordingly, afterwards upon the trial of Harrison and others, who challenged peremptorily, and severed in their challenges particular jurors, the pannels were severed.*

9. It was resolved, that when the prisoners come to the bar to be tried, their irons ought to be taken off, so that they be not in any torture while they make their defence, be their crime

A. D. 1696, post. Scroop, the second of the Regicides tried, desired that those who had been challenged on the former trial might not be called again. But the Court said, 'No: that cannot be: that is nothing to you.' But in the Case of sir Miles Stapleton, tried for High Treason, at York, A. D. 1681, infra, the prisoner having enquired, whether those that served on the juries of lady Tempest, Mr. Thuring, and Mr. Ingleby, appeared, was answered by the Judge (Dolben), that if they did, care should be taken that they should not be sworn.

† In Cranburne's Case, A. D. 1696, post, when the prisoner, who had been previously arraigned, was brought to the bar, in order for trial, or for some previous motion on his behalf to be made by his counsel, (before which the chief justice required that the prisoner should be in Court) the prisoner being in irons, Holt, Ch. Just. without any application to him said, 'Look you, keeper, you should take off the prisoners irons when they are at the bar, for they should stand at their ease when they are tried,' and Powell, Just. added, 'It should be done: they ought to plead at ease. But the keeper saying that they had not in Court any instruments with which the irons could be removed, it seems that the prisoner continued at the bar in his irons, while certain preliminary exceptions taken on his behalf were argued. When these were disposed of, the Court was adjourned for two hours to dine previously to his trial, and the Ch. Just. said, 'meantime, never so great. And accordingly upon the arraignment and trial of Hewlet and others, who were brought in irons, the Court commanded their irons to be taken off.

you keeper, knock off the prisoner's fetters.' In Vaughan's Case, A. D. 1696, post, when the prisoner (he also had been previously arraigned) was brought to the bar, he desired his irons might be taken off, and Holt, Ch. Just. immediately said, 'Ay, ay, take them off.' In Laver's Case, A. D. 1722, it was strongly urged by the prisoner and his counsel, that his irons should be taken off before he pleaded, and among other authorities this ninth resolution was cited; and it was said that at the trial of Cranburne, when he was brought up here, before my lord chief justice Holt, he insisted that his chains should be taken off, and it was ordered: But by Pratt, Ch. Just., "No doubt when he comes upon his trial, the authority is that he is not to be in Vinculis during his trial, but should be so far free, that he should have the use of his reason, and all advantages to clear his innocence. Here he is only called upon to plead by advice of his counsel; he is not to be tried now; when he comes to be tried, if he makes that complaint, the Court will take care he shall be in a condition proper to make his defence; but when he is only called upon to plead, and his counsel by him to advise him what to plead, why are his chains to be taken off this minute, and to be put on again the next?" The Chief Justice more over said, "If we should order his chains to be taken off, and he escape, I do not know but we are guilty of his escape." Some preliminary objections taken by the prisoner and his counsel were argued on two several days, and during the whole of those proceedings he continued in irons at the bar. On the second of these days he pleaded, Not Guilty, after which some time was spent upon applications for delay of his trial, for permission that his wife and sister might have access to him, and for process to compel the attendance of his witnesses: and during all this time he continued at the bar in irons. On a third day he was brought up to take his trial, and when the first jurymen was called, application was made by the prisoner's counsel that his irons might be taken off; and the Ch. Just. said, "The irons must be taken off: we will not stir till the irons are taken off." After conviction he was brought up another day for judgment, and when the clerk of the crown had asked him what he could say why the Court should not give judgment, &c., his counsel said:

Prisoner's Counsel. Is it your lordship's pleasure to give any directions touching the matter of the prisoner's being in irons? I hope your lordship will order them to be taken off, at least during his attendance here.

L. C. J. I don't know, there is none, of the Cases that have been, which go further than during the time of his trial; his trial is over, if he hath any thing to offer to the Court, and

It being agreed, that the murder of the king should be especially found, with the circumstances, in the Indictment; and it being not known who did that villainous act; it was resolved, that it should be laid that Quidam ignotus, with a visor on his face, did the act; and that was well enough; and the other persons be laid to be present, aiding and assisting therunto.

The compassing the king's death being agreed to be laid in the Indictment, to be 29 Jan. 24 Car. 1. and the murder on the 30th of the same January, it was questioned in which king's reign the 30th Jan. should be laid to be, whether in the reign of king Charles the first, or king Charles the second; and the question grew, because there is no fraction of the day; and all the Acts which tended to the king's mur-

L. C. J. Come, brother Pengelly, have you any thing to object against his irons being taken off, or do you consent to it?

Counsel for the Crown. My lord, we don't oppose it.

Then the irons were taken off.

At the end of Fletcher's Case, A. D. 1746, post, it is said: "N. B. The prisoner desired that his fetters might be taken off while he was on his trial, which the Court granted."

Blackstone, in his Commentaries, b. 4, ch. 25, says, "It is laid down in our antient books, [Bract. l. 3, de Coron. c. 18. sec. 3. Mirr. c. 5, s. 1, § 54. Flet. l. 1, c. 31, § 1. Brit. c. 5. Staundf. C. 308], that, though under an indictment of the highest nature, he must be brought to the bar without irons, or any manner of shackles or bonds; unless there be evident danger of an escape, and then he may be secured with irons. But yet in Laver's Case, A. D. 1722, a difference was taken between the time of arraignment, and the time of trial; and accordingly the prisoner stood at the bar in chains during the time of his arraignment." To which Mr. Christian adds, in a note to the fifteenth edition, "It has since been held that the Court has no authority to order the irons to be taken off, till the prisoner has pleaded and the jury are charged to try him." Waite's Case, Leach 34. It may be observed that Mr. Leach's report states that Waite was tried before baron Reynolds, whereas it appears from East's Pleas of the Crown, ch. 16. s. 17, that in what he calls Shapleigh's MS. (to which he tells us Mr. Just. Buller gave the praise of accuracy) Carter and Depouss are said to have been the judges.

der, until his head was actually severed from his body, were in the time of his own reign, and after his death in the reign of king Charles the second. And though it was agreed by all, except justice Mallet, that one and the same day might in several respects, and as to several Acts, be said to be entirely in two king's reigns; so that in some respects the whole day may be ascribed to one, and in other respects the whole day ascribed to the other, according to the truth in the matters of fact which were acted, either in the life or after the death of the first king; yet because justice Mallet was earnest that the whole day was to be ascribed to king Charles the second; therefore it was agreed, that in that place, no year of any king should be named, but that the compassing of the king's death should be laid on the 29th Jan. 24 Car. 1. And the other acts tending to his murder, and the murder itself, laid to be tricesimo mensis ejusdem Januarii, without naming any year of any king, which was agreed to be certain enough.

12. It being agreed, that the Indictment should be for compassing the king's death; and one of the overt-acts to be the actual murder of the king: It was resolved the Indictment should conclude 'contra pacem nuper domini regis coron' et dignitat' suas, necnon contra pacem domini regis nunc coron' et dignitat' suas.'

13. The question was put, whether the recorder of London should give the Charge to the grand inquest at Hicks's-Hall, where the Indictment was to be found, the fact being in Middlesex; and also whether judgment at the Sessions house, where the prisoners were to be tried, should be given by the recorder, or whether the Charge and the judgment should be given by the Chief Judge: And it was agreed that both should be given by the Judge. And accordingly this was done by my lord Bridgeman, and he gave the Charge only relating to enquire of the murderers of the late king, without mixing any other matter then to be enquired of: and after the Charge, one Indictment was preferred against all the king's murderers, who were in prison, and also against several others who were not then apprehended, but agreed they should be attainted by an outlawry upon the same Indictment. And the same day the Indictment was found, and the next day delivered at the Gaol-Delivery, in the Sessions-house in the Old-Bailey, which day all the prisoners were arraigned, and pleaded Not Guilty, but afterward some of them withdrew their Plea, and confessed the Indictment, viz.

14. Sir Hardress Waller, and Geo. Fleetwood, which was accordingly recorded by the Court, and agreed by all the judges, that it might be done, although the clerk had recorded their plea of Not Guilty; for the entry is, that such a one 'postea, or relicta verifications cognovit Indictamentum.'

"Memorandum, That the Indictment was in Latin, it being preferred after Michaelmas, until which time, all English proceedings were allowed by that Convention which was sitting when the king was restored.

"And after, all the prisoners who pleaded Not Guilty, were convicted upon full Evidence, and had Judgment of High Treason."

"And in case of High Treason, If any one do any thing by which he sheweth his liking and approbation to the traitorous design, this is in him High Treason: For all are principals in High Treason, who contribute towards it by action or approbation.

"And it was resolved that though in case a man be indicted only for words, that is not High Treason. But if a man be indicted for compassing the king's death, there words may be laid as an overt-act to prove that he compassed the death of the king, as it was in the Case of Crohagan, who being beyond sea, spake these words, 'I will kill the king if I can come at him;' and afterwards he came to England, and was taken and indicted for compassing the king's death, and these words laid as an overt-act, and proved, and he had Judgment of High Treason. And Co. Pl. Cor. 14, agreeth, that words set down in writing, are an overt-act to prove the compassing the king's death, as in the Case of Cardinal Poole there cited, and words spoken are the same thing if they be proved; and words are the natural way for a man whereby to express the imagination of the heart. If it be any way declared that a man imagineth the king's death, that is the Treason within the stat. 25 Edw. 3."

The following passage in Kelyng, concerning the law of High Treason, though not relating to this particular Case, may be interesting from its connection with the question which was so long and so stubbornly litigated (for the present settled by stat. 36 G. 3, c. 7.) whether a conspiracy to levy war against the king, is High Treason, under st. 25 Edw. 3.

"Memorandum, That a week before Christmas, 15 Car. 2, my brother Turner, myself, and my brother Archer, were appointed by the king to go to York, for the trial of several persons there taken for conspiring to levy war against the king, and some of them did actually meet in Farneleigh-wood near unto Leeds, with horses, arms, and foot soldiers. And thereupon there was a meeting by the two Chief Justices, my lord Hyde, and my lord Bridgeman; and we three with sir Jeffery Palmer the king's attorney, and sir Heneage Finch the king's Solicitor, did thereupon debate several things which were agreed by us all, viz.

"1. That if several persons do agree to levy war, and some of them do actually appear in arms, and others do not, this is an actual levying of war in all of them, as well those who were not in arms, as those who were, if they be proved to be of the Plot with them who did actually appear in arms; for there are no accessories in Treason, and therefore all that are in the conspiracy are equally guilty.

"In the next place, we being informed that though there was a conspiracy to raise war in the North Riding of Yorkshire, as well as the West Riding, where some did actually appear in arms, yet it could not be proved that those in the North Riding did agree to the rising that was in the West Riding, or that they knew any thing of it, and so would not be within the first Resolution.

"And thereupon the new statute made the 13 Car. 2, for the safety of the king's person, which maketh the conspiracy compassing and intending to raise war to be High Treason, in case they express or declare such imaginations, intentions, &c. by printing, writing, preaching, or malicious and advised speaking; and upon that act it was agreed,

"2. That if one be indicted for imagining or intending to levy war, there must be some overt-act laid in the Indictment to prove such imagination, as there is at this day in Indictments for compassing and imagining the king's death; and it was conceived that no overt-act could be laid to make it Treason within that statute, viz. printing, writing, preaching, or malicious and advised speaking, and we were informed that no printing, writing, or preaching could be proved, and it would be impossible to lay such words as could be fastened on them, and to prove that they spoke them; but in general we were informed, that their consulting and meeting together, and agreeing to raise war would be proved; and thereupon it was resolved that the best and safest way to proceed against them, was to indict them for compassing and imagining the death of the king, and to lay the meeting, consulting, and agreeing to levy war, as one overt-act, and the actual levying war as another overt-act, and so proceed upon the statute 25 Edw. 3.

"3. For it was resolved, and agreed by all now as it was before it was in Tong's Case, and sir H. Vane's Case, that the meeting and consulting to levy war is an overt-act to prove the compassing the king's death, within the statute of 25 Edw. 3. Although the consulting to levy war is not actual levying within the statute, and so cannot be indicted thereupon, for that Treason of levying war. Yet if they be indicted for the Treason of compassing and imagining the king's death, that consulting to levy war is an overt-act to prove that Treason, although Co. Pl. Cor. 14, delivers an opinion against this.

"4. It was resolved, that if persons do actually levy war, so that they may be indicted for the Treason of levying of war, within the stat. 25 Edw. 3, yet they may be indicted for compassing the king's death, and their actual levying of war may be laid as an overt-act to prove the compassing the king's death: And though Co. Pl. Cor. 14, be of another opinion, yet that is no law: For he expressly contradicts himself, for he reports the Case of the lord Cobham, 1 Jac. 1.

"And the Case of the earl of Essex 43 Eliz. where it was resolved by all the judges, That the gathering of men together to compel the king to yield to certain demands, or to remove ill counsellors, was an overt-act to prove the compassing of the king's death, for which they were indicted, so Co. Pl. Cor. 12, accords, and in the same book, fo. 14, &c. agreeth, That if a subject conspire with a foreign prince beyond seas to invade the realm, and prepare for the same by some overt-act, this is a sufficient overt-act to prove him guilty of Treason in compassing the king's death. And it was observed that in these Posthumous Works of sir E. Coke, of the Pleas of the Crown, and Jurisdiction of Courts, many great errors were published, and in particular in his Discourse of Treason, and in the Treatise of Parliaments.

"5. It was agreed that the bare knowledge of Treason, and the concealment of it, was not High Treason, but Misprision of Treason. But in case any thing be proved upon evidence, that the party liked or approved of it, then it is High Treason; or if the party knew of the design, and after such knowledge, met with the conspirators at their consultation; or if he went knowingly to their consultations several times, this is evidence of his approbation of the design, and is High Treason.

"6. It was agreed that to make a Misprision of Treason, there must be a knowledge of the design, and of the persons, or some of them; for a man cannot be said to conceal what he doth not know; and therefore, if one tell I. S. in general, that there will be a rising without acquainting him with the persons who are to rise, or with the nature of the plot, if I. S. conceal this, this is no Misprision of Treason, because he hath no knowledge of the Treason.

"7. It was agreed that if one knew of a Treason, and knew some of the conspirators, and then tell other men in general terms that there will be a rising, &c. without a discovery of the Plot, or the Traitors, such a discourse will not acquit him from Misprision of Treason by concealment of it, because notwithstanding those general discourses, both the Treason and the Traitors are concealed by him.

"8. And in case such a person who knoweth of a Treason, and the Traitors, and discovers all he knoweth to another person who is not a privy counsellor, or a justice of peace, or hath authority to take examinations concerning it, it was doubted whether such a discovery would acquit him from concealing of Treason, which is Misprision."

designs of the Court. But after new sheriffs had been chosen, more proper to serve the present occasion, a commission for hearing and determining the matter was directed to 34 persons; of whom 15 had actually engaged for the parliament against the late king, either as members of parliament, judges, or officers in their army; most, if not all of them, the Lord Mayor excepted, having been put into places of trust and profit since the late revolution!" 3 Ludlow 48.

* "Colonel George Monk," says Ludlow, "being commissioned to be of this number, was not ashamed to sit among them; any more than Mr. Denzil Hollis, and the earl of Manchester, who having been two of the six members designed by the late king for destruction, before the beginning of the war, and therefore personally concerned in the quarrel, had contributed the utmost of their endeavours to engage divers of the gentlemen (upon whom they were now to sit as judges) on that side, were not contented to abandon them in this change, but assisted in condemning them to die for their fidelity to that cause which themselves had betrayed. Mr. Arthur Annesley, who had been also a member of the parliament whilst they made war against the king, was also one of this number. Finch, who had been accused of high treason twenty years before, by a full parlia-Investiture of Bishops, and the like, the king writes his letter, 'That,' &c.

God forbid I should intend any absolute government by this. It is one thing to have an Absolute Monarchy, another thing to have that government absolutely without laws, as to any coercive power over the person of the king; for as to things or actions, they will fall under another consideration, as I will tell you by and by.

Gentlemen, since this is so, consider the Oath of Supremacy which most men have taken or should take. All men that enter into the Parliament House, they are expressly enjoined by statute to take the oath of supremacy. What says that oath? We swear that 'the king is the only supreme governor within this realm and dominions.' He is supreme, and the only supreme; and truly if he be supreme, there is neither major nor superior. I urge this the more, lest any person, by any misconstruction or inference which they might make from something that hath been acted by the higher powers, they might draw some dangerous inferences or consequences to colour or shadow over those murderous and traitorous acts, which afterwards they committed. They had no authority: but as I told you, though I do set forth this, and declare this to you, to let you know that the king was immediately subject to God, and so was not punishable by any person: yet let me tell you there is that excellent temperament in our laws, that for all this the king cannot rule but by his laws. It preserves the king, and his person, and the people's rights.

There are three things touching which the law is conversant, persons, res, et actiones; persons, things, and actions. For the Person of the King, he is the Supreme Head, he is not punishable by any coercive power: the laws provide for that. 'The King can do no wrong;' it is a rule of law, it is in our law books very frequent; 2d Edw. 4. Lord Coke, and many others. If he can do no wrong, he cannot be punished for any wrong. The king, he hath the infirmities and weakness of a man; but he cannot do any injury, at least not considerable, in person; he must do it by ministers, agents, instruments. Now the law, though it provide for the king, yet if any of his ministers do wrong, though by his command, they are punishable. The king cannot arrest a man, as he cannot be arrested himself; but if he arrest me by another man, I have remedy against this man, though not against the king; and so he cannot take away my estate. This as to the Person of the king: he is not to be touched, 'Touch not mine Anointed.'

I come to Things. If the king claim a right, the king must sue according to his laws; the king is subject to the laws in that case, his possessions shall be tried by juries. If he will try a man for his father's death, you see he will try them by the laws. The law is the rule and square of his actions, and by which he himself is judged.

Then for Actions, that is, such Actions whereby rights and titles are prosecuted or recovered; the king cannot judge in person betwixt man and man, he does it by his Judges, and upon oath; and so in all cases whatsoever, if the king will have his right, it must be brought before his judges. Though this is an Absolute Monarchy, yet this is so far from infringing the people's rights, that the people, as to their properties, liberties, and lives, have as great a privilege as the king. It is not the sharing of government that is for the liberty and benefit of the people; but it is how they may have their lives, and liberties, and estates, safely secured under government. And you know, when the fatness of the olive was laid aside, and we were governed by brambles, these brambles they did not only tear the skin, but tore the flesh to the very bone.

Gentlemen, I have done in this particular, to let you see that the Supreme Power being in the king, the king is immediately under God, owing his power to none but God. It is true (blessed be God) we have as great liberties as any people have in Christendom, in the world; but let us own them where they are due; we have them by the concessions of our princes. Our princes have granted them; and the king, now; he in them hath granted them likewise.

Gentlemen, I have been a little too long in this, and yet I cannot say it is too long, because it may clear misunderstanding, so many poisonous opinions having gone abroad. To come a little nearer: if we consider; suppose there were the highest authority: but when we shall consider this horrid murder (truly I cannot almost speak of it, but 'Vox faucibus hæret') When we shall consider, that a few members of the House of Commons, those that had taken the Oath of Supremacy, and those that had taken the Oath of Allegiance, that was to defend the king, and his heirs, against all conspiracies and attempts whatsoever, against his and their person, their crowns, and dignities; not only against the Pope's Sentence, as some would pretend, but, as otherwise, against all attempts and conspiracies, not only against his person, crown and royal dignity, nor Pope's sentence, not only in order to the profession of religion: but absolutely or otherwise, that is, whatsoever attempts, by any power, authority or pretence whatsoever: I say, when a few members of the House of Commons, not an eighth part of them, having taken these oaths, shall assume upon themselves an authority; an authority, what to do? Shall assume to themselves an authority to make laws, which was never heard before; authority to make laws? What laws? A law for an High Court of Justice, a law for lives, to sentence men's lives; and whose life? The life of their sovereign: upon such a king, who, as to them, had not only redressed long before, at the beginning of the Parliament, all Grievances that were, and were imaginable; taken away the Star-Chamber, High Commission-Court, and about Shipping; such a king, and after such concessions that he had made in the Isle of Wight; when he had granted so much, that was more than the people would have desired: when these few Commons, not only without, but excluding the rest of the Commons; not only without, and excluding the rest, but rejecting the Lords too, that then sat: when these few Commons shall take upon them this authority, and by colour of this, their king, sovereign liege lord, shall be sentenced, put to death; and that put to death, even as their king, and sentenced as their king; put to death as their king, and this before his own door, even before that place where he used in Royal Majesty to hear ambassadors, to have his honourable entertainments; that this king shall be thus put to death at noon-day, it is such an aggravation of villany, that truly I cannot tell what to say. No story, that ever was, I do not think any romance, any fabulous tragedy, can produce the like. Gentlemen, if any person shall now come, and shroud himself under this pretended authority, or such a pretended authority, you must know, that this is so far from an excuse, that it is an height of aggravation. The Court for Common Pleas is the common shop for Justice, in that Court an appeal is brought for murder, which ought to have been in the King's Bench, the Court gives judgment, the party is condemned, and executed: in this case it is murder in them that executed, because they had no lawful authority. I speak this to you, to shew you, that no man can shroud himself by colour of any such false or pretended authority. I have but one thing more to add to you upon this head, and that is (which I should have said at first), If two or more do compass or imagine the king's death; if some of them go on so far as to consultation; if others of them go further, they sentence, and execute, put to death: in this case they are all Guilty; the first conclusion was treason. I have no more to add, but one particular, a few words.

As you will have Bills presented against those for compassing, imagining, adjudging the king, so possibly you may have bills presented against some of those for levying war against the king: levying of war, which is another branch of the Statute of the 25th Edw. 3. It was but declarative of the common law; it was no new law. By that law it was treason to levy war against the king. But to levy war against the king's authority, you must know, is treason too. If men will take up arms upon any public pretence; if it be to expulse aliens; if but to pull out privy-counsellors; if it be but against any particular laws, to reform religion, to pull down Enclosures.* In all these cases, if persons have assembled themselves in a warlike manner to do any of these acts, this is treason, and within that branch of levying war against the king.

* The ground on which this has been held to be High Treason, requires that the design or object, be the pulling down of all Enclosures.

VOL. V.

(Croke Car. 583.) This was adjudged in the late king's time in Benstead's Case, queen Elizabeth's, Henry the 8th's, former times, king James's time; much more, if men will go not only to levy war against the king, but against the laws, all the laws, subvert all the laws, to set up new laws, models of their own. If any of these cases come to be presented to you, you know what the laws are. To conclude; you are now to enquire of blood, of royal blood, of sacred blood, blood like that of the Saints under the Altar, crying, Quousque, Domine, 'How long, Lord,' &c. This blood cries for vengeance, and it will not be appeased without a bloody sacrifice.

Remember but this and I have done: I shall not press you upon your oaths; you are persons of honour; you all know the obligation of an oath. This I will say, that he that conceals or favours the guilt of blood, takes it upon himself, wilfully, knowingly, takes it upon himself; and we know that when the Jews said, 'Let his blood be on us and our seed,' it continued unto them and their posterity to this day.

God save the King. Amen, Amen.

The Grand Jury returned the Indictment Billa Vera. Court adjourned to the Old Bailey 10th of October.

October, 1660.

Sir John Robinson, knight, lieutenant of his Majesty's Tower of London, according to his Warrant received, delivered to Mr. Sheriff the Prisoners hereafter named, who were (in several coaches) with a strong guard of horse and foot conveyed to Newgate, and about nine of the clock in the morning delivered to the keepers of that prison, and thence brought to the Sessions House in the Old Bailey, London, where the Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer were in court assembled; and where their Indictment was publicly read by Edward Shelton, esq.; clerk of the crown.

Sessions House in the Old Bailey, October 10, 1660.

The Court being assembled, and silence commanded, the Commission of Oyer and Terminer was again read. After which Sir Hardress Waller, Colonel Thomas Harrison, and Mr. William Heveningham, were brought to the bar,* and commanded to hold up their

* "All things being prepared, and the court assembled at the Session-house in the Old Bailey, sir Hardress Waller, maj.-gen. Harrison, and Mr. Heveningham, were ordered to be set to the bar; where the indictment being read, containing many strange expressions, it was contrived, that sir Hardress Waller, who was known to be a man that would say any thing to save his life, and was prepared to that purpose, should be first demanded whether he were Guilty, or Not Guilty. Which being done, he, after a little shifting, according to the expectation of the bench, pleaded Guilty; taking the blood which had been shed during his employment in the army upon his own head. But when maj.-gen. Harrison was required to answer, he not only pleaded Not guilty, but justified the sentence passed upon the king, and the authority of those who had hands; which sir Hardress Waller and Mr. Heveningham did; but Harrison being commanded to hold up his hand, answered. 'I am here,' and said, 'my lord, if you please I will speak a word'—

Court. Hold up your hand, and you shall be heard in due time. Mr. Harrison, the course is, that you must hold up your hand first.—And then he held up his hand.

The Indictment was read, purporting, 'That he, together with others, not having the fear of God before his eyes, and being instigated by the devil, did maliciously, traitorously, and feloniously, contrary to his due allegiance and bounden duty, sit upon and condemn our late sovereign lord, king Charles the first, commissionated him to act as one of his judges. He plainly told them, when witnesses were produced against him, that he came not thither with an intention to deny any thing he had done, but rather to bring it to light; owning his name subscribed to the warrant for executing the king, to be written by himself; charging divers of those who sat on the bench, as his judges, to have been formerly as active for the cause in which he had engaged, as himself or any other person; affirming, that he had not acted by any other motive than the principles of conscience and justice: for proof of which he said it was well known, he had chosen to be separated from his family, and to suffer a long imprisonment, rather than to comply with those who had abused the power they had assumed to the oppression of the people. He insisted, that having done nothing in relation to the matter in question, otherwise than by the authority of the parliament, he was not justly accountable, either to this or any other inferior court; which being a point of law, he desired to have counsel assigned upon that head. But the court over-ruled; and by interrupting him frequently, and not permitting him to go on in his defence, they clearly manifested a resolution of gratifying the resentments of the court upon any terms. So that a hasty verdict was brought in against him. And the question being asked, If he had any thing to say why judgment should not pass? he only said, That, since the court had refused to hear what was fit for him to speak in his defence, he had no more to say. Upon which Bridgman pronounced the sentence. And, that the inhumanity of these men may the better appear, I must not omit, that the executioner, in an ugly dress, with a halter in his hand, was placed near the major-general, and continued there during the whole time of his trial. Which action I doubt whether it was ever equalled by the most barbarous nations. But having learned to condemn such baseness, after the sentence had been pronounced against him, he said aloud, as he was withdrawing from the court, That he had no reason to be ashamed of the cause in which he had been engaged. This sentence was so barbarously executed, that he was cut down alive, and saw his bowels thrown into the fire." S Ludlow, 50.

of ever-blessed memory; and also did upon the 30th of January, 1649, sign and seal a Warrant for the execution of his late sacred and serene Majesty, of blessed memory. Where also, &c.

Clerk of the Crown. How sayest thou, sir Hardress Waller? Art thou Guilty of that Treason whereof thou standest indicted, and for which thou hast now been arraigned, or Not Guilty?

Sir H. Waller. My lords, I dare not say, Not Guilty; but since that in a business of this nature we have no counsel or advice, and being not able to speak to matter of law—

Lord Chief Baron. I am loth to interrupt you; but this is the course: you have heard the indictment read, and the course is, you must plead Guilty or Not Guilty. There is no medium, Guilty or Not Guilty. It is that which is the law, and the case of all men. Are you Guilty? Or Not Guilty?

Sir H. Waller. I may confess myself Guilty of some particulars in that Indictment, but not of all; for so, instead of discharging, I shall wound my conscience.

Clerk. Are you Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Sir H. Waller. If I might have that liberty to—Court. You shall have that liberty that any subject of the nation can have or can challenge. No man, standing at the bar in that condition you are, must make any other answer to that Indictment than Guilty, or Not Guilty. It is the common case of all men. Your confession must be plain and direct, either Guilty or Not Guilty.

Sir H. Waller. My lord, I desire some time to consider of it, for it is a great surprisal.

Court. You have had time enough to consider of it; you must follow the directions of the Court, Guilty or Not Guilty? You must not thus discourse of being surprized; for these discourses are contrary to all proceedings of this nature.

Clerk. How say you, sir H. Waller? Are you Guilty or Not Guilty?

Sir H. Waller. I dare not say, Not Guilty.

Clerk. Will you confess, then?

Sir H. Waller. I would be glad to be understood—

Court. Your plea must be direct, Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Sir H. Waller. Shall I be heard, my lord?

Court. Yes, upon your trial. There is but two ways, plead Not Guilty, or confess it. Sir H. Waller, we would not have you to be deceived. If you confess, and say, you are Guilty, there is nothing then but Judgment: If you say Not Guilty, then you shall be heard with your evidence. Consider with yourself. Plead Not Guilty, or confess, and say, you are Guilty.

Sir H. Waller. My lord, it puts me upon a great contest with myself. I shall be very free to open my heart—

Court. Sir, you must plead Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Sir H. Waller. My lord, my condition differs from others, I am a stranger; I have been thirty years transplanted into Ireland, which has made me unacquainted with the affairs of the law here.

Court. You must keep to the course of the law, either Guilty or Not Guilty. There is but one of these two pleas to be made.

Sir H. Waller. I dare not say Not Guilty.

Court. There are but these three things to be considered: Either you must say Guilty, which is confession, and then there remains no more but Judgment; or Not Guilty, and then you shall be heard; or Judgment will pass for your standing mute, which is all one if you had confessed.

Sir H. Waller. Insomuch as I said I dare not say Not Guilty, I must say Guilty.

Clerk. You say you are Guilty? You confess the Indictment.

*Sir H. Waller. Yes.

Clerk. THOMAS HARRISON, How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the Treason whereof thou standest indicted, and art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Harrison. My lords, have I liberty to speak?

Court. No more (at this time) than Guilty or Not Guilty. Mr. Harrison, you have heard the direction before.—We can give you but the same rule. If you plead Not Guilty, you shall be heard at large; if Guilty, you know what remains.

Harrison. Will you give me leave to give you my answer in my own words?

L. C. Bar. There is no answer but what the law directs; it is the same with you as with all others, or as I would desire, if I were in your condition. You must plead Not Guilty, or, if you confess Guilty, there must be Judgment upon your confession. The same rule for one must be for another.

Harrison. You express your rule very fair, as well to me as this gentleman (pointing at sir H. Waller); but I have something to say to your lordships, which concerns your lordships as well as myself.

Court. You must hold, and plead Guilty, or Not Guilty. If you go otherwise (as I told you before), it will be as if you pleaded not at all, and then Judgment will pass against you. The law gives the words, frames your answer, it is none else but the law, Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Harrison. My lord, I have been kept close prisoner near these three months, that no body might have access to me. Do you call me to give you a legal answer, not knowing of my trial till nine of the clock last night, and brought away from the Tower, to this place, at six of the clock this morning?

Court. You must give your direct answer, Guilty, or Not Guilty. You cannot say it is

* "He had at first pleaded Not Guilty, but was allowed by the Court to withdraw his plea." Kelyng, 11.

sudden, or unprovided. You spend time in vain. You trouble the Court. You must plead Guilty, or Not Guilty. We must not suffer you to make di-courses here. You must plead either Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Clerk. Are you Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Harrison. I am speaking. Shall I not speak two words?

Court. If you will not put yourself upon your trial, you must expect that course that the law directs.

Harrison. May it please your lordships, I am now——

Clerk. Are you Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Harrison. I desire to be advised by the law, this is a special case.

Court. The law allows nothing now, but to plead Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Court. You must plead to your Indictment. If it be Treason, it cannot be justified; if it be justifiable, it is not Treason; therefore plead Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Harrison. Give me advice in this——

Clerk. Tho. Harrison, Are you Guilty? Or Not Guilty?

Harrison. I would willingly render an account of all my doings——

Clerk. Are you Guilty or? Or Not Guilty?

Court. You have been acquainted with the legal proceedings. You never found in all your experience that any prisoner at the bar, for Felony or Treason, was suffered thus to discourse, or to answer otherwise than Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Clerk. Are you Guilty? or Not Guilty?

Mr. Sol. Gen. I do beseech your lordships he may plead; peradventure he knows his case so well, that he thinks it as cheap to defy the Court, as submit to it.

Court. We must enter your standing mute; that is Judgment.

Clerk. Are you Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Harrison. Will you refuse to give me any satisfaction?

Court. Are you Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Harrison. Will you give me your advice?

Court. We do give you advice. The advice is, there is no other plea, but Guilty, or Not Guilty. You shall be heard when you have put yourself upon your trial.

Clerk. Are you Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Harrison. You do deny me counsel, then I do plead Not Guilty.

Clerk. You plead Not Guilty? Is this your Plea?

Harrison. Yes.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Harrison. I will be tried according to the laws of the Lord.

Clerk. Whether by God and the Country?

L. C. Bar. Now I must tell you, if you do not put yourself upon your Country, you have said nothing.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Harrison. It is to put myself upon what you please to put me upon.

Court. If you understand (you are not every man, you are versed in proceedings of law), you know you must put yourself upon the trial of God and your Country; if you do not, it is as good as if you had said nothing.

Harrison. You have been misinformed of me——

Court. You have pleaded Not Guilty; that which remains is, that you must be tried by God and the Country, otherwise we must record your standing mute.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Harrison. I will be tried according to the ordinary course.

Clerk. Whether by God and the Country? you must speak the words.

Harrison. They are vain words——

Court. We have given you a great deal of liberty and scope, which is not usual. It is the course and proceedings of law, if you will be tried, you must put yourself upon God and the Country.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Harrison. I do offer myself to be tried in your own way, by God and my Country.

Clerk. God send you a good deliverance.

Clerk. WILLIAM HEVENINGHAM, hold up your hand. How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the Treason whereof thou standest indicted, and art now arraigned? or Not Guilty?

Heveningham. Not Guilty.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Heveningham. By God and the Country.

Clerk. God send you a good deliverance.

SIR HARDRESS WALLER then presented his Petition to the Court, directed "To the King's Majesty and the Parliament," which was received, but not at this Court read; and then the three persons aforesaid were dismissed.

Clerk. Bring to the bar Isaac Pennington, esq.; Henry Martin, esq.; Gilbert Millington, gentleman; Robert Tichburne, esq.; Owen Roe, esq.; and Robert Lilburn, gentleman; who were called, and appeared at the bar, and being commanded severally, held up their hands.

The Indictment was read again as to the former persons.

Clerk. ISAAC PENNINGTON, hold up thy hand. How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the Treason whereof thou standest indicted, and art now arraigned? or Not Guilty?

Pennington. Not Guilty, my lord.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Pennington. By God and the Country.

Clerk. God send you a good deliverance.

Clerk. HENRY MARTIN, how sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the Treason whereof thou standest indicted, and art now arraigned? or Not Guilty?

Marten. I desire the benefit of the Act of Oblivion—

Clerk. Are you Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Court. You are to understand the law is this, the same to you and every one; you are to plead Guilty, or Not Guilty. If you will demand the Benefit of the Act of Oblivion, it is a confession of being Guilty.

Marten. I humbly conceive the Act of Indemnity—

Court. You must plead Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Marten. If I plead, I lose the benefit of that Act.

Court. You are totally excepted out of the Act.

Marten. If it were so, I would plead. My name is not in that Act.

Court. Henry Martin is there.

Mr. Solicitor General. Surely he hath been kept close prisoner indeed, if he hath not seen the Act of Indemnity. Shew it him.

Mr. Shelton opening the Act.

Court. How is it written?

Clerk. It is Henry Martin.

And then the Act was shewed to the said Mr. Marten.

Marten. Henry Martin. My name is not so*, it is Harry Marten.

Court. The difference of the sound is very little. You are known by that name of Martin.

Marten. I humbly conceive all Penal Statutes ought to be understood literally.

Clerk. Are you Guilty? or Not Guilty?

Marten. I am not Henry Martin.

Clerk. Are you Guilty? or Not Guilty?

Court. Be advised; the effect of this plea will be judgment.

Here Mr. Solicitor General cited somewhat parallel to this in a case formerly of Baxter, where the name was Bagster, with an S, and adjudged all one, being of the same sound.

Clerk. Are you Guilty? or Not Guilty?

Marten. My lord, I desire counsel; there will arise matter of law, as well as fact.

Court. You are indicted for Treason, for a malicious, traitorous compassing and imagining the King's death; if you have any thing of justification, plead Not Guilty, and you shall be heard; for if it be justifiable it is not Treason. The rule is, either you must plead Guilty, and so confess, or Not Guilty, and put yourself upon your trial; there is no medium.

Marten. May I give any thing in evidence before Verdict.

Court. Yea; upon your trial you may give

* "Memorandum, That upon the arraignment of Henry Martyn, his name being so written in the indictment, he said his name was Marten, and not Martyn; but the Court agreed that he being known by that name of Martyn, that was well enough in an indictment, though it be not spelled directly as he spell-eth it," Kelyng, 11.

any thing in evidence that the law warrants to be lawful evidence.

Clerk. Are you Guilty? or Not Guilty?

Court. Understand one thing, because I would not have you mistaken; you cannot give in evidence the misnomer, but any thing to the matter of fact.

Marten. I submit and plead Not Guilty.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Marten. By God and the Country.

Clerk. God send you a good deliverance.

Clerk. GILBERT MILLINGTON, hold up your hand. How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the Treason whereof thou standest indicted, and art now arraigned? or not Guilty?

Millington. My lord, I am an ancient man, and deaf; I humbly crave your lordship's pardon to hear me a few words; I will promise it shall be pertinent enough.

Mr. Solicitor General. Impertinent enough, he means.

Court. You must plead either Guilty, and so confess it; or Not Guilty, and then you shall be heard any thing for your justification.

Clerk. Are you Guilty? or Not Guilty?

Millington. I desire I may—

Court. There is nothing you can say but Guilty, or Not Guilty; all other discourses turn upon yourself.

Clerk. Are you Guilty? or Not Guilty?

Millington. You might enlighten me in some scruples. Does my pause trouble you much? I should not be long.

Court. Your particular case cannot differ from others.

Clerk. Are you Guilty? Or Not Guilty?

Millington. There are some things in the Indictment that I can say Not Guilty to; there are others that I must deal ingenuously, and confess them.

Clerk. Are you Guilty in manner and form as you are indicted? Or Not Guilty?

Millington. Not Guilty.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Millington. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send you a good deliverance.

Clerk. ROBERT TICHBOURN, hold up your hand. How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the Treason whereof thou standest indicted, and art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Tichbourn. My lord, I have been a very close prisoner, without any advice; I am altogether unable in law to speak.

Court. You know the course hath been delivered to you by others, I will not trouble you with it. It is neither long nor short; the law requires your answer, Guilty? Or Not Guilty?

Tichbourn. Spare me but one word. If upon the trial there shall appear to be matter of law, shall I have the liberty of counsel for it? If I shall be put in my own case to plead matter of law against those noble persons who plead on the other part, I shall but prejudice myself, and therefore I crave counsel.

Court. You must plead Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Tichbourn. I have no reason nor design to displease you. I am sure I am no ways able to plead with equalness in point of law with those noble gentlemen. To the matter of fact this is my plea, In manner and form that I stand indicted I am Not Guilty.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Tichbourn. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send thee a good deliverance.

Clerk. OWEN ROWE, Hold up your hand. How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the Treason whereof thou standest indicted, and art now arraigned? Or not Guilty?

Rowe. My lord, there hath been so much said already by others, I think I need say no more. In manner and form as I am now indicted I plead Not Guilty.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Rowe. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send you a good deliverance.

Clerk. ROBERT LILBURNE, Hold up your hand. How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the Treason whereof thou standest indicted, and art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Lilburne. I desire, in regard that being so close a prisoner for twenty days, that nobody has been suffered to advise with me—

L. C. Baron. I must interrupt you. You must not mis-spent the time. Understand the law. You must plead Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Lilburne. Will you give me leave to desire counsel before I plead, to advise me touching my plea?

Clerk. Are you Guilty or Not Guilty?

Lilburne. I desire counsel—

Court. Take heed, if that be your answer, 'You desire counsel,' and do not plead, and that be recorded, Judgment will pass against you. There is nothing to plead, but Guilty, or Not Guilty. If Not Guilty, what you have to say will be heard.

Lilburne. If you over-rule me, I must submit.

Court. Do not let such language fall from you; it is improper. The law gives us a rule. The prisoner must plead Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Lilburne. I say then, In manner and form as I am indicted I am Not Guilty.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Lilburne. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send you a good deliverance.

Clerk. Bring to the bar Adrian Scroop, John Carew, John Jones, Thomas Scot, Gregory Clement, and John Cook.

Who were brought accordingly, and being commanded, severally held up their hands at the bar. The Indictment was read to the persons at the bar as before.

Clerk. ADRIAN SCROOP, Hold up thy hand. How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the Treason whereof thou standest indicted, and art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Scroop. My lord, Not Guilty.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Scroop. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send thee a good deliverance.

Clerk. JOHN CAREW, Hold up thy hand. How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the Treason whereof thou art indicted and art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Carew. There is some special matter in that Indictment, that ought not to before—

Clerk. Are you Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Carew. Saving to our Lord Jesus Christ his right to the government of these kingdoms—

Court. Are you Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Carew. I say I am Not Guilty.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Carew. How would you have me.

Clerk. Will you be tried by God and the country?

Carew. Aye, if you will.

Clerk. You must say the words. How will you be tried?

Carew. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send you a good deliverance.

Clerk. JOHN JONES, Hold up thy hand. How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the Treason whereof thou standest indicted, and for which thou art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Jones. Not Guilty, my lord.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Jones. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send thee a good deliverance.

Clerk. THOMAS SCOT, Hold up thy hand. How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the Treason whereof thou standest indicted, and for which thou art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Scot. Truly I cannot call it Treason, and therefore I plead Not Guilty.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Scot. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send you a good deliverance.

Clerk. GREGORY CLEMENT, Hold up your hand. How sayest thou: Art thou Guilty of the Treason whereof thou standest indicted, and for which thou art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Clement. My lord, I cannot excuse myself in many particulars; but as to my Indictment, as there it is, I plead Not Guilty.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Clement. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send you a good deliverance.

Clerk. JOHN COOK, hold up thy hand.

How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the treason whereof thou standest indicted, and for which thou art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Cook. I humbly conceive that this is now time to move for counsel for matter of law—

Court. You know too well the manner of the court. Are you Guilty? Or not Guilty?

Cook. Not Guilty.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Cook. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send you a good deliverance.

Clerk. Bring Edmund Harvey, Henry Smith, John Downs, Vincent Potter, and Augustine Garland, to the bar. Who were brought accordingly, and, being commanded, severally held up their hands. The Indictment was read to them.

Clerk. EDMUND HARVEY, hold up your hand. How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the treason whereof thou standest indicted, and for which thou art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Harvey. Not Guilty, my lord.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Harvey. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send you a good deliverance.

Clerk. HENRY SMITH, hold up thy hand? How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the Treason whereof thou art indicted, and for which thou art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Smith. Not Guilty, my Lord.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Smith. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send you a good deliverance.

John Downs, Vincent Potter, Augustine Garland, upon the question presently pleaded Not Guilty, and put themselves on God and the country to be tried.

Clerk. Set to the bar George Fleetwood, Simon Meyn, James Temple, Peter Temple, Thomas Wait, Hugh Peters, Francis Hacker, and Daniel Axtel. Who being at the bar, held up their hands according to order; afterward the Clerk read the Indictment against the said persons; which being ended, he proceeded in this manner:

Clerk. GEORGE FLEETWOOD, hold up thy hand. What sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of this horrid treason whereof thou standest indicted, and art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Fleetwood. My lord, I came in upon his majesty's Proclamation.

Clerk. Art thou Guilty? Or Not Guilty?

*Fleetwood. I must confess I am Guilty, (and thereupon he delivered a Petition into the Court, which he said was directed "To his majesty and the parliament," and the Court did receive it accordingly).

Clerk. Set him aside.

* "He had first pleaded Not Guilty, but was permitted to withdraw his Plea." Kelyng. 11.

Clerk. SIMON MEYN, hold up thy hand. What sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of this horrid treason whereof thou standest indicted, and art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Meyn. Not Guilty: I came in upon his Majesty's Proclamation, my Lord.

Clerk. How wilt thou be tried?

Meyn. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send thee a good deliverance.

Clerk. JAMES TEMPLE, hold up thy hand. What sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of this horrid treason whereof thou standest indicted, and art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Temple. Not Guilty.

Clerk. How wilt thou be tried.

Temple. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send thee a good deliverance.

Clerk. PETER TEMPLE, hold up your hand. How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the treason whereof thou standest indicted, and for which thou art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Temple. Not Guilty.

Clerk. How wilt thou be tried?

Temple. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send thee a good deliverance.

Clerk. THOMAS WAIT, hold up your hand. How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the treason whereof thou standest indicted, and for which thou art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Wait. I desire to be heard a word or two—

Court. There is a rule of law which is set to us and you, that in all these cases you are to plead Guilty, or Not Guilty. When you have pleaded, if Not Guilty, you may speak what you will in its proper time.

Clerk. Are you Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Wait. I pray let me be heard a word. I am very unwilling to spend time, knowing you have a great deal of business. I am very unwilling to deprive myself of my native right. I shall speak nothing but that which is truth.

Court. Do not preface then, but speak what you would say.

Wait. My lord, my case is different from the rest.

Court. Whatsoever the case be, you have no plea to us, but Guilty, or Not Guilty. We can go no other way. The law sets out your Plea.

Wait. My lord, I would speak one word. There was a great peer of this nation indicted at Northampton, within these two years, for killing a man. The judges there—

Court. You must plead Guilty, or Not Guilty. Pray who are you that should take this upon you more than all the rest? You must go the ordinary way; Guilty, or Not Guilty: are you Guilty? or Not Guilty? We do not intend to prevent any thing you have to say, but it must be proper.

Clerk. Are you Guilty? Or Not Guilty?

Wait. I cannot say I am Guilty.

Court. How then?—Wait. I am Not Guilty.

Clerk. How wilt thou be tried?

Wait. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send thee a good deliverance.

Clerk. HUGH PETERS, hold up thy hand. How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the treason whereof thou standest indicted, and for which thou art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Hugh Peters. I would not for Ten Thousand Worlds say I am Guilty. I am Not Guilty.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Hugh Peters. By the Word of God. [Here the people laughed.]

Court. You must say, By God and the country. Tell him, you that stand by him, what he should say, if he doth not know.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Hugh Peters. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send thee a good deliverance.

Clerk. DANIEL AXTEL, hold up thy hand. What sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of the treason whereof thou standest indicted, and for which thou art now arraigned? Or not Guilty?

Axtel. May it please your lordships, I desire to have the freedom of an Englishman; that which is my right by law and inheritance: I have something to offer in point of law.

Clerk. Art thou Guilty? Or Not Guilty?

Axtel. My lords, give me leave to speak. For the matter of the Indictment I conceive is upon the king's death; that there is a Commission of Oyer and Terminer for you to sit: but in regard it was in pursuance of an act of parliament, I conceive no inferior court ought to judge of it: I desire counsel, it being of great and eminent concernment in law, that ever any judges, or any inferior court, should judge of the powers and privileges of a parliament; and I pray that counsel may be assigned me.

Clerk. Are you Guilty? Or Not Guilty?

Axtel. If the court over-rule me, and I shall not have my liberty, as an Englishman—

Court. The course of law is this: No man can justify treason. If the matter which you have to say be justifiable, it is not treason; if treason, it is not justifiable; therefore you must go the ordinary course of the law. You must plead Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Axtel. I can produce many precedents—

Court. Are you Guilty? Or Not Guilty? The language is put into your mouth. You have no other words to express yourself by at this time, but Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Axtel. Judge Henth had counsel assigned him upon the same case.

Court. That is very strange; the same case? What, was it for killing a king?

Axtel. If the Court will over-rule me, I cannot help it.

Ed. Gen. It may be, this gentleman may be deceived by a mistake. It may be, he knows not the law, which your lordships may be pleased to acquaint him with: that to stand Mute in High-Treason is all one as to confess the fact, and will have the same sentence and condemnation upon them, as if they had confessed it.

L. C. Baron. Then I will tell you the law. He that doth refuse to put himself upon his legal trial of God and the country, is a mute in law; and therefore you must plead Guilty, or Not Guilty. Let his language be what it will, he is a mute in law.

Axtel. I do not refuse it.

Court. Then say.

Axtel. I am Not Guilty.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Axtel. By twelve lawful men, according to the constitutions of the law.

Court. That is by God and the country.

Axtel. That is not lawful. God is not locally here.

Clerk. How wilt thou be tried? You must say, By God and the country, Axtel. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send you a good deliverance.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Axtel, have you your Papers again?—Axtel. Yes, my lord.

L. C. Baron. When your Indictment is read the second time, when you come to your trial, you may take what notes you please.

The Court then adjourned to the same place till the next morning seven o'clock.

October 11, 1660.

The Court being assembled, the Keeper was commanded to set the prisoners to the bar.

* If we should believe Burner's account of Harrison, "He was a fierce and bloody enthusiast. And it was believed, that, while the army was in doubt, whether it was fitter to kill the king privately, or to bring him to an open trial, that he offered, if a private way was settled on, to be the man that should do it. So he was begun with. But, however reasonable this might be in itself, it had a very ill effect: for he was a man of great heat and resolution, fixed in his principles, and so persuaded of them, that he never looked after any interests of his own, but had opposed Cromwell when he set up for himself. He went through all the indignities and severities of his execution, in which the letter of the law in cases of treason was punctually observed, with a calmness or rather a cheerfulness that astonished the spectators. He spoke very positively that what they had done was the cause and work of God, which he was confident God would own and raise up again, how much soever it suffered at that time. Upon this a report was spread, and generally believed, that he said, he himself should rise again. Though the party denied that, and reported the words as I have set them down."

Thomas Harrison, Adrian Scroop, John Carew, John Jones, Gregory Clement, Tho. Scot, were brought to the bar accordingly. After which silence was commanded.

Court. You that are the Prisoners at the Bar, if you, or any of you, desire pen, ink, and paper, you shall have it; and if you, or any of you, will challenge any of the Jury, you may when they come to be sworn, and that before they are sworn.

Sir Thomas Allen being called, was desired to look on the Prisoners, and lay his hand on the book: his Oath was then read to him, viz.

‘ You shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make, between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoners at the bar, whom you shall have in charge, according to your evidence.

‘ So help you God.’

Sir Joshua Ash being next called, Mr. Scroop excepted against him.

Sir Jeremy Whichcot, bart. being next to be sworn, Mr. Harrison excepted against him.

James Halley, esq. being next to be sworn, Mr. Scot excepted against him.

Court. If you will not agree (speaking to the Prisoners) in your challenges, we must be forced to try you severally.

Henry Mildmay, esq. being called next, Mr. Scroop excepted against him.

Court. We must needs try them severally, therefore set them all aside but Harrison.

Court. Gentlemen, you that are excepted must not depart the Court.

Sir Joshua Ash being again called, was excepted against by Mr. Harrison.

Sir Jeremy Whichcot, bart. James Halley, Henry Mildmay, and Christopher Abdy, esqrs. being called again, were severally excepted against by the Prisoner.

Court. Mr. Harrison, you know the law. You must say, ‘ I challenge him.’

Harrison. I shall, Sir.

Ralph Hartley being next called, and being very sick, humbly prayed to be excused by the Court, which was granted.

Arthur Newman was called next.

Harrison. May I not ask of what quality he is?

Court. No, Sir; you are to challenge him, or not to challenge him.

Harrison. I challenge him.

Thomas Blith was next called, and also challenged.

[Here the People seemed to laugh.]

Harrison. My Lord, I must make use of my liberty in this case.

Court. God forbid.

Then Grover, Robert Clark, and Richard Whalley, were called, and by Mr. Harrison challenged.

Court. Mr. Harrison, you know how many to challenge; if you go beyond the number, at your own peril be it.

Harrison. My Lord, pray tell me what it is.

VOL. V.

Court. You say very well; God forbid but you should know. You may challenge five-and-thirty peremptorily; if you go beyond, you know the danger.

Harrison. My lord, I do not this to keep you off from the business.

William Vincent and Henry Twiford were then called, and challenged.

John Lisle was next called.

Harrison. I do not know him.

Lisle. Nor I you, Mr. Harrison. He was sworn.

Thomas Franklin sworn.

Thomas Winter challenged.

Richard Nichol sworn.

— Moyce being sick, prayed excuse, which was granted accordingly.

Richard Chieyney challenged.

Allen Parsons challenged.

Henry Edlin called.

Harrison. I challenge him.—Let him be sworn.

Court. No, no. (Whereupon he was set aside.)

Harrison. If I have any apprehension or knowledge of them, that is the thing that leads me to it, as touching this man, he may be sworn.

Court. When he is challenged he cannot be re-called*.

Harrison. I am content.

Samuel Greenhil sworn.

Thomas Bede challenged.

Richard Rider challenged.

Harrison. Lest I may run into an hazard, in making use of that liberty which the law gives me in this case, and having not taken notice of any person challenged, I mean as to the number, I desire your officer that takes notice may acquaint me with the number.

Court. You shall know it; God forbid the contrary.

Edward Rolph was called next.

Harrison. Mr. Rolph is his name? Let him be sworn.

Francis Beal challenged.

John Kirk challenged.

Charles Pitfield challenged.

John Smith challenged.

— Bell sworn.

Edward Franklin challenged.

William Whitcomb challenged.

Samuel Harris sworn.

John Collins challenged.

Thomas Snow sworn.

William Blunt challenged.

George Righth challenged.

John Nichol of Finchley sworn.

Timothy Taylor challenged.

Thomas Fruin challenged.

Richard Abel challenged.

Thomas Morris sworn.

Court. You have challenged 33 already.

Harrison. I pray the names may be read to me, to see if it be so.

Court. When you come to 35 you shall have the names read.

John Galliard challenged.

Thomas Swallow challenged.

Court. Now read their names to him.

Which were read accordingly. In all 35 challenged.

George Pickering was next called and sworn.

Then they were called over who were admitted, viz. Sir Thomas Allen, John Lisle, Thomas Franklin, Richard Nichol, Samuel Greenhil, Edward Rolph, ——— Bell, Samuel Harris, Thomas Snow, John Nichol, Thomas Morris, George Pickering; and sworn.

Proclamation was then made: 'If any man can inform my lords, the king's Justices, the king's Serjeant, or the king's Attorney, before this inquest be taken, let them come forth and they shall be heard, for now the prisoner stands at the bar upon his deliverance. And all those bound by Recognizance to appear, let them come forth and give their evidence, or else to forfeit their recognizance.'

George Masterson, James Nutley, Robert Coytmore, Holland Simpson and Wm. Jessop, Witnesses, were called.

Court. Gentlemen, that are not of the Jury, pray clear the passage. The prisoner is here for life and death, let him have liberty to see the Jury.

Clerk. Thomas Harrison, hold up thy hand.

Clerk. Look upon the prisoner you that are sworn. You shall understand that the prisoner at the bar stands indicted by the name of Thomas Harrison, late of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman, for that he, together with John Lisle, &c. [here the Indictment was read] upon which Indictment he hath been arraigned, and thereunto hath pleaded Not Guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon God and the Country, which Country you are. Now your Charge is to enquire, whether he be Guilty of the High-Treason in manner and form as he stands indicted, or Not Guilty. If you find that he is Guilty, you shall enquire what goods and chattels he had at the time of committing the said Treason, or any time sithence. If you find that he is Not Guilty, you shall enquire whether he did fly for it; and if you find that he fled for it, you shall enquire of his goods and chattels, as if you had found him Guilty: If you find that he is Not Guilty, nor that he did fly, you shall say so, and no more. And take heed to your Evidence.

Mr. Keeling enforced the Charge at large: After whom sir Henéage Finch, his majesty's Solicitor-General, in these words:

May it please your lordships, we bring before your lordships into judgment this day the Murderers of a King. A man would think the laws of God and men had so fully secured these sacred persons, that the sons of violence should never approach to hurt them; For, my lord, the very thought of such an attempt hath ever been presented by all laws, in all ages, in all nations of the world, as a most unpardonable Treason. My lord, this is that that brought the two eunuchs in the Persian court to their just destruction: Voluerunt insurgere, says the text, and yet that was enough to attain them. And so, my lords, it was by the Roman laws too, as Tacitus observes; Qui deliberant, desciverant. To doubt or hesitate in a point of allegiance, is direct treason and apostacy. And upon this ground it is, that the statute upon which your lordships are now to proceed hath these express words: 'If a man doth compass or imagine the death of the king,' &c. kings who are 'God's vice-gerents upon earth,' have thus far a kind of resemblance of the Divine Majesty, that their subjects stand accountable to them for the very thoughts of their hearts. Not that any man can know the heart, save God alone; but because when the wicked heart breaks out into any open expressions, by which it may be judged, it is the thoughts of the heart which makes the Treason; the Overt-act is but the evidence of it.

My lords, This care and caution is not so to be understood, as if it were the single interest of one royal person only. The law doth wisely judge and foresee, that upon the life of the king depends the laws and liberties, the estates and properties, the wealth and peace, the religion, and in sum, the glory of the nation.

My lords, This judgment of the law has been verified by a sad experience; for when that blessed king (whose blood we are now making inquisition for) was untimely taken away, religion and justice both lay buried in the same grave with him; and there they had slept still, if the miraculous return of our gracious sovereign had not given them a new resurrection.

My lords, My lord Coke in his Comment upon this Statute has one conceit, which is somewhat strange; I am sure it is very new; he seems to think that it would have added to the perfection of this law, if there had been a time limited for the party to be accused*. But

* By statute 7 W. 3, c. 3, it is enacted, That no prosecution shall be for any High Treasons, whereby corruption of blood may be made to an offender or his heirs, or for Misprision of such Treasons, unless the Indictment be found by a Grand Jury, within three years after the commission of the offence: From this enactment, however, are excepted all prosecutions for counterfeiting the royal coin, sign manual, signet, or seal, and also all prosecutions for designing, endeavouring, or attempting to assassinate the royal person. This statute was passed in a season of much ferment, and at the very time of an Assassination Plot against the excellent king on the throne. See the note to the Case of Don Pantaleon Sa, A. D. 1654, certainly the work of this day has quite confuted that imagination. For here is a Treason that has so long out-faced the law, and the justice of this kingdom, that if there had been any time of limitation in the statute, there would have been no time nor place left for punishment. And if this Treason had but once grown up to an impunity, it might perhaps have drawn the guilt of that innocent blood, and with it the vengeance due to it, upon the whole nation.

The scope of this Indictment is for the compassing the death of the king; The rest of the Indictment, as the usurping authority over the king's person, the assembling, sitting, judging, and killing of the king, are but so many several overt-acts to prove the intention of the heart. We are not bound, under favour, to prove every one of these against every particular person that is indicted; for he that is in at one, is guilty in law, of all the rest, as much as if he had struck the fatal stroke itself; Nay, under favour, if we can prove any other overt-act besides what is laid in the Indictment, as the encouraging of the soldiers to cry out Justice, Justice; or preaching to them to go on in this work, as godly and religious; or any other act of all that catalogue of villainies, for which the story will be for ever infamous; this may be given in evidence to prove the compassing and imagining the king's death. The conclusion of this Indictment alledges the fact done to be to the great displeasure of Almighty God, and to the disgrace of the people of England. A truth so clear and known, that it can neither be heightened by any aggravation, or lessened by any excuse.

As for the fact itself, with the manner of it, I shall not need to open it at large, for these things were not done in a corner; every true English heart still keeps within itself a bleeding register of this story; only, my lords, in the way to our evidence, with your lordships favour, this I think may be fit to be said.

First, for the year 1648 (for that was the fatal year of this king, and beyond that year we shall not now enquire) I say, whatsoever in the year 1648 could have been done by a parliament, to save the life of a king, was done in this case.

They opened the way to the Treaty in spite of the army; and while these sons of Zeruiah, who were too hard for them, were engaged in service in the remoter parts, they hastened the treaty as much as was possible; the debates upon his majesty's concessions were voted a good ground for peace; notwithstanding the remonstrances of the army still flew about their ante. Upon the whole, this statute, and the acceptation which it has received, seem to recognise, and adopt, and in a high degree, to approve that sentiment of lord Croke, which Finch, on this occasion, took upon himself to call 'a somewhat strange and very new conceit.' See, as to Prescription of Crimes, the note to the Witches' Case, ante, vol. 4, pp. 829, 830.

ears, and notwithstanding the oppositions of a fearful and unbelieving party, of the House of Commons, whom the army had frightened into an awful and a slavish dependance upon them. And when nothing else could be done for him, they were so true to the obligations they lay under, that they resolved to fall with him, and did so. For the army, who saw the treaty proceed so fast, made as great haste to break it. They seize upon the blessed person of our sacred king by force, and bring him to London; and here they force the parliament, shut out some members, imprison others, and then called this wretched little company which was left, a parliament. By this, and before they had taken upon them the boldness to dissolve the House of Peers, they pass a law, and erect, forsooth! an High Court of Justice, as they call it, a shambles of justice, appoint judges, advocates, officers, and ministers, sit upon the life of the king. Now they speak out and expound their own declarations, and tell us what that was which before they had demanded in obscure terms, when they called for justice against all delinquents. Now they speak plainly what they mean, and call this blessed king, this glorious saint, the Grand Delinquent:

'Hæc acies victum factura nocentem est.'

My lords, When they had thus proceeded to appoint their judges, officers, and court, then they called this person, their only liege lord and sovereign, to the bar, and by a formal pageantry of justice proceed to sit upon him, arraign, try, sentence, condemn, and kill, I had almost said crucify, him, whom they could not but know to be their king; and all this against the clearest light, the sharpest checks, and most thorough convictions of conscience, that ever men resisted. And yet in this moment of time, such was the majesty and innocence of our gracious sovereign, that the people followed him with tears in their eyes, and acclamations in their mouths, God save the king; even then, when the soldiers were ready to fire upon them who did either look sadly, or speak affectionately. And yet it will appear upon our evidence too, that so few of the very common soldiers could be brought to approve these proceedings, or to cry out Justice, that their officers were fain by money or blows, or both, to bring a great many to it.

My lords, The actors in this tragedy were many, very many, so many, that sure their name is Legion, or rather many Legions. And certainly, my lords, when we shall consider the things that they have done, we cannot but look upon it as a villainy which had in it all the ingredients to make it detestable, that it was possible for the counsel of men, or devils either, to put together. But yet, if any thing can be of a deeper die than the guilt of that sacred blood wherewith they stand polluted, methinks their impudence should make them more odious than their treason. It was the destruction of God's Anointed, in the name of the Lord. It was the murder of a most blessed and beloved prince, in the name of his people. Him whom they had taken the transcendent boldness to imprison, as the author of the war, they put to death, because he would have been the author of our peace; and that with so much scorn and indignity, that some of them were not ashamed to spit in the face of our lord and sovereign. And when they had thus quenched the light of Israel, darkness and confusion did overspread the face of the land; many poor subjects at home, and some Protestants in foreign nations, at the very news of it fell down dead; as if this excellent king had been in a natural as well as a religious sense, the breath of our nostrils, the Anointed of the Lord, who was taken in their pits. The judges, officers, and other immediate actors in this pretended court, were in number about fourscore: of these some four or five and twenty are dead, and gone to their own place. The God of Recompences hath taken the matter so far into his own hands; and who knows but that it might be one dreadful part of his vengeance that they died in peace? Some six or seven of them, who were thought to have sinned with less malice, have their lives spared indeed, but are like to be brought to a severe repentance by future penalties. Some eighteen or nineteen have fled from justice, and wander to and fro about the world with the mark of Cain upon them, and perpetual trembling, lest every eye that sees them, and every hand that meets them, should fall upon them. Twenty-nine persons do now expect your justice. Amongst them, the first that is brought is the prisoner at the bar, and he deserves to be the first; for if any person now left alive ought to be stiled the conductor, leader, and captain of all this work, that is the man. He, my lord, brought the king up a prisoner from Windsor; but how, and in what manner, with how little duty, nay, with how little civility, to a common person, you will hear in time. He sat upon him, sentenced him, he signed the Warrant first to call that Court together, then the Bloody Warrant to cut off his sacred head. Against him, as against all the rest, our Evidence will be of two sorts: Witnesses viva voce, that shall first prove to your lordships that every person now in question did sit in that Court, when their King stood as a Prisoner at the Bar. We shall prove that the precept by which this pretended court was summoned, was not obeyed and executed, till it had had the hands and seals of most of the pretended judges; among the rest the hand of the prisoner at the bar will be found there. We shall prove his hand to the Bloody Warrant for severing the sacred head of our blessed sovereign from the body, and then some circumstances of his malice, and of his demeanour. And after we have done with our witnesses viva voce, if we have occasion to use records of parliament, we shall shew them too; for we have the originals or authentic copies. But now we shall proceed to our Evidence.

Proclamation was made for silence.

Sir Edward Turner. My lords, the service of this day doth call to my memory the story of good king Amaziah. We read in Holy Writ, that his father, king Joash, was murdered, and murdered by his own subjects; but we read further, that when Amaziah had regained the crown, was settled in the government, he slew those who slew his father. He did go down into Edom, the valley of Salt, and there he did slay ten thousand. The work of this day doth very much resemble that action. Our good and gracious king, his father of blessed memory, and our father, his natural, and our politic father, to whom our natural allegiance was due, was murdered, and by his own subjects. But, my lords, this was not a national crime; and our good and gracious sovereign hath done us that honour and right to vindicate us in foreign nations; and now he is come home in power and glory, he does continue in the same mind: That's the reason we are not now slain by thousands, but that those miscreants are gathered up here and there that did commit the offence, and would have involved the nation in a common infamy.

Gentlemen of the jury, your time to enquire of this matter is precious, more precious than my words, else I would repeat to you the history of that tragedy, at least that summary, that was entered in the Black Book, or the journals of that they then called a Parliament. It shall suffice to tell you, and that most truly, that it was but an handful of men in respect to the whole nation, that did contrive and design this damnable and traitorous plot, to subvert the laws, and change the government of this well-governed nation. In prosecution of which they did cast abroad, and spread forth, jesuitical maxims, damnable and diabolical principles, to intoxicate the people; and when their heads were troubled, they were easily led into arms, where after some time they grew drunk with successes; and when they had drunk too much of the loyal blood of the people, then they thirsted for the royal blood also. I do confess we read in stories, that kings have before this time been murdered; some in our nation, as king Rich. 2 and Ed. 2; and in other nations. But the actors of those murders were modest to these. They did it in private; these in the face of the sun, and the people; but it was those people, gentlemen, they had corrupted with shares in their robberies and villanies. They pretended it was in the way of justice: but you must know, no justice can be executed upon the person of the king. Touch not mine Anointed, saith God himself.

My lords, I do read in the Roman story, that both amongst them and other nations, there was no law against parricide. It was not thought that any man was so unnatural and devilish to destroy his father. But we do find among the Romans such a fact was committed, and then they were at a loss, to punish it. The way was this that was found out; the offender they sewed into a mail of leather, so close that no water could get in; when they had done, they threw him into the sea ; by this denoting, the offender was not worthy to tread upon the ground, nor to breathe in the air, nor to have the benefit of any of the four elements, nor the use of any of God's creatures, and so be starved.

Gentlemen, Parricide and Regicide differ not in nature, but in degree. Parricide is the killing of the father of one, or a few persons ; Regicide the killing the father of a country. What punishment then is suitable to this offence ? Gentlemen, the prisoner at the bar is accused of this offence, and now to be tried by you : But before we enter upon the evidence, I must, with the leave of the Court, inform you, that though the Indictment contains many circumstances and gradations in the treason, yet the imagining and compassing the death of our late sovereign, is the treason to which we shall apply our evidence ; this being, both by the common-law, and by the statute of the 25th of Edward the 3d, the principal treason to be enquired of. And the other circumstances in the Indictment are but so many matters to prove the overt-act ; the consultations, the assuming power to try and condemn the king, the assault upon him, and the fatal blow that was given him, are but so many demonstrations, and open acts, proving the first treasonable design of the heart.

It will be enough for you, and so my lords will tell you, if we prove the treason itself, which is the compassing and imagining the death of the king, though we fail in some of the circumstances laid in the Indictment. I do not speak this, as if we should fail in any ; but it is not necessary to prove them all ; if we prove any, you are to find the prisoner Guilty. I am not willing to hold your lordships too long in the porch, but desire to descend into the body of the business ; and so we shall call our witnesses, and doubt not but to prove, that this man at the bar was the first, and not the least, of these offenders.

Mr. George Masterson was called.

Harrison. When I was before your lordships yesterday, I offered something very material, in reference to the jurisdiction of the Court ; but you told me, according to the rule, I must plead Guilty, or Not Guilty, and what I had to offer should be heard in its proper place. I now desire to know, whether it be proper, now to deliver myself, before you proceed to the calling of witnesses ; for I would go the best way, and would not willingly displease you.

L. C. Baron. What was promised you yesterday, God forbid, but you should have it ! But I think it will be best for you to hear the evidence, and then what you have to say shall be fully heard.

Harrison. I am content.

Whereupon, George Masterson, Stephen Kirk, Francis Hearn, William Clark, Robert Coytnore, and James Nutley, were called, and sworn.

Counsel. Mr. Masterson, whether did the prisoner at the bar sit in that which they called the High Court of Justice, to Sentence the King, or no ? Pray tell my Lords, and the Jury, thereof, and what else you know of the matter.

Masterson. Upon the oath I have taken, my lords, and gentlemen of the jury, I saw the prisoner, Tho. Harrison, sit in that which they called the High Court of Justice, upon the 27th day of January, in the year 1649, to Sentence the King ?

Counsel. Was it the day the Sentence was passed against the King ?

Masterson. It was the day of the Sentence.

Counsel. Can you say any thing else ?

Masterson. I do, sir, further remember, that when the Clerk of the Court, as he was called, read the Sentence against the King, and said, it was the Sentence of the whole Court, I saw the prisoner at the bar, together with others, stand up, to my apprehension, as assenting to it.

Counsel. Was there not direction that all should stand up as assenting ?

Masterson. I do not know, that ; but when the Sentence was read several of them did stand up, and he among the rest, as assenting to the Sentence, as the spectators understood.

Counsel. Mr. Clark, What do you say to the same question ?

Clark. My lords, and gentlemen of the jury, I remember I saw the prisoner at the bar sit several times in the Court of Justice, as they called it ; particularly on the 23rd and 27th of January, 1649, as I took notice of it in a book.

Counsel. Was that the day of the Sentence ?

Clark. Yes, my lord.

Counsel. What say you to that of the rising of those persons in the Court ?

Clark. I remember they all rose, but I did not take particular notice then of the prisoner.

Counsel. Mr. Kirk, you hear the question, Did you see the prisoner at the bar in Westminster hall, sitting upon the bench in that which they called the High Court of Justice, when the King stood prisoner at the bar there ?

Kirk. My lord, I did see the prisoner at the bar sit several days in that which they called the High Court of Justice. I was there every day of their sitting.

Counsel. Do you remember he was there on the 27th of Jan. 1649 ?

Kirk. I do, sir.

Counsel. Tell the jury, what was the work there.

Kirk. It was Sentence. I did take the names of all those gentlemen that did appear in the Court on that day, the 27th of Jan. 1649 ; and among the rest I took a note of that gentleman's name, as being present.

Counsel. Whereas these gentlemen (Mr. Masterson and Mr. Clark) have declared, that, as assenting to the Sentence, they all stood up ; did you see them stand ? and whether, by direction, or no ?

Kirk. As far the direction, I know nothing of it ; but the members then present in the Court, (after Sentence was read) as far as my eyes could perceive, stood up unanimously, I suppose, as assenting to the Sentence.

Court. Mr. Nutley, Did you know the prisoner at the bar? Have you seen him sit in Westminster-hall at any time upon the bench when the King was brought as a prisoner to the bar?

Nutley. My lords, and gentlemen of the jury, I saw the prisoner at the bar several days sit there, amongst the rest of the Judges, as a Judge, I suppose. To the best of my remembrance, he sat there four days together.

Court. Was he there upon the day of the Sentence?

Nutley. I did take notes, my lord, that day in the Court, and I find he did sit that day.

Court. Do you know any thing more of the prisoner at the bar?

Nutley. Thus much I know concerning the prisoner at the bar, my lord. The first day they sat in public was (as I remember) the 20th of Jan. 1649; some few days afore that, there was a Committee that sat in the Exchequer Chamber, and of that Committee the prisoner at the bar was one of the members. I do remember well it was in the evening; they were lighting of candles, they were somewhat private. This gentleman was there, I saw him; for through the kindness of Mr. Phelps, who was then Clerk to that Committee, I was admitted, pretending first to speak with the said Mr. Phelps, and that I had some business with him; and so (as I said before) I was admitted, into the Committee chamber; Being there, I did observe some passages fall from the prisoner at the bar; the words were to this purpose: he was making a narrative of some discourses that passed between his late majesty and himself in coming between Windsor and London, or Hurst Castle, I know not well whether. My lord, that passage that I observed to fall from him in that discourse was this: he said, That the King, as he sat in the coach with him, was importunate to know what they intended to do with him.

Harrison. In the coach was it?

Nutley. Yea, sir, it was in the coach. He told the rest of the company (as I said before) that the King asked, 'What do they intend to do with me? Whether to murder me, or no?' And I said to him, 'There was no such intention as to kill him, we have no such thoughts.' 'But,' (said he) 'the Lord hath reserved you for a public example of justice.' There is one word more, my lords, and that is this, which I heard from this prisoner at the bar. The reason and end of their meeting together at that Committee was concerning the Charge. So much I observed. It was concerning the contracting of the Impeachment. I observed that some found fault with the length of that, as it was drawn. They were offering some reasons to contract it, and I heard this prisoner at the bar vent this expression; 'Gentlemen, it will be good for us to blacken him what we can; pray let us blacken him;' or words to that effect. I am sure 'blacken' was his word.

Windham. Mr. Nutley, you speak of an Impeachment. Against whom was that Impeachment?

Nutley. It was against his late Majesty the King.

Counsel. And it was to draw up that Impeachment so as to blacken him? Was it so?

Nutley. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Coytmore, sworn.

Mr. Windham. Did you see the prisoner at the bar sitting in that which they called the High-Court of Justice on that day when the king was sentenced, or at any other time? Pray tell my lords and the Jury.

Coytmore. My lords and gentlemen of the Jury, I was in that which they called the High-Court of Justice three or four times. I saw this gentleman either once or twice sitting there.

Counsel. Do you know any thing more?

Coytmore. No, really; I came only to hear and see what they were doing, and I did there see him, I think, several days; I am sure once.

Counsel. Did you see him on the 27th of January 1649, sitting there, which was the day of the Sentence?

Coytmore. I cannot call that to memory.

Counsel. Do you know of any expressions, that the king should be an example of Judgment?

Coytmore. No, my lords.

Mr. Windham. My lords, in the next place we shall shew that Instrument that was made under the hand and seal of the prisoner at the bar as well as others, for execution of the king, that Bloody Warrant. But first we will ask this witness another question.

Counsel. Did you see the prisoner at the bar sit on the bench as an ordinary spectator, or as one of the Judges?

Coytmore. He was in the Court sitting among the rest of the Judges, as one of them.

Mr. Solicitor. My lords, we will prove that this prisoner at the bar was one of them that took upon him the conducting of the king, and that the king was in his custody; and to the High-Court of Justice also.

The Lord Newburgh, sworn.

Counsel. Pray, my lord, give yourself the trouble to raise your voice, and to tell my lords and the Jury what you know of the prisoner at the bar; the part that he acted in bringing up the king.

Lord Newburgh. I was then living at his majesty's lodge at Bagshot, when the prisoner at the bar brought the king from Hurst-Castle to London. He was the person that commanded the whole party; and when the king by the way went to dinner, by his orders there were centries set at every door where he was. When the king had dined he carried him to Windsor, and appointed several of his officers to ride close to the king, as he was riding, lest he should make his escape from them.

Counsel. That was an imprisonment itself, and so a treason.

Mr. Windham. My lords, we shall now preduce to you two Instruments which were made, the one for convening and summoning the assembling of that which they called the High-Court of Justice, and shew this prisoner's hand and seal to that; and then shew you likewise that which was the consummating of all, that Bloody Warrant for execution of his late majesty of blessed memory, with the hand and seal of the prisoner at the bar unto it amongst others.

Solicitor. My lords, it will be fit before this to give you an account how he came by these Instruments.

Mr. Jessop sworn.

Counsel. Shew to Mr. Jessop the Warrant for summoning that Court.

Solicitor. Mr. Jessop, pray tell my lords and the Jury how you came by that instrument you have in your hand.

Mr. Jessop. May it please your lordships, I having the honour to attend the house of commons, the house was pleased to make an Order that Mr. Scobell should deliver into my hands all such books and records, papers, and other things, as did belong to the house of commons; and in pursuance to that order I did receive amongst other things this instrument, as a thing that had been formerly in his hands, as clerk of the house of commons.

Solicitor. We desire it may be read, my lords.

Court. Pray first prove his hand.

Mr. Harrison. I desire to know what is offered to be read.

Court. It is a Warrant that you sealed, amongst other pretended Judges of your High-Court of Justice (as you called it), for Trial of the king, and for summoning that Court.

Counsel. Mr. Kirk, have you seen the hand-writing of the prisoner at any time?

Kirk. I have very often seen it, and am well acquainted with it; and so far as it is possible a man can testify touching the hand of another person I do verily believe this to be his hand.

Counsel. How came you to be acquainted with his hand?

Kirk. As he was a member of the House of Commons, and my employment having relation thereto, I have seen him set his hand several times.

Mr. Farrington sworn.

Counsel. Do you believe that this is the hand-writing of the prisoner at the bar? [The Instrument being shewed him.]

Farrington. I did not see him write it, my lords, but I believe it to be his, for I have often seen his hand-writing. It is his hand, so far as possibly a man can know any person's hand that did not see him write.

Harrison. I desire to see the Instrument.—Which being shewed to him, he said, 'I believe it is my own hand.'

Counsel. That's the Warrant for summoning that Court that he owns his hand to.

Court. Shew him the other Instrument.

That being for execution of the Sentence; it being shewed him.

Harrison. I do think this is my hand too.

Counsel. If you think it the Jury will not doubt it. That's the Bloody Warrant for execution; and we desire they may be both read.

Harrison. My lords, do these learned gentlemen offer these as being any records?

Counsel. No, but as your own hand-writing.

Harrison. If you do not read it as a Record, I hope your lordships will not admit of any thing of that kind against me.

Counsel. He knows that a letter under his hand and seal may be read in a Court. We do not offer it as a record, but prove it by witnesses that it is your hand-writing.

Court. You have confessed these to be your hands. Whether they are records, or no; whether papers, or letters, they may be read against you, you signed the Warrant for convening together those which you called the High-Court of Justice, and you signed the other Warrant for putting the king to death. You do confess these two things. We do not see what further use may be made of them.

Court. You might observe how the Indictment was for the imagining, compassing and contriving the king's death. To prove that, there must be some Overt-act; and a letter under the party's hand is a sufficient Overt-act to prove such imagination; to that end these are used.

Harrison. I do not come to be denying any thing that in my own judgment and conscience I have done or committed, but rather to be bringing it forth to the light.

Court. Sir, you must understand this by the way, this you must take along with you, that these are read not as any thing of authority in themselves, or as used to any other purpose, but as on evidence of the fact against you: Take that along with you.

[The two Bloody Warrants for Trial, and for Execution of his Majesty, were here read, the latter of which is as followeth.]

" At the High Court of Justice for the trying and " judging of Charles Stuart, King of Eng" land, Jan. 29, 1649.

" Whereas Charles Stuart, King of England,
" is and standeth convicted, attainted, and con" demned, of High-Treason, and other high " crimes; and Sentence upon Saturday last was " pronounced against him by this Court, to be " put to death, by the severing his head from " his body, of which Sentence execution yet re" maineth to be done: these are therefore to

Mr. Windham. Gentlemen of the Jury, we have done our evidence; and you must know, gentlemen, that the principal point of the indictment is for compassing, imagining, and contriving the death of his late Majesty of glorious memory. There lies the Treason; so says the statute of the 25th Ed. 3. It hath nothing of killing the King there, but of imagining and compassing the death of the King. The going about it, that's the Treason, as hath been learnedly opened to you; the rest are but overt-acts: If there be such an imagination or compassing the death of the King once declared, though no fruit at all follow, it is Treason. Here certainly you have a very full evidence given. We shew you a Consultation, this is one overt-act, which would do the work, if there were nothing else. I must tell you, (and that with submission to my lords the justices,) if they had advised, and gone no further, that had been Treason in the letter of the law. They convened and met together, and suppose then they had absolved and acquitted him, do you think they had absolved themselves from Treason? With reverence be it spoken, if they had acquitted him they had been guilty of Treason. Assuming a power to put the King to death is an overt-act declaring such an imagination. You see this prisoner was no ordinary actor in it; his hand is in at all games. Taking of him, imprisoning of him, bringing him to London, and setting guards on him. You see also his malice, 'let us blacken him'; for they knew his innocence would shine forth, unless it was blackened by their imputations. He sate many times, as you hear, and sentenced him, and assented to that sentence by standing up, and likewise by concluding the catastrophe of that sad beginning of sufferings, his making a Warrant for his execution; and accordingly you know what did follow: I think a clearer evidence of a fact can never be given than is for these things.

Lord Chief Baron. Gentlemen, this humming is not at all becoming the gravity of this Court. Let there be free speaking by the Prisoner and Counsel. It is more fitting for a stage-play than for a Court of Justice.

Harrison. It is now time, my lords, to offer what I have to say. Have these learned gentlemen offered what they will say.

Counsel. We have no more till he hath given us occasion; not for evidence of the fact.

Harrison. My lords, the matter that hath been offered to you, as it was touched, was not a thing done in a corner. I believe the sound of it hath been in most nations. I believe the hearts of some have felt the terrors of that presence of God that was with his servants in those days, (however it seemeth good to him to suffer this turn to come on us,) and are witnesses that the things were not done in a corner. I have desired, as in the sight of him that searcheth all hearts, whilst this hath been done, to wait, and receive from him convictions upon my own conscience, though I have sought it with tears many a time, and prayers over and over, to that God to whom you and all nations are less than a drop of water of the bucket; and to this moment I have received rather assurance of it, and that the things that have been done as astonishing on one hand, I do believe ere it be long it will be made known from Heaven, there was more from God than men are aware of. I do profess that I would not offer of myself the least injury to the poorest man or woman that goes upon the earth. That I have humbly to offer is this to your lordships; you know what a contest hath been in these nations for many years. Divers of those that sit upon the bench were formerly as active——

Court. Pray, Mr. Harrison, do not thus reflect on the Court. This is not the business.

Harrison. I followed not my own Judgment; I did what I did, as out of conscience to the Lord; for when I found those that were as the apple of mine eye to turn aside, I did loath them, and suffered imprisonment many years. Rather than to turn as many did, that did put their hands to this plough, I chose rather to be separated from wife and family than to have compliance with them, though it was said, 'Sit at my right-hand,' and such kind expressions. Thus I have given a little poor testimony that I have not been doing things in a corner, or from myself. May he I might be a little mistaken; but I did it all according to the best of my understanding, desiring to make the revealed will of God in his Holy Scriptures as a guide to me. I humbly conceive that what was done, was done in the name of the Parliament of England, that what was done, was done by their power and authority; and I do humbly conceive it is my duty to offer unto you in the beginning that this Court, or any Court below the High-Court of Parliament, hath no jurisdiction of their actions. Here are many learned in the law, and to shorten the work, I desire I may have the help of counsel learned in the laws, that may in this matter give me a little assistance to offer those grounds that the law of the land doth offer. I say, what was done was done by the authority of the Parliament, which was then the Supreme Authority, and that those that have acted under them are not to be questioned by any power less than them. And for that I conceive there is much out of the laws to be shewed to you and many Precedents also in the case. Much is to be offered to you in that; according to the laws of the nations, that was a due Parliament. Those Commissions were issued forth, and what was done was done by their power; and whereas it hath been said we did assume and usurp an authority, I say this was done rather in the fear of the Lord.

Court. Away with him. Know where you are, Sir; you are in the assembly of Christians; will you make God the author of your treasons and murders? Take heed where you are. Christians must not hear this. We will allow you to say for your own defence what you can; and we have with a great deal of patience suffered you to sally out, wherein you have not gone about so much for extenuation of your crimes, as to justify them, to fall upon others, and to blaspheme God, and commit a new Treason: For your having of counsel, this is the reason for allowing of counsel: When a man would plead any thing, because he would plead it in formality, counsel is allowed. But you must first say in what the matter shall be, and then you shall have the Court's answer.

Lord Finch. Though my lords here have been pleased to give you a great latitude, this must not be suffered, that you should run into these damnable excursions, to make God the author of this damnable Treason committed.

Harrison. I have two things to offer to you, to say for my defence in matter of law. One is, That this that hath been done was done by a Parliament of England, by the Commons of England assembled in parliament; and that being so, whatever was done by their commands or their authority, is not questionable by your lordships, as being (as I humbly conceive) a power in senior to that of High-Court of Parliament; that is one. A second is this, That what, therefore, any did in obedience to that power and authority, they are not to be questioned for it; otherwise we are in a most miserable condition, bound to obey them that are in authority, and yet to be punished if obeyed. We are not to judge what is lawful, or what is unlawful. My lords, upon these two points I do desire that those that are learned in the laws may speak to on my behalf. It concerns all my country men. There are cases alike to this, you know, in king Richard the 2d's time, wherein some question had been of what had been done by a Parliament; and what followed upon it I need not urge in it. I hope it will seem good to you that counsel may be assigned, for it concerns all my countrymen.

Counsel. You are mistaken, if you appeal to your countrymen; they will cry you out, and shame you.

Harrison. May be so, my lords; some will, but I am sure others will not.

Mr. Solicitor General. These two points, my lords, are but one, and they are a new Treason, at the bar, for which he deserves to die, if there were no other indictment. It is the malice of his heart to the dignity and crown of England. I say, this is not matter for which counsel can be assigned. Counsel cannot put into form that which is not matter pleadable itself. It is so far from being true, that was the act of the Supreme Parliament of the people of England, that there was nothing received with more heart-bleeding than this bloody business. But that the world may not be abused by the insinuations of a man, who acts as if he had a spirit, and in truth is possessed; I will say, that the Lords and Commons are not a Parliament; that the King and Lords cannot do any thing without the Commons; nor the King and Commons without the Lords; nor the Lords and Commons without the King, especially against the King. If they do, they must answer it with their head; for the King is not accountable to any coercive power. And for the prisoner to justify his act, as if it were the act of the Commons of England, he is very much to be reproved: Shall he pretend that one house, nay, the eighth part of a house (for so it was), can condemn a King, when both houses cannot condemn one man in spite of the King? I desire, my lords, it may pass with a due reproach and sentence upon it.

L. C. Baron. It is true, your questions are but one point. You pretend the Parliament's authority, and when you come to speak of it, you say the Commons of England. They were but one house of Parliament. The Parliament, what is that? It is the King, the Lords, and the Commons. I would fain know of you where ever you read, by the light you say you have in your conscience, that the Commons of England were a Parliament of England, that the Commons in Parliament used a legislative power alone. Do you call that a Parliament that sat when the House was purged,* as they call it, and was so much under the awe of the army, who were then but 40, or 45 at most? Then you say it was done by authority of them. You must know where there is such an authority, (which indeed is no authority,) he that confirms such an authority, he commits a double offence; therefore consider what your Plea is. If your Plea were doubtful, we should, and ought, and would, ourselves be of counsel for you. That which you speak concerning 'conviction of your own conscience,' remember that it is said in Scripture, that 'they shall think they did God good service when they slay you,' as it is in St. John. He hath a great deal of charity that thinks that what you did was out of a conscientious principle; it was against the light of noon-day and common practice. You make yourself a Solicitor in the business. 'Let us blacken him as much as we can.' I have not touched at all upon the Evidence, I will not urge it now. I say you justify it upon 'convictions of conscience,' and pretend it upon authority; a thing never known or seen under the sun, that the Commons, nay a few Commons alone, should take upon them, and call themselves the Parliament of England. We have been cheated enough by names and words; there is no colour for what you say. I do think and hope my brethren will speak to this case, that none of us do own that convention, whatsoever it be, to be the Parliament of England. There was another aggravation; at this time that this pretended authority usurped that power, the Lords were then sitting. You had not taken this usurped power to dissolve those Lords. No; you did this act in despite of the Lords; you had sent up an Ordinance to the Lords, and they rejected it, and thereupon these members took it upon themselves; amongst those there were some negatives, and those members were under the awe and power of your forces at that time. What you plead, the Court are of opinion tends to the subversion of the laws; for you to usurp power over the people without their consents, to call this the people, we never knew the like before; but the Parliament of England was the King, Lords and Commons. For you to speak of this power, and justify this power, is an aggravation, adding one sin and treason to another. We shall tell you, that neither both Houses of Parliament, if they had been there, not any single person, community, not the people either collectively, or representatively, had any colour to have any coercive power over their king. And this Plea which you have spoken of, it ought to be over-ruled, and not to stand good.

Mr. Annesley. I do the more willingly speak to this business, because I was one of those that should have made up that Parliament that this prisoner pretends to. I was one of that 'corrupt majority' (as they called it) that were put out of the House. He cannot forget that at that time there were guards upon both Houses of Parliament to attend them, that were of their own appointment; and thus those guards were forcibly removed by the prisoner at the bar, and his fellows, and other guards put there, who instead of being a defence unto them when those Commons stood at the door, were by them threatened. Yes the Lords and Commons of England in Parliament assembled, a full house of Commons, did resolve, notwithstanding what was aforesaid, that the treaty in the Isle of Wight 'was a ground for Peace.' Afterwards the major part of the house of Commons having resolved on this, sent it up to the Lords; that very day when they were adjourned there were forces drawn down to the house of Commons door, and none suffered to come into the house but those that they pleased. All those that had a mind for peace, that minded their duty, and trust, and allegiance to their King, were seized on by this gentleman and his fellows. When this was done, what did he and those fellows do? They sat and put a check upon all those that should come in. None must come in but those that would renounce their allegiance and duty to their king and the people, for whom they served, and then declared against that Vote which had been passed upon debate of twelve or fourteen hours; and then to call this an House of Commons, nay, the Supreme Authority of the Nation, he knows is against the laws of the land. For the House of Commons alone cannot so much as give an oath. It hath not power of Judicature of life and death: this he knows well to be according to the laws of England. He knows that no authority less than an Act of Parliament can make a law; and he knows an Act of Parliament must be passed by the King, Lords, and Commons. I wonder much to hear a justification in this kind by one that knows the laws of England so well. There will none of the Court allow that that was a Parliament: The majority of the house did all disavow it. These things have been already discoursed of; I shall only say, that he knowing the laws so well, I hope he shall suffer for transgression thereof.

Mr. Hollis. You do very well know that this that you did, this horrid, detestable act which you committed, could never be perfected by you till you had broken the Parliament. That House of Commons, which you say gave you authority, you know what yourself made of it when you pulled out the Speaker,* therefore do not make the Parliament to be the author of your black crimes. It was innocent of it. You know yourself what esteem you had of it, when you broke and tore it in sunder, when you scattered, and made them hide themselves, to preserve them from your fury and violence; do not make the Parliament to be the author of your crimes. The Parliament are the Three Estates: It must not be admitted that one House, part of the Parliament, should be called the Supreme Authority. You know what that Rump that you left did, what laws they made. Did you go home to advise with your country that chose you for that place. You know that no Act of Parliament is binding but what is acted by King, Lords, and Commons: And now as you would make God the author of your offences, so likewise you would make the people guilty of your opinion; but your Plea is over-ruled.

* See 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist. p. 1383.

To which the Court assented.

Harrison. I was mistaken a little. Whereas it was said the points were one, I do humbly conceive they were not so. I say what was done, was done in obedience to the Authority. If it were but an Order of the house of Commons, thus under a force, yet this Court is not judge of that force. I say, if it was done by one estate of parliament, it is not to be questioned.

Court. It was not done by one estate, they were but a part; nay, but an eighth part.

Denz. Hollis. It was not an House of Commons; They kept up a company by the power of the sword: Do not abuse the people, in saying it was done by the Supreme Power.

Counsel. My lords, if it were an House of Commons, neither House of Commons nor House of Lords, nor House of Lords and Commons together; no authority upon earth can give authority for murdering the king; this that he alledgeth is treason; my lord, this that is said is a clear Evidence of that which is charged; there is only this more in it, he hath done it, and if he were to do it again, he would do it.

L. C. Bar. It is clear as the noon-day, that this was not the House of Commons. Suppose it had been an House of Commons, and full, and suppose (which far be it from me to suppose) they should have agreed upon such a murderous act; for the House of Commons to do such an act, it was void in itself: nay, any authority without the House of Lords and King is void. You plead to the jurisdiction of the Court, whether we should judge it, or no. Yes, I tell you, and proper too: We shall not speak what power we have; the judges have power after laws are made to go upon the interpretation of them. We are not to judge of those things that the Parliament do. But when the Parliament is purged (as you call it), for the Commons alone to act, for you to say that this is the authority of Parliament, it is that which every man will say 'intrenches highly upon his liberty and privilege.' And what you have said to your justification, what doth it tend to but as much as this, 'I did it, justify it, and would do it again;' which is a new treason. The greatest right that ever the House of Commons did claim is but over the Commons. Do they claim a particular right over the Lords? Nay, over the King? Make it out if you can, but it cannot possibly be made out. What you have said doth aggravate your crimes: It is such an approvement of your treason, that all Evidences come short of it: King, Lords, and Commons, is the ground of the English Law; without that no Act of Parliament binds.

*Justice Mullet. I have been a parliament-man as long as any man here present, and I did never know or hear that the House of Commons had jurisdiction over any, saving their own members, which is as much as I will say concerning the Parliament. I have heard a story of a mute, that was born mute, whose father was slain by a stranger, a man unknown. After twenty years, or thereabout, this mute man fortun'd to see the murderer of his father, and these were his words, 'Oh! here is he that slew my father.' Sir, the king is the father of the country, 'pater patriæ,' so saith sir Edward Coke. He is 'caput reipublicæ, the head of the Commonwealth. Sir, what have you done? Here you have cut off the head of the whole Commonwealth, and taken away him that was our father, the governor of the whole country. This you shall find printed and published in a book of the greatest lawyer, sir Edward Coke. I shall not need, my lord, to say more of this business. I do hold the prisoner's plea vain and unreasonable, and to be rejected.

Justice Hyde. I shall not trouble you with many words. I am sorry that any man should have the face and boldness to deliver such words as you have. You, and all, must know, that the king is above the two houses. They must propose their laws to him: The laws are made by him, and not by them; by their consenting, but they are his laws. That which you speak as to the jurisdiction, you are here indicted for High-Treason; for you to come to talk of justification of this by pretence of authority, your Plea is naught, illegal, and wicked, and ought not to be allowed. As to having of Counsel, the Court understand what you are upon; Counsel is not to be allowed in that Case, and therefore your Plea must be over-ruled.

Mr. Justice Twisden. I shall agree with that which many have already said; only this, you have eased the Jury, you have confessed the fact. I am of the same opinion, that you can have no Counsel, therefore I over-rule your Plea, if it had been put in never so good form and manner.

Earl of Manchester. I beseech you, my lords, let us go some other way to work—

Sir William Wild. That which is before us, is whether it be a matter of law or fact: For the matter of law, your lordships have declared what it is; his justification is as high a treason as the former. For matter of fact, he hath confessed it. I beseech you, my lord, direct the Jury for their verdict. This gentleman hath forgot their barbarousness; they would not hear their king.

* This judge Mallet had been imprisoned in the Tower by the Parliament, for an offence in the matter of the Kentish Petition in 1642.

See the Case of Sir Edward Dering, knt. ante, vol. 4, p. 151.

Court. No Counsel can be allowed to justify a treason; that this is a treason, you are indicted by an act of the 25th of Edw. 3. That which you speak of the House of Commons, is but part of the House of Commons; they never did, nor had any power to make a law, but by King, Lords, and Commons; and therefore your plea is naught, and all the Court here is of the same opinion; if they were not, they would say so; therefore what you have said is over-ruled by the Court. Have you any thing else to offer?

Harrison. Notwithstanding the judgment of so many learned ones, that the kings of England are no ways accountable to the parliament, the Lords and Commons in the beginning of this war having declared the king's beginning war upon them; the God of Gods—

Court. Do you render yourself so desperate, that you care not what language you let fall? It must not be suffered.

Harrison. I would not willingly speak to offend any man; but I know God is no respecter of persons. His setting up his standard against the people—

Court. Truly, Mr. Harrison, this must not be suffered: this doth not at all belong to you.

Harrison. Under favour this doth belong to me. I would have abhorred to have brought him to account, had not the blood of Englishmen, that had been shed—

Counsel. Methinks he should be sent to Bedlam, till he comes to the Gallows to render an account of this. This must not be suffered. It is in a manner a New Impeachment of this king, to justify their treasons against his late majesty.

Solicitor-General. My lords, I pray that the jury may go together upon the Evidence.

Sir Edw. Turner. My lords, this man hath the plague all over him; it is pity any should stand near him, for he will infect them. Let us say to him as they used to write over an house infected, 'The Lord have mercy upon him,' and so let the officer take him away.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Harrison, we are ready to hear you again; but to hear such stuff, it cannot be suffered. You have spoken that which is as high a degree of blasphemy, next to that against God, as I have heard. You have made very ill use of these favours that have been allowed you to speak; your own conscience cannot but tell you the contradiction of your actions against this that you have heard as the opinion of the Court. To extenuate your crimes you may go on, but you must not go on as before.

Harrison. I must not speak so as to be pleasing to men; but if I must not have liberty as an Englishman—

Court. Pray do not reflect thus; you have had liberty, and more than any prisoner in your condition can expect; and I wish you had made a good use of it. Keep to the business, say what you will.

Harrison. My lords, thus: There was a discourse by one of the witnesses that I was at the committee preparing the Charge, and that I should say, 'Let us blacken him.' This thing is utterly untrue; I abhorred the doing of any thing touching the blackening of the king. There was a little discourse between the king and myself: The king had told me that he had heard that I should come privately to the Isle of Wight to offer some injury to him; but I told him I abhorred the thoughts of it. And whereas it is said that my carriage was hard to him when I brought him to London, it was not I that brought him to London, I was commanded by the general to fetch him from Hurst-Castle. I do not remember any hard carriage towards him.

Court. Mr. Harrison, You have said, that you deny that of Blackening which the witness hath sworn; and somewhat else touching the king in his way to London, that the witness hath sworn to also. The jury must consider of it, both of their oaths and your contradictions. If you have nothing more to say, which tends to your justification, we must direct the jury. The end of your speech is nothing but, to infect the people.

Harrison. You are uncharitable in that.

Justice Foster. My lords, This ought not to come from the Bar to the Bench; if you sally out thus about your conscience; if your conscience should be a darkened conscience, that must not be the rule of other men's actions. What you speak of that nature is nothing to the business. If you have any thing to say, by way of excuse for yourself for matter of fact, you may speak: but if you will go on as before, it must not be suffered.

Harrison. The things that have been done, have been done upon the stage, in the sight of the Sun—

Court. All this is a continuance of the justification and confession of the fact. We need no other evidence.

Counsel. He hath confessed his fact, my lords. The matter itself is treason upon treason; therefore we pray direction to the jury.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Harrison, I must give direction to the jury, if you will not go further touching the fact.

Harrison. My lords, I say what I did was by the Supreme Authority. I have said it before, and appeal to your own consciences, that this Court cannot call me to question.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Harrison, you have appealed to our consciences. We shall do that, which, by the blessing of God, shall be just; for which we shall answer before the Tribunal of God. Pray take heed of an obdurate, hard heart, and scared conscience.

Harrison. My lords, I have been kept six months in close prisoner, and could not prepare myself for this trial by counsel. I have got here some acts of parliament of that house of commons, which your lordship will not own; and the proceedings of that house, whose authority I did own.

L. C. Baron. This you have said already. If you shew never so many of that nature, they will not help you: you have heard the opinion of the Court touching that Authority. They all unanimously concur in it.

Gentlemen of the jury, You see that this prisoner at the bar is indicted for compassing imagining, and contriving the death of our late sovereign Lord, King Charles the First, of blessed memory. In this indictment there are several things given but as evidences of it; they are but the overt-acts of it. The one is first, that they did meet and consult together about the putting the king to death; and that alone, if nothing else had been proved in the case, was enough for you to find the indictment; for the imagination alone is treason by the law. but because the compassing and imagining the death of the king is secret in the heart, and no man knows it but God Almighty, I say, that the imagination is treason; yet it is not such as the law can take hold of, unless it appears by some overt-act. Then the first overt-act is their meeting, consulting, and proposing to put the king to death. The second is more open; namely, their sitting together, and assuming an authority to put the king to death. The third is sentencing the king. And I must tell you, that any one of these acts prove the indictment. If you find him guilty but of any one of them, either consulting, proposing, sitting, or sentencing (though there is full proof for all), yet notwithstanding you ought to find the indictment. You have heard what the witnesses have said, and the prisoner's own confession. Witnesses have sworn their sitting together; and that he was one: one swears he sat four times, another twice; some several times. There are several witnesses for this, as Mr. Masterson, Mr. Clark, Mr. Kirk, and Mr. Nutley. And then you have another thing too, which truly the prisoner did not speak of. Witness was given against him, that he was the person that conducted the king; this was before that which he would have to be done by a legislative power, and that is another overt-act. If a man will go about to imprison the king, the law knows what is the sad effect of such imprisonment. That hath often been adjudged to be an evidence of imagining and compassing the death of the king. That man, the prisoner at the bar, it hath been proved to you, did imprison the king; as appears by his own hand to the warrant for summoning of that traitorous assembly, the High Court of Justice, as they called it. And also it appears by his hand to the warrant for execution; that Bloody Warrant. He hath been so far from denying, that he hath justified these actions. The Evidence is so clear and pregnant as nothing more. I think you need not go out.

The jury went together to the bar, and presently unanimously agreed on their verdict; whereupon they were demanded by the clerk,

Clerk. Are you agreed on your Verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our Foreman. (Which was sir T. Allen.)

Clerk. Thomas Harrison, Hold up thy hand. Gentlemen of the Jury, look upon the Prisoner. How say ye? Is he Guilty of the treason whereof he stands indicted, and hath been arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Then the keeper was charged to look to the prisoner.

Clerk. What goods and chattels had he at the time of committing this treason, or at any time since?

Foreman. None to our knowledge.

Which verdict being repeated to the Jury by Mr. Clerk of the crown, the Jury owned it unanimously.

Solicitor Gen. My lords, upon this verdict that hath been given against the prisoner at the bar I humbly move, that we may have Judgment given. Your sessions will be long, and your work will be great; his demeanour hath been such that he doth not deserve a reprieve for so many days that you are like to spend in this session.

Court. Mr. Harrison, they desire Judgment upon the verdict. What do you say for yourself why Judgment should not pass against you?

Clerk. Thomas Harrison, hold up thy hand. What hast thou to say for thyself why Judgment should not pass against thee, to die according to law?

Harrison. I have nothing further to say, because the Court have not seen meet to hear what was in my heart to speak, I submit to it.

The Crier made Proclamation for Silence whilst Judgment was in giving.

L. C. Baron. You that are the prisoner at the bar, you are to pass [or receive] the sentence of death, which sentence is this: The Judgment of this Court is, and the Court doth award, That you be led back to the place from whence you came, and from thence to be drawn upon an hurdle to the place of execution; and there you shall be hanged by the neck, and being alive shall be cut down, and your privy members to be cut off, your entrails to be taken out of your body, and, you living, the same to be burnt before your eyes, and your head to be cut off, your body to be divided into four quarters, and head and quarters to be disposed of at the pleasure of the king's majesty, and the Lord have mercy upon your soul.*

And then Proclamation was made for adjournment of the Court to this place till seven of the clock to-morrow morning; and all Jurymen and witnesses were commanded to be at the said place and time upon forfeiture of 100*l.* a-piece.

TRIAL OF ADRIAN SCROOP.

October 12, 1660.

The Proclamation for Silence.

The Jury called.

Prisoners brought to the bar, viz. John

* See some account of his subsequent conduct and Execution, post.

Jones, Adrian Scroop, Thomas Scot, Gregory Clement, John Carew.

Crier. Sir Thomas Allen.

Clerk. Sir Thomas Allen, lay your hand upon the book, look upon the prisoner at the bar.

Scroop. I challenge him, my lord.

Lord Chief Baron. That you may not mistake, if you challenge in this manner, and do not join your challenges, we must try you severally one after another; I must tell you the course of the law; if one challenge one, and another challenge another, we must sever, and go to trial one by one. Call the next.

Clerk. Sir Henry Wroth.

Scroop. I challenge him.

Lord Chief Baron. Then we must go on severally. Set all aside but Mr. Scroop*. Mr.

* "Col. Adrian Scroop was accused for sitting as one of the Judges in the High Court of Justice, when the King was brought to answer as a prisoner at the bar, for signing one Warrant for summoning that Court together, and another for the Execution of the King. He denied nothing of this; but pleaded the authority of the parliament in his justification: denying that he had been acted by any motive of malice, as the Indictment had untruly suggested; and asserting, that in what he had done relating to the King, he had followed the light of his reason, and the dictates of his conscience. At this trial the principal witness was that Brown, who, having been major general in the service of the parliament, and mentioned already in this work to be of a mercenary spirit, was now brought to betray a private conversation; and to depose, That talking one day with col. Adrian Scroop in the Speaker's chamber, and telling him, that the condition of the nation was sad since the murder of the King, the Colonel had answered, That men had different opinions touching that matter: and being desired by the said Brown to explain himself, he told him, he should not make him his confessor. Though this evidence be in appearance very insignificant; yet, having influenced the House of Commons, as I mentioned before, it is not to be admired if it took effect with a Jury in an inferior court; who, taking every thing said against the person accused for substantial proof, made no scruple of bringing him in Guilty of Treason.

"He was descended of an ancient family, and possessed of a considerable estate. His port and mien was noble, and the endowments of his mind every way answerable. He appeared early in the Army of the Parliament, being present and engaged at the Battle of Edge-hill, in the head of a troop of horse, which he had raised. He was first advanced to the degree of a major, and soon after appointed to be colonel of a regiment of horse. He had been, for several years, governor of the castle of Bristol; and when the parliament thought fit to slight that garrison, they made him one of their Commissioners for the civil Scroop, you may challenge particularly whom you will till you come to thirty five; if you go beyond that number, you will lose the benefit of the law.

Scroop. I desire, my lord, that whosoever was challenged yesterday, may not be called again.

Court. No, that cannot be, that is nothing to you. The Court thereupon proceeded and called—Challenged. John Lisle, Nich. Raynton, Thomas Winter, Thomas Frankelyn, Randal Nichol, Jo. Kirke, Ambrose Scudamore, George Tirrey, who were all challenged.

Jury. Thomas Willet, Hen. Marsh, Charles Pitfield, Christopher Abdy, Richard Cheney, Tho. Bid, Jo. Smith, Richard Abel, Ralph Halsel, Jo. Gallyard, Tho. Swallow, Samuel Starnel, were admitted, and sworn on the jury.

Clerk. Cryer, make proclamation. If any man can inform my lords, the king's Justices, the king's Serjeant, or the king's Attorney, before this inquest be taken between our sovereign lord the king, and the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth and they shall be heard, for now the prisoner stands at the bar upon his delivery; and all others bound by recognizance to give Evidence against the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth and give their evidence, or else they shall forfeit their recognizance.

Clerk. Adrian Scroop, hold up thy hand; you gentlemen that are sworn, look upon the government of Scotland, in conjunction with the lord Broghill, Monk, and others. In all these employments he manifested such abilities and fidelity, that the Parliament appointed him to be one of the Commissioners for the trial of the late King; in which place he acted with all the impartiality that becomes a judge in whom so great a trust is reposed, and who ought to be no respecter of persons. The hard measure he received from the Convention at Westminster, I have already mentioned. It remains only to give some account of what he said at the place where he suffered death; which was to this purpose: That though he had been accustomed to be seen in better places, and other kind of circumstances; yet it being the will of God he should be brought into this condition, he submitted cheerfully; that he never had entertained malice against any man; and that he now wished no ill either to the Jury who found him Guilty, or to the Judges who pronounced Sentence; or even to the person by whose means he was brought to that place, who, he presumed, was so well known, that it was not necessary to name him. He said, he should not boast of his birth or education, or the private conduct of his life; because he was going to appear before a tribunal where all men must come, and where the justice or injustice of every action would be manifest; desiring the people in the mean time not to think uncharitably of him, for he was firmly persuaded he suffered for the cause of God and his Country." 3 Ludlow, pp. 53, 55.

they will not help you: you have heard the opinion of the Court touching that Authority. They all unanimously concur in it.

Gentlemen of the jury, You see that this prisoner at the bar is indicted for compassing, imagining, and contriving the death of our late sovereign Lord, King Charles the First, of blessed memory. In this indictment there are several things given but as evidences of it; they are but the overt-acts of it. The one is first, that they did meet and consult together about the putting the king to death; and that alone, if nothing else had been proved in the case, was enough for you to find the indictment; for the imagination alone is treason by the law. but because the compassing and imagining the death of the king is secret in the heart, and no man knows it but God Almighty, I say, that the imagination is treason; yet it is not such as the law can take hold of, unless it appears by some overt-act. Then the first overt-act is their meeting, consulting, and proposing to put the king to death. The second is more open; namely, their sitting together, and assuming an authority to put the king to death. The third is sentencing the king. And I must tell you, that any one of these acts prove the indictment. If you find him guilty but of any one of them, either consulting, proposing, sitting, or sentencing (though there is full proof for all), yet notwithstanding you ought to find the indictment. You have heard what the witnesses have said, and the prisoner's own confession. Witnesses have sworn their sitting together; and that he was one: one swears he sat four times, another twice; some several times. There are several witnesses for this, as Mr. Masterson, Mr. Clark, Mr. Kirk, and Mr. Nutley. And then you have another thing too, which truly the prisoner did not speak of. Witness was given against him, that he was the person that conducted the king; this was before that which he would have to be done by a legislative power, and that is another overt-act. If a man will go about to imprison the king, the law knows what is the sad effect of such imprisonment. That hath often been adjudged to be an evidence of imagining and compassing the death of the king. That man, the prisoner at the bar, it hath been proved to you, did imprison the king; as appears by his own hand to the warrant for summoning of that traitorous assembly, the High Court of Justice, as they called it. And also it appears by his hand to the warrant for execution; that Bloody Warrant. He hath been so far from denying, that he hath justified these actions. The Evidence is so clear and pregnant as nothing more. I think you need not go out.

The jury went together to the bar, and presently unanimously agreed on their verdict; whereupon they were demanded by the clerk,

Clerk. Are you agreed on your Verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our Foreman. (Which was sir T. Allen.)

Clerk. Thomas Harrison, Hold up thy hand. Gentlemen of the Jury, look upon the Prisoner. How say ye? Is he Guilty of the treason whereof he stands indicted, and hath been arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Then the keeper was charged to look to the prisoner.

Clerk. What goods and chattels had he at the time of committing this treason, or at any time since?

Foreman. None to our knowledge.

Which verdict being repeated to the Jury by Mr. Clerk of the crown, the Jury owned it unanimously.

Solicitor Gen. My lords, upon this verdict that hath been given against the prisoner at the bar I humbly move, that we may have Judgment given. Your sessions will be long, and your work will be great; his demeanour hath been such that he doth not deserve a reprieve for so many days that you are like to spend in this session.

Court. Mr. Harrison, they desire Judgment upon the verdict. What do you say for yourself why Judgment should not pass against you?

Clerk. Thomas Harrison, hold up thy hand. What hast thou to say for thyself why Judgment should not pass against thee, to die according to law?

Harrison. I have nothing further to say, because the Court have not seen meet to hear what was in my heart to speak, I submit to it.

The Crier made Proclamation for Silence whilst Judgment was in giving.

L. C. Baron. You that are the prisoner at the bar, you are to pass [or receive] the sentence of death, which sentence is this: The Judgment of this Court is, and the Court doth award, That you be led back to the place from whence you came, and from thence to be drawn upon an hurdle to the place of execution; and there you shall be hanged by the neck, and being alive shall be cut down, and your privy members to be cut off, your entrails to be taken out of your body, and, you living, the same to be burnt before your eyes, and your head to be cut off, your body to be divided into four quarters, and head and quarters to be disposed of at the pleasure of the king's majesty, and the Lord have mercy upon your soul.*

And then Proclamation was made for adjournment of the Court to this place till seven of the clock to-morrow morning; and all Jurymen and witnesses were commanded to be at the said place and time upon forfeiture of 100*l.* a-piece.

TRIAL OF ADRIAN SCROOP.

October 12, 1660.

The Proclamation for Silence.

The Jury called.

Prisoners brought to the bar, viz. John

* See some account of his subsequent conduct and Execution, post.

Court. Did you sit upon the Sentence-day, that is the evidence, which was the 27th. of January? You are not bound to answer me, but if you will not, we must prove it. Do you confess that?

Scroop. I do not confess that I stood up as assenting to the Sentence.

Mr. Clark called.

Counsel. Mr. Clark, what say you to that?

Clark. I did not take particular notice of him that day, that he stood up; but the whole Court stood up, to my apprehension, but I took notice that he was there then present.

Counsel. Mr. Clark, do you remember that you saw any of them sit?

Clark. I did not take notice of any that sat then, but all stood up, to my thoughts.

Mr. Carr called.

Counsel. Mr. Carr, Tell my lords and the jury whether you did see the prisoner at the bar sitting in that which they called the High Court of Justice.

Carr. My lords, and gentlemen of the jury, the 22d, 23d, and 27th of January 1649 I was present when the names of that they called the High Court of Justice were called, and amongst others that were judges of that Court, as was printed in a Paper, which I then had in my hand, I found the name of Mr. A. Scroop, who I saw did there sit and appear. [Mr. Carr looked in that paper when he gave his evidence.]

Scroop. I hope you will not take any evidence from a printed list.

Counsel. The manner of his evidence is, he saith, this, that he had this printed paper in his hand when the names of that Court were called, and marking the persons in that paper who were present, and that you were one of them who did appear.

Scroop. My lord, I shall not dispute, in regard of my want of skill in the law, the lawfulness of bringing in any Paper in evidence into the Court, I shall not dispute against your lordships; but by your favour, I do suppose there is no witness ought to use any paper, or look upon any paper when he gives evidence; but I shall submit it to your lordships.

Sol. Gen. Ask him the question without his paper; but yet nothing is more usual than for a witness to make use of a paper to help his memory.

Scroop. The gentleman that spake last I cannot hear him.

Sol. Gen. We do not need his paper in this case, he will tell it without a paper; Mr. Carr, speak without a paper.

Carr. My lords, upon the calling of those that were Judges in that court which they called the High Court of Justice then sitting, this gentleman the prisoner at the bar did answer to his name then called.

Scroop. Did you see me?

Carr. I heard you answer, and saw you.

Scroop. I pray he may be asked where about I sat in that court.

Counsel. Mr. Carr, you hear the question, answer to it.

Carr. I am not able particularly to tell now, it being many years since.

Scroop. My lord, observe of what value this evidence is; I am sure I never was in his company, I do not know that ever he saw me in his life; I beseech you give me leave to plead for myself in all humbleness and modesty, my lord.

L. C. Baron. Notice is taken of it, Mr. Scroop; God forbid you should be debarred of it.

Scroop. I say he comes with evidence of a paper, he heard my name called; and marked it: it is strange that a gentleman whom I never saw, I know not his name, nor do I think he knew my name if he had met me.

L. C. Baron. I told you that was laid aside, and you heard him speak viva voce without a paper.

Counsel. Mr. Kirk, did you see the prisoner at the bar in that court which they called the High Court of Justice for trial of the late King?

Kirk. My lords, and gentlemen of the jury, I did see the prisoner there, and I did wonder to see him there, which was the reason I took the more special notice of his being there.

Scroop. Pray, my lord, let me intreat one thing before he speaks; that your lordships will be pleased to speak to him to give in his evidence without any speech.

Counsel. How can that be? Can he give evidence without speaking?

Scroop. I beseech you, my lords, give me leave to say this, Let him give in his evidence in plain words without any speech.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Scroop, he must be excused; there are circumstances inducing which are as much as the principal; this that he hath said is very material; saith he, 'I did see the prisoner at the bar there; I did not expect it, and wondered at it, and therefore took the more notice.' Let him go on, ask him what question you will.

Scroop. My lord, I submit.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Kirk, you must speak the truth, and the whole truth; go on.

Kirk. I say as I said before, I saw this gentleman sitting in that which they called the High Court of Justice, and I did therefore wonder at it; because I did not expect him there. I came to know him formerly as he was called captain Scroop.

Counsel. Go on.

Kirk. And, as I said before, I saw this person, this prisoner at the bar, sit amongst the rest of those persons, judges, as they called themselves, of the High Court of Justice for the Trial of the King; I did more particularly take notice of this person; because I did not expect him there: I knew him formerly upon this report, being an eminent man, by the name of captain Scroop, and at that time was an associate of one captain Vivers, and captain Wingham; I had not seen him some years before this business, and seeing of him there, I did the more particularly take notice of him.

Scroop. Have you done, Sir? I beseech your lordship ask him what employment he had there himself when he saw me there.

Kirk. My lord, I was there to hear the trial.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Scroop, I am not willing you should have any thing of interruption, unless you reflect upon any person that concerns not you. Mr. Scroop, do not think it will be for your advantage, nor is it proper for you to ask.

Scroop. In all humbleness I do speak it to your lordships, that your lordship will please to consider, that if he had any employment in that business himself, how unfit a witness he is against me.

Court. Much fitter.

Scroop. If it be so, I have done.

Kirk. My lord, I was there only as a spectator, I went only there to see and hear what was there to be seen and heard; I stood there and took notes in characters of the proceedings, and several others with myself did the like, and we compared them together, that was all my business at that time, and I saw him sit there the 27th day of Jan. 1649, which was the day of Sentence against the King.

Scroop. Whereabouts did you see me sit there?

Kirk. It is not, I think, imaginable that any person should be able after so many years possibly to say where any person sate; but to the best of my remembrance you sate upon the second bench next the President. But I dare not be positive in that, I dare not justify it upon my oath, it is but my remembrance.

[Here Mr. Scroop talked to one that stood near him.]

L. C. Baron. We must desire that of you, Mr. Scroop, that you will not speak to any here but what the Court may hear.

Scroop. I shall observe your commands.

Mr. Coytmore sworn.

Counsel. Did you see the prisoner at the bar sitting in that which they called the High-Court of Justice as a Judge upon the King?

Coyt. I did see him.

Counsel. When? What day?

Coyt. I cannot name the day: I was there three days of their sitting, there I saw him once or twice; once I am sure.

Scroop. What day?

Coyt. I cannot remember.

Counsel. Did he sit there as a Judge upon the King?

Coyt. He sate among the rest as a Judge.

Scroop. Give me leave to ask whereabouts he saw me sit?

Counsel. Where did you see him sit?

Coyt. I cannot remember the place, he was among them; I saw him either one or two days; there was a great company of them together.

VOL. V.

Counsel. Mr. Nutley, did you see the prisoner at the bar sitting in that which they called the High-Court of Justice?

Nut. If it please your lordships, I was there in the Court those four several days that they sate in Judgment. I heard the prisoner at the bar called by his name. I did take notice he was there, truly I think he was there twice or thrice, to my remembrance.

Counsel. Can you tell what day, whether the 27th of Jan. 1649?

Nut. I cannot say positively, but to the best of my remembrance he was there; that was the last day when Judgment was given.

Mr. Baker sworn.

Counsel. Mr. Baker, what say you? Did you see the prisoner at the bar sitting in that which they called the High-Court of Justice?

Baker. Yes, I did see col. Scroop on Tuesday the 23d of Jan. 1649, very particularly stand up and answer to his name.

Counsel. Mr. Coytmore, are you acquainted with col. Scroop's hand?

Coyt. I have had several letters from him.

Counsel. Mr. Scroop, have you a mind to see the Warrant for summoning the Court?

Scroop. I desire to see it; I do not remember I set my hand to it.

Court. Shew it him. [It being shewed him]

Scroop. I cannot say it is my hand.

Counsel. It is too true: we shall prove it to you.

Court. Shew it to Mr. Coytmore.

Scroop. Be pleased to let me see it once more:—Which was again shewed him:—Truly, my lord, I will save him the labour.

Counsel. You do acknowledge it was your hand?

Scroop. I will save him the labour; for I confess I do not love men should be put to their oaths more than needs.

[Here likewise the Warrant for Execution was read.]

Counsel. My lords, we shall conclude our evidence with major-general Brown, the Lord Mayor Elect.

The Lord Mayor Elect sworn.

Counsel. My lord, be pleased to tell my lords what discourse hath lately passed between the prisoner at the bar and you concerning the death of the King.

Lord Mayor Elect. My lords, upon some occasion I was accidentally at the chamber of the Speaker, there I met this gentleman, whom indeed I knew not; he told me who he was; and when I understood who he was, I said to him (or words to this purpose, I cannot tell the words), because I would not distaste him, and say you have done this, therefore I put it thus, we have done this, What a sad case have we, said I, brought this kingdom unto! 'Why,' saith he? You see, said I, how it is ruined now the King is murdered, &c. Saith he, 'Some are of one opinion, and some of another.' Sir, said I, do you think it was well done to murder the King? Saith he, 'I will not make you my confessor, Sir;' it was much to this purpose.

Counsel. When was this spoken?

Lord Mayor Elect. Truly I do not know the day, but it was that day that sir H. M. rendered himself to the Speaker; it was since the coming in of the King.

Sol. Gen. Neither time nor the hand of God appearing in this business, nor the condition he was in, was ever able to bring this gentleman to be sorry for his offence; but we do not give it as any evidence of his crimes: You have heard the prisoner confess the two Warrants: You have heard by several witnesses produced, that he did sit in that which they called the High-Court of Justice, by three that he sat particularly on that day they called the day of their Judgment; you have heard how little penitence he hath had, by his declaration to the Lord Mayor Elect.

Scroop. I hope now that you have heard the evidence against me, that you will give me leave to make some defence for myself.

L. C. Baron. God forbid otherwise but that you should have free liberty.

Scroop. Truly, my lords, though my breeding hath not been in the way of the laws, and therefore I have a great disadvantage when there be such learned gentlemen as these are to plead against me, I must confess to you I have something for matter of law to plead for the justification of the fact, though I would not undertake to justify the person; this I humbly intreat, if it may be granted, that I may have some time given me, and some counsel, that I may answer matter of law.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Scroop, if you have any thing of matter of law for which you would have counsel, you must alledge that matter first; the use of counsel is only to put it in certainty what you have of matter of law, and then the Court and Judges must judge of it. If you have matter of law, you must tell what it is; if it be matter that there is cause to over-rule it, there is no cause of making further use of counsel. If one be indicted for murder, when he comes to trial he will say, I have matter of law to plead; what is that? That murder is no felony: Do you think counsel will be admitted in this? If you do alledge what this matter is wherein you desire counsel, you shall have your answer.

Scroop. My lords, as well as I am able to do it I shall do it; my lord, I was not in the Parliament; take notice of that; and that which was done in the High Court of Justice, it was done by a Commission from the Parliament. My lord, it was that authority, which was then, I will not say it was so, because I would not give offence; it was that authority which was then accounted the Supreme Authority of the nation; and that authority, my lord, that a great many of the generality of the nation submitted to. My lord, I having received a command from that authority, what I did was in obedience to that authority: My lord, I have not had time to consider of these things, because I have been for these six weeks time shut up a close prisoner, and that I could neither come at counsel nor any thing else, nor to get any thing to prepare for it; therefore I desire your lordships to do me the favour, if you see any weight in it, to let me have time and counsel assigned me.

L. C. Baron. Have you done, Sir?

Scroop. Yes.

L. C. Baron. Then I take it, this is the effect of what you have said; if I have not taken it aright, tell me so: You say you justify the fact, though not your person; that you were not of the Parliament; that what was done was by Commission from the Parliament; Be pleased not to mistake me, for I say you said this: 'That that which I have to plead in justification of it, I do not say that I justify myself, but that which I have to say is for justification of the fact: I was, first, no contriver of the business; and then, secondly, I did it by virtue of the command, and in obedience to the authority of the Parliament: That that authority was then accounted the supreme authority of the nations, and that the generality of the nations did submit to their authority;' I think I have repeated all you have said. Then, Mr. Scroop, you must know this, that there is no cause at all why counsel should be given for what you speak; I profess it rather tends to the aggravation than extenuation of what you did. First, you say you did it by authority of Parliament; I am afraid you have been mistaken as well as others; by the word Parliament, what doth that mean? I am sure you, and every one knows, that there was not one precedent ever heard of till this, that the House of Commons should take upon them the legislative power, and make such an act as this was; there was no colour for it. Then for men upon their own heads, never heard of before, and against the liberty and freedom of the people, that they should call it the Parliament, when there was but 46 sat, whereas there was above 240 excluded; and how you can call this a House of Commons is a great wonder to me; but I tell you this, take it for granted, that if they were the most perfect House of Commons that could be, did ever the House of Commons before this single act, take upon them the legislative power without the Lords? The Acts are begun in the Commons House; when they have done, if the Lords do not pass it, it is abortive; if it be done by both Houses, there ought to be a Royal Assent: But the Lords had rejected this Act; then they must take upon them, these 46 men, whereof I do believe there was not above 25 or 26 men that did vote this, and this must be called the Parliament, the Commons of England. I would fain know whether any man hath heard that the House of Commons took upon them the legislative power before this Act; but this hath been over-ruled in the like case, and I shall say no more to it. What is the Oath of Allegiance? Is it not that you would defend the King, his crown, rights and liberties, against all persons whatsoever? It was not only against the Pope (as some would have it), but the word is, 'or otherwise.' They broke the Oath of Supremacy, which was, 'That the King was Supreme Governor of these nations.' They swore that they would maintain and keep all privileges, immunities, pre-eminences, annexed to the Imperial crown of this realm; there is difference between some crowns and Imperial crowns: An Imperial crown, it was that which was not to be touched in the person: We do not speak any thing of the absolute power of the King, for you see he cannot judge concerning the death of his father, but by laws. When you swore this allegiance, all those members to break this at once, this would be so far from having any colour of authority, that he that justifies it, justifies it against the light of the conscience and laws. You say you did it by commandment from them; he that doth a command by such an authority, it is his guilt; our Law Books say, That if a Court at Common Law exceed their jurisdiction, in that case he that obeys that command is punishable. In the Court of Common Pleas, if there be an appeal there for murder, it is only proper to the Upper Bench; and therefore if the party be condemned, sentenced, and executed thereupon, the executioner in that case is guilty of murder for obeying that authority, which was indeed no authority: and therefore whereas you would go about to justify the fact, because you did it by command of that authority, that is an aggravation: That when men shall assume an authority which is a devil at the noon day, appearing without vizors; I say, shall assume an authority never heard of before; if men will countenance their acts by obeying them, it is an aggravation: We have already declared this in the case of the prisoner yesterday; we are all satisfied in the law in that case: it is so clear a point in law, that my brethren here and we did over-rule it yesterday in the like case, and so we must now; and I hope that all do concur in this opinion that hath been delivered.

Lord Finch. I hope all do concur in this opinion delivered by my Lord Chief Baron. You shelter yourself under a command of the House of Commons; but let me tell you, and all the world, That if the House of Commons (let it have been never so complete) had given a command, it had been a thing no ways justifiable; the justification is an aggravation.

Scroop. My lord, I do see that every thing I speak, though it be for clearing of myself from your ill opinion, I see it is taken in an ill sense (I humbly beseech pardon for the expression); if I err, I will crave your lordship's pardon; but, my lord, I say this, if I have been mis-led, I am not a single person that have been mis-led. My lord, I could say (but I think it doth not become me to say so), That I see a great many faces at this time that were mis-led as well as myself, but that I will not insist upon: I say this, That I hope an error in judgment shall not be accounted malice, or an error of the will: Truly, my lord, I never went to the work with a malicious heart; I humbly desire your lordships to take notice of it, that I never bore any malice at all against his late majesty.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Scroop, have you done?

Scroop. My lord, I do beseech your lordships to take notice, that an error in judgment is not an error in the will.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Scroop, I am very glad to hear you say so: but let me tell you what the law saith; the law in this case creates the malice. If a man do an act of this nature, that may be some kind of excuse to God, but towards man you are to look to the fact, the law implies the malice. If there be any thing you will say in the extenuation of your offence, we will be very glad to hear that may tend to your help.

Scroop. My lord, there is one evidence comes in against me that I must confess I am very sorry to see; and, my lord, there was a saying, and it is by my Lord Mayor Elect: Truly he is a worthy gentleman, but I desire the Lord may forgive that which he hath spoken: Truly, my lord, I did never intend any thing in this, neither can I directly remember that I spake those words directly, as my Lord Mayor Elect doth speak: I do believe my Lord Mayor cannot very well remember them himself; for he saith, so far as he can remember; I must confess that when I was there, and had appeared according to the Proclamation, that such discourse somewhat like it was raised, not of my procuring; I did not procure the discourse; I never intended the justification of the fact; but it was my ill success that I should meet with that worthy gentleman to have so much discourse with him.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Scroop, my Lord Mayor Elect saith no more than this, 'so far as he remembers,' and the words that you should say were these, 'That some are of one opinion, and some are of another.'

Scroop. Upon the death of the king, my lord, I must confess to you, that somewhat I said to him, but I cannot own that I said those words. My lords, He is a worthy person, I do not desire to speak any thing to degenerate in the least kind from him; it is but his Yea, and my No; there was no body there.

L. C. Baron. Have you any thing more to say for yourself?

Scroop. My lord, if your lordships do over-rule it so that I may not have Counsel, I have little more to say.

L. C. Baron. You have heard the sense of the Court in that particular, you cannot have Counsel allowed you as to the matter you have pleaded.

Scroop. I have done; but only this, my lords, I know not whether it be seasonable to mention it; I came in upon the Proclamation; and, my lords, by means of these unhappy words that have been reported of me in the House of Commons, whereas before I was no excepted person, I came to be excepted, and upon the very last day of passing that act, never was excepted before the very last day: I beseech you take notice of this.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Scroop, That is a thing that is not before us, but there will be a proper time to consider of it in another place; that is nothing to the trial; have you any more to say, Sir?

Scroop. No, my lord; will your lordship please to let me speak a word to the Jury?

L. C. Baron. If you speak to the Court the jury will hear it.

Scroop. Truly, my lord, this I do perceive, that I am under a very great prejudice as to this fact. It hath been the case of many gentlemen besides myself; I desire that these gentlemen would take my case into consideration, as they would their own, and I desire that the Lord would give them direction that they may do that which is according to justice and mercy; that is all that I have to say, my lords.

L. C. Baron. You gentlemen that are sworn of this jury, you see the prisoner, Mr. Scroop, hath been indicted for imagining and contriving the death of his late majesty, of blessed memory, king Charles the first. You see there are several things in this indictment; the Charge is the imagining and compassing the death of the king. In the indictment there are several matters of fact to prove this imagination. The imagination is the treason, the matters of fact to prove it are but the evidences of that imagination; if any one of them be proved to you, it is sufficient; the one is consulting and meeting together how to put him to death, the other sitting and assuming authority to bring him to trial. Then you have a sentence by the Court to put the king to death thereupon; afterwards he was put to death: Any one of these matters are evidence enough for you to prove the Indictment; for though the Indictment concludes that so they did imagine and compass the death of the king, and that the king was put to death in manner and form as aforesaid; the manner and form aforesaid goes to this, to the imagination of the heart; for the law did not think any one would put the king to death, they thought it so a crime, they thought it not convenient to bring it into the statute. But the compassing and imagining the death of the king is made treason: Then to apply it, this fact, to the gentleman, it appears to you here by the proofs against him. Here is Mr. Masterson swears he saw him sit in that pretended Court; there was your evidence of the first, the first was their meeting together; and of the second too, they did assume authority upon them; and he swears further to the sentencing. That the prisoner was there. Here were the three Overt-Acts all proved. He confesses he did sign the Warrant for putting the king to death: This, without any witness at all, was a sufficient proof, a proof of proofs. The other witnesses, you hear what they say: you hear Mr. Kirke, Mr. Clark, Mr. Nutley, swear all to his sitting there. It is true, when this comes to the particulars where he sate, you must remember it was twelve years ago; when a man sees a mixt number of about eighty persons, it is impossible a man should be able to answer this particular after twelve years, where such a one sate; but you may see by his sentencing what he did. They all witness they saw him positively; and one tells you, 'He wondered he saw him there;' and indeed it might be a wonder; for Mr. Scroop (to give him his right) was not a person as some of the rest, but he was unhappily engaged in that bloody business, I hope mistakenly; but when it comes to so high a crime as this, men must not excuse themselves by ignorance or misguided conscience. As to God, for this horrid murder of the king, somewhat may be, but there is no excuse or extenuation before man; there may be, I say, before the Lord. You see the proof is full against this gentleman, as full as may be; witnesses saw him sit, and he himself confessed he signed the Warrants. I have no more to say to you, but, Gentlemen, you see what it is; I think for matter of fact you need not go from the bar; but I leave it to you.

Scroop. My lord—

L. C. Baron. Mr. Scroop, if you have any thing to say when the jury have brought in their Verdict, if you will say any thing for matter of mercy, the Court will hear you.

Scroop. I thank your lordship.

The Jury went together, and presently settled themselves in their places.

Clerk. Adrian Scroop, hold up thy hand. Look upon the prisoner. How say you? Is he Guilty of the treason, whereof he stands indicted and hath been arraigned, or Not Guilty?

Jury. Guilty.

Clerk. What goods and chattels, &c.

Jury. None that we know.

L. C. Baron. If you will say any thing, the Court will hear you.

Scroop. I have no more, my lord, but refer myself to this honourable Court.*

TRIAL OF JOHN CAREW.

October 12, 1660.

Clerk. Set John Carew, Tho. Scot, John Jones, and Gregory Clement to the bar; who were set accordingly; and being commanded, they severally held up their hands.

Clerk. These men that were last called, &c. Sir Thomas Allen lay your hand on the book: Look, &c.

Carew. I challenge him.

L. C. Baron. Are you all agreed as to your challenges?

Prisoner. No, my lord.

L. C. Baron. Then we must do as before, sever you, and go to trial severally: Take the three away, and let Mr. Carew stand at the bar.*

Challenged, Charles Pitfield,——Wille, Will. Smiths, Rich. Rider, Edward Ralph, James

* “ Mr. John Carew was a gentleman of an ancient family in the county of Cornwall, educated in one of the universities, and at the Inns of Court. He had a plentiful estate; and being chosen to serve in the great parliament, he was elected into the Council of State, and employed in many important affairs; in which he shewed great ability. He found the same usage from the Court as maj. gen. Harrison had done; being frequently interrupted, and counsel denied, though earnestly desired by him, in that point of law touching the authority by which he had acted. When he saw that all he could say was to no purpose, he frankly acknowledged, that he sat in the High Court of Justice, and had signed two warrants; one for summoning the Court in order to the king's trial, and another for his execution. Upon this the Court, who were well acquainted with the disposition of the jury, permitting him to speak, he said, that, in the year 1640, a parliament was called according to the laws and constitution of this nation; that some differences arising between the king and that parliament, the king withdrew his person from them; upon which the lords and commons declared——Here the Court, being conscious that their cobweb-coverings were not sufficient to keep out the light of those truths he was going to produce, contrary to the liberty they had promised, interrupted him, under colour that what he was about to say, tended not only to justify the action for which he was accused, but to cast a bill of division among those who were present. But Mr. Carew going on to say, The lords and commons by their declaration——Judge Foster interrupted him again, and told him, he endeavoured to revive those differences which he hoped were laid asleep, and that he did so to blow the trumpet of sedition; demanding if he had ever heard, or could produce an act of parliament made by the commons alone. To this he would have answered; but was not permitted to finish what he began to say, or hardly any one thing he endeavoured to speak in his defence during the whole trial: Mr. Arthur Annesley, particularly, charged him with the exclusion of the members in the year 1648, of which number he had been one. To which he only replied, that it seemed strange to find a man who sat as a judge on the bench, to give evidence as a witness in the Court. These irregular proceedings, unbecoming a court of judicature, obliged Mr. Carew to address himself to the jury, leaving them to judge of the legality of his trial; and appealing to their consciences, whether he had been permitted to make his defence. But they, who were not to be diverted from the resolutions they had taken, without any regard to the manner of his trial, declared him Guilty as he was accused.” 3 Ludl.

Shercroft, Thomas Uffman, Francis Beal, Will. Whitcombe, Samuel Harris, Jo. Nichol of Finchley, George Right, Thomas Fruen, Ab. Newman, Thomas Blithe, Will. Vincent, James Hawley, Chr. Abdy, Tho. Bide, John Smith, Ab. Scudamore, Ralph Halsel, John Galliard. In all 23.

Jury sworn, Robert Clark, Thomas Grover, Richard Whaley, Samuel Greenhil, Nicholas Raynton, Thomas Winter, Richard Cheney, John Kerk, Richard Abel, Thomas Morris, George Terrey, Thomas Swallow; in all 12.

If any man can inform my lords the king's justices, &c.

Clerk. John Carew, hold up thy hand.

You that are sworn look upon the prisoner: You shall understand, &c.

Sir Edward Turner. May it please your lordships, our hue and cry still proceeds against the murderers of our late sovereign lord king Charles the first of blessed memory, and this gentleman the prisoner at the bar is apprehended as one among others for shedding that precious blood. Gentlemen of the jury, he stands indicted before you, for that he, I cannot express it better, not having the fear of God before his eyes, but being seduced by the instigation of the devil, he did imagine and compass the death of his said late majesty. In prosecution of this, gentlemen, there be several things that are mentioned in the Indictment, which are the open acts to discover to you these secret, and private imaginations. He did meet and consult with divers persons touching the death of the king, that did usurp and take upon them to exercise a power and jurisdiction to try the king; and finally, most horribly put him to death. The treason by the statute of 25 Ed. 3, and which you are to enquire of, is, the imagining and compassing the death of the king; the rest of the Indictment are but particulars to prove that he did so imagine and compass the death of the king. If we shall prove these, or any of these facts, you have then sufficient to convict him. There was a thing they called a High Court of Justice, that was set up, wherein they did pretend to try our late sovereign lord, and a precept made, and that under the hand and seal of the prisoner at the bar, amongst others, for summoning and convening that bloody Court, where, among the rest of the miscreants, the prisoner at the bar did sit, and had confidence, nay impudence, to pronounce Judgment against his sovereign. In this he rested not, but he, among them, set his hand and seal to that bloody roll or warrant for putting him to death, which accordingly was done; and to these several open acts we shall call our witnesses, and so proceed.

Mr. Masterson, Mr. Clark, and Mr. Kirk sworn.

Counsel. Mr. Masterson, look upon the prisoner, did you see him sit in that they called the High Court of Justice?

L. C. Baron. Mr. Carew, if you will have pen, ink, and paper, you may have it, pray call for it.

Carew. I have no need of it.

Counsel. Mr. Masterson, did you see, &c.

Masterson. My lords, and gentlemen of the jury, I was present at that assembly, which they called the High Court of Justice for trial of the king, upon the 22d, 23d, and 27th of January 1649, and there I saw the king stand a prisoner at the bar. I saw this gentleman, the prisoner at the bar, sit upon the bench in that Court, as one of his majesty's judges; particularly upon the 27th of January, which was the day of sentence, I saw him sitting there.

Counsel. Mr. Clark, you hear the question; do you remember that you saw the prisoner at the bar sitting in that which they called the High Court of Justice?

Clark. I remember I saw the prisoner at the bar sitting in that which they called the High Court of Justice for the trial of the late king, and particularly I took notice upon the 23d and 27th of Jan. 1649, that he was present.

Counsel. What was done upon the 27th day?

Clark. The 27th day the late king was sentenced to death.

Jury. What is your name, Sir?

Counsel. His name is William Clark.

Counsel. Mr. Kirk, what say you to the former question touching the prisoner, his being at that which they called the High Court of Justice?

Kirk. My lords, and gentlemen of the jury, I was present at the trial of his late Majesty of blessed memory. I saw that gentleman, the prisoner at the bar, several days there, particularly the day of the sentence, which was the 27th day of January, 1649; when the sentence was passed he rose up, assenting to it. [Then the Warrant for summoning that pretended Court was shewed to Mr. Kirk.]

Counsel. Do you believe that hand to be the hand of Mr. Jo. Carew, prisoner at the bar?

Kirk. My lords, I do believe it to be his hand; I have seen his hand to several orders, and being very well acquainted with his hand-writing, I believe it to be his hand as much as any man can possibly know another man's hand.

[Then the Warrant for Execution of the King was likewise shewn him.]

Counsel. Is that the hand also of the prisoner at the bar?

Kirk. It is the same hand, my lord.

Court. Was Mr. Carew a member of the Long Parliament?

Kirk. Yes, my lord.

Counsel. Had you occasion to be acquainted with his hand?

Kirk. My lord, I have seen him set his hand several times to orders and other papers.

Mr. Farrington sworn.

Counsel. Do you know (the Warrants being shewn him) those hands to be the writing of the prisoner at the bar?

Far. My lords, really I believe these are his hand.

Court. Are you acquainted with his hand?

Far. Yes, my lord, and I do believe these to be his hand-writing. I did not see him write them, but so far as possibly a man can know another's writing I do believe these to be his.

Court. If you will ask to see them, you may see them, Mr. Carew.

Carew. Please you to go on.—Here they were both read.

Counsel. May it please your lordships, we shall not need to trouble the jury any further: we have proved that the prisoner did sign that Warrant for summoning that Court of Injustice, that he sate there and sentenced the King to death among others, and that he signed the Warrant for execution.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Carew, you have heard the evidence; you may please to speak what you think fit for yourself.

Carew. My lords, the crimes that are here laid to my charge in this indictment are Treason and Murther.

L. C. Baron. I would not have you to be mis-informed, it is Treason only, but it carries the other in with it, Murther.

Carew. Because you say it carries the other inclusively.

L. C. Baron. It doth; the charge is the compassing and imagining the death of the King, the other is but evidence.

Carew. Then the thing that I stand upon before the Lord, and before you all, I say before the Lord, before whom we must all stand, and give an account of this action, which is a very great and weighty one: And whereas it is charged there, (for I shall not trouble you with many words as to the particulars, or as to the proofs, but I shall ingenuously acknowledge what the truth is, and how far I can believe it;) and therefore I say, as to the beginning of what was charged by the Counsel, and according to the course of the indictment, that what was done in those things, that it was not having the fear of God before mine eyes, but being moved by the Devil; and that it was done with a traitorous, malicious and devilish heart, and all those things mentioned in the indictment: as for that, I can say in the presence of the Lord, who is the searcher of all hearts, that what I did was in his fear, and I did it in obedience to his holy and righteous laws.

[Here the people hummed.]

L. C. Baron. Go on. He stands for his life, let him have liberty.

Carew. It is part of my charge not to have the fear of God, &c. I did such and such things. I hope I may have liberty.

L. C. Baron. Go on, you shall not be interrupted.

Carew. I say, that I did it in the fear of the Lord, and I will begin with that, and confess ingenuously the truth of it. When this came in to question, there was an Ordinance brought in to try the king, where my name was not as one of the judges. There was another afterwards, an act which I shall mention upon what ground by and by, what that was, and that act was brought in and committed, and names brought in, and my name was not brought in, and so afterwards my name was put in, and seeing it I did strike it out. After the committee was up, I told them I did desire to be excused in such a business. I have told you, how, wherein, and the ground that I did it, which I shall leave with the Lord, in whose hands your and my breath, and all our breaths, are; and therefore when it was so, I did, because of the weight of it, as being a very great and special thing, and so I was very unwilling, because of there being enow, which I thought had more experience every way for so great a concernment as that was, to be employed rather than I; yet being satisfied with that authority that did it, this is to shew you how that I had the fear of the Lord, and did weigh the things: after that when the Bill was brought into the house, my name was put in there with several others, so I came to be in; and what I did was upon these two accounts: First, in obedience, as I told you, to the Lord, which was the chief thing, and in obedience to that which was then the Supreme Authority of this nation; and therefore I shall mention these grounds very briefly, because indeed the things that are controverted here at this time, they have been controverted in the face of the whole world in several nations; and the Lord hath given an answer upon solemn appeals to these things; I shall therefore mention them very briefly, because they have been so public. The Declarations and Remonstrances that have passed between the king and parliament concerning the beginning of the wars—

Lord Chief Baron. Mr. Carew, I would be very loth to interrupt you, but I see what course is taken, and the people's eyes are upon you: You seek delays, and against the course of prisoners: You say you will confess, but you do not confess the fact, after you have spent all this time; and all the witnesses are heard for this that you speak of now; if you go about to justify 'as in the fear of the Lord,' or any thing of that nature, that we cannot allow of; but we do allow you to speak and give the heads of what you will say as to the matter of fact; but to hear you make discourses and debates which are a justification of a horrid and notorious treason, we cannot hear it; we ought not to hear the maintaining of open treason; cannot hear you to speak that upon your opening, which is treason: We are willing that you open the heads what you have to say; we are upon our consciences, and to appear before God for what we do, and so are you too; but remember, the devil sometimes appears in the habit of an angel of light. If you will couch your matter in a few words, the court affords you liberty, which is indeed beyond the strict rules of law.

Carew. You say you sit here by the laws of the land, and are sworn to maintain the laws. We ought not, that we should plead to this Indictment, for what we did was by an act of Parliament.

Court. Pray, Sir, this must not be let fall without reproof or rather punishment.

Carew. I believe there is no precedent for it.

Court. Sir, we know the act of Parliament as well as you, and most of the standers-by: You go upon a false ground, there was no such act of the Supreme Authority as you pretend to; these are but phantasms of your own brain, and must not be suffered; these things have been controverted and decided many a time again and again.

Carew. I desire to have time to speak how it was begun and carried on, or else how shall I be able to make my defence, or to tell you what are the heads I will insist upon: I shall declare the grounds upon which the Parliament did proceed.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Carew, If that be your ground, the Parliament did it, the house of Commons did it, 'I have something to offer' (not to interrupt you) to the then Commons'—

Carew. In my humble opinion for the maintaining of this, it was by authority, the Supreme Authority, by which it was done,

L. C. Baron. Did you sign this Warrant for the summoning and warning of that Court? And did you sign the Warrant for executing the late king?

Carew. I desire I may go on with my defence.

L. C. Baron. We would not have you be mistaken: You seem to confess the act, and now you justify it; you cannot speak any thing for your justification till you confess the fact.

Carew. I shall speak to that in its time.

L. C. Baron. You must speak to that first, that is matter of fact, whereupon the jury are to go.

Carew. There is matter of law.

Court. You must speak to matter of fact first.

Carew. I say, this that I was about to say, That the Supreme Authority—

Court. You must speak to the fact first, Whether you did compass, &c. the king's death, or not? That is the first ground; if you did not, there is an end of the business: It is proved against you that you did it; if you come to justify it, it must be when you have first agreed the matter of fact.

Carew. I desire I may have liberty to proceed, either for matter of fact, or law, as I list.

Court. No, no, you must first speak to the fact; you may be after heard. You know in all cases they must begin with the fact, either denying or extenuating; for matter of law in this case must arise from the fact.

● Carew. But I humbly conceive there is a matter of law in this case, and it is matter of law that is above the jurisdiction of this inferior court.

Mr. Sol. Black. I pray that he may be held to the issue, Guilty, or Not Guilty: if he deny the fact, let us rely upon our evidence, and he upon his; he cannot come to law till he hath confessed the fact. The question is, Whether you did, or not? There is the fact; if you have any thing to justify, that follows.

Carew. I was upon that, and going on to shew the reasons and grounds of it.

Court. First you must confess it, if you will shew the reasons why you did it.

Carew. I told you there was some things I did.

Court. What are those some?

Carew. I do acknowledge that I was there at the court.

Counsel. Did you sign the Warrants for summoning that court, and for execution of the king?

Carew. Yes, I did sign them both.

Counsel. Then say what you will.

L. C. Baron. Now go on.

Carew. In the year 1640, there was a Parliament called according to the laws and constitutions of this nation, and after that there was some difference between the King and the Parliament, the two Houses of Parliament, Lords, and Commons, and thereupon the King did withdraw from the two houses of Parliament, as appears by their own declaration, The Great Remonstrance, printed in 1642; and thereupon the Lords and Commons did declare——

L. C. Baron. Mr. Carew, the Court are of opinion not to suffer you to go on in this; they say it tends not only to justify your act, but you cast in bones here to make some difference. You talk of the Lords and Commons; you have nothing to do with that business; your authority that you pretend to was an act of Parliament (as they called themselves), and that where there was but 46 commons in the house, and but 26 voted it.

Carew. I say, that the Lords and Commons, by their Declaration——

Mr. Justice Foster. Hold your hand awhile, Sir, not so fast; you go to raise up those differences which I hope are asleep; new troubles, to revive those things which by the grace of God are extinct; you are not to be suffered in this; it is not the singling out of a few persons that makes a Parliament. We see as before, so still, it is your course to blow the trumpet of sedition. Did you ever hear, or can you produce instances of an act of Parliament made by the house of Commons alone? though this was not the house of Commons, as you have heard before.

Carew. Neither was there ever such a war, or such a precedent.

Court. Nor we hope never will be: Pray remember, you were returned to serve in the house; what was that Writ that summoned your appearance? You had no manner of ground in the world to go that way that you did.

Counsel. We pray that the prisoner at the bar give us patience a little to repeat that to him which your lordships have been so often troubled with declaring; this is not the first or second time that in this public assembly it hath been said, That neither the Lords nor the Commons, jointly nor severally, have any power at all to proceed upon the person of the King; that it is not in their power to condemn any man in England without the good pleasure of the King, much less the King himself; and that this is the great liberty of the people of England that it should be so; and it was the first breach and invasion of our liberty that that first Parliament made, and which you justify in the name of the Lord. In this case to throw us upon debates of the war, and to talk here of the causes and reasons of that quarrel which ended in such a tragedy; for this person to come here with this confidence, and to justify it, but that he knows he cannot be in a worse condition, one would wonder it should fall from any man that hath any regard of himself. It is all one to them that perish, whether they fall by one sin, or multitudes: He makes no scruple to multiply treasons. I do beseech your lordship he may not offer as he hath begun, but that the jury may proceed.

Court. All the Court are of the same opinion, not to hear any thing like the former discourses.

Carew. I desire I may be heard; I have not compassed the death of the late king, contrived the death of the king; what I did, I did by authority.

Court. This is not to be heard; you have heard what hath been said to you, there could be no such authority, neither was, nor could be; but you would by a wire-lace bring it in by this. You have confessed the fact, which must be left to the Jury.

Annesley. I think you were present in the house of commons when that Vote passed for agreement with the king in the treaty at the Isle of Wight. You know the king having condescended to most of the desires of his parliament, there was a debate in the house, and a conclusion that they were Grounds for Peace. You know the lords and commons did resolve to agree with their king; when that was done, that would not satisfy you, and other members of the house; then you go and contrive new ways; you contrive a new-fashioned parliament, the driving away many members by power, which you could not do by the law of the land: Nay, the parliament had declared against: That which you pretend is by authority, is no authority; for few of you set up an arbitrary parliament of a few of yourselves, when you had driven away the rest: This kind of parliament gives you the authority you pretend to. You were saying that the parliament was called at first, the Lords and Commons, by the King, according to the ancient constitutions of the laws: Did such a parliament give you such authority as you pretend to? an act of parliament, as you call it, which was but an order of some of the Commons, and but a few of them; you can have no manner of justification, and therefore your plea must be over-ruled, as yesterday it was in the like case. You are indicted upon a clear act of parliament of 25 Edw. 3, and you defend yourself upon pretence of an act of parliament, which hath been over-ruled as no act.

Carew. I am a stranger to many of these things which you have offered, and this is strange, you give evidence sitting as a judge.

L. C. Baron. You are mistaken, it is not evidence; he shews you what authority that was, an authority of 26 members; How is this evidence? Mr. Carew, if you have any thing more of fact, go on: If you have nothing but according to this kind of discourse, I am commanded to direct the Jury.

Carew. I am very willing to leave it with the Lord, if you will stop me that I cannot open the true nature of those things that did give me ground of satisfaction in my conscience that I did it from the Lord.

Sol. Gen. I do pray, for the honour of God, and our king, that he may not be suffered to go on in this manner. You have been suffered to speak; you have said but little, only sedition, you pretend a conscience, and the fear of the Lord, when all the world knows you did it against the law of the Lord, your own conscience, the light of nature, and the laws of the land, against the oaths you have taken of allegiance and supremacy.

Carew. Gentlemen of the Jury, I say I shall leave it with you. This authority I speak of is right, which was the Supreme Power; it is well known what they were.

Counsel. It is so indeed, many have known what they were.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Carew, You have been heard what, and beyond what, was fit to say in your own defence; that which you have said, the heads of it you see the whole Court hath over-ruled. To suffer you to expatiate against God and the king, by blasphemy, is not to be endured; it is suffering poison to go about to infect the people; but they know now too well the old saying, 'In Nomine Domini,' in the name of the Lord, all mischiefs have been done: that hath been an old rule. I must now give directions to the Jury.

L. C. Baron. Gentlemen of the Jury—

Carew. I have desired to speak the words of truth and soberness, but have been hindered.

L. C. Baron. Gentlemen of the Jury, you see the prisoner here at the bar hath been indicted of treason, and this was for compassing and imagining the death of our sovereign lord king Charles the 1st of blessed memory. This Indictment sets forth several Overt-Acts to prove this imagination, for otherwise it is secret in the heart; the fact itself, the treason itself, is the imagination of the heart: The Overt-Acts that are laid down in the Indictment to prove this, That they did consult and meet together how to put the king to death, That they did sit upon him: And thirdly, That they did sentence him to death and afterwards he died. You heard what is proved against the gentleman, the prisoner at the bar, by several witnesses, his own confession, That he signed the Warrant for summoning and convening that Court together, whereby the king was to be brought to his trial; and that he sat at his sentence, and issued the Warrant for his execution: You saw that this gentleman did the fact, did compass and imagine the king's death. That which you are to try is this issue, being indicted for High-Treason, and pleading Not Guilty; whether this gentleman that went so far, sate upon him, condemned him, signed the Warrant for his execution, did not compass and imagine the king's death? I think you need not stir from the bar where you are, but I leave that to you.

After a very small time of consultation by the Jury amongst themselves at the bar, they agreed in a verdict.

Silence was commanded.

Clerk. John Carew. Hold up thy hand. Gentlemen of the Jury, look upon the prisoner: How say you? Is he Guilty of the horrid Treason whereof he stands Indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Clerk. What goods and chattels, &c.

Jury. None that we know of*.

TRIAL OF THOMAS SCOT.

October 12, 1660.

Clerk. Set Thomas Scott† to the bar (which was accordingly done). Thomas Scot, Hold up

* See particulars of his Behaviour and Execution infra.

† "Mr. Thomas Scot was on the same day brought to a trial, or rather to receive the sentence of condemnation. He was charged with sitting in the High Court of Justice at the king's trial, with signing the two warrants above mentioned, and desiring, that the following inscription might be engraved upon his monument, "Here lies Thomas Scot, who adjudged "the late king to die." Divers witnesses were produced to prove these things; and among them Mr. William Lenthall, Speaker to the parliament; who though when the king entered the house of commons, and had demanded of him the five members, he knew how to answer, "That he had neither ears to hear, eyes to see, or mouth to speak, except what the house gave," could now appear as evidence against Mr. Scot for words spoken in parliament; which he was conscious to himself was a high breach of privilege; acquainting the court, that the person accused had justified in the house the proceedings against the king. Mr. Scot said in his defence, That whatever had been spoken in the house, ought not to be given in evidence against him, not falling under the cognisance of any inferior Court, as all men knew; that for what he had done in relation to the king, he had the authority of parliament for his justification; that the Court had no right thy hand. These men that have been of the last Jury are to try, &c. If you will challenge all, or any of them, you must challenge them before they are sworn.

Scot. I desire that those men who have been of the former Jury may not be named. I know my liberty of excepting against my number.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Scot, That which you desire is a thing not right; the offence with one is not the same with others: I speak not but that the Court will do you all right; the Court will grant it, if you will wave your to declare whether that authority were a parliament or not. And being demanded to produce one instance to shew that the house of commons was ever possessed of such an authority, he assured them he could produce many. But having begun with the Saxon times, he was interrupted by the Court, and told that the things of those ages were obscure. Finding he might not be permitted to proceed in that way, he took the liberty to tell them, that he could not see for what reason it was not as lawful for that house of commons which he had sat as a member, to make laws, as for the present convention, which had been called by the authority of the keepers of the liberties of England. "I had the authority of parliament, the legislative authority to justify me"—Here the court interrupted him. But having no reasons to give, Finch said in a passion, "Sir, if you speak to this purpose again, I profess for my own part I dare not hear any more. It is a doctrine so poisonous and blasphemous, that if you proceed upon this point I shall (and I hope my lords will be of the same opinion) desire, that the jury may be immediately directed." Mr. Scot replied, "My lord, I thought you would rather have been my counsel, as I think it is the duty of your place. But in this matter I am not alone, neither is it my single opinion. Even the secluded members owned us to be a parliament; else why did they, supported by an armed force, intrude themselves contrary to the resolutions of the house, in order to procure the major vote for our dissolution?" To which Mr. Annesley answered, That if the secluded members had not appeared in parliament, and by that means put an end to all pretences, the people had not so soon arrived at their happiness. These with many other things of equal force, being said by Mr. Scot in his defence, rather to justify himself to his country, than from any hopes of consideration from those with whom he had to do; the Jury, as directed, found him 'Guilty' also.

"Mr. Scot was a gentleman, who, having been educated in the university of Cambridge, had lived privately in the country till, upon a recruit of members to serve in the parliament, he was chosen to be of their number; and in that station carried himself with such constancy and zeal for the service of the Commonwealth, that, during the interruption of the parliament by Cromwell, the country in which challenges; but if you mean those that have been by others, challenged, it is against law.

Scot. I am willing to bring myself upon my trial, and I will take the ordinary way of excepting and challenging.

Sir Hen. Worth, sir Jer. Whichcote, James Hawley, Rich. Rider, Fra. Beale, Chr. Abdy, Nicho. Raynton, Tho. Winter, John Kirke, Rich. Abel, sir Tho. Aleyn, Abr. Scudamore, Ralph Halsall, George Tirrey, Tho. Swallow, Charles Pickerne, Arthur Newman, Tho. Blithe, William Vincent, Rich. Whaley, were called and challenged.

he lived, as a mark of their esteem, chose him to serve them as often as there was occasion. When the parliament was a second time interrupted by the army, he held a constant correspondence with Monk for their restitution; in which he was very instrumental, as well by causing the letters he received from Monk, declaring his resolution to live and die with the parliament, to be printed and published, as by other services. He had been several times chosen a member of the Council of State. And the parliament being again restored they appointed him to be secretary to that board, and deputed him for one of the two commissioners they sent to accompany Monk in his march to London. To this gentleman Monk solemnly swore at St Alban's, that he would be faithful to the parliament. In confidence of which, when Mr. Scot had resumed his place in the house, he undertook so largely for his integrity. But when his treachery was too manifest, he endeavoured to pass beyond the seas, and was taken by pirates; who, having plundered him, set him ashore in Hampshire; yet, by the assistance of his friends, he procured another vessel to land him in Flanders; where he was no sooner arrived, but he was seized by an agent for the king. Don Alonzo de Cardenas, then governor of the Spanish Netherlands, who had been ambassador for the king of Spain in England during the government of the Commonwealth, remembering the particular obligations he had to Mr. Scot, caused him to be set at liberty. Being freed from these dangers, and afterwards finding his name to be inserted among others of the king's judges who were required to render themselves if they expected any benefit by the act of indemnity; in confidence at least of saving his life he surrendered himself to the English agent within the time limited by the proclamation. And though he was thus insnared, yet he was not unwilling to confirm what he had done with the testimony of his blood; which he did with the greatest demonstrations of cheerfulness and satisfaction of mind. He attempted several times to speak to the people at the place of execution, in justification of that cause for which he was to die: but those who feared nothing so much as truth, interrupted him so often, that he found himself obliged to say, 'That surely it must be a very bad cause which cannot suffer the words of a dying man.'

Thomas Grover, Edw. Rolfe, Tho. Ufman, William Whitcombe, Rich. Cheney, Tho. Hide, Charles Pitfield, John Smith, Tho. Morris, Tho. Fruen, Henry Twyford, Samuel Starnel, were the Jury sworn.

Clerk. Crier, make Proclamation.

Crier. O yes, if any man can inform my lords the king's justices, &c.

Clerk. Tho. Scot, Hold up thy hand. You that are sworn of this Jury, you shall understand that the prisoner at the bar stands indicted by the name of Tho. Scot, late of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, gent. 'For that he, together with John Lisle, &c.' [Here the Indictment was read.] 'Unto which Indictment he hath been arraigned, and thereunto hath pleaded Not Guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon God and the country, which country you are. Now your charge is to enquire, whether, &c.'

Mr. Sol. Gen. You that are sworn of this Jury, this inquisition for blood, royal blood, goes on against the prisoner at the bar; he stands indicted for compassing, imagining, and contriving the death of the late king, of blessed memory: It is laid to his charge in the Indictment, that he did assemble at Westminster, and that he, with other persons, usurped the authority of sitting and sentencing to death his said late majesty, and that in consequence and pursuance of that the king came to his death; The treason he stands charged with is the compassing and imagining the King's death: the other parts of the Indictment are but overt-acts, that do but evidence and prove the corruption of his heart. If we prove but some of these overt-acts, then you must find him Guilty. Our evidence against this gentleman will be thus: We shall call witness to prove his sitting in the Court, sentencing his king, while his king stood a prisoner at the bar; the warrant for execution of the king, directed to certain persons to see execution done accordingly, was under hands and seals, and among those hands and seals, the hand and seal of the prisoner at the bar is one: And then we shall produce to your lordships witnesses to shew you with what a hard and impenitent heart this hath been committed; for he so gloried in the act, that he desired it might be writ upon his tomb.

Mr. Nutley, Mr. Kirke, Mr. Masterson, and Mr. Clark, sworn.

Counsel. Mr. Masterson, be pleased to tell my lords and the Jury if you have seen the prisoner at the bar sit in that which they called the High-Court of Justice.

Masterson. My lords, and gentlemen of the Jury, I saw the prisoner at the bar present at the High-Court of Justice (as they called it) for the trial of the late king some days; that is to say, either upon the 22d or 23d of Jan. 1649; but particularly upon the 27th of that month in the said year, when the Sentence of death was pronounced against his late majesty, I saw the prisoner at the bar present.

Counsel. As one of the Judges, do you mean?

Masterson. As one of the Judges sitting upon the bench.

Scot. Do you know whereabouts I sat?

Masterson. I cannot satisfy you in that, but I saw you sitting upon one of the benches.

Counsel. Mr. Clark, you hear the question, pray answer what you know touching it.

Mr. Clark. My lords, and you gentlemen of the Jury, I was present in the year 1649, when his late majesty stood a prisoner at the bar in that which they called the High-Court of Justice, and among other persons there present in that business, I observed Mr. Scot, the prisoner at the bar, to sit as one of the Judges, and particularly upon the 23d and 27th of January in the said year, upon which last day the Court pronounced Judgment upon the late King.

Counsel. Did he stand up as assenting to the sentence?

Mr. Clark. They all stood up, to my apprehension, I know not particularly whether the prisoner at the bar did.

Counsel. Mr. Kirke, tell my lords and the Jury your knowledge in this business touching the prisoner at the bar.

Mr. Kirke. I was present at the trial of his late majesty several days; among the rest of the persons that sat in the Court as Judges, I saw the prisoner at the bar, and particularly upon the day of the sentence, the 27th of Jan. 1649, the Court stood up unanimously as assenting.

Counsel. Shew him the Warrant for execution.

Kirke. This is his hand.

Counsel. Have you seen his hand often?

Kirke. Yes, Sir, and am well acquainted with it.

George Farrington sworn.

Counsel. Shew Mr. Farrington the Warrant; do you know that to be Mr. Scot's hand-writing?

Farrington. I did not see him write it, but I do verily believe it to be his; I have often seen his hand-writing.

Counsel. Mr. Nutley, do you know Mr. Scot's hand-writing? Is that Mr. Scot's writing? [The Warrant shewn him.]

Nutley. I do verily believe it is.

Counsel. Have you been acquainted with the writing of his name?

Nutley. I have seen him write his name, and do verily believe it to be his hand.

Counsel. Clerk, read the Warrant.—He read it accordingly.

Counsel. That which remains of our evidence is to prove his boasting of this villainy; we shall desire you to hear Sir Theophilus Biddolph.

Sir Theophilus Biddolph sworn.

Counsel. Pray tell my lords and the jury what you have heard the prisoner say touching this business of putting the King to death.

Sir T. Biddolph. I did hear him confess that he did sit as one of the judges of the late King; and that he was so far from repenting of the act, that he did desire when he died that a tombstone might be laid over him with this inscription, 'Here lies Thomas Scot, who adjudged to death the late King.'

Counsel. Where did he say this?

Sir T. Biddolph. In the parliament house.

Colonel Copley, Esq., sworn.

Counsel. Pray, Mr. Copley, tell my lords what you know of this business.

Mr. Copley. My lord, I was one of the Secluded Members; when we were called to sit in the house again, the prisoner at the bar, Mr. Thomas Scot, (I think it was the last day we sat,) there being some speaking of the horridness of the fact, he made a long harangue about that horrid act; and he said, 'He hoped he should never repent of it,' and desired that when he died it might be written upon his tombstone, 'Here lies Thomas Scot, who adjudged to death the late King.'

Counsel. We have done with our evidence.

Court. When was it you heard him speak those words?

Sir T. Biddolph. To my best remembrance it was in Richard's parliament; it was about January or February was twelve-months.

Counsel. Were not you a member for the city of London in that parliament?

Sir T. Biddolph. Yes.

Counsel. Mr. Copley, when was it that you heard it?

Mr. Copley. It was in April last.

Sol. Gen. It was a settled persuasion of his heart, and he thought it fit to be gloried in.

The Lord Mayor Elect sworn.

Counsel. Pray, my lord, tell my lords what you know concerning the prisoner at the bar.

Lord Mayor Elect. My lords, I was one of those Secluded Members that were returned again a little before the coming in of his majesty: upon the last day of our sitting, Mr. Scot seeing the house must break, said, 'Their heads must be laid to the block if there was a new parliament,' for, said you, (looking on Mr. Scot) 'I confess I had a hand in putting the King to death, and I desire all the world may take notice of it, and I desire when I die it may be written on my tomb. I do not repent of any thing I have done; if it were to do, I could do it again.'

Sol. Gen. Do it again! He follows his blows home.

William Lenthall, esq. sworn.

Counsel. Mr. Lenthall, pray be pleased to tell my lords and the jury, what you do remember of any discourse of Mr. Thomas Scot, (the prisoner at the bar,) tending to the glorying in this act, or any thing in justification of that act.

Mr. Lenthall. My lords, the last day it was, the last instant of time, we were resolving of breaking the house, there was some opposition in it, not very much: the general consent of the house was to dissolve it; I must confess at that time I did hear Mr. Scot much justify that act of the death of the king, which truly I was much offended at. I confess to you upon my oath, touching his speech of the inscription upon his tomb, I did not hear that: Justifying the death of the king he made a long harangue about, and he sat at the upper end of the gallery; but these words, 'of having it written upon his tomb, and to have all the world take notice of it,' I do not remember.

Counsel. My lords, my Lord Mayor Elect omitted something; pray let him speak to it.

Lord Mayor Elect. My lords, the conclusion of his speech ended thus: 'being it is your pleasure to have it so,' the house dissolved, 'I know not how to hinder it; but when that is done, I know not where to hide this hated head of mine.'

Counsel. We desire to hear what the prisoner will say for himself.

Scot. I have no certainty from the witnesses that I was there, but in a wandering way; they know not where I sat, nor my posture.

Mr. Baker sworn.

Counsel. We do not call this witness as material, for we must insist upon it quite through, that after twelve years time it is not possible a witness should remember where every particular person sat. Pray hear this witness.

Baker. I do perfectly remember that Mr. Scot sate two rows above Mr. Bradshaw, on his left hand, in that which they called the High Court of Justice.

Scot. As to the Warrant you speak of, I know not what it signifies, I desire to know what the nature of it is.

Counsel. The warrant hath been read; it is not produced against him as a record for then it needed not be proved: but it is produced against him as an evidence in writing under his own hand, that he was consenting to the death of the king.

Scot. They may very much mistake my hand; you speak of words that I should utter in parliament, I do humbly insist upon it that I am not to answer, nor they alledge, any thing of that nature: it is a high breach of privilege.

Counsel. There is no privilege of parliament for treason. First, some of the words were spoken in Richard's parliament, and that you do not own to be a parliament; then another thing (a known rule in law), there is no privilege of parliament for treason.

Scot. I have heard the rule, but do not so well understand it, of that spoken in Richard's Parliament; it will be a nice thing for me to distinguish between that and another parliament; but this I think, that convention of the people ought to have the privilege of the parliament, as well as any other. I humbly conceive it was testimony ought not to be given to you; whatever I say in parliament, the privilege extends to no more than this, that I may be lawfully secured till the parliament hath been acquainted with it, but not finally concluded till the parliament have heard it.

L. C. Baron. You are indicted for compassing and imagining the death of the King: I would have you understand, that in case a man should commit an act of treason, be it in what place soever, there is no place of sanctuary for treason: in case of felony, if a man be indicted for felony in the parliament-house, during the time of parliament, this is not to be tried in parliament, but according to the rule of common law; so in case of treason, the house of commons in parliament doth not try treasons: that distinction which you make is nothing.

Scot. I humbly conceive there is such a privilege, that no man shall ever be called to account for any thing spoken in parliament, if he be not called to account by the house before any other member be suffered to speak.

L. C. Baron. That is, the house will not determine; but that doth not extend to your case; you are not charged here criminally for speaking those words that have been testified against you; but for compassing and imagining the king's death, of which there are other evidences, and this but an evidence to prove that.

Scot. My lord, I never did say these words with that aggravation which is put upon them, I have a great deal of hard measure; as to say, 'I hope I shall never repent,' I take God to witness I have often, because it was spoken well of by some, and ill by others, I have by prayers and tears often sought the Lord, that if there were iniquity in it he would shew it me; I do affirm I did not say so.

Baker. My lord, I omitted something, which was this; I had occasion to speak to Mr. Scot whilst Richard's parliament was sitting, and among other discourse insisting upon some things that Richard had done, saith he, 'I have cut off one tyrant's head, and I hope to cut off another.'

Scot. My lord, this is but a single witness.

Sol. Gen. I suppose he meant Richard, for he was a tyrant.

L. C. Baron. Speak on, Mr. Scot, whatever you have to say.

Scot. If that be laid aside as an impertinency, I have the less to say.

L. C. Baron. The next thing you have to do is to answer to the fact, whether you did it, or did it not.

Scot. I say this, whatever I did, be it more or less, I did it by the command and authority of a parliamentary power; I did sit as one of the judges of the king, and that doth justify me, whatever the nature of the fact was.

L. C. Baron. We have had these things alleged before us again and again: the Court are clearly satisfied in themselves that this act could not be done by any parliamentary power whatsoever. I must tell you what hath been delivered, that there is no power on earth that hath any coercive power over the King, neither single persons nor a community, neither the people collectively nor representatively. In the next place, that which you offer to be done as by authority of parliament, it was done by a few members of the house of commons; there were but 46 there at that time, and of those 46, not above 26 that voted it; at that time the house of lords was sitting, who had rejected it, and without them there was no parliament; there was a force upon the parliament, there was excluded seven parts of eight: supposing you were a full house of commons, and that without exception, there was not authority enough; and it is known to you, (no man better) that there never was a house of commons, before this time that this foul act was made for erecting that High Court of Justice, (as you called it,) assumed that authority of making a law; you cannot pretend to act by authority of parliament; and because you would excuse it, you did it by authority of parliament, whether it were good or no: if any man do that which is unlawful by an unlawful authority, the assuming to do it by that authority is an aggravation, not an extenuation, of the fact: it was over-ruled; I think my lords will tell you, that they do not allow of that authority at all, either to be for justification or plea.

Scot. My lords, I humbly pray leave to say, that without offence to the Court, (every person whereof I honour) this Court hath not cognizance to declare whether it were a parliament or no.

L. C. Baron. That was objected too; and we must acquaint you, That first of all, it is no derogation to parliaments, that what is a statute should be adjudged by the common laws: We have often brought it into question, whether such and such a thing was an act of parliament, or not; any man may pretend to an authority of parliament: if forty men should meet at Shooter's-Hill, as the Little Convention did at Westminster, and say, 'We do declare ourselves a parliament of England;' because they do so, shall not this be judged what is a statute, and what not? It is every day's practice, we do judge upon it; the fact is known to every body, they did assume to themselves a Royal Authority; it hath been over-ruled already; it hath been the mistake of many; the vulgar acceptance of the word parliament. A parliament consists of the king, lords, and commons; it is not the house of commons alone, and so it is not by authority of parliament: it is not, unless it be by that authority which makes up the parliament: you cannot give one instance that ever the house of commons did assume the king's authority.

Scot. I can many, where there was nothing but a house of commons.

Court. When was that?

Scot. In the Saxons time.

Court. You say it was in the Saxons time; you do not come to any time within 600 years; you speak of those times wherein things were obscure.

Scot. I know not but that it might be as lawful for them to make laws as this late parliament, being called by the Keepers of the Liberties of England: my lords, I have no seditious design, but to submit to the Providence of God.

Court. This is notorious to every man; this we have already heard and over-ruled.

L. Finch. That that I hope is this, that Mr. Scot will contradict that which he hath said before; that is, that he hopes he should not repent, I hope he doth desire to repent. Mr. Scot, for this we must over-rule it, as we have done before; there is nothing at all to be pleaded to the jurisdiction, and this point hath been determined before.

Scot. The parliament in former times consisted not so much of king, lords and commons, but king and parliament. In the beginning of the parliament in 1641, the bishops were one of the three estates; if it be not properly to be called a parliament, a legislative power, though it be not a parliament, it is binding: if two estates may take away the third, if the second do not continue to execute their trust, he that is in occupancy may have a title to the whole: I do affirm I have a parliamentary authority, a legislative power, to justify me.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Scot, what you speak concerning the Lords Spiritual is nothing to your case, be it either one way or other; it was done by an act of parliament, with consent of the king, lords, and commons; though you will bring it down to make these commons have a legislative power, I told you it was over-ruled before. We have suffered you to expatiate into that which was a thing not intended by many of my lords, that you should have any such power to expatiate into that which is nothing but indeed to make a new government, which is the highest treason next to the murdering of the king, in the world; to subvert the laws, and to make a few of the commons, nay, if they had been the whole, to make them to have the legislative power. Mr. Scot, if you have any thing in extenuation of the fact, we shall hear you; further we cannot.

Ld. Finch. If you speak to this purpose again, for my part I will profess myself I dare not hear further of it; it is so poisonous blasphemous a doctrine, contrary to the laws, if you go upon this point, I shall (and I hope my lords will be of that opinion too) desire the jury may be directed.

Scot. I thought, my lord, you would rather be my counsel; it is not my single opinion, I am not alone in this case, therefore I think I may justify myself in it; it was the judgment of many of the Secluded Members to own us to be a parliament.

Lord Annesley. What you said last doth occasion my rising; you seem to deliver my opinion, who you know could never agree to what you have alledged; truly I have been heartily sorry to hear the defence you have made to-day, because you know I have had letters from you of another nature; I was very confident to have heard you an humble penitent this day, instead of justifying yourself. As to that which you say of the Secluded Members owning you to be a parliament, they were so far from it, that you know for how many years they lay under sufferings and obscurity because they could not acknowledge that an authority which was not so: you cannot forget the Declaration of both houses that was published upon a jealousy that the people had, they would change the government of king, lords and commons; it was so far from their thoughts, it was called in that Declaration, 'A black scandal cast upon them:' this Declaration you know was by order of both houses affixed in all churches of England, that people might take notice what they held to be the fundamental government of this kingdom, king, lords, and commons: after this for you to set up another government, and under them to act such things that one would think should hardly enter into the heart of any man! You know very well, all along they declared themselves faithful subjects to the king, and so would have lived and died: and you might have had your share of the happiness of that peace, if you could have had an inclination to submit to that which both houses had resolved. When you and others could not bring your hearts to stoop to your fellow subjects, when you could not submit to that equal rule to take your share with them, when pride carried some so high, then was the beginning of your fall and others; and none could expect other than what is now come to pass, that they should come to that shame and sorrow that this day hath brought upon you: I could have wished to have heard nothing but an humble confession of the fault that hath been clearly proved, and no justification of it: you have sworn, among others, to preserve the laws and people of this kingdom: but you drove away not only the house of lords, but most of the commons; and then to give the name of a parliament to the remainder, this is a great aggravation of your treason. I think we of the secluded members could not have discharged our duty to God and the kingdom, if we had not then appeared in parliament to have dissolved that parliament, and so by our joint assent put an end to all your pretences, which if we had not done, we had not so soon come to our happiness, nor you to your miseries.

L. C. Baron. The Court hath told you before their opinions in the thing, and no further debate is to be allowed in this; the justification of it doth comprehend treason; we ourselves are not by law to allow the hearing of it. If you have nothing to say for yourself, I must give direction to the jury.

Scot. I humbly crave leave to move the jury that they bethink themselves, and consider of it rather as a special verdict, than of a definitive one. I think there is cause of a special verdict.

Court. If there was need of a special verdict (we are upon our oaths), I should give direction to the jury. What we do, we do upon our oaths, and must answer it before God Almighty. The Court hath delivered their opinions before, that in this case the pretended authority under which you did derive that power which you did execute, that it is no authority, it is void in law, it is a foundation (if it were true) of subverting all laws, and indeed of all religion; a power that you assume to yourselves of judging and condemning your king; that you would countenance such an authority, is a great aggravation of the fault. They are judges whether you did imagine or compass the king's death, that is all the jurors have to do. Gentlemen of the jury—

Scot. I would know what particular law I have transgressed in this thing.

Court. The law of God and Man, 25 Edw. 3.

Scot. I humbly conceive that reaches not to this case.

Court. To satisfy you in that, the very words of the statute are, 'If any man do compass or imagine the king's death, it is treason;' the Indictment is, that you did imagine and compass the death of the king: if the fact be proved against you, you are within the statute.

Scot. You will not say the king shall be a traitor if he shall compass the death of the queen.

Court. The queen is a subject.

Scot. I am not yet convinced.

L. C. Baron. Gentlemen of the jury—

Scot. I do plead and claim that I am within the compass of several Pardons, and desire counsel in that particular; I do come within the compass of his majesty's Pardon.

L. C. Baron. If you had not gone on to matter of justification, you might have been more heard to this of Pardon; but after a justification then to come for a pardon, which implies a confession of guilt, they are contradictory; I must tell you we are now upon point of law. That proclamation I doubt not but his majesty will inviolably make good; but we are not to judge of that, it is nothing to a legal proceeding: you are now in a court of law, it is not to be pleaded in a court of law; the king's pardon in law must be under his broad seal: how far you are under that proclamation care will be taken, and what is fitting to be done will be done; but it is nothing in the matter of the charge to this jury.

Scot. I desire counsel touching the statute 25 Edw. 3.

Court. You should have done it before you had confessed the fact.

Scot. I may do it in arrest of judgment.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Scot, for that of the king's Proclamation, if you be within the benefit and compass of it, according to his royal word and honour in it, you will have the benefit of it; but it is not a plea in law, but it must be a pardon under seal; whatsoever concerns that Proclamation will be considered, it is nothing to the matter whereupon the jury are to go.

L. C. Baron. Gentlemen of the jury, you see the prisoner, Tho. Scot, stands indicted for compassing and imagining the death of our dread sovereign king Charles the first of most glorious and blessed memory: he is indicted for compassing and imagining his death, there is the treason; and what is set afterwards in this indictment is only to manifest this compassing and imagining, because that being in the heart alone, without some overt-act nobody can prove it: there are several overt-acts laid in the indictment; one is, a traitorous consulting and meeting together how to put the king to death: then a sitting upon the king as a prisoner, being before them about his life and death: the third is sentencing to death; that which followed is, that he was murdered: if any of these acts should be proved, the indictment is proved; for the proof, there are several witnesses have fully proved he did sit there several times, particularly upon Jan. 27, which was the day of the sentence; that he did sit there, all of them agree to that; it is true, as to the circumstances where he sat, one gentleman saith he sat in the second row, on the left hand of Bradshaw; you will remember it is 12 years ago, how any man upon the view, and after so long a distance of time, would be able to remember in what posture one man was from the rest, I think neither you nor I can remember: here is one proves to you that he did sign the warrant for executing the king; he saith, 'How can another know his hand?' You see what the witnesses say, they know it; a man can prove nothing more of another man's hand than that, unless they see it written: there is nothing to put upon you but his words: you see what words are aggravated against Mr. Scot; whereas he saith, it is a breach of the privileges of parliament; if it were so, it is nothing to this fact; though another man should break the privileges of parliament, it is nothing to you; but besides, it is not a breach of the privilege of parliament. You have heard the witnesses what they have said against him. Mr. Lenthall swears that he did speak at large fully in owning that business of the king's death; the rest swear positively to the same effect, and that at several times: what was that? He gloried in it, defended it, and said 'He could wish it were engraven on his tomb-stone;' he hath denied this that the witnesses have proved; that which is left to you is, whether the prisoner at the bar is guilty of compassing and imagining the king's death; and so go together.

After a little consultation together they settled in their places again.

Clerk. Tho. Scot, hold up thy hand. Look upon the prisoner at the bar; how say you, is he Guilty of the Treason whereof he stands indicted? Or Not Guilty? Jury. Guilty.

Clerk. Look to him, Keeper.

Clerk. You say the prisoner is Guilty, &c. and so you say all? Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Set Mr. Scot aside*.

* See an account of his Behaviour and Execution, infra.

Clerk. Set John Jones and Gregory Clement to the bar*.

Which was done accordingly.

Thereupon the said Gregory Clement preferred his Petition to the Court. Indictment read against them both.

L. C. Baron. If you do confess your offence, your Petition will be read.

Clem. I do, my lord.

* Ludlow says, that "Col. John Jones and Mr. Gregory Clement, finding all that had been said in vindication of the things objected against the gentlemen who had been already tried, to prove ineffectual, informed the Court, that they could say no more than had been already alledged; and therefore confessed the fact. Upon which they were declared Guilty, as the persons before-mentioned had been.

"Mr. Gregory Clement was chosen a member of the Parliament about the year 1646, and discharged that trust with great diligence; always joining with those who were most affectionate to the Commonwealth, though he never was possessed of any place of profit under them. Being appointed one of the Commissioners for the trial of the King, he durst not refuse his assistance in that service. He had no good education, but his apprehension and judgment were not to be despised. He declared before his death, that nothing troubled him so much as his pleading Guilty at the time of his trial to satisfy the importunity of his relations; by which he said he had rendered himself unworthy to die in so glorious a cause.

"Col. John Jones was a gentleman of a competent estate in North Wales, and so well beloved in his country, that he did considerable service to the public cause by his interest in those parts. He reduced the Isle of Anglesea to the obedience of the Commonwealth, and was soon after chosen to serve in parliament for that place. He had been one of the Council of State; and in the year 1650 was constituted one of the Commissioners of Parliament for managing the civil affairs of Ireland. This trust he discharged, during the course of divers years, with great diligence, ability, and integrity, in providing for the happiness of that country, and bringing to justice those who had been concerned in the murders of the English Protestants. When the great parliament was restored to the exercise of their authority, after their long interruption, they chose him to be one of those eight persons to whom they committed the care of the public safety, till they could establish a Council of State. Of this also he was chosen a member, and soon after sent by the Parliament to his former trust in Ireland; where he continued till the late change. Being drawn to Charing-cross on the same sled with col. Scroop, the gravity and graceful mien of these aged gentlemen, accompanied with visible marks of fortitude and internal satisfaction, surprised the spectators with admiration and compassion."

L. C. Baron. Mr. Clement, if you do confess (that you may understand it,) you must when you are called, and when the Jury are to be charged; you must say, if you will have it go by way of confession, that you wave your former plea, and confess the fact.

Clerk. Gregory Clement, you have been indicted of High Treason, for compassing and imagining the death of his late majesty, and you have pleaded Not Guilty; are you contented to wave that plea, and confess it?

Clem. I do confess myself to be Guilty, my lord*.

Clerk. Set him aside.

TRIAL of JOHN JONES.

October 12, 1660.

Clerk. John Jones, hold up thy hand. These men that were last called, &c. if you will challenge all, or any of them, you must challenge them when they come to the book, and before they are sworn.

Jones. I confess I sat amongst them some days, but not maliciously contrived the death of the king.

Counsel. He is troubled at the form; he confesseth the matter, that he was there sitting in the High Court of Justice. If he will not confess it, he knows that we can prove his hand and seal to that Bloody Warrant. He is troubled that he is said to have traitorously and maliciously contrived the king's death: He that doth these acts towards it is by law responsible as to the malice.

Jury sworn.

Sir Tho. Allen, sir Henry Wroth, sir Jer. Whichcott, James Hawley, Henry Mildmay, Christ. Abdy, Nich. Raynton, Richard Cheney, Tho. Byde, Charles Pitfield, Abraham Scudamore, Charles Pickerne: In all twelve.

Clerk. Crier, make Proclamation.

Crier. If any man can inform, &c.

Clerk. John Jones, hold up thy hand. Look upon the prisoner, &c.

Mr. Sol. Gen. My lords, and gentlemen of the Jury, I must open to you, as to other juries, that the short point of this long Indictment is but this, that the prisoner at the bar did imagine and compass the death of the king, which is your issue to try. We shall prove it by those overt-acts which the law doth require. To prove the sitting, sentencing, and signing the Warrant for Execution by the prisoner at the bar.

Counsel. Call Mr. Clark and Mr. Carr, and Holl. Sympson, who were sworn.—Mr. Sympson, did you see the prisoner at the bar sitting in that which they called the High Court of Justice?

Sympson. I did see Mr. Jones sit divers times, both there and in the Painted Chamber.

Jones. I do confess I sat divers times.

* See an account of their Execution, infra.

Counsel. Did he sit the day of Sentence?

Sympton. I cannot say it.

Counsel. Mr. Clark, you hear the question, pray answer my lord.

Clark. My lord, and gentlemen of the Jury, I was there the 27th of Jan. 1649. I saw col. Jones there several days before, but I did not see him that day; his name was called, but I do not know whether he was present.

Counsel. Mr. Carr, did you see him sit on the 27th day, which was the day of Sentence?

Carr. My lords, he answered to his name some days, I am not able to tell what day.

Mr. Nutley sworn.

Counsel. Can you tell whether the prisoner at the bar was present in that which they called the High Court of Justice?

Nutley. The prisoner at the bar was several times in the Court which was called the High Court of Justice; truly I cannot say whether he was there the 27th day, the day of the Sentence.

The Warrant for summoning the Court being shewed.

Counsel. Is that Mr. Jones's hand (the prisoner at the bar) set to that Warrant?

Nutley. I have been acquainted with his hand, I do believe it is.

The Warrant for Execution also shewed.

Counsel. Is that the same hand-writing?

Nutley. Yes, I believe it is; he hath written several letters to me.

Mr. Hartlib sworn.

Court. Mr. Hartlib, do you know Mr. Jones's hand?

Hartlib. I never did see him write, but I have seen several letters out of Ireland, and other papers which have been supposed to be his hand-writing; this seems to be like that which was reputed to be his hand.

Counsel. Mr. Clark, do you know Mr. Jones's hand-writing?

Clark. I have seen several letters of col. Jones's, and these are like his hand-writing; I do believe they are his hand-writing.

Mr. Jones looks upon them both, and confesses they are like his hand-writing.

Counsel. We have given our Evidence: What do you say for yourself before Charge be given to the Jury?

Jones. I have little to say, your lordships have already heard what is to be said in this case, I have nothing to say to the point; I am not fit to plead any thing, especially in matter of law; I must wholly put myself upon the Lord, and this honourable Court and Jury.

L. C. Baron. Gentlemen of the Jury, here is his prisoner, John Jones, stands indicted, for that he, with others, did compass and imagine the king's death; that is the substance of the indictment. The indictment sets forth several acts each proving the compassing and imagining the king's death: One of them is, that they did consult and meet together, and propound how the king should be put to death: The second is, they did assume a power to judge the king: The third is, that they did actually sit upon him: And the last of them is, that they sentenced the king, and afterwards the king was murdered. The whole substance is, whether he did compass and imagine the king's death. If any one of these particulars that are alledged for the overt-acts be proved, you are to find the Indictment. He hath confessed very ingenuously, that he did sit upon the king, that he did sit in that Court, and so there is an overt-act proved: if nothing else, you ought to find him guilty of this treason. There is further evidence (though not any evidence of his sitting the last day of the sentence) you have had three comparing similitudes of hands to prove that he did sign that sentence, that horrid instrument, whereby the king was ordered to be put to death; one of them having received letters from Ireland, and others acquainted with his hand, say, that it is like his hand; he hath so confessed the likeness of his hand, but he saith he doth not remember he signed it. As to you of the jury, there is no more to be considered, if any one of the acts do appear true to you, that is sufficient to find him guilty (though he were not guilty of all); but that he did compass and imagine the king's death is clear, in sitting and signing the Warrant; for the other, whether you shall find that he did sentence the king, that must be left to you. Whatsoever it is, still it is the same; if any one be proved, you ought to find him guilty of the Indictment, which is the compassing and imagining the king's death. I think you need not stir from the bar, for he hath confessed it.

The Jury went together, and after a little consultation returned to their places.

Clerk. Are you agreed of your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our Foreman.

Clerk. John Jones, Hold up thy hand. Look upon the prisoner at the bar. How say ye, is he guilty, &c.

Foreman. Guilty.

Clerk. Look to him, Keeper.

Clerk. You say the prisoner at the bar is Guilty, &c. and so you say all?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Set all that have been tried this day to the bar.

Lord Chief Baron. Mr. Scot, I must speak a word to you; you made mention of the king's Proclamation for pardon, and you did desire the benefit of it. As I told you before, so now again, that it was not proper for us upon that proclamation to give any allowance by way of plea, because the pardon ought to be under the broad seal; but God forbid but just and due consideration should be had of it with honour; so far as you are comprehended within it; though judgment shall pass, no Warrant for Execution shall go out against you till consideration be had, how far you are within the compass of that proclamation; and the like to you, Mr. Scroop.

Clerk. Adrian Scroop, Hold up thy hand. Thou hast been indicted of High Treason, and hast thereof been found Guilty: What canst thou say for thyself why judgment should not pass for thee to die according to law.

Scroop. I do humbly submit to his majesty's mercy.

Clerk. John Carew, Hold up thy hand. Thou art in the like condition with the former, what canst thou say, &c.

Carew. I commit my cause unto the Lord.

Clerk. Thomas Scot, Hold up thy hand. Thou art in the like condition with the former, what canst thou say, &c.

Scot. I shall only say, I do only cast myself upon his majesty, and pray mercy.

Clerk. John Jones, Hold up thy hand. Thou art in the like condition with the former, what hast thou to say, &c.

Jones. I pray his majesty's clemency.

Clerk. Gregory Clement, Hold up thy hand. Thou standest indicted of High Treason, and thereunto hast pleaded Guilty, what canst thou say, &c.

Clement. I pray mercy from the king.

Lord Chief Baron. You that are prisoners at the bar, ye see the sentence of death is to pass against you; and for aught you know, or we know yet, may be heavier than you are aware: How soon it will be executed we know not; when you have reflected upon your own consciences, many of you could not chuse but look there, and see as in a glass, the foulness of this horrid offence: it is the Murder of our most gracious sovereign king Charles the first of blessed memory; a prince whom we (such as had the honour personally to attend him) know was of such parts and virtues, if he had been a private man, more could not have been desired; truly what he did as a king, his clemency, how it appeared at first in this prince's time: If you look what peace and prosperity we enjoyed in his days, we will not find it in other king's times; you had not a nobleman put to death, save one, and that for an offence which must not be named*; a prince that had granted so much: You may remember what was granted before the beginning of these wars; Grievances complained of, Star-Chamber, High-Commission Court, Ship-money, the Claim of Staunery, &c. all these were taken away: What concessions he made after in the Isle of Wight; how much he wooed and courted the people for peace. I urge this unto you, only that you would lay it to your hearts, that you would consider what it is to kill a king, and to kill such a king. If any of you shall say, that we had no hand in the actual murder of the king, remember that they that brought him to the bar, were all as one as if they had brought him to the block; as St. Paul confessed, though he held but the clothes, he killed the martyr Stephen. You are shortly to appear before God's tribunal, and I beseech God Almighty that he will give you, and us all, those hearts, that we may look into ourselves; no fig-leaves will serve the turn; whatsoever you have said now as prisoners, or allowed to say for your own preservation in point of fact; notwithstanding it will not serve before God Almighty: All things are naked before him. Lay it to your hearts; God Almighty, though you have committed these foul and horrid sins, yet he can pardon you, as he pardoned that murder of David: I speak it to you, that you may lay it to your hearts. I am heartily sorry, in respect you are persons of great civility, and (those that I know) of very good parts; and this I must say, That you will consider with yourselves, if any of you have been led away, though it were with his own conscience, if any of you did it, as you conceived, in conscience, remember that our Saviour saith, 'The time shall come when they will persecute you, and kill you, and think they do God good service.' I have the judgment of charity, possibly some of you did it in this kind, and this is less than doing it wilfully; others might do it by a misguided conscience; there is a spiritual pride; men may over-run themselves by their own holiness, and they may go by pretended revelations: men may say, I have prayed about such a thing (I do not speak it with reproach to any). If a man should commit a robbery, or murder, merely because he will, and should come and say, I have prayed against it, and cannot understand it to be a sin, as one in Shropshire did, and yet notwithstanding killed his own father and mother. Try your own spirits, you must not think that every fancy and imagination is conscience; men may have a strange fancy and presumption, and that they may call conscience: Take heed, there is a spiritual pride; the devil doth many times appear like an angel of light; do not rest upon that self-confidence: examine your hearts, consider the fact by the Word of God; that is the rule, the law is to be applied to it, Eccles. viii. 'Where the word of a king is, there is power; and who can say unto him, What dost thou?' That is to shew the power of kings in scripture: Remember withal that of David in Psalm 51, that penitential Psalm, when he had committed that horrid sin against Uriah; remember what he said, being a king, Tibi soli peccavi, 'Against thee only have I sinned.' Truly it being in such a case, I speak it as before God Almighty, according to my duty and conscience, I wish most heartily as to your persons; I pray God to give you that grace that you may seriously consider it, and lay it to heart, and to have mercy upon you, and to forgive you, and this is all that I have to say; and now not I, but the Sentence of the law, the judgment which I have to give against you, is this: You prisoners at the bar, the Judgment of the Court is, and the Court doth award, that you be led back, &c. and the Lord have mercy on your souls *.

Clerk. Crier, make Proclamation.

Crier. O Yes, &c. All manner of persons, &c. Jurors and Witnesses, to appear to-morrow morning at seven o'clock, at this place; so God save his Majesty.

TRIAL OF JOHN COOK.

October 13, 1660.

The Court being assembled, Proclamation was made.

Clerk of the Court. Set Cook, Peters, Hacker, and Axtel, to the bar: They being brought, the Keeper was afterwards ordered to take back all, except Mr. Cook.†

* See particulars of their Behaviour and Execution, infra.

† "Mr. John Coke," says Ludlow, "late Chief Justice of Ireland, had in his younger years seen the best part of Europe; and at Rome had spoken with such liberty and ability against the corruptions of that court and church, that great endeavours were used there to bring him into that interest. But he, being resolved not to yield to their solicitations, thought it no longer safe to continue among them; and therefore departed to Geneva, where he resided some months in the house of Signior Gio. Diodati, minister of the Italian church in that city; after which he returned to England, and applied himself to the study of the laws; and in that profession became so considerable, that he was appointed by the High Court of Justice to be their solicitor at the king's trial. I have already said, that he was seized and imprisoned by sir Charles Coote; who, joining with Monk in his treachery to the Commonwealth, sent him over to England, that he might sacrifice him to his new master, in satisfaction for the blood of his party which he himself had formerly shed. Being brought to his trial, he was accused of preferring, in the name of all the good people of England, an impeachment of high treason to the High Court of Justice against the late king; that he had signed the said impeachment with his own hand; that, upon the king's demurrer to the jurisdiction of the court, he had pressed that the charge might be taken for confessed; and therefore had demanded judgment from the court against the king. But this indictment being more particularly charged upon him in the three following articles,

1. That he, with others, had propounded, counselled, contrived, and imagined the death of the late king;
2. That, to bring about this conspiracy, he, with others, had assumed authority and power to accuse, kill, and murder the king;
3. That a person unknown did cut off the king's head; and that the prisoner was abetting, aiding, assisting, countenancing, and procuring the said person so to do,

Clerk. John Cook, hold up thy hand, &c.

Jury. Sir J. Whichcot, James Hawley, Jo. Nichol of Holden, Tho. Nichol, F. Thorn, Edw. Wilford, Will. Gumbleton, Jo. Shelbury, Tho. Jenney, Tho. Willet, sir H. Wroth, Richard Cheney, of the Jury, called and sworn.

Cook. May it please your lordship, I do not know any of these persons. I beseech your lordship, that in regard the safety of my life depends upon the indifferency of these persons, that your lordship may demand of the sheriff to know whether he hath not heard them say, or any of them, that they are pre-engaged; I hope they are not, and thereupon I have not challenged any.

he answered, 1st, That he could not be justly said to have contrived or counselled the death of the king; because the proclamation for the king's trial, even by the confession of his accuser, was published on the 9th of January, which was the day before he was appointed Solicitor to the High Court of Justice. In the 2d place, Though the court should not admit that to be an act of parliament, which authorised him to do what he did; yet he assured himself, they would allow it to be an order, which was enough to justify him. 3dly, That he, who had neither been accuser, witness, jury, judge, or executioner, could not be guilty of treason in this case. He urgeth, That, having acted only as counsel, he was not answerable for the justice or injustice of the cause he had managed; that, being placed in that station by a public command, it could not be said he had acted maliciously, or with a wicked intention, as the indictment mentioned; that words spoken do not amount to treason, much less when set down in writing by the direction of others; especially since no clear proof had been produced, that his name subscribed to the charge against the king was written by himself. He said, That to pray and demand justice, though injustice be done upon it, could not be treason within the statute; that when he demanded justice, it might be meant of acquittal, as well as of condemnation; and that if it should be accounted treason in a counsellor to plead against the king, it must also be felony to plead against any man who may be unjustly condemned for felony: that the High Court of Justice, though now called tyrannical and unlawful, was yet a court, had officers attending them, and many think had authority, there being then no other in this nation than that which gave them their power; and if this will not justify a man for acting within his own sphere; it will not be lawful for any one to exercise his profession, unless he may be sure of the legality of the establishment under which he acts. These and divers other things of no less weight he said in his defence: but the cabal thinking themselves concerned to prevent the like in time to come, and to terrify those who were not only able, but willing also to be employed in such service, procured from the jury a verdict of condemnation against him, according to their desire."

L. C. Baron. Sir, the officer reads their names out of his papers, I suppose he doth not pick and chuse them; I would not have him; and I am sure he will not do you any wrong in that particular.

Cook. My lord, I am satisfied.

Clerk. If any man can inform, &c.

Clerk. J. Cook, Hold up thy hand.

Cook. My lords, I desire pen, ink and paper.

L. C. Baron. Give it him.

Clerk. J. Cook, Hold up thy hand. You that are sworn look upon the prisoner; you shall understand, &c. [Here the Indictment was read as before.]

Sol. Gen. May it please your lordships, and you gentlemen that are sworn of this Jury, the prisoner at the bar stands indicted for High-Treason, for compassing and imagining the death of the late king of blessed memory: The Indictment sets forth, That he, together with others, did assemble at Westminster-Hall, and sets forth many other particulars of sitting, sentencing, and of the consequent death and murder of the king. The matter and charge of the Indictment is, for compassing and imagining the death of the king; the rest of the circumstances of the Indictment are but alledged as Overt-Acts to prove the imagination, which only is the treason. This prisoner at the bar stands here indicted for this treason of compassing and imagining the late king's death. My lord, his part and portion in this matter will be different from those that have been tried before you; they sat as judges to sentence the king, and he, my lord, stood as a wicked instrument of that matter at the bar, and there he doth with his own hand subscribe and exhibit a Charge of High-Treason, a scandalous libel, against our sovereign, to that pretended Court, to be read against him, as an accusation in the name of all the people of England; when he had done that, he makes large discourses and aggravations to prove (if it had been possible) innocency itself to be treason.* When he had done, he would not suffer his majesty to speak in his defence, but still took him up, and said, that he did spin out delays, and desired that the Charge might be taken as if he had confessed it: He pressed the Court that Judgment might be given against the king; he was the man that did demand that wicked Judgment before the Court pronounced it; and he was the man that did against his own conscience, after he had acknowledged that he was a wise and gracious king, yet says he, 'That he must die, and 'Monarchy' with him;' there in truth was the treason, and the cause of that fatal blow that fell upon the king. This was his part to carry on; how he did it as a wicked counsellor we shall prove to you, and the wages and reward of the iniquity that he did receive.

* See his Speech intended to have been spoken to the High Court of Justice, if king Charles the first had pleaded, ante, v. 4, p. 1018.

James Nutley sworn.

Counsel for the Crown. Pray tell the circumstances of the prisoner's proceedings at Westminster-hall, when he did exhibit a Charge against the King.

Nutley. My lords, the first day of bringing his majesty to his trial was Saturday, Jan. 20, 1649. Before they sat in public, they that were of the Committee of that which they called the High Court of Justice, did meet in the Painted Chamber, which was in the forenoon of that day. Being there, I did observe that there was one Price a scrivener that was writing of a Charge; I stood at a great distance and saw him write, I saw this gentleman, the prisoner at the bar, near thereabouts where it was writing, I think it was at the Court of Wards. This Charge afterwards (a parchment writing) I did see in the hands of this gentleman, the prisoner at the bar. A very little after that they called their names, they did adjourn from the Painted Chamber into Westminster-hall, the great hall. The method that they observed, the first thing was to call the Commissioners by name in the Act; the pretended Act for trying the King was read; that is, when the Court was sat the Commissioners were called by their names, and as I remember they stood up as their names were called: The next thing was reading the Act for trying of his late majesty. After that was read, then this gentleman, the prisoner at the bar, presented the parchment writing, which was called the Impeachment, or Charge, against his majesty: Mr. Bradshaw was then President of that Court, and so called Lord President; he commanded that the prisoner should be sent for, saying, 'Serjeant Dendy, send for your 'prisoner;' thereupon the King was brought up as a prisoner, and put within a bar: And when the Court was silenced, and settled, this gentleman, the prisoner at the bar, did deliver the Charge, the Impeachment to the Court; and it was read; the King was demanded to plead to it presently. Here I should first tell you, that upon the King's first coming in there was a kind of speech made by Mr. Bradshaw to the king in this manner: I think I shall repeat the very words: 'Charles Stuart King of England, the 'Commons of England, assembled in Parliament, taking notice of the effusion of blood in 'the land, which is fixed on you as the author 'of it, and whereof you are guilty, have resolved to bring you to a Trial and Judgment, 'and for this cause this Tribunal is erected.' There was little reverence given to his Majesty then, which I was troubled at: he added this further, 'that there was a Charge to be exhibited against him by the Solicitor General;' I think this gentleman was so called at that time, and he called to him to exhibit the Charge; and this gentleman (the prisoner at the bar), did deliver an Impeachment, a parchment writing, which was called a Charge against the King at that time, which was received, and read against him.

Counsel. Did you ever see the Charge? [which was now shewn to Mr. Nutley.]

Nutley. My lords, I do believe that this is the very Charge, I am confident it is the same writing; I have often seen him write, and by the character of his hand this is the same.

Counsel. Go on with your story.

Nutley. My lords, immediately upon the delivery of this Charge of Impeachment, which was delivered in the King's presence, after it was read the King was demanded to give an Answer to it. His Majesty desired to speak something before he did answer to the pretended Impeachment (for so his Majesty was pleased to call it), he did use words to this purpose; saith he, 'I do wonder for what cause you do convene me here before you;' He looked about him, saith he, 'I see no Lords here, where are the Lords?' Upon this Mr. Bradshaw, the President, for so he was called, did interrupt his Majesty, and told him, 'Sir,' saith he, 'you must attend the business of the Court; to that purpose, you are brought hither, and you must give a positive Answer to the Charge;' saith the King, 'You will hear me speak, I have something to say before I answer;' after much ado, he was permitted to go on in the discourse he was in, so far as they pleased. His Majesty said, 'I was in the Isle of Wight, and there I was treated with by divers honourable persons, Lords and Commons, a treaty of peace between me and my people; the treaty was so far proceeded in that it was near a perfection: Truly,' (saith he) 'I must needs say they treated with me honourably and uprightly; and when the business was come almost to an end, then' (saith he), 'was I hurried away from them hither, I know not by what authority; now I desire to know by what authority I was called to this place? That is the first question I shall ask you before I answer the Charge.' It was told him by Mr. Bradshaw, the President, that the authority that called him hither was a lawful authority. He asked him what authority it was, the second time. It was answered him by the President, that it was the authority of the Commons of England, assembled in Parliament, which he affirmed then to be the supreme authority of this nation. The King said, 'I do not acknowledge its authority: authority, if taken in the best sense, it must be of necessity understood to be lawful, therefore I cannot assent to that; I am under a power, but not under an authority; and there are many unlawful powers, a power that is on the highway; I think I am under a power, but not under an authority; you cannot judge me by the laws of the land, nor the meanest subject. I wonder you will take the boldness to impeach me, your lawful King.' To this purpose his Majesty was pleased to express himself at that time, with more words to that purpose. The King went on to further discourse concerning the jurisdiction of the Court. Bradshaw, the President, was pleased to interrupt him, and told him several times, that he trifled out the Court's time, and they ought not to endure to have their jurisdiction so much as questioned.

Court. Pray go on,

Nutley. This gentleman at the bar, I did hear him demand the King's Answer several times; a positive Answer was required of the King; the King often desired to be heard, and he interrupted him again and again, several times; and at length it was prayed that the Charge that was exhibited against him might be taken pro confesso.

Court. By whom?

Nutley. By the prisoner at the bar, if so be that he would not answer. This, my lord, is the substance of what I have to say against him.

Counsel. Mr. Nutley, pray what discourse have you had at any time with the prisoner at the bar concerning this Impeachment?

Nutley. Truly, my lord, I know the gentleman well; I was well acquainted with him, and for the satisfaction of my own conscience, (for I was very tender in the business, and sorry he was engaged in it,) I went to him and did desire him to desist; I had discourse with him (for I was then a young student in the Temple, and had a little knowledge in the laws:) I desired him to consider the dangerous consequences of such a proceeding; I may say I did it with tears in my eyes, for I had a very good respect to the gentleman for his profession-sake, being learned therein: Truly, my lord, he did answer me thus: 'I acknowledge it is a very base business, but they put it upon me; I cannot avoid it, you see they put it upon me.' I had some discourse with him concerning the oath of allegiance, truly he was satisfied that this oath was against the business in question: I saw he was troubled at it.

Counsel. Can you speak of the manner of calling for judgment against the king?

Nutley. That, (I have already answered to it) was several times done; the king was brought several times to the bar, and at every time he was brought he was pressed to answer whether Guilty? or Not Guilty?

Court. By whom?

Nutley. By the solicitor then, the prisoner now at the bar. My lord, I remember his majesty was pleased when he saw he could not be heard to the discourse that he did intend to make of the whole business; saith the king, if you will needs press me to answer, I must demur to your jurisdiction: My lord, the answer that was given to that was this: Mr. Bradshaw, their then president, did say, Sir, saith he, if you demur to the jurisdiction of this Court, I must let you know that the Court do over-rule your demurrer; this was said, my lord, and judgment was pressed very often.

Court. By whom?

Nutley. By the prisoner at the bar.

Cook. My lord, may I ask him a question?

Court. Yes.

Cook. The first question is, Whether the parchment was delivered by me into the Court, or brought into the Court by Mr. Broughton the clerk.

Nutley. I do incline to believe, my lord, that it was brought into the Court, and delivered by some hand or other to the prisoner at the bar; I do believe it was, for I do remember it was written by one Price; I was told that was his name; that may be true; I believe it was brought into the Court, and delivered to the prisoner now at the bar.

Counsel. But did he exhibit it?

Nutley. Yes, my lords.

Cook. Did you see me set my hand to that parchment?

Nutley. No, my lords; but I believe it to be his hand.

Cook. Another question, Whether Mr. Nutley did hear me say concerning the opinions of those gentlemen, what they intended to do in that business?

Nutley. My lords, I do remember that I had often conference with the gentleman at the bar. I desired him to desist from the business, considering the dangerous consequences of it: Truly, my lord, I do well remember that he did say he did hope they did not intend to take away the king's life. Said I, if they go about any such thing, do you use your utmost endeavour to preserve his life: saith he, I did labour to that purpose, but they tell me they only intend to bring him to submit to the parliament.

Cook. It is said that I demanded judgment of his life; Mr. Nutley, I demand of you, whether I used the words of judgment against his life, but only I demanded their judgment?

Nutley. My lords, for that I cannot remember possibly to a syllable, but judgment was demanded.

Court. By whom?

Nutley. By this person.

Cook. I said the judgment of the Court, not against him, I meant judgment for his acquittal.

Court. Did you never hear him desire the Court that the Charge might be taken pro confesso.

Nutley. That I have said, my lord, it was urged by the prisoner at the bar against his majesty, that if he would not plead to the charge, that then the matter charged in it might be taken pro confesso. But, my lord, if you please to give me leave to add this one word more, my lord, I did hear him say at that time; he shewed me a paper that contained an Order of the Court, that did direct the very words that he should use when he came to deliver the charge; whether those words were in the Order I do not know.

Cook. Whether was I not directed by those gentlemen the very words I should speak?

Court. We are satisfied in that; he saith by an order that you shewed him, you were so directed. If you have anything more, ask it him.

Mr. Farrington sworn.

Sec. Gen. Pray tell my lords and the jury, what was the carriage of the prisoner at the bar at Westminster, at the place they called the High Court of Justice.

Farrington. My lord, I was present about the 20th of Jan. 1649 at that which they called the High Court of Justice, and Mr. Bradshaw sat then as President; so much as I remember concerning the prisoner at the bar I shall acquaint your lordship. This gentleman at the bar, after the reading the commission, and directions by the President to bring his majesty (the prisoner they called him) to the bar; the king being brought, after silence made, and some speeches made by the President, this gentleman, the prisoner at the bar, having then a parchment in his hand, the substance of it was for levying war against the kingdom, he prayed that it might be read, and accepted as a Charge, in behalf of the good people of England. It was accordingly read, and afterwards being demanded to answer, after his majesty having given several reasons as to the jurisdiction of the Court four days, every day the prisoner at the bar demanded the judgment of the Court: And if his majesty would not answer to the Charge, it might be taken pro confesso.

Counsel. Do you know his hand if you see it?

Farrington. I have not seen his hand a long time. [Then the impeachment was shewn to the witness.]

Farrington. Truly, sir, this is like his hand.

Counsel. Do you believe it?

Farrington. It is very like it; I do not know positively.

Counsel. Did you hear the words pro confesso?

Farrington. Yes, my lord, several times after the first day.

Counsel. Did he interrupt the king in his discourse, as to say these words, that the Charge might be taken pro confesso?

Farrington. I do remember one day there was some interruption between the king and him, the king laying his cane upon his shoulder, desiring him to forbear.

Cook. You cannot say that I interrupted his majesty.

Farrington. I remember that the king laid his cane upon your shoulders.

Cook. Whether did I the first or the last day demand judgment, or that any thing might be taken pro confesso?

Farrington. The first day? No; but after the first day he did several days; you did the last day.

Griffith Bodurdo, esq. sworn.

Counsel. Sir, you have heard the question, give an account to my lord, and gentlemen of the jury, of the carriage of the prisoner at the bar towards his majesty during the time of the trial.

Mr. Bodurdo. My lord, I was all the time that the king was brought there before the court as a prisoner; I was present all the day, having a conveniency out of my house into a gallery that was some part of it over that court. I do remember that the prisoner at the bar (whom I never saw before that time) did exhibit a Charge the first day against the prisoner at the bar, which was the king, in these very terms, 'the prisoner at the bar.' The Charge I heard it read then, I have not seen it since; the substance was this: That for levying war against the parliament and people of England, and namely, at such and such a place killing of the people of England, (I think Naseby and Keinton field was named in it, and divers other places were named in the Charge,) and the conclusion was, that he had done those things as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and a public and implacable enemy of the Commonwealth. But this prisoner at the bar did exhibit the Charge, and the king did then, as you have heard he did, plead to the jurisdiction of the Court. The king would fain have been heard, but I think they did adjourn for that time. The next day he pleaded the same thing; I remember that the answer that was several times given; twice given by Bradshaw to the king thus, That the Court did assert their own jurisdiction; the second and third day, I do not remember any day after the first, but that the prisoner at the bar did demand judgment for the king's not pleading, and did several times make complaints to the Court of the king's delays; that he intended delays, and nothing else.

Cook. Pray, my lord, one question: whether, my lord, before he heard me speak of demanding judgment against the king, whether he did not hear Mr. Bradshaw several times say that the Court owned their authority, and that the matter would be taken pro confesso?

Bodurdo. I did hear the prisoner at the bar desire of the Court, that it might be so; and I heard the prisoner tell the king that it must be so.

Joseph Herne sworn.

Counsel. Mr. Herne, tell my lords what you know of the prisoner's carriage at the High Court of Justice, as they called it.

Herne. Upon Saturday, the 20th of January, 1649, it was the first day his majesty was convened before them. I could not come near the Court, only I saw him at a distance; I heard nothing but the acclamations of the people, crying out, 'God save your majesty' what was done in Court I know nothing of. On Monday I was there, and had a conveniency to see and hear what was acted; and so his majesty being come to the seat appointed for him, the prisoner at the bar being called upon by the then President Bradshaw, he demanded of him what he had to ask of the Court. He was then talking with Dorislaus, and seemed not to mind the business of the Court. His majesty sitting near, takes his stick, and thrusts the prisoner at the bar upon his shoulder; and the prisoner looking back with a great deal of indignation turned about: I did hear Bradshaw speaking to him in these words, Mr. Solicitor, have you any thing to demand of the Court? Whereupon the prisoner at the bar did use these or the like words: May it please your lordships, I have formerly in the name of the commons assembled in parliament, and the good people of England, exhibited a Charge of High Treason and other High Crimes, against Charles Stuart, the prisoner at the bar; (flinging his head back in this manner to him) he had there further to require of the Court, that he might be demanded to make positive answer by confession or denial; if not, that the Court would take it pro confesso, and proceed according to justice; this was on the first day I was in the Court. The President Bradshaw told his majesty, that he heard what was craved in the name of the commons assembled in parliament, and the good people of England, against him, by the now prisoner at the bar. The king stood up, but Bradshaw prevented him in what he had to say, telling of him that the Court had given him time to that day to know when he would plead to the Charge. His majesty proceeded to object against the jurisdiction, and said he did demur to the jurisdiction of the Court; upon which the President answered him, If you demur to the jurisdiction of the Court, you must know that the Court hath over-ruled your demurrer; and you must plead to your Charge, Guilty, or Not Guilty: Upon that the king asked their authority, and desired he might give reasons against it; he was denied it by the President; the President at last was content to tell him, that though he was not satisfied with their authority, they were, and he must; but to satisfy him, he told him in short, they sat there by the supreme authority of the nation, the commons assembled in parliament, by whom his ancestors ever were, and to whom he was accountable; then the king stood up, By your favour, shew me one precedent. Bradshaw sits down in an angry manner: Sir, saith he, we sit not here to answer your questions; plead to your Charge, Guilty, or Not Guilty: Clerk, do your duty: Whereupon Broughton stood up, and asked what he had to say, whether Guilty or Not Guilty? And President Bradshaw said, That if he would not plead, they must record his contempt. His majesty turned about to the people, and said, Then remember that the king of England suffers, being not permitted to give his reasons, for the liberty of the people. With that a great shout came from the people, crying, God save the king; but there was an awe upon them, that they could not express themselves as they would have done, I believe.

Counsel. What did Cook say to the judgment? Did you hear him press for judgment?

Herne. Yes, I heard these words from the prisoner at the bar, That if the king would not plead, his Charge might be taken pro confesso, and that the Court might proceed according to justice.

Cook. One question more, whether he often heard me speak those words, that it might be taken pro confesso, and to proceed according to justice?

Herne. You desired he might be held to his plea, confession or denial, that he might not be suffered to use any words to the jurisdiction of the Court

Cook. Whether he heard the Charge read?

Herne. I did not hear the Charge read; I was not there the first day. I heard you confess you had exhibited a Charge of High-Treason against the prisoner at the bar, which was then the king's majesty.

Cook. Whether I did not in the Charge conclude, that all proceedings might be according to Justice?

Court. Read the title and last article of that Charge. Which was accordingly read, and follows in hæc verba:

The Title of the Charge.

'The Charge of the Commons of England
'against Charles Stuart, King of England,
'of High-Treason, and other Crimes ex'hibited to the High-Court of Justice.'

The last Clause in the Charge.

'And the said John Cook by Protestation '(saving, on the behalf of the people of Eng'land, the liberty of exhibiting at any time
'hereafter any other Charge against the said
'Charles Stuart, and also of replying to the 'answers which the said Charles Stuart shall 'make to the premises, or any of them, or any 'other Charge that shall be so exhibited) doth 'for the said treasons and crimes on the be'half of the said people of England impeach
'the said Charles Stuart as a tyrant, traitor, 'murderer, public and implacable enemy to
'the Commonwealth of England, and prayeth
'that the said Charles Stuart king of England,
'may be put to answer all and every the pre'mises; that such proceedings, examinations,
'trials, sentences, and judgment may be here-
'upon had, as shall be agreeable to justice.'

Court. Mr. Cook, will you have any witnesses examined touching the question you last asked?

Cook. No, be pleased to go on.

Mr. Baker sworn.

Mr. Baker. My lords, and gentlemen of the Jury, I was at the High-Court of Justice, as they called it, the first, second, and third days. Not to trouble you with the proceedings of Bradshaw, I will tell you what I observed of this gentleman; I have the notes that I took there, and pray that I may read them to help my memory. [Which was granted, and then he proceeded in this manner] That day, my lord, Mr. Cook told the Court, that he charged the prisoner at the bar (meaning the King) with Treason and High Misdemeanors, and desired that the Charge might be read; the Charge was this, That he had upheld a tyrannical government, &c. and for that cause was adjudged to be a tyrant, &c. and did then press that the prisoner might give an answer to that, and that very earnestly. The second day, my lord, he told the Court, that he did the last day exhibit a Charge of High-Treason against the prisoner at the bar, (meaning the King) and that he did desire he might make answer to it; and he told them also, that instead of making an answer to the Court, the King had delayed the Court, but desired the King might make a positive answer, or otherwise that it might be taken pro confesso. The third day, my lord, he came and told the Court as before, that the King had delayed them, and then he charged him with the highest Treasons and crimes that ever were acted upon the theatre of England, and then pressed that Judgment might be given against him; and another expression was, that it was not so much he, but the innocent and precious blood that was shed, that did cry for Judgment against the prisoner at the bar: This, my lord, is the substance; there were other passages.

Cook. Whether before this time he had not heard something of an act or order proclaimed at Westminster? Whether there was any other word in effect used in that Charge more than in the Proclamation?

Baker. I did hear the Proclamation and Charge, and the substance of it; I have given an account of it, and I did hear you press upon it very much; the Proclamation, I heard of it, that it was made for the summoning of the Court, but I did not hear the Proclamation made.

Cook. That that was called the Act of the Commons for Trying of the King.

Baker. I did hear of the Act, but did not take notice of it.

Mr. George Masterson sworn.

Counsel. Mr. Masterson, pray inform my lords and the Jury what you know touching the carriage of the prisoner at the bar at the trial of his late majesty.

Masterson. My lords, and you gentlemen of the Jury, I was present in that they called the High-Court of Justice, upon the 22d, 23d, and 27th days of January, in the year 1649. I shall wave those circumstances which you have heard, and many of which I well remember and what I heard likewise between the King, who was then a prisoner, and the then president Bradshaw; but concerning the prisoner at the bar, this I very well remember, that upon Monday I heard him say he had exhibited a Charge of High-Treason against the prisoner, (then the King) and demanded now that he might plead to his Charge; I do very well remember, that after some passages between the King and the Court, the prisoner at the bar desired the King might plead to his Charge, or else it might be taken pro confesso: I remember upon the last day, the day of that fatal sentence, I heard the prisoner at the bar demand in the name of the Commons assembled in parliament, and all the good people of England, Judgment upon the prisoner at the bar, pointing at the King; this is all.

Mr. Burden sworn.

Counsel. Do you know who did examine the witnesses against the king? And were you examined? And by whom?

Burden. By Judge Cook, for so he was called in Ireland.

Counsel. Did he examine you as a witness against the king? Did he give you an oath?

Burden. Yes, my lord, and many others.

Cook. This is a new thing, I never heard of this before; where was it that I examined him? I had no power.

Counsel. No, we know that, but you were active.

Court. Where was it?

Cook. Whether there were not any others with me in the room? And where was it?

Burden. It was at Westminster-Hall, within the High Court of Justice.

Cook. Who was there besides me?

Burden. I cannot tell; Axtel, he was there, and I am sure Cook was there.

Counsel. Mr. Burden, pray tell my lords and the jury what questions you were examined upon, and what they tended to.

Burden. He examined me, and gave me my oath; there was eight or nine of us, we had been in the king's army in former times; this gentleman (Colonel Axtel brought us in, commanded us out of our company; I was in his company, and this gentleman) himself gave us our oaths; he asked us where we saw the king in action? I did reply to him, and told him, I saw him in the field with his army; he asked me many other questions that I could not tell him; he asked me whether I did see the king at Nottingham set up his standard? And I was never at Nottingham in my life; these were the questions.

Mr. Starkey sworn.

Counsel. Pray inform my lords and gentlemen of the jury what passed between you and the prisoner at the bar concerning the trial of his late majesty.

Mr. Starkey. My lords, this gentleman, now prisoner, and myself, have been acquainted a great while, being of the same society of Gray's-Inn; and truly, my lord, I confess I owe all my knowledge in the laws to that gentleman; when I came first he was accused for debt, and was pleased to do me, and several other gentlemen, now and then the favour to reason the law with us, and assist us in the beginning of the long parliament; that is, to give you an account of his being indebted, he did desire I would do my endeavour to get his protection. Near the time of the king's trial there was a gentleman with myself, one Samuel Palmer, of Gray's-Inn, which frequented his company, had several nights the opportunity of understanding the affairs at Westminster, and truly he himself did seem to us to count that a very ridiculous Council. I remember what he said one night, I think they are all mad, which was within two or three days before the king's trial; and instanced how a fellow cried out to the lord Fairfax, that if he did not consent to the proceedings, he would kill Christ and him. After that I did not think he did go to this Council for employment, but out of curiosity. When the king came to trial, we heard that Mr. Cook was the person that was Solicitor, and acted that part that you have heard of; and during that trial, whether the second or third day, I cannot say that certainly, Mr. Cook came to Gray's-Inn that evening about ten or eleven of the clock at night, only upon some particular occasion, as he said; I being walking in the court in the walk before my chamber with another gentleman, I did see him pass out of a house to go back again; I thought it was he, called after him; 'Mr. Cook' said I; upon that he turned back and met me; I took him by the hand; said I, 'I hear you are up to the ears in this business;' 'no,' saith he, 'I am serving the people;' 'truly,' said I, 'I believe there's a thousand to one will not give you thanks.' Said I, 'I hear you charge the king for the levying war against the parliament; how can you rationally do this, when you have pulled out the parliament to make way to his trial?' He answered me, 'you will see strange things, and you must wait upon God.' I did ask him, but first he said this of himself; said he, he was as gracious and wise a prince as any was in the world; which made me reflect upon him again, and asked how he could press those things as I have heard? What answer he made to that I cannot tell. I did by the way enquire what he thought concerning the king, whether he must suffer or no? He told me, 'he must die, and monarchy must die with him.'

Cook. Whether was this after or before the sentence.

Mr. Starkey. It was before the sentence, for it was either the second or third trial; or rather in some interim of time before the sentence; for there was an adjournment for a day or two; but I am sure it was before the sentence.

Court. Mr. Cook, they have concluded their evidence, plead for yourself what you think fitting.

Cook. My lord, I have been a prisoner three months, I humbly desire to acknowledge his Majesty's and his Council's favour, that I was not put into a Jeremy's prison, but in the Tower, and not in irons; I give your lordships humble thanks for that; and truly, considering the nature of the charge, had it been in some other kingdom, they would have served us as John Baptist in prison; I thank you that I have a fair trial with the judges of the law, who are upon their oaths to do equal right and justice between our sovereign lord the king, and every prisoner, concerning matters of life and death; and likewise those noble lords, that though they are not put upon their oaths, but upon their honour, if they know any law to preserve my life, I trust they will rather save than destroy. My lords, I do therefore say as Paul said, my plea is much of that nature, against the law, and against Cæsar, I hope I have not offended at all, and so I have pleaded Not Guilty. The learned Counsel have examined several witnesses against me; and I humbly conceive that the matter will rest in a very narrow compass: the substance of the charge (so far as my memory will serve) doth rest in these three things, the other being but matter of form: That I, with others, should propound, consult, contrive, and imagine the death of the king. 2ndly, that to the perfecting and bringing about this wicked and horrid conspiracy, that I, with others, did assume a power and authority, (as I remember) Power, I am sure, then to kill and murder the king; and 3dly, that there was a person unknown that did cut off the king's head, and that we were abetting, aiding, assisting, countenancing, and procuring the person, or words to that effect, against the form of the statutes, and so forth. I have twelve poor words to offer for myself in this business, wherein if I do not answer every thing that hath been particularly objected, I hope you will give me leave afterwards to offer it. First, I humbly propound this, that if it was not made appear to your lordships that I did ever propound, consult, advise, contrive, attempt, or any way plot or counsel the death of his majesty, then I hope I cannot be found guilty within the statute of 25 Edward the third; for the naked truth Mr. Nutley hath in a great part spoke to; I was appointed upon the tenth of January, 1649, for to give my advice concerning a Charge, there having been upon the ninth a proclamation for the trial; and upon the tenth Mr. Steel, Dr. Doriaus, and Mr. Ask, and myself, were appointed, and ordered to be of Counsel to draw up a Charge; here I have the Order attested by Mr. Jessop, and pray it may be read.

Court. They do admit the thing, that you were so assigned.

Cook. Then I humbly conceive, that that cannot be said to be done maliciously, or advisedly, or with any wicked intention in me, which I was required and commanded to do; acting only within my sphere and element as a counsellor, and no otherwise.* The next thing is this, my Lord, that by law, words will not amount unto treason; we usually say, that

* "Upon the trial of Coke, of Gray's-inn, who was of counsel against the king, and delivered in the Charge against the king in the Traitorous Court called the High Court of Justice; he objected that he did not draw up the Charge; but he only acted as a counsellor, and did only speak words to have the Charge read, and demanded Judgment against the king; and he said words did not make treason.

"It was resolved by the court, that if a paper containing treasonable matter, be indited by another, yet being known by Coke to contain treasonable matter, and being delivered by him as a Charge against the king to take away his life, this is an overt-act to prove that he compassed the king's death, which is the treason he is indicted for." Kelyng, p. 12. See also p. 23.

words may declare an heretic, but not a traitor; there were some statutes formerly, 1 Edw. 6, where words are made treason; but they were all repealed by 1 Maria, that nothing shall be treason but what is expressed in 25 Edw. 3. This objection will seem to lie, that these were words put in writing; and that I humbly conceive to be the greatest matter objected; to which I answer, 1. Whether there be any full, certain, clear proof, that that is my hand to the Charge, I must leave to you; two or three witnesses say they believe it, and that it is like my hand; that I leave to you, if that appear; yet, my Lord, that that is put in writing as done by another that is the dictator, and does dictate unto me; I humbly conceive, that for any man to write words, which in their own nature may be treasonable, if he doth but write them by the command of another, by speaking them after another, taking them upon rebound, that is not treason, because they do not discover a traitorous heart; those words of compassing the death of the king in the 25 Edw. 3, they are secret imaginations in the heart, and they must be manifest by some overt-act; that which was dictated, my Lord, unto me, that I had expressly prescribed me, what I should say, what words I should say; that I did not invent any thing of mine own head, of my own conceit; and therefore cannot properly be said, to be malicious. The next thing that I crave leave to offer is this; that the pure and plain demanding and praying of justice, though injustice be done upon it, cannot possibly be called treason within the statute, then I hope nothing that has been said against me will amount to treason: for the words in the natural, grammatical, plain, genuine, and legal sense, will bear no other construction, as I humbly conceive, but (that whereas those gentlemen had his majesty then in their power a prisoner) that it was prayed by me that they would do him justice; I do hope that it will appear that I did give bonum et fidele consilium. It will appear, I hope, that some would have had a very voluminous and long Charge; that I was utterly against it, as conceiving that it was not fit and requisite that any thing should be put in; at least I durst not invent one word myself, but what was expressed in the Act for Trial; if your lordships will not admit it an Act, you will an Order, and so it will bear me forth, at least to excuse me from treason, because I kept myself to the words; whereas in that it was said that they should proceed according to the merits of the cause, I was against that, that I did not understand that; but according to justice, and that is but according to law, because the law is the rule of justice I do humbly hope (my lord,) that if by law, when words may be taken in a double sense, they shall always have the more favourable interpretation, much more when the word, in the legal sense, will bear it; when it is prayed they will proceed according to justice, I hope it will not be inferred there was any intention of doing injustice when justice was required. And therefore (my lord) the next word that I would offer is this: If, my lord, in all tragedies which are as we call them, judiciously or colourably, there are but these four actors, accusers or witnesses, the jury, judges, and executioner; if I be none of these, I cannot be guilty of treason. I hope I may safely say according to law, that I had not a hand at all in his majesty's death. My lord, the court and counsel it is very true, they do aim at the same thing; the counsel requirendo justitiam, the other exequendo justitiam, the end being the same, to have justice. If when justice be demanded, and injustice be done, what is that to the counsel? We read in the sixth of John, concerning Pilate, 'Knowest thou not' (speaking to Christ) 'that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee?' My lord, I humbly answer this to that which seems to be the most material part in the indictment, That we did assume a power; my lords, I did not assume a power; I hope it will not be said that the counsel had any power: eloquentia in the counsel, judicium in the judges, and veritas in the witnesses, xxvth of Acts, Tertullus, that eloquent orator, accused Paul; Paul answered for himself, and it is said, 'Festus being willing to do the Jews a courtesy, he left Paul bound;' it was not the counsel that left him bound. His majesty was never a prisoner to me, and I never laid any hands upon him; if any witnesses have spoke of any irreverence, I must appeal to God in that I did not in the least manner carry myself undutifully to his majesty, though one of the witnesses was pleased to say that I said these words, 'That there is a Charge against the prisoner at the bar;' it was not said the 'prisoner at the bar;' there was not one disrespectful word from me. There is a case in the third Institute of my lord Coke, it is to this purpose, that one wilfully and knowingly forswore himself; the case was put to inveigle the Court; and though the Court does injustice upon a false oath; it is not injustice at all in the witness, it is perjury in him; if there can be no injustice in a witness, much less a counsellor can be said to have his hand in the death of any, because he has no power at all; this must needs follow, that if it shall be conceived to be treason for a counsellor to plead against his majesty, then it will be felony to plead against any man that is condemned unjustly for felony. The counsellor is to make the best of his client's cause, then to leave it to the Court. It is said, I should demand judgment; I do not remember that, I leave it to you, but still to demand justice. Counsellors, they do engage in business before they do rightly understand the true matter of the fact: it is part of a Serjeant's oath, that so soon as he does discover the falsity of the cause, he should forsake the cause. My lord, by what Mr. Nutley hath said it appears, and I have many witnesses in the country, three or four in Leicestershire, would have spoken full to this, that (my lord) there was not before the sentence of the king (to the best of my knowledge) a word spoken by any that they did intend to put him to death; I say, to my knowledge; and, my lord, when judgment is demanded, is it not twofold, of acquittal or condemnation? If those that then were entrusted with the power of judicature, if they did not know any law to proceed by to take away his majesty, then I demanding their judgment, it doth not appear to be my judgment; and I refer it to the learned counsel, that counsel many times at the assizes and other courts have been sorry that the verdict have been given for their clients, when they have known the right lay on the other side, and so I might in this. The next thing I humbly offer, is, that if in right reason, considering the condition his majesty was then in, the advising to draw up the charge was rather to be looked upon as a matter of service than disservice, then it cannot be called treason; it is very true, my lord, that a very little small Overt-act will amount to a treason; and, my lord, had this been in times of peace, and had his majesty been no prisoner (now he was under the power of an army), this had been great treason; but he being a prisoner (not by my means, for I was no swordman), what can a man that knows himself innocent, being a prisoner, desire more than a speedy trial? So that making the trial more speedy cannot be said to be done traitorously. A trial doth follow imprisonment as naturally and necessarily as the shadow doth the body. If any man shall desire and be instrumental in bringing him to a trial which might acquit, rather than condemn him, and so humbly pray proceedings according to justice, this will have, I hope, a better name than treason. I am much beholden to his majesty, and this honourable parliament, for the penning of the Act of Indemnity, which, I hope, my lord, you will give me leave to take notice of.

Court. Open as much as you will of it.

Cook. My lords, the words that I would make use of are in the beginning; treason, murder, and other felonies that are spoken of, they are said to be counselled, commanded, acted or done; in the preamble, which is as the key to open the mind and meaning of the law makers, it is said, that all persons shall be pardoned for all, excepting such as shall be named, and in such manner as they shall be excepted; and then it comes, provided that this act shall not extend to pardon such and such persons, and by name I am one; and it is said, all which persons, for their execrable treason, in sentencing to death, or signing the instrument for the horrid murder, or being instrumental in taking away the precious life of our late sovereign lord, Charles the first, of glorious memory, are left to be proceeded against as traitors to his late majesty, according to the laws of England, and are out of the said act wholly excepted and foreprized. There is not any thing offered against me upon the two first great words, which are sentencing and signing; that which I have to do to endeavour to clear myself is this, being instrumental in taking away the life of his said majesty : First, I humbly offer this to the Jury's consideration, That where the parliament doth begin to fix the treasonable part, there, I hope, and no otherwise, this honourable Court will fix it : If it had been the intention that counsellors, advisers, and such as spoke their minds sometimes in the business, you know that was epidemical, many words were spoken which cannot be justified ; whether naturally it would not have followed, that all such persons, for their counselling, advising, or being instrumental, are left to be proceeded against as traitors, I hope you will take that into consideration ; concerning the words, ' or ' being instrumental,' observe it is not said, ' or ' being any otherways instrumental ;' but ' sentencing, signing, or being instrumental ;' if therefore the word, ' instrumental,' be not of a general comprehensive nature, then all this evidence which hath been given in against me, being before the sentencing and signing, will fall to the ground ; that this is the legal genuine, and grammatical sense, and cannot be any otherways than as particular, as if it were the sentencer, signer, and executioner ; which if it had been so, nothing of the evidence would have reached me. My argument is this : Such a use is to be made of an act of parliament, that no word may be frustrate and insignificant ; but if this interpretation shall be put upon it, ' sentencing, signing, or being any way ' instrumental,' then the words sentencing and signing need not have been. If ' instrumental' will carry the words ' sentencing and signing,' then these words will carry no force at all ; especially, my lord, when there is no need of any retrospect at all ; if it be so, I know not how far it may look back ; there is no necessity of putting any comprehensive generality upon this word ' instrumental,' but that the plain natural sense will be this, that those that did sentence and sign, and those that were instrumental in taking away his life, that is, those that did abet and comfort that person unknown, or justify, or countenance him, which is after the sentencing, and not before, in the legal sense. Next, I conceive, that a counsellor cannot be said to do any thing vi et armis.

It is said, That by force and arms I did abet, &c. it is rhetorical to say that words may be as swords, but legal it is not, unless there be something vi et armis ; in the grammatical sense, instrumental in taking away the king's life ; it is not said instrumental in order to take away the king's life, or instrumental in advising to take away the king's life, but instrumental in taking away the king's life. My lord, the next thing is, that there cannot be any thing be said to be done by me, first not falso, because in that sense it must have the operation of mendacity ; that there must be a lie told in it ; I did nothing but what I was required to do, to set down such and such words ; I did not invent nor contrive them, I heard nothing of it till the 10th day of January. My lord, for malitiosè, that I did not any thing maliciously, I hope it will appear in this ; what I then spoke it was for my fee ; it may be called avaritia, but not malitia ; for the law will imply a malice, when there is no other express ground or reason why the thing was done, but here was an express ground to speak for my fee. I hope the Jury will take that into consideration. Then, secondly, I was not judicial in the case, I was not magisterial as any officer, but ministerial. As touching examining of Witnesses, it is a great mistake, the Court had power to give an oath ; I might be there, but I had no power to give an oath ; but whether I might ask any question, I do not remember, but that I should give an oath, that is a falsity. Then, my lord, for proditoriè, I hope there is nothing at all that appears to the jury ; so that there was no malice nor traitorous intention in the thing. There are some matters of law which I desire your lordships will give me leave to speak to, and that your lordships will be of counsel with me. I would offer something concerning his majesty's gracious Declaration from Breda to the Parliament (I was then in Ireland) ; I did put in a Petition to the honourable Commissioners before any exception was, that I might have the benefit of that Declaration ; I did lay hold of it : My lords, there are two things in that Declaration that I would offer. His majesty saith, that for the restoring of the king's peers, and people of the kingdom to their just rights and liberties, he will grant a free and general Pardon to all, excepting such as shall be by parliament excepted ; and within three or four lines after it is said, a free parliament ; though I do not in the least question the legality of this parliament, yet, my lords, to this particular purpose, whether the parliament that was to except ought not to be a parliament that was to be called according to his majesty's writ, according to the laws of the kingdom, I humbly conceive it will bear that ; though his majesty is pleased to confirm this, yet it is not such a parliament that was to except ; that I offer to your lordships. My lords, That that I would humbly make bold to put for myself, because it is the privilege of one in my condition, is this : There is, my lords, many lords, the earl of Essex*, the earl of Southampton, and others, that were adjudged in the 44 of Eliz. 8 Institutes. They did traitorously and maliciously conspire to take her majesty prisoner, and to remove her counsellors from her, which were found guilty, and suffered accordingly : The reason is, That because thereby, if it had been done, they had deploiled her majesty of her regal government ; and the case is instant in Philip, who was a nominative king, that it was not Treason to have attempted any thing against him. My lords, his majesty being a prisoner without any hand of mine, I giving advice according to what was dictated to me to bring him to that trial, whereby he might have been acquitted, and so set at liberty, I hope that will not be said as instrumental.

My lords, I humbly shall offer but two words,

* See No. 70, vol. 1, p. 1638.

1. To the honourable Court, then to the Jury. The words 25 of Edw. 3, and so the exposition of the learned judges have been from time to time, that there shall be no semblable treasons made by presumptions or strains of wit, but those treasons specified there: It is said, if a husband do kill his wife, or a wife kill her husband, a master should kill his servant, or the servant should kill his master, that that shall be petty treason; a child did kill his father, though that was looked upon as a great sin, yet the judges did not presume that to be treason, because it was not in the very words; this being an extraordinary case, to write a thing after another doth not appear that there was a malicious heart in him that did write. There hath been the act of parliament that doth call these courts tyrannical and unlawful courts; but, my lords, a tyrannical and unlawful court, is a court de facto, though not de jure; if a court be not a just and lawful court, it cannot be said but that it is a court: We say a thief is a true man, though morally he is not so; this was a court, officers attending on them; some said they had authority; and therefore for one to come and act within his sphere, not to act out of that, nor do any thing but what he had a prescript form appointed him, I hope that will not be found to be within the letter of the law. I have been told, (how true I cannot tell), that there have been some votes in the honourable parliament, that those that did only counsel or advise, that those were not to be looked upon as Traitors; I have been told so, that those that did only speak as counsel for their fee, who were not the contrivers of it, the parliament did not intend they should be left to be proceeded against.

Court. That letter that was sent from the commons to the king at Breda, they speak first of the violation that was put upon the parliament, and of the base and horrid murder of his late majesty. It is said that the parliament (I conceive they meant of the remaining part), they were not guilty, but some few ambitious, bloody, guilty persons; who contrived the same, and others misled by them.

Cook. The other matter of law is this: I say, that I do hope that though that Order, which I was about to produce concerning my acting, that if it may not in a legal sense any way be said to be an Act of the parliament and commons, yet it may be said to be such an Order to bear out those that did act according to it, because there was an authority de facto, otherwise it were not lawful for any man to exercise his profession during their power. I hope counsellors might then exercise such profession, as well as others. My lord, though I should suffer myself in this case, I should be loth the honourable profession of the law should. I think I was in my sphere, acting as a counsellor. Now, gentlemen of the jury, that which I have to say to you is an evidence concerning matter of life, it must be so clear, that every one that hears it may understand it. It is called an evidence, because it is evident; it is one reason why prisoners for their lives are not allowed counsel for matter of fact, because the evidence is, and ought to be, so clear and plain that every one should be satisfied, both jury and standers-by; and it is a proper word to say the prisoner is convicted, that is as much as, his mouth is stopped; and therefore I say, truly as I hope I may speak it to you without offence, as Jeremy in another case, when some of the people would have had them put him to death, 'As for me, behold I am in your hand, do with me as seemeth good and meet unto you,' Jer. xxvi. ver. 14, 15. Saith he, 'But know ye for certain, that if ye put me to death, ye shall surely bring innocent blood upon yourselves.' I hope you will not willingly be guilty of any such thing; I must leave it to your consciences, whether you believe that I had an hand in the king's death, when I did write but only that which others did dictate unto me, and when I spoke only for my fee; and this I would be bold to say, though the argument is not so directly confessed, that human justice (I do first say as this my principle and opinion is), that as every man ought to pay his moral debts, so all political debts; there is a debt due to human justice, so political: if the Lord should have suffered me to have been drunk, and killed a man, for which I ought to have died, instead of speaking for myself, I would have rather intreated the jury to have found me guilty; I think these things ought to be answered, political debts. When I was in Ireland, and had opportunity of going away, if I thought I had been guilty I might have done it; my name is put into his majesty's Proclamation. It is true, I was a prisoner three or four months before, so that I could not render myself. To what end should that Proclamation mention my name? It was said I obscured myself, but I did not. Human justice doth never punish so much for expiation as for prevention; the judgments of the learned Aquinas, Grotius, and Amesius, and many others, that if a man doth kill a man, commit any thing worthy of death, though he doth repent never so much, yet that others may be deterred from committing such acts, the magistrate is bound to put him to death. But where there is not such a thing, there it is different; though it is said the land is defiled, that is, where there is danger that the like may be committed again; now all things are settled, there is no danger at all; now there can never come such a case as this again; I say, my lord, what I acted I did as a counsellor, I had no malicious intention in it. Mr. Nuxley bare testimony so far, that I told him, 'there was no intention of putting his majesty to death;' I only did say, that 'I desired them to do justice;' and I hope what was done was their act, not mine, and so I leave myself to your lordships.

Court. Silence commanded.

Sol. Gen. My lords, this gentleman who is the prisoner at the bar requires such an evidence of the fact as may be evident, he saith so evident as may be as clear as the sun ; I think that evidence is not to seek ; but if he must never be convicted till he be so far convinced as to be speechless, I believe we may stay long enough ; nevertheless if he be willing (as he saith he is) to pay his debts to political justice, we shall quickly give him the total sum. That which he hath said hath been like a lawyer, the best that his case will bear, but withal it is a great aggravation to his crime, that he that knew the law so well, should so much transgress it. He began, ' Words do not make treason ; ' he mistakes ; his charge is not for words ; gentlemen, his charge is for compassing and imagining the death of the king, and the evidence of that charge is meeting in that assembly, and the part that he bore in that assembly. And yet, my lords, he will be much mistaken too (under favour, and with submission to your lordships judgments, and those that hear him), if they think that in all cases it is a general rule that words are no treason ; for when a man shall proceed to declare the imagination of his heart, as to exhort and persuade men to effect that wicked thing, the killing of the king, certainly there cannot be a greater overt-act than these words, nor a clearer evidence of such an imagination, for ' out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks. ' My lord, to say that the demanding of justice is not treason, though injustice do follow, is a very weak gloss upon a wicked action. The subject matter was a charge of High-Treason against the king ; the conclusion of the charge was a Protestation, by which he saved to himself a liberty to put in a new charge, if that was not sufficient ; upon the whole he desires, that the king, as a traitor, may be brought to justice. Judge ye now, gentlemen, upon the nature of this demand, whether this were such a demand of justice as might end in acquittal ; whether he that presses that this charge may be taken pro confesso, did mean that when the Court had recorded it, they should acquit him when they had done ? My lords, to say there are four actors in this case, the witness or accuser, the judge, the jury and the executioner, and that he is none of them, and therefore in this case he cannot be a traitor ; still, my lord, that is to beg the question ; for if he be one of them that did assemble in the place, and were any instrument of that assembly, he hath thereby given an evidence of an overt-act of his wicked heart ; and when all is done, this poor gloss amounts but to this, ' I am none of those four ranks, ' that is, there were others worse than myself, ' and therefore I am none at all. ' My lord, the thing that he hath mainly insisted upon is the Act of Indemnity ; my lord, he doth observe that his name is excepted in that Act ; that he doth hope that it is so penned, as by the favour of the parliament it may reach his case ; and he hath argued very much upon it, and he speaks as if he did believe it himself. But surely there is no colour for that interpretation, that he should step out of this proviso, by the very Act of Indemnity, that was made on purpose to bring him in by name ; the words are, ' Provided that this act, nor any thing therein contained, shall extend to pardon, or give any benefit to John Cook, ' &c. ' all which persons, for their execrable treasons in sentencing to death, or signing the instrument for the horrid murder, or being instrumental in taking away the precious life of our late Sovereign Lord King Charles the first, of glorious memory, are left to be proceeded against as traitors, &c. ' First, my lord, this general and clear answer, I conceive, is to be given, that the prisoner at the bar being by name excepted out of the Act of Indemnity, by the Proviso mentioned in it, although the subsequent lines that follow be the reasons why the parliament do except ; yet if it be within the very words of the exception, whether he be in the reasons that moved them to that exception, is not material ; if he could distinguish that he was not instrumental in that sense, to which he labours to restrain this Proviso, he can but say this : the parliament was mistaken in their reason, but not in their conclusion ; but he is directly within the exception, and the reason of it too, for the word instrumental goes as far as can be, and he is properly and literally, in the strict notion of the word, an instrument of the death of the king : the king could never have been brought to death, if not to the bar ; never had been sentenced, if he had not been impeached ; that impeachment could never have been taken pro confesso, nor the impeachment itself delivered, if he had not delivered the one, and pressed the other : he that brought the Ax from the Tower was not more instrumental than he : and besides, a lawyer as he of great understanding, and of good parts, he knows very well there are no accessories in treason, but he that acts any part in so wicked a conspiracy, let him begin at what end he will, he stands responsible for the utmost consequence of it ; and in effect the very penning of this Proviso is an express judgment of parliament, that he was instrumental ; but that is not to be pressed.

The next thing he doth insist upon is the Declaration of his majesty, that he sent from Breda, which he saith he laid hold upon ; here lies the weight of his answer : the king writes his letter to the parliament now sitting, that he doth purpose, for the quieting of the hearts of men that may be in doubt, to pardon all persons all crimes of what nature soever, either against himself or royal father, excepting those which shall be by act of parliament excepted ; and, my lord, he doth say, and modestly presses, that he doth conceive the meaning of that is, to pardon all persons what crimes soever they have committed, except such as by a free parliament shall be excepted ; a legal parliament, called by the writ of the king, which this parliament is not. To that I give these answers : first, my lord, I do say that this letter of our gracious sovereign from Breda in itself undoubtedly is no pardon in law for treason ; that cannot be without the broad-seal. Next, a pardon under the great-seal in such a form of words as this is, would not be a pardon for treason, for that must not be pardoned by implication, but by positive words; so in the case of sir Walter Raleigh, a commission directed to 'our well-beloved subject' would not pardon the treason of which he was condemned. In the next place, this letter at the most is but a pardon in honour, which must always be taken according to the meaning; and that the king's honour may be for ever sacred, I say, this letter doth no way help the prisoner at the bar.

First, it is plain by the very superscription of this letter in which the Declaration was inclosed, that it is directed to the Speaker of our House of Commons in Parliament assembled; which cannot possibly be expounded of any other parliament than that which was then sitting, to whose Speaker it was written.

Secondly, the letter itself says, 'we have left it to you to provide for Security and Indemnity;' and again, 'if there be a crying sin for which the nation may be involved in infamy, we cannot doubt but you will be as solicitous to vindicate it as we can be.' And then in this very letter encloseth that Declaration, upon the penning of which the prisoner so much relies: now lay all together, and it is clear the parliament meant by the declaration, must be the same parliament which was meant by the letter; and that was this very parliament whom the king intended to trust, both with indemnity, and with the vindication of his father's death, and to be the dispensers both of mercy and justice in this particular. Another thing is this, this very parliament, as the prisoner observes, they did go to the king according to his gracious letter, and in the behalf of all the good people of England, they did lay hold of the king's mercy in his Letter and Declaration, and prayed that this claim by their Speaker, in behalf of all the rest of the commons of England, might be effectual to all purposes, and for all persons other than those that should be by themselves afterward excepted, according to their requests: his majesty accepts their petition, and makes proclamation, that his pardon should extend to all but such as they should except: what can be more clear and evident, than that this is the parliament which the king did mean to be the very parliament to which the letter should have reference till the Act of Oblivion was passed? Again: the late transactions of these twelve years past had involved so many persons, that we could scarce find a man but he had need of mercy; nay, this very parliament to which this letter was written had need of indemnity; and is it probable in the nature of the thing, or can it be understood by any man, that the king writing to this parliament and offering them pardon and indemnity, should mean such a pardon and indemnity as a future parliament, to be called by his own writ, should be willing to afford them? Whose hearts would have been satisfied with so contingent a security?

My lords, upon the whole matter, by what the king hath said in this letter, and by what the parliament hath done in pursuance thereof, and by what the king hath proclaimed, it is to my understanding as clear as the noon-day, that the honour of the king is not concerned at all in the exemption of the prisoner at the bar; and for the cases of my lords of Essex and Southampton, which he hath cited, they make against him; they were condemned because they endeavoured to imprison the queen, and to remove her counsellors, of which very fact the prisoner is in law guilty too: and then the case of king Philip, the husband of queen Mary, makes nothing for him neither, unless he will speak out, and tell us plainly, that because by a former violence the king was made a prisoner, he became but like a titular king, as king Philip.

In the next place he saith, my case is out of the law, I acted as a counsellor in my own particular for my fee; it was avaritia, but not malitia, nor falsè, malitiosè, or proditoriè: but he must know, that no man hath, or can have, a lawful calling to pursue the life of his king; and the law implies malice; for malitiosè and proditoriè are not only words of course, but of truth too, in this case; else it were as much as to say, that no counsel can be guilty of high-treason, than which nothing can be more absurd: my lord, for that which he said last (for I must omit some things, and give him leave to take the advantage of it), to stand upon it, that the place was a court, such a one it was that he was not answerable for the constitution of it; if it were not in a legal sense, it was such an Order as might bear him out, that is, with modesty and good manners to justify high-treason; it is not with such insolency as some others before him did it, but it amounts to that, that an Order of a few persons that first made themselves a parliament, and then made a court of justice, had officers, and met together, and perfected so great a treason; I say, that this Order to bear him out is impossible. He that is a lawyer, he must account to the laws for what he hath done; if the authority were not lawful, he cannot but know that this which he calls the Parliament was so far from a legal authority, that it was one part of the treason that he did assist such an assembly.

Gentlemen of the Jury, This is your own case, here is a Charge that is exhibited by the prisoner at the bar, as he saith, in the name of all the people of England. Look on it, for you are some of them if you own it; then it may be true what he hath said; but I hope you meet here to tell this nation, and all the world, that the people of England had no hand in this Charge; do but consider how that this prisoner at the bar had hunted the life of the king, how he did fish out and examine evidence, whether the king set up his standard at Nottingham, was at such a place, and such a place; to what end is all this, but with design of blood? Were these things to be produced against the king, and then judgment to be demended that he may be saved? Is it not plainly proved to you by witnesses, how he did exhibit the Charge, press it, aggravate it, desired it might be taken pro confesso, was afflicted with the delays, how angry he was when he was interrupted? Is it not proved to you, that he was at first against the thing, and said, 'It was a base business?' When he was engaged in it said, that he was 'a servant of the people of this kingdom?' What doth he do at last, when the thing had gone far? he speaks that which is the only troth which I have heard yet from him, 'He must die, and monarchy then must perish with him;' from which event, good Lord, deliver us.

Sir Edrard Turner. My lord, the substance of the Defence that the prisoner hath made at the bar, with much skill and cunning, may be referred to two heads. The first to the statute of the 25th of Edw. the 3rd, the second to the late Act of Oblivion: for the first, my lord, he saith, that his fact is not comprized within that statute; saith he, I did never conspire or imagine the death of the king; nor did believe that would be a consequent of their actings. It was expressly proved, that himself did say that the king must die, and monarchy with him: but, gentlemen, though he had said true, that it had not been proved, or that he did not believe that would be a consequent, yet, my lord, I must tell you, that every step of this tragedy was treason; the summoning themselves, that was treason; every proceeding upon that was treason; the summoning of their meetings in the Painted-Chamber, coming into Westminster-Hall, every person as instrumental, those that came to act the least part in that tragedy, were every one guilty of treason; what, saith he, I acted as a counsellor for my fee; it was that fee that Judas had, the 30 pieces of silver, that made him hang himself. He goes further, and tells you, there must be no semblable Treasons, this is clear; the conspiring and imagining the death of the king, that is the treason that is mentioned in the act; treason by the common law; though this be not named the killing of the king; yet all these proceedings are demonstrations to you there was a secret imagination to kill him. Then to the Act of Oblivion, his argument is, that because the act saith, that if they had sentenced, signed, or been instrumental in the death of the king, that they should be excepted; but it is not said, or 'otherwise instrumental;' that this therefore should refer to subsequent, not precedent acts, that is a strange exposition; take it grammatically, it hath the most large construction, instrumental, more large than if they had said otherwise, for it doth comprehend every thing: there having been so full an answer already, I will be short; I will not meddle with his civil debts, but with his political: if a man kill another, though he do repent, the magistrate must do justice in terrorem. Though he doth repent (I hope in God he doth so), the magistrates, your lordships, must do justice in terrorem; I desire that justice may be done upon that man. He said it was no treason to demand justice against the king, because he did but demand it; I hope he will think it no unkindness in me to desire judgment against him, because it is just.

Mr. Wadham Windham. As I understand the prisoner at the bar, the chief argument which he shelters himself under was his profession, which gives a blast to all of us of the long robe; I will not mince his arguments; saith he, here was a Court, I was appointed Solicitor; and saith he, for men to practise before those that have not a proper judicature, it is not felony, murder, or treason (I would not willingly mince his argument), and that I was appointed, and the words dictated to me; and a counsellor carrying himself within the compass of his profession is not answerable; but if he will exceed his bounds, his profession is so far from sheltering him, that, as it has been opened, it is very much an aggravation; it is the duty of a counsellor to give counsel; if a man shall come to me and ask counsel, and I shall counsel him to kill a man, am not I accessory to that murder? Words, by his argument, will not amount to treason; if the fact follows, I am as guilty as if I did the fact; in point of treason, it is all one as if I had done that very act. If Mr. Cook did advise that act, or was instrumental, he is as much a traitor as the man in the frock that did the execution. For his profession, truly, my lord, I do not think that a counsellor is always bound to know the patent of him that sits as judge, that will not be his case; here was no ordinary warrant of law to carry on justice: Grotius saith, in case of necessity for carrying on justice, there may be many things allowed: I pray where did Mr. Cook read of such a Court as a High Court of Justice? There was never such a High Court of Justice read of in the law; then as this was a mock Court, so under good favour it was a mock jurisdiction. Was there any law under heaven to put the King to death? Is it not out of the compass of all Courts whatsoever to do it? and under good favour, my lord, this is but to shelter a man's self under colour of justice to do the most execrable treason in the world; I have no more to say to you.

L. C. Baron. I would repeat the evidences and your answer to you; if you have any thing new, speak to it.

Cook. This is new; it was said by one, that if there had been no Charge, there had been no Sentence given in the case; I say, that the Indictment or Charge is no part of the Trial, by the statute of Magna Charta: The peers of the land shall be tried by peers, but are indicted by the country; I conceive, by what they have said, they do make me causal of the King's death. It is said in the Indictment, there was a power; I say this, I did not assume any power; it cannot be said, if counsel be come in to an unlawful power, that he takes the power, but stands with respect at the bar. At assizes judgment passes, the clerk of the assizes he is not instrumental in taking away life. For that which Mr. Starkey should say, that I should say, 'The King must die, and monarchy with him,' I humbly beg that the Jury would take notice of what Mr. Nutley said, that I told him there was no intention of taking away the King's life; and besides, it is but a single witness. I hope there must be two witnesses in point of law to convict a man of High Treason.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Cook, you said right but even now, that if there was any thing in matter of law which the Court knows of, which may be of advantage to you, they are of counsel to you, and so they ought to be.*

Cook. I thank your lordships.

L. C. Baron. I shall repeat the whole evidence, and begin with that first (we are upon our oaths): The witnesses that are against you, I took notice of them; you have had a great deal of liberty, which you have made use of civilly; but, sir, for the fact, I think it is a great deal more full than as you have answered. First, the first witness produced against you was Mr. Nutley (I shall speak only the material parts that concern your Charge): he swears expressly, that he saw Price a scrivener writing a Charge in the Court of Wards, that he saw his Charge in your hands; he saw afterwards, when the King of blessed memory was brought as a prisoner, that there you delivered the Charge in; there is more than words; you delivered that Charge in, that alone is an overt act; then if there were nothing else in that case, that a man in a paper should call the King Traitor, Tyrant, Murderer, and Implacable Enemy, as there the words are, and he deliver this paper, and this be read; if this be not an overt act of imagining and compassing the King's death, I do not know what an overt act is: and he gives further evidence; if I mistake, take free liberty to interrupt me.

Cook. Sir, they were not my words, but their words that commanded me.

L. C. Baron. This I say, that this very thing alone, such a paper approved by you, delivering this paper to an assembly, and requiring it may be read, this is an overt act to prove the imagination of your heart for the death of the King; the reason is, if the King should be a Tyrant, a Traitor, &c. it stirs up hatred in the people, and the consequences of that hatred is the death of the prince. The next thing that Mr. Nutley said, was this, he said that you demanded positively judgment against him, against the blessed King, then prisoner at the bar. I remember you said that you did demand judgment, but that you did not demand judgment against the King; take it so, whether you did, or not, (though you shall find in some other witnesses that I shall repeat, that you said judgment against the King); the consequence will be the same; who could you demand judgment against but the King? he was the prisoner: because he did demand a further hearing by the Parliament, you urged that his Charge might be taken pro confesso, then it must needs be judgment against the King; it is effectively and implicitly the same. He went further, and that was, that being your friend and acquaintance, and acknowledging your parts as a lawyer, (which truly I do very much know myself, and do know this gentleman to be a man of very great parts in his profession), he had familiar acquaintance with you; he told you what a base business it was, and you did yourself acknowledge it; said the prisoner to Mr. Nutley himself, It is a base business, but they put it upon me. He did discourse further to him of the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, which he knew very well, no man better; this, gentlemen, he very ingenuously confessed it, saying, I confess it is so, they put me upon it, I cannot avoid it; but then excuses it, I am the servant of the people: Afterwards he pressed the King to answer positively, whether Guilty or Not Guilty; the pressing of the King to answer, what was it in effect, but to hasten judgment? and that was to hasten his death; so that this is the substance of Mr. Nutley's testimony, that he pressed judgment; judgment was demanded by the prisoner now at the bar; it is not only demanded, but pressed, and all the current of the witnesses at several days are to this purpose. It is true (that I may repeat the whole for you, and against you), that this gentleman, the prisoner at the bar, when Mr. Nutley did urge this to him, said he hoped they did not intend to take away the King's life; I verily believe they do not intend to take away the King's life; I hope they do not. But, Mr. Cook, it is no excuse to say you hope, or you believe, they will not, &c. How far it may be in such a crime something in extenuation in foro cali, but not in foro civili; you opened it yourself, that if a man should go about to take the King prisoner, it is treason; the law adjudged that to be treason; when you knew they would condemn him as a Tyrant, Murderer, &c. you must easily believe what would follow such a condemnation, truly death; that is no colour of excuse in foro civili. Farrington swears to the same purpose, that he saw you having a parchment in your hands, delivering it in, and prayed it might be read as a Charge of the people; you did not speak, I deliver this in, from those that delivered it to me; that was not in the paper, that you said of yourself; my brethren will tell you, all this is an apparent point of the imagination of your heart; at that time he swears the same thing, that you did desire it might be taken pro confesso. Mr. Bodurdo is the third, he swears the same thing too, that you exhibited a Charge of High Treason against the prisoner then at the bar, and tells you the substance of it; he saith that all but the first day you demanded judgment for not pleading to the Charge; he adds that you complained of the delays; I am sure that was not dictated to you; that could not be thought that you should desire judgment for the prisoner: It is very true which you say for yourself in that, that you did not demand it first, till it was demanded by the court; Mr. Bodurdo tells you, and so it was granted the first day, that Bradshaw only said it, but afterwards that you always demanded it: The next was Mr. Herne, he swears the same words again, that you did in the name of the Commons assembled in parliament, and the People of England, exhibit a Charge, &c. These are your own words; if you did exhibit a Charge against the king, to exhibit a Charge of High-Treason the very thing followed; if it were so, there was death; so certainly there cannot be a greater expression of the imagination of a man's heart than that is: It is true, you asked then a question, and that was, Whether that that you concluded was not that you desired to proceed according to justice? It is true, the words of the charge are so; but before you come to conclusion you charge him as a traitor, tyrant, &c. Communis hostis; after you had given that charge you demanded justice; those that spit in his face, they demanded justice: every one knew what belonged to that justice: Then Baker, he swears positively that you did exhibit the Charge in this manner; he said this, that you said, you had exhibited a Charge of High-Treason, &c. and that the king sought delays; there is your insisting upon it; he says further that you said these words, That you did desire judgment should be given against him, not so much you, as the blood that had been shed that cried for judgment; truly whether that was a judgment that you intended for acquittal, that must be left to the jury. You asked (because I will repeat it in order as my memory will give me leave) whether there was any other words in the Charge than was in the Proclamation? Mr. Cook, Whether there was any other words, or no, that differed in the proclamation; as it was a great sin and foul fact in the proclamation, so it was as foul in the Charge. Master Masterson swears the same too, he heard you say the second day you had delivered a Charge (the day before) against the king; and that he had delayed his Answer; you desired he might plead Guilty, or Not Guilty; the last day, that you did in the names of the Commons assembled in parliament, and the People of England, demand judgment against the king: and then another swears those words, judgment against the prisoner at the bar, which was the king. Burden swears you examined him as a witness against the king, in what place he was with the king; it seems he was in the king's army; he swears you gave him an oath; (it is testimony fit to be believed) but however, if you did not give the oath, by what you say yourself you may be by, and asked him the question. Master Starkey, he tells you, that during the Trial, and before the Sentence, that you, being an old acquaintance of his in Gray's-Inn, and speaking with him, he spake like a friend to you, 'I hear you are up to the ears in this business;' and 'whereas you talk of the people, there is a thousand for one against it?' that you should tell him again, 'You will see strange things, but you must wait upon God;' these words of waiting upon God are words of that nature, people do use them now-a-days when they would do some horrid impiety, which hath been the sin of too many; it is but a canting language, that is the best term I can give it: You told him then 'He must die,' this was before the Sentence; (that is to be observed, Gentlemen of the Jury) you say you did not know of the sentence, you said 'He must die, and monarchy with him.' You must here know that some of those persons that sat upon him said, the king was a gracious and wise king; and as Mr. Cook did say, and they were the best words they spoke, and I think he thinks so in his conscience; but in conclusion 'He must die and monarchy must die with him;' others said, they did not hate king Charles, but they hated monarchy and government; but monarchy was the thing that they would behead. I think I have done with that evidence that was given against you; the indictment itself was read, the Overt-acts was the meeting, propounding, and consulting about it. It appears he was in the chamber about the Charge, that he did propound it, he delivered the Charge, and it appears withal, that he demanded judgment, he desired the king might answer, or that it might be taken pro confesso. These are Overt-acts to declare the imagination of his heart. The answer of Mr. Cook I will repeat it as clearly as I can, because nothing shall go to the extenuating of the fact but it shall be spoken. Mr. Cook, in your answer, your defence that you make, you set forth the heads of this Indictment, and you set them forth very truly; the heads are the aggravations of the Indictment, the Indictment was the compassing and imagining the death of the king; it said it was upon these grounds, that you did propound, abet, and consult the death of the king; that you with others did assume power and authority to kill the king, and that thereupon a person unknown in a frock did accordingly kill the king. You say to the first part, if it did not appear that you did advise the death of the king, that you were not guilty: For that, Sir, as I told you before, taking them either complexly or singly, if any of the particulars reached to one of these acts it was enough, but it reaches to all: You required judgment against the king as a traitor, and that with a reason, and certainly death must follow: You say you were appointed to give your advice; you had a Proclamation first for Trial of the king; you had the Order of January 10, whereby you were appointed to give your advice; if it were so, it will be no excuse at all; the proclamation gives you no warrant at all; he that obeys so wicked a proclamation it will not save him; it appears you were privy to this before the proclamation; if you were not at all, when such a thing as this is, such a proclamation and act, and such a manner of trial, as I believe, though you have read very much, you never heard of such a thing in our law, or foreign nations, that you thereupon should take upon you to be of counsel against the king, it aggra-vates the fact : other men may be impudent and ignorant, but you that were a learned lawyer, your being of counsel doth aggravate the thing. You say, secondly, By law, words will not amount to treason ; for that, I would not have that go for law by no means, though it be not your case ; for you are not indicted for words, but words are treason, and indictments are often for it ; but the difference is this, the Indictment is not for words, but compassing and imagining the death of the king ; words are evidence of the compassing and imagining the king's death ; it is the greatest evidence of the imagination of the heart ; words do not make a treason, that is, if it be by inference or consequence, but reductively ; but if it be immediately, I shall say to a man, Go kill the king, by that which is an absolute, immediate necessary consequence, to say this is no treason, I would not have that go for law ; your case is not for words, but for delivering a Charge, the ground that you speak of ; words may make a heretic, but not a traitor ; it was a witty saying, but you have no sufficient authority for it ; these are words put in writing ; we all know, if a man put his words in writing, if a man speak treasonable words, and put them in writing, they have been several times adjudged treason ; and so in my lord Coke's 3 Institutes, the Case of Williams of the Temple ;* there was a book of treason in his own study of his making, and he was indicted for it ; words put in writing is an express evidence of the imagination of the heart ; you say it was dictated to you, but when words are written in a Charge, and your name to it (which I had almost forgotten), that is more than words ; the witnesses swear the likeness of your hand ; they do but swear the likeness of your hand ; no man can swear more, unless he was present and saw it ; but you owned the charge, and there your name is ; that besides the two witnesses, there is your own actions to prove it. When two witnesses shall swear it is like your hand, and you own that charge, I must leave it to the jury : you say you did this after command, the words are dictated to you ; the words were conceptis verbis, appointed and ordered by the Court, but the pressing was yours ; he stands upon delays, let it be taken pro confesso, demanding judgment ; these were your words ; another man may dictate a thing, but you are not forced to speak it ; you urged it, owned it ; you demanded not in the name of the Court, but in the name of all the people of England ; you say further, that your demanding justice is not within the statute ; as I said before, what can be the effect of demanding justice, but that the king should die upon those premises ? You say farther that it was in behoof of the king, as you would urge it ; to do the king a courtesy, in asking the king might have justice ; but you did not name what justice it was ; but you did him a courtesy ; truly the king was but a little beholden to you for that request ; all the world knows what that demanding of justice was, it was to have the king's head cut off ; you went as far as you could ; it ended with you when you demanded justice ; that is, as far as you could, you cut off the head. St. Paul, when the Witnesses laid down the cloths at his feet, he said, ' I killed Stephen the ' Martyr.' You say further, that in all tragedies, the accuser or witness, the jury, the judge, and executioner, are the only persons ; and you are none of these ; you are only of counsel ; if justice was not done, what was it to you ? You said you did not assume a power, there was only eloquence required in the counsel ; it hath been truly said, that this is a great aggravation to be of counsel against the king ; you said his majesty was then a prisoner and accused ; counsel cannot be heard against the king ; you undertake to be counsel against the king in his own person, and in the highest crime ; if the counsel at the bar in behalf of his client should speak treason, he went beyond his sphere ; but you did not only speak (but acted) treason ; you said you used not a disrespectful word to the king ; truly, for that you hear what the witnesses have said ; you pressed upon him ; you called it a delay ; you termed him not the king, but the prisoner at the bar, at every word ; you say you did not assume an authority ; it is an assumption of authority, if you countenance or allow of their authority ; you say you do not remember you demanded judgment against the king ; that is fully proved against you ; you yourself asked the question ; whether you did say ' against the king ' he did not remember ; but others positively, that you demanded judgment against the king and prisoner at the bar ; you said, that before sentence there was not an intention to put the king to death ; to that Mr. Starkey swears that you expressly said, ' the king must die, and monarchy with him,' and this before the sentence : whereas you say this is but one witness, that there is to be in treason two witnesses ; but that there should be two witnesses to every particular that is an evidence of the fact, that is not law ; if to one particular that is an evidence there be one witness, another to another, here are two witnesses within the meaning of the statute ;* two witnesses to the indictment, compassing and imagining the death of the king ; being accompanied with other circumstances, this one witness, if you believe him, is as good as twenty witnesses, because other overt-acts are expressly proved by several witnesses. You say next, for the drawing of the charge, in right reason, it ought to be counted for the service of the king: first you do acknowledge, and truly very ingenuously, that in the time of peace to bring him to the bar, not being a prisoner, is treason (you say it) according to the law, and that you delivered the charge for the accelerating of the trial; and that it was not done by you traitorously; you say the king was a prisoner before; and you say what hands he was in, in the hands of men of power and violence; it had been your duty to have delayed it, not accelerated it, that there might have been some means of prevention of that bloody act that followed; if you knew that to be treason to make him a prisoner, subjects do not use to make kings prisoners, but death follows. You urge in the next place the Act of Indemnity, and that you are not excepted; for that you have made as much of it as the matter will bear; yet you must consider, first, as a rule in law, that where they are general words, when they come to be explained by the particulars, you shall not include them within the general: mark the very words, they are these: 'Provided that this act, nor any thing therein contained, shall extend to pardon, discharge, or give any other benefits whatsoever unto such and such,' (among whom you are named), 'nor any of them, nor those two persons, or either of them, who being disguised by frocks and vizards, did appear upon the scaffold erected before Whitehall, upon the 30th of Jan. 1649. All which persons' [these are the words]. 'First,' It shall not extend to you; then it comes, 'All which persons for their execrable treason in sentencing to death, or signing the instrument for the horrid murder, or being instrumental in taking away the precious life of our late sovereign lord Charles the first of glorious memory, are left to be proceeded against as traitors to his late majesty, according to the laws of England and are out of this present act wholly excepted and foreprized.' First, as I told you before, and as it was very well said by Master Solicitor, admitting the reason had been mistaken, and that you had not been comprehended in the reason, you are excepted out of the body, 'Provided it shall not extend,' &c. Many times laws do make recitals, which in themselves are sometimes false in point of fact; that which is the law is positive words, the other words are for the reason; 'excepting all which,' that is, master Cook, which person is excepted, not for doing of it, but for his execrable crimes in being instrumental. It is clear without that, if it were not so; we say when a sentence is, or such a one, or such a one, the third, 'or' makes all disjunctive: here are three 'ors,' first in sentencing to death, or signing the instrument, then comes this, 'or being instrumental in taking away the precious life of our late sovereign, &c.' This 'or' doth clearly exclude the other two; 'or instrumental' not only in point of death, but farther, 'being 'either sentencer, signer, or being instrumental in taking away the king's life:' that is being any way instrumental. Truly, whether it be not instrumental to exhibit a charge against him, or complain of his delays; to ask justice against him in the name of the people, to do all this, and desire that the charge might be taken pro confesso, if this be not instrumental, I know nothing else but sentencing and signing: some signed the Sentence, some the instrument for death: the next degree of being instrumental, the highest degree of that, is to accuse him, to deliver in the charge against him in the name of the people; do it again and again, be angry at the delays. The next thing is this, that you did not do this falso or malitiose, but for your fee; and that though there might be avaritia, there was not malitia in it; it was done by your profession, you were not magisterial in it; you thought the consequences that did follow, would not follow. If a man does but intend to heat a man, and he die upon it, you know in law it is all one: you must understand there is a malice in the law; if a man bent one in the streets, and kill him, though not maliciously in him, yet it is so in law. That you desire to have the benefit of the king's Declaration; that you did put in your petition proving the same; that you were a prisoner before; that the commons in behalf of themselves and the people of England they craved the benefit of it, which was granted, excepting such as should be by parliament excepted; and that the king should mention a free parliament; for this, it hath been fully answered to you, and clearly, by Mr. Solicitor, that you are not at all concerned in the king's Declaration at Breda. For first, it is nothing in law, it binds in honour; and we have given the same directions yesterday upon the like occasion, that is, that the king's Declaration binds him in honour and in conscience, but it does not bind him in point of law, unless there were a pardon granted by the broad seal; the thing is cleared to you what parliament the king meant by it; they were sitting at that time, had acknowledged their duty and allegiance to their king; they went ad ultimum potentiae for a free and absolute parliament, whilst the king was absent, though the king was away; yet notwithstanding the king declared whom he meant; he directed one of those Declarations to our Speaker of the House of Commons, and another to the Speaker of our Peers: In this case it was loquendum ut vulgus; it was owned by him as having the name of a parliament; it was done with great wisdom and prudence, and so as it could be no otherwise; that they were loyal subjects, acting in the king's absence; he consenting to it; the king owning that authority; so he was obliged in honour no further than his own meaning and words; but there is another clause in the act which excludes all these persons. The next thing is this, you say the statute of 25 Edw. 3, and it is very true, you say if it be any semblable treason, we were not to judge upon that, unless they were the treasons in the act; and it is most true; now you would urge but this, that this is but a semblable treason; but you are indicted for the compassing and imagining the death of the king: If these acts did not tend to the compassing and imagining the king's death, I know not what does; I am satisfied you are convicted in your conscience. The next thing (for you have said as much as any man can in such a cause, it is pity you have not a better), you say, though it was a tyrannical court, as it is called, but such a court it was, and there were officers you say, it had figuram judicii; that aggravates the act to you, to your profession. There is a difference between a standing court, and that which is but named to be a court; this was but one of a day or two's growth before, and you know by whom; by some that pretended to be only the commons; your knowledge can tell you, that there was never an act made by the commons assembled in parliament alone; and you may find it in my lord Cokè, that an act by the Lords and Commons alone was naught, as appeared by the Records; sir James Ormond was attainted of treason; the act was a private act, by the king and commons alone; the lords were forgot; when the Judges came to try it, it was void; and another in Henry the 6th's time; you know this was no court at all; you know by a printed authority, that where a settled court, a true court is, if that court meddle with that which is not in their cognizance, it is purely void; the minister that obeys them is punishable; if it be treasonable matter, it is treason; if murder, it is murder: So in the Case of Marshalsea, and in the Common Pleas, if a man shall begin an appeal of death which is of a criminal nature, and ought to be in the King's Bench, if they proceed in it, it is void; if this court should condemn the party convicted, and he be executed, it is murder in the Executioner; the court had no power over such things. You speak of a court: 1. It was not a court: 2. No court whatsoever could have any power over a king in a coercive way, as to his person. The last thing that you have said for yourself is this, that admitting there was nothing to be construed of an Act or an Order, yet there was a difference; it was an act de facto, that you urged rightly upon the statute of 11 Hen. 7, which was denied to some, God forbid it should be denied you; if a man serve the king in the war, he shall not be punished, let the fact be what it will. King Henry the 7th took care for him that was king de facto, that his subjects might be encouraged to follow him, to preserve him, whatever the event of the king was: Mr. Cook, you say, to have the equity of that act, that here was an authority de facto; these persons had gotten the supreme power, and therefore what you did under them you do desire the equity of that act; for that clearly the intent and meaning of that act is against you; it was to preserve the king de facto, how much more to preserve the king de jure; he was owned by these men, and you, as king; you charged him as king, and he was sentenced as king. That that king Henry the 7th did was to take care of the king de facto against the king de jure; it was for a king and kingly government, it was not for an antimonarchical government; you proceeded against your own king, and as your king, called him in your Charge, "Charles Stuart King of England." I think there is no colour you should have any benefit of the letter, or of the equity of the act. They had not all the authority at that time, they were a few of the people that did it, they had some part of the army with them; the lords were not dissolved then, when they had adjourned some time, they did sit afterwards, so that all the particulars you alledge are against you. The last thing was this, You say, that it having pleased God to restore the king, judgment should be given for example for terror to others that this could not be drawn into example again; why? Because by the blessing of God peace was restored; no probability that if your life was spared, that it would be drawn again into example; this is the weakest thing you have urged; you must know the reason: There are two things, there is the punishment, and example; punishment goes to the prisoner, but example to the documents of all others; God knows what such things may be in after-ages, if there should be impunity for them; it would rather make men impudent and confident afterwards. If you have any more to say I will hear you, if not, I must conclude to the Jury: You hear the Evidence is clear for compassing and imagining the death of the king; you have heard what he has said, and what he hath done; he was within, and examined Witnesses against the King, that he was by at the drawing of the Charge where it was drawn; you hear he exhibited this Charge in the name of the commons assembled in parliament, and the good people of England, and what this Charge is; it is High Treason, and other high misdemeanors; you find that he does complain of delays does again and again speak of this Charge, desire it may be taken pro confesso; in the close of all, it was not so much he as innocent blood that demanded justice: this was more than was dictated to him. You have heard the witnesses; he was persuaded to forbear; acknowledged the king to be a gracious and wise king; the oaths alledged against him, and you have heard his excuse; I have nothing more to say; I shall be very willing to hear you further; I have not absolutely directed the Jury.

Cook. I do humbly acknowledge your patience in hearing me, and that your lordships have truly and justly stated both proofs and my answer. If your lordships are pleased to lay aside these acts, or orders, or authority, whereby I did at that time truly conscientiously act, and did think that it would bear me out; if you lay aside that, and look upon it as so many men got together without authority, and as well those that were instrumental, though not sentencers or signers, and that clause in the act, I confess I humbly make bold to say, I have not received satisfaction in my judgment; those very words of 'not so much I as the innocent blood cries for justice,' were dictated to me; there was nothing at all left to me, because his majesty did not plead; there was no trial; that which I did was according to the best, though it may be according to the weakest part of my judgment: I have no new matter.

L. C. Baron. You have said no new matter, unless it be worse than before, for now you warrant that authority.

Cook. Do not mistake me, my lord, I mean so far as to excuse me in the point of High-Treason.

L. C. Baron. We delivered our opinions as to that formerly; we were of opinion, that the acting by colour of that pretended authority was so far from any extenuation, that it was an aggravation of the thing: the meeting by that authority was treason, and in them that acted under them, and approving of it; the making of that traitorous pretended Act, making the Proclamation, sitting upon it, they were all so many treasons; that was the reason why that was urged against you, assuming upon you the power, that was, you approving of their power by acting under them, so that there is nothing more to be said.

Gentlemen of the Jury, You have heard the Indictment was for compassing and imagining the death of the king; you have heard the several Overt-Acts repeated, and whether these are guilty of treason to deliver in a Charge against the king, such a one as that was in these words, as against a Traitor, Tyrant, Murderer, and implacable Enemy to the Commonwealth; in these very words to desire Judgment against the prisoner (then the king) at the bar, angry at delays, to desire that the Charge might be taken pro confesso, to have it expressly, again and again to demand Judgment; if these be not Overt-Acts of compassing and imagining the death of the king, and that which hath been said by the witnesses, it must be left to you: I think you need not go from the bar.

Jury went together.

Silence is commanded.

Clerk. Are you agreed in your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall speak for you?

Jury. The foreman.

Clerk. John Cook, Hold up thy hand. Look upon the prisoner at the bar. How say you, is he guilty of the treason in manner and form as he stands Indicted? Or Not Guilty?

Fore-man. Guilty.

Clerk. Look to him, Keeper.

Clerk. What goods and chattels?

Jury. None that we know of.*

TRIAL OF HUGH PETERS.*

October 13, at the same bar.

Clerk of the Crown. Set Hugh Peters to the bar: Which was done accordingly.

* Peters, whom Hume calls "the mad chaplain of Cromwell," seems to have been a man of indefatigable zeal, activity, and restlessness. Besides the accounts of his preachings, we read in Whitelocke not only of his sending the first advices of important events, but also of his occasionally himself bringing such intelligence to the Parliament. We find him also sent to treat with the king's adherents, and conferring with the king (Jan. 20th 1648-9) just before his Trial. After the king's death, we find his arrival at Dublin recorded, on which occasion it is mentioned, that at the beginning of the troubles in Ireland, he had a brigade against the Rebels, and came off with honour and victory, and the like was now expected from him. And, accordingly, ten days afterwards the following dispatch is received from him:

"Sir; The truth is, Drogheda is taken, 3,552 of the enemy slain, and 64 of ours. Col. Castles and C. Symonds of note. Ashton the governor killed, none spared, we have all Trym and Dundalk, and are marching to Kilkeenny. I came now from giving thanks in the great Church. We have all our army well landed.

I am, Yours,

Dublin Sept. 15th, [1649.] HUGH PETERS."

In March following, we find him at Milford Haven; "the country whereabout did unanimously take the Engagement: Mr. Peters opening the matter to them and much encouraging them to take it." It is not at all surprising that this man should be rewarded by his masters for "his unwearied services." Whitelocke's Memor. 157. Neither is it matter of surprise, on the other hand, that a man who so boldly meddled with every thing within his reach, should occasionally handle what he was not competent to manage. Whitelocke, after mentioning the Committee for Reformation of the Law, says, he "was often advised with by some of this Committee, and none of them was more active in this business than Mr. Hugh Peters the minister, who understood little of the law, but was very opinionative and would frequently mention some proceedings of law in Holland, wherein he was altogether mistaken." (Memorials, p. 497, Jan. 31st 1650.)

"The charge against Mr. Hugh Peters was, for compassing and imagining the death of the king, by conspiring with Oliver Cromwell at several times and places, and procuring the soldiers to demand justice; by preaching divers sermons, to persuade the soldiery to take off the king; comparing him to Barabbas and applying part of a psalm where it is said, 'they shall bind their kings in chains,' &c. to the proceedings against him; assuring them, that if they would look into their Bibles, they should find there, 'That whoever sheddeth man's Clerk. Hugh Peters, Hold up thy hand; thou standest indicted, &c. If you will challenge any of the Jury, you must challenge them when they come to the book, before they are sworn.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Peters, you may challenge to the number of 35 peremptorily, but beyond that you cannot, without good cause shewn; and you may have pen, ink, and paper.

Peters. My lord, I shall challenge none.

'blood, by man shall his blood be shed;' and that neither the king nor any other person are excepted from this general rule. He was also accused of saying, that the Levites, Lords and Lawyers, must be taken away, in order to establish a Commonwealth; that the king was a tyrant, and that the office itself was chargeable, useless, and dangerous. These, with other things of like nature, being sworn against him, Mr. Peters said in his defence, That the war began before he came into England; that, since his arrival, he had endeavoured to promote sound religion, the reformation of learning and the law, and employment of the poor; that, for the better effecting these things, he had espoused the interests of the parliament, in which he had acted without malice, avarice, or ambition; and that, whatever prejudices or passions might possess the minds of men, yet there was a God who knew these things to be true. It was not expected that any thing he could say should save him from the revenge of the court; and therefore he was without hesitation brought in guilty. This person had been a minister in England for many years, till he was forced to leave his native country, by the persecution set on foot, in the time of Abp. Laud, against all those who refused to comply with the innovations and superstitions which were then introduced into the public worship. He went first into Holland, and from thence to New-England; where, after some stay, being informed that the parliament had relieved the people in some measure from the abuses in church and state, and designed to perfect that work, he returned to England; and in all places, and on all occasions, encouraged the people to appear vigorously for them. Having passed some time in England, he was made chaplain to a brigade that was sent against the Irish rebels; and observing the condition of the plundered Protestants in that country to deserve compassion, he went into Holland, and improved the interest he had there with so good success, that he procured about 30,000*l.* to be sent from thence into Ireland for their relief. He was a diligent and earnest solicitor for the distressed Protestants of the vallies of Piedmont, who had been most inhumanly persecuted, and reduced to the utmost extremities, by the tyranny of the Duke of Savoy; and in gratitude to the Hollanders for the sanctuary he had found among them in the time of his distress, he was not a little serviceable to them in composing their differences with England in the time of Cromwel." 3 Ludlow 60.

Jury sworn 12, Sir Jer. Which, James Hally, Christ. Abdy, Nich. Rainton, Rich. Cheney, Jo. Smith, Rich. Abol, G. Terry, Char. Pickern, Jo. Nichol, Fran. Dorrington, Anthony Hall.

Clerk. Hugh Peters, Hold up thy hand. Look on the prisoner, you that are sworn, &c.

Sir Edward Turner to the Jury. You have often heard repeated to you, that the substantial part of the Charge is the compassing and imagining the death of the king, and all the rest will be but evidence to prove that imagination against the prisoner at the bar, whom we will prove to be a principal actor in this sad tragedy, and next to him whom God hath taken away, and reserved to his own judgment; and we shall endeavour to prove, that he was a chief conspirator with Cromwell at several times, and in several places; and that it was designed by them: We shall prove that he was the principal person to procure the soldiery to cry out, Justice, Justice, or assist or desire those for the taking away the life of the king. He did make use of his profession, wherein he should have been the minister of peace, to make himself a trumpet of war, of treason and sedition, in the kingdom: He preached many sermons to the soldiery, in direct terms for taking away the king, comparing the king to Barabbas: He was instrumental when the Proclamation for the High Court of Justice (as they called it) was proclaimed, directing where it should be proclaimed, and in what place. When the king was brought upon the stage, that mock work, he was the person that stirred up the soldiery below to cry for Justice; we shall shew you as he preached at several times upon several occasions, still he was in the pulpit to promote this business; the next day after he was brought to trial he commends it; you shall hear all out of the mouth of the prisoner, therefore I say no more; call the witnesses.

Dr. William Young sworn.

Counsel. Tell my lords and jury what the prisoner at the bar has declared to you concerning the contrivance of bringing the king to trial.

Dr. Young. My lords, and gentlemen of the jury, it was near about (and that the prisoner may remember) the month of July, 1648, since we came first acquainted, when he went over to Ireland; it was about the siege of Pembroke Castle; but afterwards in the year 1649, we renewed our acquaintance; he went over into Ireland with that usurper, the late Protector, as he was called, after the town of Wexford was taken; coming over he fell sick of the flux, and said he received it by infection, praying over Captain Horton: Coming into Milford, that captain sends a summons to me to come on board, that was to fetch this prisoner at the bar, who was sick. I found him there grovelling upon the deck, and sick he was indeed; with much difficulty we got him on shore; within a very few days, to the best of my remembrance five days, I perfected his cure: we became very familiar; I observed in him that he had some secret thoughts that I could not well discover, neither well understand; whereupon I thought it might tend to my security that I should so much sympathize with him, to get within him to know his intentions. After some weeks, (for he continued with me ten weeks, or near thereabouts, some few days rather over than under,) we grew so familiar, that at last I found he began to enlarge his heart to me. Many times I should hear him rail most insufferably against the blood royal, not only against our martyred king, but against his offspring; still as we continued our acquaintance, he became more and more open to me; so we would sit up discoursing till about twelve or one of the clock at night very often, about these unhappy wars late in England. At last, my lord, I found him that he began to tell me how he came into England, and upon what account he came out of New-England. I shall desire that in regard his discourses were various, that I may deliver them orderly; they were delivered to me within the compass of ten weeks; but the days and weeks I cannot remember. First, he told me, (discoursing of New-England and the Clergy there, and much of the Clergy here in England, and of the business here of Reformation,) he told me, that for the driving on of this interest of this Reformation, he was employed out of New-England for the stirring up of this war, and driving of it on; this I shall, my lord, speak to in the first place, and that upon the oath I have taken: And, secondly, he was pleased at another time to acquaint me, and that by way of compliment, complaining then against the parliament, saying, that some time after he was come into England he was sent over into Ireland by the parliament to receive further instructions to drive on the design, to extirpate monarchy; saith he, I did dispend a great deal of my own money, yet never had that satisfaction from them which they promised me; that was, they promised 2 or 3,000*l.* for my journey, and yet they have given me no more but only a small pittance of land out of my lord of Worcester's estate in Worcestershire. I have seen his letters directed to his kinsman here in London; as I take it his name was Parker, advising him for the settling of his land, and selling it. Thirdly, my lord, I have observed, that by way of vilification of the monarchical government, I have found him jocundly scoffing at it, and would ordinarily quibble in this manner, saying, 'this Commonwealth will never be at peace 'till 150 be put down.' I asked him what this 150 was, he told me three L's, and afterwards interpreted the meaning to be the Lords, the Levites, and the Lawyers: with that, said I, we shall be like Switzers, Tinkers, and Traitors. Now, my lord, we are come to the last particular; we discoursing thus frequently, and withal he was then a colonel, and had a commission under that usurper Oliver, and brought over his commission for raising of soldiers to foment that war in Ireland; that it was so I appeal to the dictates of his own conscience, and whether he did not press me very importunately to accept of a commission of major, or a captain; he did issue forth two commissions under his own hand, one of them to bring over from Devonshire two foot companies unto Cork. My lord, because we were militarily affected, amongst the discourses of our unhappy wars, I know not how it came from him, it being near eleven years since, and I have had many sufferings incumbent on me, so that I may fail in some particulars, but in general thus it was: We were discoursing concerning our martyred king, as then we called him, and of his imprisonment in Holmeby-House, which I wondered at; thus we discoursed; he told me the story how they had used him at Holmeby; and at last came up to this, when he was taken away from Holmeby-House,* the parliament had then a design to have secured Oliver Cromwell, and myself, being then in London; saith he, we having intelligence of it, escaped out of London, and rode hard for it, and as we rode to Ware we made a halt, and advised how we should settle this kingdom in peace, and dispose of the king; the result was this, They should bring him to justice, try him for his life, and cut off his head: whether this was the expression of Cromwell I cannot tell; but to the utmost of my remembrance, and I am mistaken if it was not the advice of Mr. Peters to Cromwell; and I believe it, because his former relations of his instructions out of Ireland did tend to that effect.

Mr. Sol. Gen. I will ask you this question; we will not press you particularly upon your memory, whether Cromwell or Peters said the words? Do you remember he confessed to you they were agreed upon that matter?

Young. They did consult and agree upon it.

Peters. My lord, I desire to speak a word, [his voice being low, he was brought to the second bar]. I am the bolder to speak to your lordships at this time a word, and it is high time to satisfy my conscience; if these things were true, there is enough said to destroy me; I desire leave to tell you what offence I take at the witness, thus, my lord. This gentleman I do know—

Counsel. What say you to him?

Peters. That which I have to say is this, that

* It appears from Whitelock, that shortly after king Charles the First was removed by Joyce from Holmeby to Newmarket, 'Mr. Peters went to the king to Newmarket, and had much discourse with him.' Rushworth says, 'Mr. Peters was at Newmarket, and had much discourse with his majesty. His majesty told Mr. Peters, that he had often heard talk of him, but did not believe he had that solidity in him he found by his discourse; that he would have further conference with him another time. Mr. Peters moved his majesty to hear him preach, but his majesty refused.' Whitelocke's Mem. 257. 6 Rushw. Coll. 578.

in his story he hath told that which is not true; but I will not find fault with him, because he was my host, I will not reflect and recriminate: I shall give your lordships in simplicity as much satisfaction myself as any witness; this I say to the man that speaks, and this is certain, I did spend some time at this gentleman's house, he is called there Dr. Young; and my trouble at this discourse is this, I do not know, my lord, that I found a more violent man for the parliament than himself; so far he undertook to be a spy on one side; this I find to be so, he will not deny it; he was very fierce in that way; I think words of such a man ought to be little attended to. The second is this, this gentleman is not a competent witness, and that upon a twofold ground. First, because I know he is under a very great temptation and trouble in this very thing, and it is upon this account he was put out of his living in the country, and here he came to me to help him in again, and was very highly offended because I did not do it. Secondly, it is not that I would invalidate his witness, but give me leave to tell you, it is his way to snap and catch at every man, which is the complaint of the people in his own country. I know that same which is spoken is false; I speak it in the presence of God, I profess, I never had any near converse with Oliver Cromwell about such things; I speak this to the jury, that they would have a care of the witness; I was in sickness then; those that have known me do know likewise that I have much weakness in my head when I am sick, and to take words that are spoken in a sick condition, he ought not to do it; for the words themselves I do here profess against them, for the generality of them; and that he hath been freer in my judgment in any communication in this way than I have been; it is marvellous, here I profess the things untruths, I call God and angels to witness they are not true. I will give you an account of my whole condition by and by, if I may be heard.

Court. You shall be heard at large; that which you have been heard now is concerning the competency or incompetency of the witness: the incompetency against him is this, that when you came thither none more violent for the parliament than himself, and that he was a great spy; and you say it was usual with him to take such courses: these are but words; if you have any witnesses we will hear them; the man may be traduced and slandered, and so all witnesses may be taken away.—Mr. Peters, if you take this course, God knows when this business will end; if you have a mind, take pen, ink, and paper, and take notes of the witnesses, and make exceptions to them one after another; but interrupting one, and so another, we shall never have done.

Young. I do recollect myself of some other conferences between us; as to my being malicious, I know he never did me any wrong, and therefore I cannot be malicious; and as for my reputation, having resided two years in London, I can have certificates both from my country, and some of this city, to vindicate me in that particular: But, my lord, that which I would inform your lordship is this, he told me he took duke Hamilton a prisoner himself in his own chamber; seized on his goods, and took his George and blue ribbon off his shoulder, and the George he shewed me.

Wybert Gunter sworn.

Counsel. Mr. Gunter, what can you say concerning a meeting and consultation at the Star in Coleman-street?

Gunter. My lord, I was a servant at the Star in Coleman-street, with one Mr. Hildesley; that house was a house where Oliver Cromwell and several of that party did use to meet in consultation; they had several meetings; I do remember very well one among the rest, in particular that Mr. Peters was there; he came in the afternoon about four o'clock, and was there till ten or eleven at night; I being but a drawer could not hear much of their discourse; but the subject was tending towards the king, after he was a prisoner, for they called him by the name of Charles Stuart; I heard not much of the discourse; they were writing, but what I know not; but I guessed it to be something drawn up against the king; I perceived that Mr. Peters was privy to it, and pleasant in the company.

Court. How old were you at that time?

Gunter. I am now thirty years the last Bartholomew-Day, and this was in 1648.

Court. How long before the king was put to death?

Gunter. A good while; it was suddenly, as I remember, three days before Oliver Cromwell went out of town.

Peters. I was never there but once with Mr. Nathaniel Fines.

Counsel. Was Cromwell there?

Gunter. Yes.

Counsel. Was Mr. Peters there any oftener than once?

Gunter. I know not, but once I am certain of it; this is the gentleman; for then he wore a great sword.

Peters. I never wore a great sword in my life.

Mr. Starkey sworn.

Starkey. My lords, in the month of December, before the king died, in the beginning of that month, and so towards the 12th of January following, the head-quarters of the army were at Windsor, and Mr. Ireton, that is dead, (who was a general officer of the army) was quartered in my father's house there, and by reason of his long residence there, being about two months, I knew him very well. My lords, this gentleman Mr. Peters, he likewise quartered in another place in that town, and Cromwell himself was quartered at one Mr. Baker's that lay low in the town; so that in truth my father's house being near the Castle, and there being in it a large room, and in respect that Mr. Ireton was quartered there, usually the Council of War sat there. My lords, I was then in the house constantly: Besides this Council of War, which did commonly sit there, I did observe that Cromwell, Ireton, and this gentleman Mr. Peters, and one col. Rich, and a fifth person, whose name I have forgot, did usually meet and consult together, and would sit up till two or three o'clock in the morning very privately together: this was their usual course when their Council of War sat; Mr. Ireton came in to supper, but went out again; there were guards upon them: After this time it happened that I was often in Mr. Ireton's company, where Mr. Peters coming to him, was very often at meals there, but especially at nights. Mr. Ireton being civil in carriage; would usually entertain discourses with Mr. Peters, likewise would favour me sometimes with discourse; and in that discourse I did many times take occasion to assert the laws in point of the king; and discoursing about the king as being a capital instrument in the late inconveniences, as they called it, in the times of the war, Mr. Ireton would discourse this ordinarily; I was bold to tell them that the person of the king was solutus legibus; this gentleman the prisoner at the bar, told me it was an unequal law. I did observe Mr. Peters did bend his discourse, not by way of argument only, but in point of resolution of judgment, fully against the person and government of the king. I remember some of his expressions were these, That he was a tyrant, that he was a fool, that he was not fit to be a king, or bear that office; I have heard him say, that for the office itself, (in those very words which shortly after came into print,) that it was a dangerous, chargeable, and useless office. My lords, the constant discourse of this gentleman at that time was such as he did believe would never be called into question, so it was not a thing that a man was necessitated to observe by an accident, but it was their whole discourse. I will put you in mind of a particular passage: When the news came to Windsor that the king was in prison at the Isle of Wight, my father, (whose house that was) was very much troubled at it; and being an ancient man, was not able to controul his passions with reason, told my mother that they (meaning Mr. Ireton, &c.) should have no entertainment there, and took the key of the cellar and put it in his pocket; his passions being lessened, Mr. Ireton, his wife, and another officer being at supper, and afterwards my father said grace, and, as he usually did, though they were there, he said that usual and honest expression, praying for the king in these usual words, 'God save the king, prince, and realm;' sometimes they did laugh at it, but never did reflect upon him; but this night he made this expression, 'God save the king's most excellent majesty, and preserve him out of the hands of all his enemies.' Peters, who was then at the table, turns about to him, and said, 'Old gentleman, your idol will not stand long;' I do conceive he meant it of the king. For a matter of two months of the constant residence and being of the army there, I did observe that in the General Council there, and in this private cabal, (after the business was broke out, and when the king was taken prisoner, and carried to Windsor), Mr. Peters was the constant man; and when the business broke out, I looked upon it in reason that Cromwell, Ireton, and this gentleman at the bar, and Rich, and that other gentleman, whose name I have forgot, that they were the persons that did the business. My lords, Mr. Peters he continued at Windsor: I remember very well that after the body of the army, the general, and the officers of the army, were gone to London, he continued in Windsor: I remember a passage of one Bacon, who was a sectary; Mr. Peters being in discourse of the king, Mr. Bacon took great distaste at Mr. Peters for some affront put upon the king; Mr. Peters falls upon him, and rails at him, and was ready to beat him; we understood it so, because he did tell him of his affronting the king.

Counsel. Mr. Peters, if you have any thing to ask this witness, you may.

Peters. I have many things to ask him. Did I ever lie there?

Starkey. No.

Peters. Did you see me there at 3 o'clock in the morning?

Starkey. I have seen you go up at ten o'clock at night to Mr. Ireton's chamber, and sometimes I understood you did not go away till four o'clock in the morning; I went to bed it is true, but I understood it so.

Thomas Walkely sworn.

Counsel. Give your testimony what consultation you have had with the prisoner at the bar.

Walkely. I came out of Essex in at Aldgate; just as I came in a Proclamation was read for trial of his late majesty; I went down the next day to the Painted Chamber at Westminster, where I saw Oliver Cromwell, John Goodwin, and Peters, and others; John Goodwin sat in the middle of the table, and he made a long speech or prayer, I know not whether, but Mr. Peters stood there: After John Goodwin had done his prayer, it was desired that strangers might avoid the room; then came up Cook, and Dorislaus, and Humphryes, and Ask, and Dendy, and several others, and stood by Bradshaw at the upper end of the table; but Cromwell stood up and told them it was not necessary that the people should go out; but that was over-ruled: and so I went out and staid their rising, and saw this gentleman Mr. Peters come out with them. After that, when the king was brought to town a prisoner, the lord Carew, a very honourable person, meeting with me, saith he, Walkeley, if you will ever see your old master, go now, or else it may be you will never see him. Where is he, my lord, said I? Saith he, he is coming on this side Brainford. I went to the farther end of St. James's Corner, and there I met some of the army coming, and then I saw his majesty in his coach with six horses, and Peters, like bishop almoner, riding before the king triumphing*; then, after that, in St. James's Park, I saw Peters marshalling the soldiers, and I was forced to go about. My lord, this is all I can say concerning that. I remember one thing further of him; I heard him in Westminster-Hall say, within a year or two after the army was raised, 'If we can keep up our army but seven years longer, we need not care for the king and all his posterity.'

* The following extract, inserted in Seward's "Anecdotes of Distinguished Persons," is made from a very curious little book, called, "England's Shame, or the Unmasking of a Politic Atheist, being a full and faithful relation of the life and death of that Grand Impostor, Hugh Peters, by William Young, M. D. [probably the Witness,] London, 1663, 12mo. Dedicated to her most excellent majesty Henrietta Maria, the mother queen of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland:"

"The soldiers were secretly admonished, by letters from Hugh Peters, to exercise the admired patience of king Charles, by upbraiding him to his face; and so it was; for having gotten him on board their boat to transport him to Westminster-Hall, they would not afford him a cushion to sit upon, nay, scarcely the company of his spaniel, but scoffed at him most vilely; as if to blaspheme the King were not to blaspheme God, who had established him to be his vicegerent, our supreme moderator, and a faithful Custos Duorum Tabularum Legum, Keeper of both Tables of the Law.

"The King being safely arrived at Whitehall, (that they might the easier reach the crown), they do with pious pretences, seconded with fear of declining, hoodwink their general Fairfax, to condescend to this bloody sacrifice. Whereas Oliver Cromwell and Ireton would appear only to be his admirers, and spectators of the regicide, by standing in a window at Whitehall, within view of the scaffold and the people; whilst Peters, fearing a tumult, dissembles himself sick at St. James's: conceiting that he might thereby plead Not Guilty, though no man was more forward than he to encourage col. Axtel in this action, and to animate his regiment to cry for Justice against the Traitor, for so they called the King.

"The resolve passed," adds Dr. Young, "that the King must be conveyed from Windsor Castle to Hampton Court, Harrison rides with him, and upbraids him to his face. Peters riding before him out of the castle, cries, We'll whisk him, we'll whisk him, now we have him. A pattern of loyalty, one formerly a captain for the King's interest, seizing Peters' bridle, says, Good Mr. Peters, what will you do with the King? I hope that you will do his person no harm. That Peters might be Peters, he replies, He shall die the death of a Traitor, were there never a man in England but he.

Mr. Proctor sworn.

Proct. I having occasion to go from London to Windsor the day that the king was brought from thence a prisoner, a little on this side Brainford I saw great troops of horse; I did conceive what the cause was, having heard the king was to be brought up to his trial; after I had passed some number of horses, at last I espied the prisoner at the bar immediately before the king's coach, singly riding before the coach-horses, and the king sitting alone in the coach. My lord, I did put off my hat, and he was graciously pleased to put off his hat; the troopers seeing this, they threw me into the ditch, horse and all, where I staid till they passed by, and was glad I escaped so.

Hardwick sworn.

Counsel. When the proclamation was read, in Westminster-hall for trial of the king, did you see Mr. Peters there?

Hardwick. I was in the hall when that ugly proclamation was proclaimed, where I saw Dendy, King, and that gentleman, the prisoner, at the bar, in the hall; after the proclamation was proclaimed, the prisoner at the bar came out into the Palace-Yard, and told them, 'Gentlemen,' saith he, (a great many officers and soldiers being there) 'all this is worth, nothing, unless you proclaim it in Cheapside, and at the Old Exchange.'

Counsel. Explain yourself, what proclamation do you mean?

Hardwick. The proclamation for the High-Court of Justice.

Holland Simpson sworn.

Counsel. What do you know concerning the prisoner at the bar?

Simpson. I do know Mr. Peters very well, I have known him these 11 or 12 years: when the High-Court of Justice was sitting, both in the Court and Painted Chamber, I saw this gentleman in consultation there, and at several other places, at sir Will. Brereton's and other where.

Counsel. Did you see him at the trial?

Simpson. I saw him, but not as a judge. There was one day in the hall colonel Stubbards, who was adjutant-general, (he was a very busy man,) and colonel Axtel; Mr. Peters going down the stairs, comes to him, and bids Stubbards to command the soldiers to cry out 'justice, justice, against the traitor at the bar.'

Counsel. Who did he mean?

Simpson. The king was at the bar at the same time; whereupon, my lord, the soldiers did cry out upon the same; and as the king was taken away to sir Robert Cotton's, some of them spit in the king's face, but he took his handkerchief, wiped it off, and smiled.

The Captain forced to loose his hold of the reins, by a blow given him over his hand with Peter's staff, this trumpeter of sorrow rides on singing his sad note, We'll whisk him, we'll whisk him, I warrant you, now we have him!"

Peters. I do not know this gentleman, did he ever see me?

Simpson. Yes, divers times in the Painted-Chamber, at sir William Brereton's at the deanery, in consultation with Bradshaw, and you were admitted, and no man else, as I know, unless sir Will. Brereton, who came along with you.

Thomas Richardson sworn.

Richardson. My lords, the first day that this Court of Justice (as they called it) did adjourn, I went up into the Court, and I saw the prisoner at the bar with some more standing in the Court, and I came and stood close by him, and some with him, whom I did not know; I heard him commend Bradshaw, the carriage of him in the trial of the king, and another Cook's carriage; to be short, Mr. Peters holding up his hands, said, 'This is a most glorious beginning of the work.'

Sir Jeremy Whichcot sworn.

Whichcot. My lords, I have by accident, not by choice, been several times in Mr. Peters's company; truly I have heard him speak very scurrilously of the king; amongst the rest he was making some kind of narration of Cromwell making an escape, and that he was intended to be surprized; that if he had not presently gone away he had been clapt up in the Tower, and declared a traitor; he said there was a meeting of the officers of the army, where he used this expression, 'And there we did resolve to set aside the king.' My lord, after this (it was at another time) he was speaking of that which they called the High Court of Justice, and I do very well remember this was his expression of it, 'I cannot but look upon this Court with a great reverence, for it doth resemble in some measure the trial that shall be at the end of the world by the Saints.' This is all that I perfectly remember; it was a great while ago; I cannot speak more punctually; I have seldom heard him speak of the king, but of the tyrant. I remember one time he was saying he would have preached before the king, but, said he, 'the poor wretch would not hear me.'

Richard Nunnely sworn.

Counsel. Was Peters upon the Scaffold at the time of execution, or before?

Nun. On that unhappy day, 30th of Jan. 1649, this Hugh Peters came an hour before the king came to Whitehall; I came with a warrant of 40 or 50,000*l.* to Oliver Cromwell, being door-keeper to the Committee of the Army; Nunnely, says Oliver Cromwell, will you go to Whitehall? Surely you will see the beheading of the king; and he let me into Whitehall; coming into the boarded gallery I met Hugh Peters, and he was in the gallery; and then I got with Hugh Peters into the Banqueting-House; being there, Hugh Peters met one Tench of Hounsitch, that was a joiner; meeting him; he speaks to him, and whispers in his ear, and told him somewhat, I do not know what it was; but Tench presently went and knocked four staples upon the scaffold; I meeting Tench again, What art thou doing, said I? What, will you turn hangman? Says he, This day will be a happy day. Said I, Pray God send it be not a bloody day; upon that Hugh Peters went upon the scaffold just an hour before the king came, and then he went off again. I watched at the window when the king's head was cut off, and afterwards I saw the vizards going into a chamber there; about an hour afterwards (I staying there at the door) there comes Hugh Peters in his black cloak and broad hat out of that chamber (as I take it) with the hangman; I am sure I did see him go along with the hangman to take water; this is all I can remember, it being many years since.

Peters. I humbly beg I may be heard in this case; I have here a witness, and I desire he may be examined; it is noised I was upon the scaffold, I here call God to witness I was not out of my chamber that day; I was sick that day; I speak in the presence of the Lord.

Court. If your witness will stay he shall be heard; there are more witnesses to the same thing, and so he may speak to all together.

Dr. Mortimer sworn.

Mortimer. Me lar, me ha serd de king, &c.

Court. We cannot understand a word.

Counsel. He is a Frenchman, my lord.

Court. Pray let there be an interpreter.

[One Mr. Young was sworn to interpret truly his evidence.] But it being afterwards found difficult and troublesome, the counsel waved his evidence, and prayed another witness might be called.]

Mortimer. Me Lar, me can peak Englis—

Counsel. No, no, pray sit down, we will examine other witnesses. Call Stephen Clough.

Stephen Clough sworn.

Counsel. What do you know of Hugh Peters?

Clough. My lords and gentlemen of the jury, in 1648 I heard of a meeting of the Council of officers at Westminster, I think in the Painted-Chamber, and I being willing (my lord) to hear what their consultations were, I went thither, and was there as one of them, (but I was not one,) amongst the rest Hugh Peters was one; when the room was pretty full the door was shut. Mr. Peters desired to call for a blessing upon their business, in his prayer he uttered these words, 'O Lord, (said he) what a mercy is it to see this great city fall down before us! And what a stir is there to bring this great man to trial, without whose blood he will turn us all into blood if he reign again!'

Peters. What day was this?

Clough. It was about three weeks or a month before the king died.

Peters. Where was this?

Clough. In the Painted Chamber.

Peters. You have been very bold.

Clough. I speak upon my oath.

Peters. How long was this ago?

Clough. In 1648.

Peters. How many years since is that?

Clough. You know yourself sure how many years since 1648.

Peters. How long before the king died, do you say?

Clough. About three weeks or a month before the king was murdered.

Counsel. We shall call a witness to prove, that in December 1648, there was a solemn fast appointed to seek God in what they were about, and Mr. Peters was appointed to preach before them.

Mr. Beaver sworn.

Beaver. My lord, and you gentlemen of the jury, upon a day that was appointed for a Fast for those that sat then as a parliament, I went to Westminster to find out some company to dine with me, and having walked about an hour in Westminster-hall, and finding none of my friends to dine with me, I went to that place called Heaven, and dined there; after I had dined I passed through St. Margaret's Church-yard to go home again, (I lay in the Strand,) I perceived all the church-yard full of muskets and pikes upon the ground, and asked some soldiers that were there what was the business. They told me they were guarding the parliament that were keeping a fast at St. Margaret's; who preaches? Said I. They told me Mr. Peters is just now gone up into the pulpit; said I, I must needs have the curiosity to hear that man, having heard many stories of the manner of his preaching; (God knows I did not do it out of any manner of devotion;) I crowded near the pulpit, and came near the Speaker's pew; and I saw a great many members there, whom I knew well: I could not guess what his text might be, but hearing him talk much of Barabbas and our Saviour, and insisting altogether upon that, I guessed his text was that passage wherein the Jews did desire the release of Barabbas and crucifying of Christ; and so it proved; the first thing I heard him say was, 'It was a very sad thing that this should be a question amongst us, as among the old Jews, whether our Saviour Jesus Christ must be crucified, or that Barabbas should be released, the oppressor of the people: O Jesus, Saith he, Where are we, that that should be a question amongst us?' Says he, 'And because that you should think, my lords and gentlemen, that it is a question, I tell you it is a question; I have been in the city, which may very well be compared to Hierusalem in this conjuncture of time, and I profess those foolish citizens for a little trading and profit they will have Christ' (pointing to the Redcoats on the pulpit-stairs) 'crucified, and the great Barabbas at Wipdsor released.' Says he, 'but I do not much heed what the rabble say: I hope,' says he, 'that my brethren of the clergy will be wiser, the lips of the priests do use to preserve knowledge; I have been with them too in the assembly, and having seen and heard what they said, I perceive they are for crucifying of Christ, and releasing of Barabbas; O Jesus, what shall we do now?' With such like strange expressions, and shrugging of his shoulders in the pulpit.

Counsel. How long was this before the king was murdered?

Beaver. It was a few days before the house of commons made that thing called an Act for his trial.

Counsel. What did he say to the members?

Beaver. I am coming to it; says he, 'My lords, and you noble gentlemen of the house of commons, you are the Sanhedrim, and the great council of the nation, therefore you must be sure to do justice, and it is from you we expect it: you must not only be inheritors of your ancestors, but you must do as they did; they have opposed tyrannical kings. they have destroyey them; it is you chiefly that we look for justice from. Do not prefer the great Barabbas, Murderer, Tyrant and Traitor, before these poor hearts,' [pointing to the red-coats,] 'and the army, who are our saviours:' and thus for two or three hours time, that he spent, he nothing but raked up all the reasons, arguments and examples he could, to persuade them to bring the king to condign, speedy and capital punishment.

Peters. I do not know you, are you sure you saw me at that time? Do you know me?

Beaver. Yes, sir.

Peters. I did not preach there at that time.

Counsel. Pray, my lord, will you call Mr. Jessop, who hath the records of the parliament, and can produce the Order, whereby you were appointed to carry on the work of that fast; there was the Order for his preaching, and Order of thanks for his work.

[Mr. Jessop produced the Journal, wherein was the Order following, which was read.]

[Clerk reads.] 'Die Jovis 7 September, 1648. Resolved, that there be a day of public Humiliation for this house to seek God in these times of difficulty, and that to-morrow be the day, and kept here in this house. Resolved that Mr. Peters, Mr. Marshal, and Mr. Caryll, be desired to perform the duty on the day of Humiliation with the house to-morrow.'

Counsel. That is not it we intend, there was one after that in December 1648.

[Clerk reads.] '20 December 1648. Ordered, That Mr Peters be desired to preach on Friday next, the day of public humiliation, at Margaret's Westminster, in the place of'

Counsel. Call Mr. Chace. After this the work went on, and the High Court of Justice sat; and the first day they sat was Saturday January 20, in Westminster-Hall, the 21st being the Sunday following; I think this gentleman was at White-hall; he will tell you what he preached.

Mr. Chace sworn.

Chace. My lord, I heard the prisoner at the bar preaching before Oliver Cromwell and Bradshaw, who was called Lord President of the High Court of Justice, and he took his text out of the Psalms in these words, 'Bind your kings with chains, and your nobles with fetters of iron;' that was part of the text: But says he in his sermon, 'Beloved, it is the last psalm but one, and the next Psalm hath six verses, and twelve Hallelujahs, praise ye the Lord, praise God in his Sanctuary, and so on; for what?' says he, 'Look into my text, there is the reason of it, that kings were bound in chains, &c.' He went on with a story of a Mayor, a Bishop and his man; 'The bishop's man, saith he, being drunk, the mayor laid him by the heels; the bishop sends to the mayor, to know by what authority he imprisoned his servant; the mayor's answer was, there is an act of parliament for it, and neither the bishop nor his man is excepted out of it; and applied it thus: Here is, saith he, a great discourse and talk in the world, what, will ye cut off the king's head? The head of a protestant prince and king? Turn to your Bibles and you shall find it there, Whosoever sheds man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed; (says he) I will even answer them as the mayor did the bishop, here is an act of God, Whosoever sheds man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed; and I see neither king Charles, nor prince Charles, nor prince Rupert, nor prince Maurice, nor any of that rabble, excepted out of it.' And further he said, 'This is the day that I, and many Saints of God besides, have been praying for these many years.'

Peters. Ask him whether he took notes.

Chace. No Sir, but it being so memorable a sermon I took special notice of it: I came to my brother's house in Shoe lane, and told him; said I, Brother, I have been at White-hall, and have heard the most execrable business that ever was heard in the world by a minister of the Gospel, and told him the words: I observed that Oliver Cromwell did laugh at that time when you were preaching.

Tho. Tongue sworn.

Counsel. What do you know of the prisoner's preaching?

Tongue. Upon January 21, 1649, I was at White-hall, where this gentleman preached, and he preached upon this text, Psalm cxlix. v. 8. 'To bind their kings in chains, and their nobles in links of iron;' in which text this Peters did much applaud the soldiers there; he said he hoped to see such another day following as the day before, and that 'Blessed be God (says this parson Peters) the house, the lower house, is purged, and the house of lords themselves they will down suddenly;' this is all that I well remember at that time. Upon the 28th of January, 1649, next day after Sentence of the king, I heard Peters preach upon this text in St. James's chapel, Psalm cxlix. 6, 7, 8, 9. 'Let the high praises of God be in their mouth, and a two edged sword in their hands, to execute vengeance on the heathen, and punishment upon the people, to bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron, to execute upon them the judgment written, this honour have all his Saints; praise ye the Lord:' And there he did so Saint the red coats, and so reprobate the poor king's friends! And in the middle of his sermon he took occasion to produce a text, Isaiah xiv, 18, 19, 20. 'All the kings of the nations, even all of them, lye in glory, every one in his own house. But thou art cast out of thy grave like an abominable branch, and as the raiment of those that are slain, thrust through with a sword, that go down to the stones of the pit, as a carcass trodden under feet; thou shalt not be joined with them in burial; because thou hast destroyed thy land, and slain thy people, the seed of evil doers shall never be renowned:' says he, This I did intend to insist and preach upon before the poor wretch, and the poor wretch would not hear me.'

Counsel. Who did he mean?

Tongue. His majesty, who was the day before condemned; saith he, 'Look in your lesser Bibles and you shall find the title is, The Tyrant's Fall.'

Counsel. That that was spoken of the king of Babylon, the ignominy that was cast upon him, he applies it to the king of England.

Peters. Ask him where it was?

Tongue. It was in St. James's chapel, Sunday the 28th of Jan. 1649, in the fore-noon.

Reynold Bowdler sworn.

Bowdler. That which I have now to say is this, I did hear him a few days before the king was murdered preach in St. Sepulchre's church, that he compares the king that was then to die, to Barabbas, a murderer, and in this manner; saith he, 'There is a great company amongst us like the Jews, they cry out, let Christ be crucified, and let Barabbas be released;' still comparing the king to Barabbas the murderer; these were his words, with many more to the same purpose.

William Rider sworn.

Counsel. Speak what you know concerning the prisoner.

Rider. I was at the same time at Church in St. Sepulchre's.

Counsel. How long was that before the king died?

Rider. It was very near the king's death.

Counsel. Was it after the High-Court of Justice sat, as they called it?

Rider. About that time it was. My lord, as soon as ever he had read the words of his text, which was, 'He shall call his name Emmanuel,' he presently shook hands with his text, and fell (as he was wont) to news, and there he said, 'The great inquiry now is to know what 'should become of the king; Let that alone,' saith he; and presently he falls to it again, and was pleased to style the king Barabbas; saith he, 'There is a great many of the people had rather Christ should be crucified than Barabbas;' and here he was applauding the soldiers; and said that 'Emmanuel' was written upon the bridles of their horses; and he was speaking of the king's soldiers, saith he, 'I have known eighty thousand of them, and not one of them a gracious person.'

Counsel. Now we expect the Answer of the prisoner at the bar, the Indictment hath been fully proved.

Peters. I desire that witness may be admitted which I spoke of, his name is Cornelius Glover.

Counsel. We have omitted one evidence; we desire Master Walker may be called.

Mr. Walker sworn.

Walker. On Sunday after the king was first brought to his trial, out of curiosity I went to hear Mr. Peters at White-hall; after he had made a long prayer, saith he, 'I have prayed and preached these twenty years, and now I may say with old Simeon, Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.*' Afterwards he speaks of the text, of 'binding their kings

* On the 4th of November, 1789, Dr. Richard Price, a Non-conforming Minister of eminence, preached in the Old Jewry, a Sermon, principally relating to the events that had then recently taken place in France; in allusion to which, he exclaimed, "What an eventful period is this. I am thankful that I have lived to it. I could almost say, 'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation!'" Mr. Burke, after adverting to this testimony against Peters, and applying Dr. Price's exclamation to the forcible removal of the 6th of October, 1789, of the King and Queen of France, from Versailles to Paris, bursts forth into a copious and most powerful strain of indignant eloquence:

"I find," says he, "a preacher of the gospel prophaneing the beautiful and prophetic ejaculation, commonly called 'nunc dimittis,' made on the first presentation of our Saviour in the Temple, and applying it, with an inhuman and unnatural rapture, to the most horrid, atrocious, and afflicting spectacle, that perhaps ever was exhibited to the pity and indignation of mankind. This 'leading in triumph,' a thing in its best form unmanly and irreligious, which fills our preacher with such unhallowed transports, must shock, I believe, the moral taste of every well-born mind. Several English were the stupified and indignant spectators of that triumph. It was (unless we have been strangely deceived) a spectacle resembling a procession of American savages, entering into Onondaga, after some of their murders called victories, and leading into hovels hung round with scalps, their captives, overpowered with the scoffs and buffets of women as

'in chains,' &c. then much reviled the king: 'But soft there,' saith he, 'I must not talk so here, I am in the king's chapel; there is a very remarkable passage in Amos; Amos went to preach, and Amaziah would not let him, but Amos would preach; the poor wretch would not hear me, but yet I will preach.' Afterwards he speaks of the Mayor of Exeter that committed the Bishop's servant for being drunk; saith the Mayor, 'here is an act of parliament for it, and I do not see that the Bishop nor his man are either of them excepted out of the act;' and saith he, 'in scripture it is said, 'Whosoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed;' and I do not find that either king Charles, prince Charles, prince Rupert, prince Maurice, or any of that Rabble, are excepted.'

Counsel. Now, Mr. Peters, you may call your witness.

Cornelius Glover not sworn.†

L. C. Baron. Where do you dwell?

Glover. In Paul's Church-yard.

L. C. Baron. What is your quality of life?

Peters. A servant of the king's.

L. C. Baron. I do not ask you, Mr. Peters.—Glover. I belong to the Post-house.

Peters. Pray hear him speak.

L. C. Baron. What would you have him asked?

Peters. Whether I was out of my chamber that day the king suffered?

L. C. Baron. What say you to that?

Glover. I was come to Mr. Peters a little before that time, to live with him as his servant; it fell out that day he was ill in his chamber all the morning; the soldiers in St. James's house were all gone away; I had a ferocious as themselves, much more than it resembled the triumphal pomp of a civilized martial nation;—if a civilized nation, or any men who had a sense of generosity, were capable of a personal triumph over the fallen and afflicted."

"Is this a triumph to be consecrated at altars? to be commemorated with grateful thanksgiving? to be offered to the divine humanity with fervent prayer and enthusiastic ejaculation?—These Theban and Thracian Orgies, acted in France, and applauded only in the Old Jewry, I assure you, kindle prophetic enthusiasm in the minds but of very few people in this kingdom; although a saint and apostle, who may have revelations of his own, and who has so completely vanquished all the mean superstitious of the heart, may incline to think it pious and decorous to compare it with the entrance into the world of the Prince of Peace, proclaimed in an holy temple by a venerable sage, and not long before not worse announced by the voice of angels to the quiet innocence of shepherds." Reflections on the late Revolution in France, 1790.

desire to go see the meeting, where they were at White-hall; saith he, 'Thou seemest to have a great desire to go and look about thee, it is very sad, but if you will go you may. I did go over the park.'

Counsel. What time? Glover. About noon.

Counsel. What hour?

Glover. I do not know; I did not stay there; the soldiers and the people filled the place, and I went back again to the chamber; I came back again within a matter of an hour's time.

Counsel. Was the king dead before you came back again?

Glover. They said he was not: When I went home he asked me what was doing? I told him there was a great croud, I could not come near; I staid there an hour, and then went out again; and still there was a crowd; and I came back again, and Mr. Peters was in his chamber then.

Counsel. Was he in bed or up?

Glover. I do not remember.

Counsel. How old were you then?

Glover. I am not above 32 or 33.

Counsel. Was Mr. Peters sick?

Glover. Yes, he was melancholy sick as he used to be.

L. C. Baron. How long have you been at the Post-house? Glover. About five years.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Peters, have you any more to ask him?

Peters. I brought him to testify that I was not out of my chamber that day, and that I was sick.

L. C. Baron. Did you desire to go, or did he send you?

Glover. I did desire to go, being newly come to London.

L. C. Baron. This gentleman, though not upon oath, is examined, and it is only to one particular, nothing at all to the main proofs.

Peters. I bring him only to vindicate myself from that aspersion of my being upon the scaffold.

L. C. Baron. They do not lay the weight of their evidence upon that: The king's counsel have done with their evidence, if you have any thing to say, you have your liberty.

Peters. May it please your lordships, I will give you an account of the business: I lived 14 years out of England, when I came over I found the wars begun; I began no war, my lord, nor have been the trumpeter; when I came out of the West-Indies, I fled from the war into Ireland, to the Western part there; and it was after the rebellion, when some of the Irish had been stirring there, I went and spent my time there. I was neither at Edgehill, nor Naseby; but, my lord, after I came over there was war that the people were engaged in; I was not here in the beginning of it, but was a stranger to the carriage of it. When I came into the nation I looked after three things: One was that there might be sound Religion; the second was that Learning, and Laws might be maintained; the third, that the Poor might be cared for; and I must confess I have spent most of my time in these things to this end and purpose: There was a noise in all parts of some miscarriages in matters of Religion, after it was settled I lived in Ireland; I must profess for my own part, solemnly, that my carriage hath been upon these heads. For Religion, I have, through God's mercies, spake of the truths of the Protestant Church, upon this account I did stay to see what God might do: I was sent over to his majesty that we might have a little help in point of Exchequer and Customs, and encouragement in learning. My lord, this is true, that I being here in the nation and being, sent over upon the occasions of the country, and not upon any design; but this I say, (I cannot deny it,) that after I came over, and had seen the state of England, in some measure I did stir, but by strong importunities, the ministers of London deeper than I: I am very sorry to hear of my carriage towards the king; it is my great trouble; I beg pardon for my own folly and weakness; I thought God had a great controversy with the nation, and the Lord was displeased on all hands; that which some people took to I did take unto: I went into the army; I saw at the beginning of it that corruptions grew among them. I suppose none can say I have gone aside from any orthodox truth of the Lord: And now to take off the scandal upon me, and to the business, let me beg of your lordships to consider whatever prejudices or revenge may take up men's hearts, there is a God that knows all: God hath a regard to the people of England: I look upon this nation as the cabinet of the world. That that doth concern the business is this, my lord, that after this time hither I came, and did bear witness to all the world, that there was amongst us something that was for better, and something worse, for the nation; I took advice of some great persons concerning the weightiness of it; I had neither malice nor mischief in my heart against the king; upon this I did engage so far, being invited; I went into the wars, and there I found very strange and several kinds of providences, as this day hath been seen; I do not deny but that I was active, but not to stir in a way that was not honourable. I challenge a great part of the nation to manifest my carriage among them: I shall make it good divers ways; I had so much respect to his majesty, particularly at Windsor, that I propounded to his majesty my thoughts three ways to preserve himself from danger, which were good, as he was pleased to think, though they did not succeed, and the work died; as for malice, I had none in me. It is true, there was a difference amongst us, an army, and an army; I never had a groat or penny from Oliver Cromwell since I knew this place; I profess I have had no ends for honour or gain since I set foot upon this shore; I challenge any man that belonged to that party whether they had not the same respect from me as my own party; I have not persecuted any with malice; I will only take off malice.

L. C. Baron. Your business is matter of fact.

Peters. I am unskilful in law, this that I offer is to shew that I had no malice in me; I was so far from malice, that I have a Certificate, if worth the reading, from one of the most eminent persons in the nation, to shew I had no malice: It is concerning the marquis of Worcester, under his lady's hand, beginning with these words, 'I do here testify that in all the sufferings of my husband, Mr. Peters was my great friend, &c.' I have here a seal (and then produced it) that the earl of Norwich gave me to keep for his sake for saving his life, which I will keep as long as I live.

L. C. Baron. I am not willing at all to interrupt you, or hinder you; that which you speak of doing good services is not at all to the point; we do not question you for what good you have done, but for the evil you have done; I hope there is no malice in your heart, nor upon the Court nor Jury, we and they are upon our oaths; and you hear the matter alledged against you; pray come to the matter.

Peters. My Lord, I cannot remember them.

Lord Chief Baron. Then I will remember you: you are charged by this Indictment for compassing and imagining the death of the king, and there is set forth sundry particulars to prove the overt-act, that you with other persons named in that indictment, did consult and meet together how to bring about the king's death. Then you are charged with several acts of contriving and endeavouring the king's death. Overt-acts that tend to the compassing and imagining the king's death, or any one of these, to encourage the bringing on the king to his death, the consulting or meeting together about it, though you did not sit or sentence; yet if you did any thing tending to that encouragement, or otherwise abet it, comfort, or any wise aid those traitorous persons that did it, in the doing of it you are by law guilty of the whole fact: the proposing and determining the king shall die, though you were not he that actually put him to death, yet notwithstanding, if you did the other, you are guilty of all; if you shall speak any seditious speeches, be they in the pulpit, or out of the pulpit, if you shall utter any thing that tends to sedition, these are open acts, which prove the imagination of the heart: though imagination of the heart be treason, yet it cannot be proved but by open acts, yet the imagination itself is treason. First you did conspire, all the witnesses go along to prove this. Dr. Young saith, you came over from Ireland to his house, and after five days that you were recovered of the flux, you staid there ten weeks; you said yourself there was enough, if it were true, to condemn you or any man: I shall repeat it to you; you told him a narrative, that you came from New England, from thence to Ireland, and then you came to Holland, with an intent to see how you might bring on the kingdom to be a commonwealth: next he saith, you spoke very often against the king by way of disgrace, against him and his family, against the king and his off-spring, this you said very often: then you spake in vilification of monarchical government, that this commonwealth would never be at peace till 150, or three-L's, Lords, Levites, and Lawyers were taken away, at which he replied, then they must be all Switzers; Tinkers or Traitors: he swears you were a colonel, and had a commission; that you would have had him accept of a commission; and that you had two companies come from the west: you told him the parliament had an intent to secure Cromwell and yourself, but that you rid hard for it; and then you confessed you agreed then upon his death, to bring him to trial, and to cut off his head: you did agree together, and he believes it was your advice to Cromwell: your answer was this, that he was more violent than yourself; that he took upon him to be a spy; and that he was no competent witness, because he was under a temptation, because you did not help him to his living, and so conceived it to be malice; you say he was used to take up such courses in his own country; the matter is not whether you had malice to the king's life or monarchy. For the next, one Gunter, he swears, that he was a servant to Mr. Hildesley, at the Star in Coleman-street, and this was in 1648, he saith, that many of the party of Cromwell did use to resort thither, amongst the rest he saw you, he said he came in to them, and their discourse was about Charles Stuart, and the prisoner — and did guess it was about the king; that you were privy to it then; he saith this was three days before Oliver Cromwell went out of town; the effect of that is urged no further than this, that you were so far of the cabal, that you were present with those persons, Cromwell, Ireton, Rich, and others; you said, I was there once with Mr. Nathaniel Fines. Starkey, he saith, that at his father's house Ireton lay, and was quartered there at Windsor, before and when the king was prisoner; that you had your quarters there, and Cromwell too, in that town: the general meeting of the council of war was at his father's house; that Ireton and his wife lying there, you came and resorted thither very often; he saith then, that it appeared that after the council of war had done, many times Rich, and you, and Cromwell, and Ireton, were there together, sometimes till two o'clock in the morning; he saith then, that he did observe there was a fifth person, (he did not remember his name) and you sat up usually till two or three in the morning; you had guards about you: he saith further, that Ireton being a domestic, he often discoursed with him, and you came sometimes to be there too: that there being some discourse concerning the king, many times he did assert the law concerning him, that he was solutus legibus, as to his person; that you should say, that it was an unequal law, and that you did then discourse fully against the king's government: you said he was a tyrant, not fit for that office: that the office was useless, chargeable and dangerous: these very words he observed, which afterwards were printed when they took away monarchy. He saith further, that was their full and whole discourse: he saith that his father at supper used to say that usual grace, 'God save the King, Prince, and Realm;' but afterwards that he heard the king was made a prisoner, that his father altering the grace, he said, 'God save his most excellent majesty, and deliver him out of all his enemies hands,' you rose up, and said, 'Old gentleman, your idol will not stand long;' that he did observe you often with them: he saith further, when Bacon was coming out, and speaking some words concerning your frequent affronting the king, you took up a staff and were ready to beat him, and made an uproar: It appears also of your being privy to Cromwell's actions. The next witness is Walkely, and he swears this against you, That he was in the Painted Chamber the next day after the proclamation was made, and there he saw John Goodwin and you: and there was an assembly, and at the middle of the table John Goodwin was, and made a long speech or prayer: that Cromwell would have had the people stay there, but it was ordered they should be turned out: at the end he saw you come out with the rest, there it appeared you were in the consultation; he saith he met the army at St. James's, and there, when they were half past, he saw the king in his coach, and there he saw Mr. Peters like bishop Almoner riding immediately before the king; and at St. James's park he saw you marshalling the soldiers, that he was forced thereupon to go about; he saith further, that within a year or two after the army was raised he heard you say these words, If we can keep up our army seven years longer we need not care for the king and all his posterity.

Peters. My lord, I must deny abundance of this; the king commanded me to ride before him, that the bishop of London might come to him.

L. C. Baron. But this was three weeks after—The next witness against you is one Proctor; he saith, That day (as the other witness did) he saw you riding just before the king's coach, and because he did his duty the soldiers threw him, horse and all, into a ditch. The next witness is one Hardwick, he saith that when the proclamation was read he saw you in Westminster-hall, and that you said, they had done as good as nothing, unless it was proclaimed in Cheapside and at the Old Exchange; this you said to some of the officers there.

Peters. My lord, I cannot acknowledge it.

L. C. Baron. The next witness against you is Simpson, he swears he saw you in consultation with Oliver Cromwell, and take sir William Brereton by the hand, and come to Bradshaw's, and this during the time of the king's trial; he further saith, that one day when the king was at his trial you commanded colonel Stubbers to bid his soldiers cry out Justice, Justice, which they cried, and afterwards some of the soldiers spit upon the king.

Peters. I do believe that he, that swore that, cannot say I was there.

L. C. Baron. Another witness is one Richardson, who saw you the first day in the court; and he said further, that you commended Bradshaw and another, to wit Cook, for their carriage in the trial of the king; that you held up your hands, and said, 'This is a most glorious beginning of the work.'

Peters. Whereabouts in the court?

Richardson. In the body of the court, called then the High Court of Justice.

Peters. My lord, I do not know that ever I was in the body of the court.

L. C. Baron. The next witness is sir Jeremy Whichcot, he saith, he heard you often speak scurrilously of the king: and making a narrative of Cromwell's escape, you said there was a meeting, and 'there we resolved to set aside the king:' remember what the other witness said, we agreed, and here we resolved; you said, I cannot but reverence the High Court of Justice, it doth resemble the judging of the world at the last day by the saints: so it was the saints that sat there; I would have preached before the wretch, but the poor wretch would not hear me: you often called him tyrant; I cannot possibly remember the place, things, or words, that are alledged. Then you have another witness, Nunnelley, he saith he came with a warrant to Oliver Cromwell for some money, and that he should say, go and see the beheading of the king at Whitehall; he saith there he met with you (though you said you were not there that day) going to the Banqueting-house; that you spoke to Tench, and whispered in his ear, and that Tench went and knocked staples on the scaffold; he meeting Tench said, what are you a hangman? saith Tench, This day will be a happy day; he saith, after all this Hugh Peters was upon the scaffold, and that he went out with the hangman.

Peters. I do profess to your lordships before angels and men that I did not stir out of my chamber that day.

L. C. Baron. The counsel doth not put reliance upon that, because of what your witness saith, though his evidence is not satisfactory. The next is Clough, and he swears this, that he saw you in the Painted-Chamber with the council of officers, and there you desired them to call on God for a blessing upon their business, and there you said, 'O Lord, what a mercy it is to see this great city fall down before us! And what a stir is there to bring this great man to trial, without whose blood he will turn us all into blood, if he reign again!' And this was about a month before the king was murdered. You hear it, Mr. Peters.

Peters. Some part I did, but it is impossible for me to bear down many witnesses; indeed, my lord, I say this, they are marvelous uncharitable, and speak many false things.

L. C. Baron. The next is this, the testimony concerning several sermons of yours; and let me tell you the pulpit ought not be a place where men with impunity may speak any thing, what they list, of sedition and treason.

Peters. I am of the same Judgment myself, my lord.

L. C. Baron. And there was a solemn day to seek God, then you preached at St. Margaret's church; this was Mr. Bever; in he came, and heard you talk much of Barabbas and our Saviour; there you fell upon this speaking of the king, It is a sad thing that it should now be a question, whether we should crucify our Saviour Jesus Christ, or that great Barabbas, speaking of the king; you called him traitor, tyrant, murderer of his subjects, and the like, you went on in a way of a story, 'These citizens for a little trading they will have Christ crucified, and the great Barabbas at Windsor released;' and said you, 'the clergy, the assembly, they are all for crucifying Christ, and releasing Barabbas;' you made that expression, 'O Jesus, what shall we do?' The king was a prisoner then at Windsor; you made your application to the parliament that was then present; you told them the people did expect justice from them; you must not prefer the great tyrant and traitor, naming the king, to these poor hearts, (the Redcoats standing by.)

Peters. I must profess against most of that.

L. C. Baron. There is the same by others. It is further proved by the Order, that you were appointed to preach.

Peters. I do not deny I preached, but not these things.

L. C. Baron. The next thing is this, there was one Mr. Chace, this was during the trial, he saith you preached at White-hall upon this text, Psalm cxlix. 'To bind their kings in chains, and their nobles in fetters of iron.' You had two or three other verses more; then you made a discourse of a mayor and a bishop's man, the bishop's man being drunk, the mayor committed him to prison; the bishop being angry, asked by what authority? The mayor said, there was an act of parliament for it; he did not find that either the bishop or his man was excepted; you applied that to the king; 'said you, I will shew you an act of the Bible, 'Whosoever sheds man's blood, by men shall his blood be shed;' this doth not except the king, prince, prince Rupert, prince Maurice, or any of that Rabble.'

Peters. It is false.

L. C. Baron. You said further, 'This is the day that I and many other saints of God have prayed for these many years;' and Oliver Cromwell laughed at that time. The next witness was Tongue, he heard you preach, and he swears the same with the former; that you applauded the soldiers, and that you hoped to see such another day following as the day before; and that blessed be God the house is purged, and the lords will shortly be pulled out; and the 28th day of January, which was the day after the king was sentenced, at St. James's, his chapel, you took for your text the cxlix. Psalm, 6, 7, 8, and 9 verses, whereof these words were part, 'To bind their kings in chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron;' there in the middle of that sermon, having spoken before of the king, you said you did intend to preach before the poor wretch upon the 14th of Isaiah, 18, 19, and 20 verses, speaking of all the kings of the nations, 'Thou art cast out of thy grave like an abominable branch,' &c. he saith further, you said, 'look upon your lesser Bibles and you will find the title is, 'The Tyrant's Fall.' There is another witness, that is one Bowdler, a few days before the king's death, at St. Sepulchre's, there you fell upon the old comparison, all along you compared the king to Barabbas; and that a great many would have Christ crucified, and Barabbas released; all along comparing the king to Barabbas. One more, and that was Ryder, he heard this text, 'He shall call his name Emmanuel;' you fell to speak of news; what shall become of the king? And you said 'the king was Barabbas, and a great many would rather have Christ crucified than Barabbas.' And then Mr. Walker he saith, that after the king was first brought to his trial he heard you say this, 'I have prayed and preached this twenty years, and now may I say with old Simeon, 'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation;' He mentions that you made use of the other comparison of the mayor and the bishop's man, and inferred from thence, that the king and prince, &c. were not excepted out of the scripture, where it is said, 'Whosoever sheds man's blood,' &c. You have heard all this witnessed against you, what have you to say for yourself?

Peters. These are but single witnesses.

L. C. Baron. The statute is two witnesses for treason, but not two to one individual thing, though there are several witnesses have proved the same thing about Barabbas, and our Saviour, 'Bind their kings with chains,' &c. and of your other actions there is a whole Jury of witnesses. Two witnesses expressly, we agreed upon the king's death, and we resolved to set the king aside.

Peters. I do not know the witnesses.

L. C. Baron. One is sir Jeremy Whichcot, the other is Dr. Young; you shall do well if you have any thing to invalidate these witnesses to speak it, else the Jury will be sent together to deliver up their verdict.

Peters. My lord, if I had time and opportunity, I could take off many of the witnesses, but because their testimony is without controul I cannot satisfy myself; I have no skill in the law, else I might have spoke for myself; I do not know what to say more, unless I had more time and counsel.

Sol. Gen. If the prisoner can say no more, here is this in it; here are five places where he did consult about the king's death, at Windsor, at Ware, in Coleman-street, in the Painted Chamber, and in Bradshaw's house; and four witnesses to prove this; there are two witnesses to his comparison of the king and Barabbas, and two witnesses to his text of binding their kings in chains, &c. Proof that he hath been in action in New-England; that he came from it with that intent, and then went to Holland; that he had been in arms; that he called the day of his majesty's trial a glorious day, resembling the judging of the world by the saints; he prays for this in the Painted Chamber, preaches for it at White-hall, St. James's Chapel St. Sepulchre's; what man could more contrive the death of the king than this miserable priest hath done? The honour of the pulpit is to be viudicated; and the death of this man will preach better than his life did; it may be a means to convert many a miserable person, whom the preaching of this person hath seduced; for many come here and say they did it 'in the fear of the Lord;' and now you see who taught them; and I hope you will make an example of this carnal prophet.

The Jury went together, and after a little consultation settled in their places.

Clerk. Are you agreed in your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our fore-man.

Clerk. How say you? Is the prisoner at the bar Guilty of the treason whereof he stands indicted? Or not Guilty?

Fore-man. Guilty.

Clerk. And so you say all?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Look to him, keeper.

Counsel. We desire Mr. Cook may be brought to the bar, and that they may both have their judgment pronounced.

Clerk. John Cook, hold up thy hand; what hast thou to say why the Court should not pronounce judgment for thee to die according to law?

Cook. I have a few words, matter of law: first, there is no averment in the Indictment, that John Cook mentioned in the Act of Indemnity, is the same with the John Cook mentioned in the Indictment, and that I am the John Cook mentioned in both.

L. C. Baron. This will not help you in this case, you have owned, and have pleaded by the name of John Cook.

Cook. The second is this, that the Overt-Acts should be particularly expressed in the Indictment.

L. C. Baron. This cannot be alledged in arrest of judgment, the jury have found you guilty of compassing and imagining the death of the king by the statute of 25 Edw. 3, and this cannot help you.

Cook. I say it was professionally.

L. C. Baron. That hath been over-ruled already; we have delivered our opinions; the profession of a lawyer will not excuse them, or any of them, from treason, and this hath been over-ruled, and is over-ruled again.

Cook. I humbly conceive that the remaining part of the house of commons were to be judges whether there was a force or not.

L. C. Baron. This is all past and over-ruled.

Cook. Then I have no more.

Clerk. Hugh Peters. Hold up thy hand: what hast thou to say for thyself why judgment should not pass against thee to die according to law?

Peters. I will submit myself to God, and if I have spoken any thing against the Gospel of Christ I am heartily sorry.*

Silence commanded.

L. C. Baron. You are both persons of that ingenuous and liberal education as I hope I shall not need to tell you what it is to die, you have had a great deal of time to think of it; you could not but think of this issue of your doings long ago, and therefore I shall spare my labour of telling you what it is to die and of that eternity that you are to enter into; only give me leave in a few words, in relation to both your professions, to say something to shew the nature and heinousness of this offence, the murder of the king. If you were not actually guilty of putting the king to death; nay, admitting (in charity) you had no intent to go as far as you did, you are by the laws of Christ and this nation, guilty of high-treason, in that you that are a lawyer know very well, (and I speak it that you may lay it to your heart in the convictions of your conscience. I must say to you as Joshua said to Achan, 'my Son, give glory to God, and confess;' and it would become you so to do) you know very well it is the law of this nation, that no one house, nor both houses of parliament, have any coercive power over the king, much less to put him to death; you know, (as you cited very well) that the imprisoning of the king is treason. You know both of you, this is an undoubted truth; the rule of law is, that the king can do no wrong; that is the king can do no wrong in the estimation of law; he may do some particular acts as a private person, but he can do little prejudice in his own person; if he would hurt any it must be by ministers, in that case the law provides a remedy; if he doth it by ministers they must answer for it. The king of England is one of those princes who hath an Imperial Crown; what is that? It is not to do what he will; no, but it is that he shall not be punished in his own person if he doth that which in itself is unlawful. Now remember this when you took the oaths of allegiance and supremacy; (I presume you both did so;) what was your oath of supremacy? It was this, that the king was the only supreme governor of these realms; it goes further, as he was the supreme governor, so he was the only supreme governor, that excludes co-ordination; you swear farther, that you will to the utmost of your power defend the king against all conspiracies and attempts whatsoever; truly you that were a lawyer when you had thus sworn, your fee could be no excuse against what you had sworn to. We know that the king, in his politic or natural capacity, is not only salus populi, but salus reipublicæ. The law hath taken care that the people shall have justice and right; the king's person ought not to be touched; the king himself is pleased to judge by the law; you see he doth by law question the death of his father; he doth not judge it himself, but the law judges it. Mr. Peters knows very well he subscribed the 39 Articles of Religion; look upon them that were confirmed in 1552, and upon those articles that were confirmed in 13 Elizabeth; the king is there acknowledged to have the chief power in these nations; the meddling with the king was a jesuitical doctrine: this I speak, not that the king should or ought to govern but by the fundamental laws of the land; they that keep within the bounds of the law are happy; you that are a lawyer know this in point of law, and you that are a divine know this in point of divinity. You both know the truth of it, and when you have thought upon it, I hope you will reflect upon that horrid crime, the shedding of royal blood. You see he had granted all those grievances of the people, taken them away, secured them, for the future; and at this very time, when this horrid act was done, you see he had granted all at the desire of the people; he had made those concessions, such, as (were it not in respect of others more than those that treated themselves) they thought was more than could be expected by the nation. You that had a hand in the king's death it falls upon you, the guilt of it, because you were some of those instruments that assisted those persons that broke the treaty; prepare yourselves for that death which you are to die; it is a debt which we all owe to nature; if in this case there is something of shame comes to you it is that you must take as part of the reward of your sin. The only work I have now to do is to pronounce the judgment, and this is the judgment of the Court, and the Court doth award, that both of you be led back to the place from whence you came, and from thence shall be drawn upon a hurdle, &c. and the Lord have mercy upon your souls.

Clerk. Crier, make proclamation.

Clerk. O Yes, &c. All manner of persons, &c. and all jurors and witnesses, are to appear at this place to morrow morning at seven of the clock in the morning, upon pain of one hundred pound a piece. So God bless king Charles, &c.

October 15.

Memorandum, That the Bill of Indictment against William Hewlet, alias Howlet, was found at Hicks's Hall, October 12th instant.

Proclamation of the Court being made:

Clerk of the Crown. Set William Hewlet, alias Howlet, to the bar: which was done accordingly.

Clerk. William Hewlet, alias Howlet, hold up thy hand. Thou standest indicted of high treason in the county of Middlesex, by the name of William Hewlet, alias Howlet, for that thou, &c. How sayest thou, art thou Guilty of the high-treason whereof thou hast been indicted, and art now arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Hewlet. I am Not Guilty, my Lord.

Clerk. How wilt thou be tried?

Hewlet. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send thee a good delivery. Set him aside.

TRIAL OF DANIEL AXTELL.

October 15, 1660.

Clerk of the Crown. Set Axtell to the bar: which was done accordingly.

Clerk. Daniel Axtell, hold up thy hand.*

Axtell. Pray, my lord, let me have pen and ink.

L. C. Baron. Give Mr. Axtell pen and ink.

Clerk. Daniel Axtell, these men that were last called of the jury are to pass, &c. If you will challenge them, or any of them, you must challenge them when they come to the book, before they are sworn.

L. C. Baron. Do you know how many you have liberty to challenge? Because I would not have you misinformed, so you may challenge peremptorily, and no more.

Axtell. I thank your lordship.

L. C. Baron. Unless you have any particular cause; if so, you may challenge more.

Axtell. I confess I am wholly ignorant of the law.

John Kirke, John Smith, Thomas Morris, Ralph Hallsell, John Sherecroft, Francis Beale, Robert Cromwell, John Galfyard, John Shelbury, George Rithe were called, and by the prisoner challenged.

Thomas Bide, Charles Pitfield, Robert Sheppard, William Dod, Thomas Uaman, William Maynerd, George Plucknet, Samuel Harris, John Nicholl of Hendon, Henry Marsh, Thomas Bishop, Thomas Snow, in all twelve, were admitted, and sworn of the Jury.

* "Col. Daniel Axtell had been captain, major, and lieutenant-colonel in a regiment of foot; in the last of which employments he had assisted at the trial and execution of the late king. When lieut. gen. Cromwell was sent by the parliament into Ireland with an army against the rebels, and the regiment in which col. Axtell served was drawn out by lot for that expedition, he cheerfully undertook the employment; and for his fidelity, courage, and conduct, was soon preferred to the head of a regiment; and not long after was made governor of Kilkenny, and the adjacent precinct; which important trust he discharged with diligence and success. In this station he shewed a more than ordinary zeal in punishing those Irish who had been guilty of murdering the protestants. And on this account; as well as for what he had done in relation to the late king, the court had procured him to be excepted out of the act of indemnity." 3-Ludlow, p. 73.

Clerk of the Crown. If any man can inform my lords the king's justices, &c.

Clerk. Daniel Axtell, hold up thy hand. Look upon the prisoner you that are sworn, and hearken to your charge; you shall understand that the prisoner stands indicted, &c.

Counsel. May it please your lordships, and you gentlemen that are sworn of the Jury, the High Court of Injustice that was erected for trial of the late King, it had all the formalities of a Court to put in execution that bloody act; they had their President, their Counsel, their Chaplain, and their guards; some of their Judges have been already tried, one of their Counsel, and their Chaplain. Now, my lord, we come to the guards, and this gentleman at the bar, that is now the prisoner, he was commander of that black guard, that cruel and bloody guard: The Indictment is, That he did imagine and compass the death of the King; there be several overt acts that are mentioned in the Indictment as evidences of that imagination, as the consultation to bring him to trial, the actual bringing him to trial, and the bloody execution upon the scaffold; our evidence shall be this, that during the time of the trial the prisoner at the bar did command the soldiers in Westminster-hall, himself did keep the entrance into the Court; and when Bradshaw did speak to the King, and told him he trifled away time, and required his Answer to the Charge exhibited in the name of the Commons of England assembled in Parliament, and the good people of England,* that a noble person in the gallery there cried out, 'It was a lye;' saying that above half the Commons disowned it; saying where are these good people? It is a lye; Oliver Cromwell is a Traitor; this bloody fellow commanded the soldiers to shout her; he did several times command and encourage the soldiers to cry out, 'Justice, Justice;' and the last day of that horrid trial, called by them 'the Day of Judgment,' he likewise commanded them to cry out, 'Execution, Execution;' and when some of them would not do it, he had the valour to beat them. My lords, and gentlemen of the jury, if we prove any of these particulars to demonstrate unto you that he was guilty of compassing and imagining the King's death, it is equal as if we had proved he did actually cut off the King's head.

Mr. Bodurdoe, Mr. Nutley, Mr. Harrington, Sir Purbeck Temple, Mr. Simpson, Mr. Baker, Mr. Huncks, and Mr. Jeonar, sworn.

Counsel. Mr. Simpson, Tell my lords, and the jury, who had the command of the soldiers during the trial of the King in Westminster-hall.

Simpson. My lords, (as I said before in the case of Mr. Peters), col. Stubberd and col. Axtell had the command of the soldiers below stairs, near that which was called the High Court of Justice.

Axtell. I desire to know his name, my lord.

Simpson. My name is Holland Simpson.

Counsel. Did you see him there commanding the soldiers?

Simpson. There was a kind of hubbub in the Court; there was a lady (they said it was the lady Fairfax) who at the exhibiting of the Charge against the King, said to be in the name of the Commons and people of England, she spoke out aloud, and said, 'It was a lie, that not half, nor a quarter of the people; Oliver Cromwell is a rogue and a traitor;' they called for a guard, this gentleman he was called, and brought up some musqueteers, and commanded his soldiers to present and give fire against the lady, and commanded her to unmask.

Axtell. What lady was it? I desire to know.

Simpson. She went by the name of the lady Fairfax; I know not whether it was so or no, it was the common report it was she.

Clerk. Mr. Huncks, Pray tell my lord, what you know of the prisoner at the bar.

Huncks. My lord, to say positively any thing of the man touching his command I cannot, but only that morning the King died he came into the door of the room where colonel Phayre, col. Hacker, Cromwell, and myself, were, (Ireton and Harrison, lying in bed together in the same room,) and then he stood at the door half in and half out; I refused to sign an order for executing the King, as Cromwell ordered me, and some little cross language having passed, saith the prisoner at the bar 'Colonel Huncks, I am ashamed of you, the ship is now coming into the harbour, and will you strike sail before we come to anchor?' This I appeal to yourself; but for crying out, 'Knock them down, shoot them,' I know not who it was; the officers cried, 'Justice,' and some of the soldiers, but I profess I know not who it was particularly; but they cried, 'Justice,' and then I fell a trembling, for I was afraid of the King; but these were the words he used to me, 'Will you strike sail,' &c.

Axtell. My lord, I desire to ask him a question.

L. C. Baron. Ask him what you will.

Axtell. If I am not in the right I hope your lordships will direct me.

L. C. Baron. Go on.

Axtell. Colonel Huncks, where was it?

Huncks. In a little room in Whitehall, where Ireton and Harrison lay in bed together.

Axtell. Do you know whereabouts?

Huncks. I think I can go to the room again; I appeal to your own conscience before all this people.

Axtell. By your favour, sir, the room, I perceive, you know not; and truly, sir, my lord, if you please to give me leave, because he appeals to my conscience, I do appeal to the great God, before whom it may be I shall shortly be arraigned to give an account of all my words, thoughts and actions, I do not remember that ever I had any converse with this man there, or met him there, or any of that company there, that day; he was a stranger to me, but I wish that you (to save yourself being in the Warrant for execution) do not make others a peace-offering to save yourself; the Lord that knows my heart I appeal to him; I appeal to your own conscience, because you appeal to my conscience; I never met you, nor saw you there.

Huncks. Have you done? Then give me leave; you say you do not know me; I appeal to the same God, when Cromwell took upon him to have the crown, have not I said, What have you got by being Jehu-like? Lord, strike me dead here if it be not true.

Axtell. I will not reflect upon him; but because he hath appealed to my conscience therefore I speak it; it is known notoriously how Jehu-like you were, when you were one of the chief guards of his majesty, one of the forty halberters that did oppose every person then for the King; had I had time, and had not been a close prisoner as I was, there were witnesses enough.

Counsel. This after our evidence is more proper.

Huncks. Spare me not, colonel Axtell.

L. C. Baron. Take the old and ancient course, let the witnesses that are produced for the King be all heard, then give your answer to all of them together.

Axtell. My memory is not very good.

L. C. Baron. You have pen, ink, and paper. Mr. Axtell, is this all that you desire to speak to colonel Huncks?

Axtell. Yes, my lord.

L. C. Baron. Have you any other questions?

Counsel. My lord, we have a few words; he objects as if col. Huncks were under a danger; he is pardoned.

Axtell. I desire to ask him upon what account these words were spoke.

Huncks. My lord, it was this; Cromwell having a commission, (which I think I heard read here,) col. Hacker was reading of it, my lord, Cromwell he comes to me, and by virtue of that commission he would have me to write a warrant for executing the king, but I refused to write that warrant; the prisoner then standing at the door, (if God bless me I will search all the doors at Whitehall, but I will find it out,) I not doing it, I said, Why should it be offered to me? Says Cromwell, Thou art a peevish fellow; Cromwell fell a writing; as soon as ever he had done that writing, he gave Hacker the pen, what Hacker writes I know not; and upon my refusing, this prisoner at the bar said, 'Col. Huncks, I am now ashamed of you, the ship is now coming into the harbour, and will you now strike sail before you cast anchor?'

Counsel. You observe the course of this evidence; there was a warrant of commission directed to three persons, Hacker, Huncks, and Phaire, for execution of the king; Cromwell demanded of this gentleman (col. Huncks) that he should sign a warrant by virtue of that other warrant, and this gentleman refused it: The prisoner objects this, that he to save himself doth witness this against the prisoner: Gentlemen, he did refuse the thing; have you any thing to ask col. Huncks?

Axtell. He says colonel Phaire and Hacker were there, I do not doubt but they will be so conscientious to vindicate me from all this Charge.

L. C. Baron. If it be any thing that tends to your defence that will be heard afterwards: but have you any questions to ask colonel Huncks?

Axtell. No more; I know nothing of it, if I were to die at this bar presently.

Counsel. Sir Purbeck Temple, pray tell my lords and the Jury your knowledge of the carriage of this gentleman touching the trial of his late majesty.

Sir Purbeck Temple. My lord, being present, and engaged by some persons of honour, servants of his late majesty, to be present when that horrid murder was acting before this court of justice, (as they called it) I was present at all the trials of the king, and very near him; I heard the king demand from Bradshaw by what authority and commission they proceeded thus strangely to try him. Then I heard the lady Fairfax, and one Mrs. Nelson, (my sister,) after the exhibiting of the Charge in the name of the Commons assembled in parliament, and the Good People of this kingdom, against Charles Stuart, king of England; I say I heard the lady cry out from a gallery over the Court, 'Not half the People; it is false: Where are they, or their consents? Oliver Cromwell is a Traitor.' Upon which I heard the prisoner at the bar cry out, 'Down with the whores, shoot them;' which made me take farther notice of him; seeing him in Westminster-Hall, commanding the soldiers there, I saw him the most active person there; and during the time that the king was urging to be heard, he was then laughing, entertaining his soldiers, scoffing aloud, whilst some of the soldiers, by his suffering, and, I believe, procurement, did fire powder in the palms of their hands, that they did not only offend his majesty's smell, but enforced him to rise up out of his chair, and with his hand to turn away the smoke; and after this he turned about to the people, and smiled upon them, and those soldiers that so rudely treated him: Then turning himself to Bradshaw, said to him and the Court, 'There are some sitting here,' (fixing his eyes upon some persons near Bradshaw) 'that well knew that if I would have forfeited or betrayed the liberties and rights of the people I need not have come hither,' (or words to this effect,) 'but their liberties and rights are dearer and nearer to me than my three kingdoms, nay, than my life itself; therefore I desire you to hear me, and remember that I am your lawful king, that have done you many acts of grace and favour.' After which, this person, Mr. Axtell, prisoner at the bar, commanded his soldiers to cry out 'Justice;' which the soldiers not readily obeying of him, I saw him beat four or five of them with his cane until they cried out, (with himself) 'Justice, Justice, Execution, Execution,' which made me turn to a noble lord, by whom I then stood, and said, 'Pray, my lord, take notice, there is not above four or five that cry out Justice, Justice.' I heard also of their spitting in the king's face; and I think nobody's sufferings have been so like those of our Saviour Christ Jesus, as his majesty's were. After this, this person crying 'Justice, Justice, Execution, Execution,' a second time, the Court proceeded to pass a Sentence: the which his majesty pressed hard against, and said, 'Sir, before you pass that ugly Sentence, (which I very well understand you are determined to do,) I desire you to hear me; hear me, hear me:' passionately, and most affectionately expressing it, which they denying the king, and the noise of 'Justice, Justice, Execution, Execution,' being repeated, they proceeded and read that ugly Sentence of Death: After which his majesty was immediately hurried away from the bar into a common sedan, where he was carried by two common porters; which sedan I followed to the middle of King's-street, where I saw the two porters in reverence go bare, till the soldiers (under the command of the prisoner at the bar) beat them, and would not suffer them to go bare, when they carried him. After this the people cried out, 'What, do you carry the king in a common sedan, as they carry such as have the plague? God deliver your majesty out of such enemies hands.' In which street I was forced to leave the sight of his majesty, occasioned by the injuries and hurts I received in my person from the soldiers under Axtell's command, they carrying him through the streets shouting in triumph. A short time after I received an importunate command from a lady of great honour, (a servant of his majesty's) that I would endeavour to find out where the body of the martyred king was, and to give an account where it then was: Applying myself to Whitehall, after two or three-score entreaties, I was denied; but understanding that money would do it, I gave the person then under the command of Mr. Axtell, that then kept it, half a piece to shew it me, who in a scoffing manner took me by the hand and said, 'If thou thinkest there is any sanctity or holiness in it, look here:' where I saw the head of that blessed martyred king lie in a coffin with his body, which smiled as perfectly as if it had been alive; this is the sad account of the martyred king, and this horrid prisoner, Mr. Axtell.

Axtell. My lord, may I ask that gentleman some questions?

L. C. Baron. Yes, yes.

Axtell. My lord, he seems to say that I bid the soldiers cry out for Justice; he doth not say at all I was there in command, but he saith a lady, by report the lady Fairfax, spake some words, and that I should bid the soldiers silence her; truly I desire to know the certainty of the place where I stood.

Sir Purbeck Temple. My lords, and gentlemen of the Jury, I saw this person standing within a pike or two's length, as I can guess it, (I remember the place within a yard of the ground in Westminster-hall,) I do not say this person sat in the Court as a principal officer, that did then hold his majesty prisoner at the bar; I did not say it was a lady unknown, or reported to be such a one; but I said it was the lady Fairfax, and my own sister, Mrs. Nelson, and he cried, 'Shoot the whores.'

Axtell. He seems now to say I commanded the guards: I never was a guard to his majesty, or had any thing to do in that business, but it was wholly committed to a company of men I know not of. That gentleman that spoke I have no acquaintance with him, I think he did not know me at that time.

L. C. Baron. Have you any thing to ask him?

Sir Purbeck Temple. My lord, another passage he puts into my memory; when I did observe a thousand of sad faces, I saw none laughing but yourself, as if you had been carousing and entertaining the soldiers. I do not charge you that you commanded those halberteers, but those red-coats; you were all in red: I saw you cane those four or five soldiers I mentioned, till they cried Justice, Justice, with you; and that with the powder in the palms of their hands they forced the king to rise out of his chair, which you were much pleased with, and laughed at.

Axtell. I say before the Lord, before whom I must be judged again for this, I do deny this whole account.

Griffith Bodurdæ, esq. sworn.

Bodurdæ. My lords, and you gentlemen of the Jury, I was at the time of this sad trial in Westminster-hall.

Axtell. Your name, Sir, I beseech you?

Counsel. His name is Mr. Bodurdæ.

Bodurdæ. I say I was all the time of the king's trial in Westminster-hall; I was in a gallery that I had out of my house where I then lived, just under and besides the House of Commons, and I do remember I saw this gentleman there; I do think he was then called lieutenant-col. Axtell, so far as I remember: truly I have not seen him since, before this day, nor have had any reason to have known him, but that I saw him very active in giving commands to the soldiers there: This gentleman was keeping the Court, letting some in, and putting others out: he seemed to have the command of it: one day (whether it was about some passage, or their President's speech, I know not) there was a lady in the same gallery where I stood, and some muttering, 'It is a lie, not half the People,' or words to this effect: he the now prisoner at the bar, standing below in the Court, without the bar, not far from Dendy, with five or six soldiers, upon this muttering and disturbance (as he apprehended) to the Court, he called to the soldiers, saying, 'Shoot them, if they speak one word more:' they did also present the muzzles of their muskets up to the gallery: my lord, by this we were very hush: after that immediately within half a quarter of an hour, Dendy came to the gallery from the Court, to know who it was made that disturbance: but the lady was withdrawn into my chamber, and did not come out afterwards.

Axtell. Where was this, Sir?

L. C. Baron. What is your desire?

Axtell. My lord, where he saw me then?

L. C. Baron. Mr. Bodurdoe, you hear the question.

Mr. Bodurdoe. There was a gallery, which I do believe is yet standing, and the Court was just underneath the gallery, and you were just underneath the gallery, and five or six soldiers with you.

Richard Young sworn.

Counsel. What do you know of the carriage of the prisoner at the time of the trial?

Young. I was upon a scaffold, whereby I did see what was done in the Hall; I saw that lieut. col. Axtell was busy and very active in encouraging the soldiers to say, 'Let us have Justice against the king.'

Axtell. I desire to ask Mr. Young one question; others say that the word was, 'Cry for Justice,' this gentleman is pleased to make some addition, 'Let us have Justice against the king.'

Young. No, not against the king, but I conceived you meant against the king.

Axtell. I cry you mercy, you do but conceive so.

Young. You were upon the right hand of the Hall, almost at the corner of the pavement; it could not be otherwise applied.

John Jeonar sworn.

Counsel. Speak your knowledge of col. Axtell's carriage at the High-Court of Justice.

Jeonar. I had the honour to wait upon the king as a domestic servant, to the time of his death; that day, which was the first day the king was brought to his trial, I did wait upon him among other servants; we stood close to the bar where the king was, some three or four of us; colonel Axtell was upon the right hand of us commanding the guard, to keep things in order when the Court was to be withdrawn; (the many circumstances about the lady Fairfax shall be omitted;) the President commanded the prisoner to be withdrawn; with that col. Axtell steps down before me to draw out his guard; this I heard him say, soldiers, cry for Justice, Justice; I was the next man to him; and upon the last day of the trial he did come down in the same manner, and bid the Soldiers cry out for Execution, Execution.

Axtell. I do desire a question may be asked of that gentleman; I must confess I did not know the gentleman at that time, though he said he knew me; he seems to say that at the first day I encouraged the Soldiers to cry, 'Justice, Justice,' and the last day, 'Execution, Execution;' what place was this in, Sir?

Jeonar. I tell you the king was brought from Cotton-House, through a guard, that you managed, of musqueteers, and with a guard of partizans; besides, there was myself and others there: When we came up we got as close to the bar as we could, you were passing up and down from above and below: When the Court was dissolved, you stepped down just before to draw your guard to make ready, and to cry, Justice, Justice, and the second time, Execution, Execution; you were very near me, and then you cried, Justice, Justice, Execution, Execution.

Axtell. Are you certain? I have heard other men, I confess, accused for this, some other officers.

Jeonar. I did hear you, I do know you by sight.

Counsel. You know him now to be the same person?—Jeonar. Yes.

Samuel Burden sworn.

Counsel. Tell my lord and the jury what you know of the carriage of the prisoner.

Burden. My lords and gentlemen, I do believe col. Axtell knows me well enough, I was then under his own command at White-Hall; there were some cavaliers then in the regiment; it was my fortune I came into your Company, I wish I never had: You commanded more besides myself to be a witness against the king, and Justice Cook took my Examination; you brought me in, you commanded the guards that time at White-Hall, when the king was upon his trial.

Axtell. What more?

Burden. And you commanded Elisha Axtell, with a file of soldiers, to take a boat and go down to the common hang-man, who lived beyond the Tower, to execute the king; he is now Sheppard's serjeant in Ireland.

Axtell. My lord, I desire to ask him a question; he was pleased to say I desired him to be a witness.—Burden. Yes.

Axtell. Where was it?

Burden. In the Court at White-Hall.

Axtell. My lord, I have seen the printed list of witnesses against the king, and in that list you shall find no such name.

Burden. I have been a prisoner in Dublin by your means.

Axtell. My lord, I hope you will take notice of that.

Counsel. Burden, do you remember any of his commands to Web, to draw up in the Banqueting House?

Burden. He commanded Web to draw up in the Banqueting-House, during the time of execution, his own Company. I was one of his own Company then.

Counsel. In order to what?

Burden. For Execution.

Axtell. My lord, is Web here?

Burden. He is in Dublin.

Axtell. I wish he were here.

Edward Cook sworn.

Cook. May it please your honour, my lord, the last day of the trial of his majesty I came into Westminster-Hall, coming where the Court was, I did see col. Axtell, the prisoner at the bar, there with some musqueteers.

Counsel. What day was this?

Cook. The last day of his majesty's trial.

L. C. Baron. Go on, sir.

Cook. Standing there a little while his majesty came guarded with some halberteers, when he came by the soldiers that stood with col. Axtell, his majesty bowed, and afterwards put off his hat, and went up to the Court: I could not know what Bradshaw said to him, I stood below: I heard him say he was brought by the consent of the commons and people of England: there stood a lady above in a gallery, crying out, It is a lie, where are the people? or their consents? Cromwell is a traitor: Whereupon col. Axtell standing by, saith he, What drab is that that disturbs the Court? Come down, or I will fetch you down.

Mr. Nelson sworn.

Counsel. Tell my lords, and gentlemen of the jury, touching the discourse between you and the prisoner at the bar in Dublin.

Nelson. My lords, and gentlemen of the jury, upon a discourse with the prisoner at the bar in Dublin, five or six years since, upon the platform in that Castle we discoursed of the late king's having had several reports: I desired to know of him who it was executed the king, thinking he might inform me; he was pleased to tell me this, saith he, the persons that were employed in that service, you know them as well as I do: truly sir, not I, said I, I saw them in vizards, but not their visage, as I knew of; yes, saith he, you do know them; it is true, saith he, myself and others were employed in that affair, in order to the execution; but there were several persons came and offered themselves out of a kind of zeal, to do the thing, but we did not think it proper to employ persons who we did not know, but we made choice of a couple of stout persons; pray let me hear their names, said I; said he, it was Hewlet and Walker; I desired to know their reward; truly saith he, I do not know whether 30*l.* a piece, or between them; I said it was a small reward for a work of that nature; truly, saith he, that was all.*

Axtell. You named one man, I did not hear the other named.

Nelson. I named Hewlet and Walker; he was one that managed the execution, he told me so, and it pleased you, Sir.

Axtell. He is pleased to say that in Ireland there was such conference; was any body by?

Nelson. No, sir.

* As to the question, who actually beheaded the king, see the note to the king's Trial ante, vol. 4, p. 1141, and the articles there referred to; also the "Life of Cromwell" and Lilly's History of his Life and Times.

In the Gentleman's Magazine for Nov. 1767 (vol. 37, p. 548, 549.) and Jan. 1768, vol. 38, p. 11, are three letters designed to shew that Wm. Walker, a mathematician it seems, who died at Darnall, in the parish of Sheffield, Nov. 4th, 1700, was the person who beheaded king Charles. In addition to the testimony of Nel-Axtell. Did I name any body to you?

Nelson. You named those two persons.

Axtell. Certainly I must invent them then, for I had no more knowledge of them than any one here.

Nelson. You told me you were one of them that had the managing of that affair.

Counsel. My lord, we have done with our Evidence; those particulars that were first opened to you have rendered the prisoner much a blacker person than we thought: we leave him to his defence.

Axtell. May it please your lordships in the first place, because I am ignorant in the laws, I desire to know upon what statute this indictment is grounded.

L. C. Baron. It is grounded upon 25 Ed. 3.

Axtell. My lords, I must acknowledge my ignorance of the laws, being a thing I never studied, nor have the knowledge of, but I have heard it is the duty of your lordships and the judges to be of counsel for the prisoner in things wherein he is ignorant in matter of law, to make his just defence; and therefore, my lord, the Indictment itself being matter of law, if your lordships please not to grant me counsel to speak to matters of law, I humbly pray that your lordships would be pleased that for want of knowledge, formalities, punctilioes, and niceties of the law, I might not undo myself: I have heard by a learned judge, that though the judge be of counsel to the king, yet by his oath he is also to be counsellor to the prisoner, and stands as mediator between king and prisoner; and therefore, my lord, I shall beg that humble favour, that wherein I shall fall short to make the best improvement in my plea in matter of law, that your lordships will help me, and not take advantages against me, as to the niceties, formalities, and punctilioes of the law; and, my lord, this is a resemblance of that son, upon the trial of Axtell and Hewlet, Walker's epitaph on a brass plate in Trinity church Sheffield, is cited, which contains this passage "Variis durante nupero interregno, munis arduis sub Mercuriis non Martis vexillo laudabiliter functus redeunte rege Car. 2do in proedolium paternum, templo huic vicinum, se lubens," and it is stated to be "a current report among the oldest people there, that this man when upon his death bed was in the utmost distress and anxiety of mind, from which he could not be relieved, till he had openly confessed that king Charles 1, was beheaded by his hand," and mention is made that a warrant had been issued for his apprehension.

"In 1685, Rumbold, the owner of the Rye House," (see the Trials of Walcot, A. D. 1683, infra) "upon his trial in Scotland, being asked if he was one of the masked executioners on Charles the First's scaffold, declared he was not, but that he was one of Oliver Cromwell's regiment then, and was on horseback at Whitehall that day, as one of the guard about the scaffold." 1 Fountainhall's Decisions, 365. See Rumbold's Case, infra.

great day, where Christ will be judge, and will judge the secrets of all hearts, and of all words, and all persons, and by him all actions are weighed, knows all our hearts whether there be malice, or how it stands in the frame of each heart before him in this place; and therefore I hope there will be nothing by pre-judging, or any thing by precluding, to be so black a person as it seemed to be said against me. My lords, I must shorten the time, and come to speak as to the authority.

L. C. Baron. As to what, sir?

Axtell. I speak as to the authority by which, or under which, I acted; I humbly conceive, my lord, under favour, that I am not within the compass of that statute of the 25 Ed. 3, for that questionless must intend private persons, counselling, compassing, or imagining the death of the king. But you know, my lords, the war was first stated by the lords and commons, the parliament of England, and by virtue of their authority was forced to be raised, and they pretended by law that the right of the militia was in them; and your lordships will remember in several declarations and acts that were mutually exchanged between his majesty and parliament; and, my lord, that was the authority, the lords and commons assembled in parliament raised a force, and made the earl of Essex general, and after him the earl of Manchester, of the eastern association, and after that sir Thomas Fairfax, lord general of the forces; by this authority I acted, and this authority I humbly conceive to be legal, because this parliament was called by the king's writ, chosen by the people, and passed a bill they should not be dissolved without their own consents; that the parliament was in being when the trial was, and a question whether yet legally dissolved.

In the fourth place, they were not only owned and obeyed at home, but abroad, to be the chief authority of the nation, and also owned by foreign states and kingdoms, who sent ambassadors to that purpose; under them did all the judges of the land act, who ought to be the eye of the land, and the very light of the people, to guide them in their right actions; and I remember the judges upon trial, (I have read it of high-treason,) judge Thorp, Nichols and Jermin have declared it publicly, that it was a lawful justifiable thing by the law of the land to obey the parliament of England. My lord, it further appears as to their authority over the people of this nation, petitioning them as the supreme and lawful authority: and, my lords, as I have heard it hath been objected, that the houses of lords and commons could make no act, truly, my lord, if you will not allow them to be acts, though they intitle them so, call them so, and are obeyed as so, by the judges ministers, and officers of state, and by all other persons in the nation, yet I hope they cannot be denied to be orders of parliament; and were they no more but orders, yet were they sufficient, as I humbly conceive, to bear out such as acted thereby. And, my lord, the parliament thus constituted, and having made their generals, he, by their authority, did constitute and appoint me to be an inferior officer in the army, serving them in the quarters of the parliament, and under and within their power; and what I have done, my lord, it hath been done only as a soldier, deriving my power from the general; he had his power from the fountain, to wit, the lords and commons; and, my lord, this being done, as hath been said by several, that I was there, and had command at Westminster-Hall, truly, my lord, if the parliament command the general, and the general the inferior officers, I am bound by my commission, according to the laws and customs of war, to be where the regiment is; I came not thither voluntarily, but by command of the general, who had a commission (as I said before) from the parliament. I was no counsellor, no contriver, I was no parliament man, none of the judges, none that sentenced, signed, none that had any hand in the Execution, only that which is charged is, that I was an officer in the army; if that be so great a crime, I conceive I am no more guilty than the earl of Essex, Fairfax, or lord Manchester.

Judge Mallet. You are not charged as you were an officer of the army.

Axtell. My lords, that is the main thing they do insist upon: my lord, I am no more guilty than his excellency the lord general Monk, who acted by the same authority, and all the people in the three nations; and my lord, I do humbly suppose, if the authority had been only an authority in fact, and not right, yet those that acted under them ought not to be questioned; but if the authority commanded, whatsoever offence they committed, especially that that guided me, was no less than the declared judgment of the lords and commons sitting in parliament; they declared that was their right, as to the militia; and having explained several statutes of Henry the 7th, wherein the king having interchanged declarations with the parliament, the parliament comes to make an explanation on that statute; and, my lord, it is in folio 280, wherein they do positively expound it, and declare it as their allowed judgment. To clear up all scruples to all that should take up arms for them, saith the parliament there, as to the statute of 11th of Henry the 7th, chapter the first, which is printed at large, comes there to explain it in general, and comes here, folio 281, and gives this judgment; 'It is not, say they, agreeable to reason or conscience, that any one's duty should be known, if the judgment of the high-court of parliament be not a rule or guide to them.' In the next place this is the next guidance, rule, and judgment of parliament, upon the exposition of this statute, and as they have said in several places, (was it not too much to take up your lordship's time,) they are the proper judges and expounders of the law. The high-court of parliament have taken upon them to expound the law, and said that we lawyers will give the meaning of the text contrary to what they have expounded the meaning under their hands: in the same declaration his majesty is pleased to quit that statute upon which I stand indicted, the 25th of Edward 3, where they do, my lord, expound that very statute in the declaration made in 1643, folio 722. I come to the declared judgment, wherein they did positively say, that the persons that do act under their authority ought not to be questioned as persons guilty, folio 727, that is the exposition that the lords and commons assembled in parliament do make upon the statute.

Counsel. My lord, this is an argumentation of discourse in justification of his proceedings, we desire to know what he will answer as to the plea.

Axtell. My lords, I have this further to say, that if a house of commons assembled in parliament may be guilty of treason, (for the truth is, if I acted treason, that acted under the authority of the lords and commons in parliament, and of the commons in parliament, then doubtless they must begin the treason :) if the house of commons, who are the collective body and representation of the nation, be guilty, all the people of England, who chuse them, are guilty too; and then where will there be a jury to try this? Concerning the commons alone I have been over-ruled.

L. C. Baron. If you have any thing to say to the lords and commons, answer to your charge; your charge is nothing of the lords and commons, but what you acted when the house was broke and forced.

Counsel. You cannot but know that there is nothing charged against you, for which you can so much as pretend an authority of the lords and commons; you know before you could do this horrid murder, you were the persons that destroyed the lords and commons both; indeed you ravel in a business, to make people gaze upon you without any ground.

Axtell. I am upon my life, I hope you will bear me patiently.

L. C. Baron. God forbid but we should.

Axtell. I do desire to assert my authority; if any thing was done upon the house of lords and commons I do not come here to justify their actions, I was not concerned in it. My next plea is this; that if a house of commons can be charged guilty of high-treason as a community, the distributive body must needs be guilty.

Court. If there should have been 20 or 40 men come out of the house of commons, and should murder a man, they must answer for that; it is not the community that can do such an act of treason: these persons that you call a house of commons, there was but 26 of them, and these must be the people; this is the state of the case; and when you have thrust out thrice the number of those remaining, only those can serve your turn.

Lord Annesley. Mr. Axtell, I am very sorry to see you in that place, and it troubles me as much to hear you vent that for an authority; which you know yourself was no authority; you would now for your defence for life, (and it is reason you should make as full a defence for life as you can,) you would shelter yourself under that authority, which I am sorry I must say you were one of the greatest violaters of. You cannot forget how near a close of this bloody war, by the mercy of God, this nation was, when the army interposed, whose trade it was to live by war, when they had felt so much of the sweet of war, they would not suffer the people to enjoy peace, though the lords and representatives in parliament had agreed to it; a treaty was begun, terms of peace propounded and agreed to; this you cannot forget, and will have no need of notes, or books to help your memory: When the people groaned under the miseries of War, and thirsted after peace, then came up the army, who were servants to the parliament till that time, taking upon them the authority; (you cannot forget that yourself was one of the number that came to offer accusations against the majority of the commons house, calling them rotten members;) the house of lords was not then suffered to sit, they would not join in that ordinance that was preparing for the trial of the king; when the lords had refused, they were no longer fit to be lords neither; then comes in a new authority which we never heard of before; a remnant of the house of commons joining with the army that had driven away the greatest part of the house of commons; (for in all assemblies courts the major part must determine, or no determination,) after this course was taken, then is an act set on foot, they take upon them by votes of their own to be the parliament of England; that the supreme power of the nation is in the representatives of the people; who were they? Those few only that remained; almost all the cities, counties and boroughs of England had none left to represent them, they were driven away by force; then was this act of parliament (such an act as was never heard of before) set on foot and passed as an act by a few of the house of commons; if you can plead this for your defence, this is the act that you must shelter under. But you know the lords and commons had unanimously resolved for peace, and so agree with the king. If this act will be any defence, you may plead it to the full; and this is all you have to say, therefore go upon no foreign matter.

Axtell. If it please your lordship, that worthy lord that spoke last is pleased to say, that I was one of the persons that did accuse some of those members of parliament; truly, my lord, I never did come to the Commons' bar but once, presenting a petition; and for my hand either in charging any of the members, or secluding any of them, I never had any hand in that matter; this is all to that part. Next, I humbly conceive here I must ground my bottom, and if I perish, I perish by a judgment in a parliament; my commission that did authorize me to obey my general, was given me when the lords and commons sate in parliament; I had no other commission than this: My lord Fairfax commanded the army after the King's death by the like commission; I did but my duty in going to my regiment; the general saith, go to such a place, stay there; if I refuse, by the law of war I die; if I obey, I am in danger likewise; I say my commission was given me by the lords and commons, and therefore I hope, my lord, that what I have said and offered in that particular is not truthless, but of weight.

Court. The effect of your commission is only to make you an officer.

Artell. My commission bears date the 27th of March 1648, ten months before the King's death; we had no other commissions, therefore I humbly conceive the question will be this in point of law, and I humbly desire it may be truly and fairly stated by your lordship, and these honourable judges, that whether a man being guided by the judgment of the lords and commons assembled in parliament, and having declared their judgments and expositions of that statute of the 25th of Edward the Third, and acting only by that judgment of parliament, and under their authority, can be questioned for treason. That, my lord, is a question that I do humbly think is a point in law, and that you will please fairly and truly to state it, whether I am within the compass of that statute whereupon I am indicted.

Counsel. My lord, we do not charge him with any thing that he did act under the colour of his commission, or with any thing he did before that, but that which we charge him with are the acts that he did at the trial of the King; shew us your commission from the lords and commons assembled in parliament, for trial and execution of the King, you say something; we do not charge him for any thing done by virtue of that commission, but with those violent acts that he did in encouraging the soldiers to cry, 'Justice, Justice, Execution, Execution,' and all those other violent actions of his own malicious heart against the King. We humbly beseech you he may answer to that which is the Charge against him, and that is, the compassing and imagining the death of the late King, and his declaring that by those overt acts that we have proved. My lords, we desire that the prisoner at the bar may remember that he is not indicted for levying war against the King; if so, then that, sir, which you offer, might be given as a plea, and we should have spoken to it; but you are indicted for compassing and imagining the death of the King; and that which we have given in evidence were the subsequent overt acts to prove the same.

Artell. I hope you will not think it much to give me some more freedom for my own defence for life; My lord, I must needs say, though there was a force on the parliament, I am not to justify it; I was no lawyer, no statesman, no counsellor, but a soldier; and if the general, who had a commission from the lords and commons, and that some years before and after the King's death, be not guilty of treason, what I did was by command from my general; and though I am charged with being in arms in Westminster-hall, and at such and such a place, yet it was not a voluntary act, for I was bound to obey my general; I do humbly pray that I may have your lordship's judgment in this point; I must say it was from the sense of their exposition of the law, and of the statutes, and from the authority, that every one took up arms for, and served them, and obeyed either the one general, or the other; I say it was under this very authority, and this must needs acquit me from all the guilt that is laid upon me.

L. C. Baron. You put yourself upon the judgment of the Court upon this which you call a point in law. First, It is manifest that there is no excuse at all for treason; no man by his commission can warrant the doing of an act which is treason: you must take notice of the authority, whether it be good or no; your commission was not to put the King to death, but on the contrary, to preserve the King's life. The lords and commons, what they did we do not meddle with; the reason and ground of what they did was the preservation of the King's person, as well as the maintenance of the laws and liberties of this nation; they made protestations, declarations, and oaths, for the preservation of the King's person; and you could not but take notice of those things: Now whereas you go about to shroud yourself under the lord Fairfax, he had no such power, and therefore you can challenge no more than he had; and to what you say concerning the judgment of the parliament, there will be a great deal of difference between a particular case and a declaration of lords and commons; there is nothing you have said that hath any thing of force, and God forbid you should make use of it; but I must tell you, you could not but notoriously know all those transactions, that were in the army, what the army had done, that they came up with swords in their hands, and turned out whom they would; you saw what the lords and commons had done, that the treaty was ready for its birth; and then you came up with your myrmidons, with force and arms, and excluded the greatest part of the members, and then the lords were laid aside: It is true, the lords were not wholly dissolved, but they would not suffer them to sit, nor act at all, and this was apparent to the nation. So that this was but a colour and pretence of a parliament, that a few persons, for so they were, but an eighth part of the house of commons, should take upon them to act as an house, and of that eighth part (which was but forty-six in the whole) there was but twenty-six that voted that act which you say you obeyed; but you say you obeyed the general; you are not to obey the general in this case; for the facts that you have committed are not charged as acts of war; you are not charged for bringing the soldiers in, but for those violent actions that you were guilty of there; you made the soldiers cry out, 'Justice, Justice, Execution, Execution;' you sent officiously for a hangman to come down to you; your commission gave you no power for this; the death of the King you know how it was designed; you know the act for the bringing in of that commission (as they called it) to sit in justice was after the house of commons was reduced to a very small number, and some of those dissenting too; what you did act under that authority, if you can justify it, in the name of God say so; but do not engage the nation in those things which they abhorred, and by the mercy of God are laid asleep.

Mr. Justice Foster. You begin at the wrong end; you ought, as all men ought to do, first to answer the matter of fact, and not to put in those long dilatory pleas, till you have answered the matter of fact, whether those things charged on you be true or not; then if you have any thing further to say for yourself by way of excuse, it will be the time to speak, and not before.

Axtell. May it please your lordships, I humbly conceive I am upon that method to the first part of the witness: they accuse me for commanding my soldiers in Westminster-hall, then I must prove my authority, which I have been about to do, and declared the judgment of parliament.

L. C. Baron. The Court have heard you with a great deal of patience, and that which is not at all to the business.

Axtell. I only refer this as to the authority: (I humbly conceive you will give me leave to insist upon this, and how far I may improve it for my own defence:) here is the Commission by which my lord Fairfax acted: and that after the king's death: and I acted by the same authority he did: I had not been at Westminster-hall but on the command of the General.

Court. Doth that Commission authorize you to cry, Justice, Justice? And to look up and down to get witnesses against the king: Is that in your Commission?

Axtell. I am to serve and obey all my superior officers, that is my Commission: if I do not I die by the law of war.

Court. You are to obey them in their just commands: all unjust commands are invalid.* If our superiors should command us to undue and irregular things, (much more if to the committing of Treason) we are in each case to make use of our passive, not active, obedience.

Axtell. Under favour, it is not proved, that I did either compass or imagine the king's death: that is matter of fact.

* "Memorandum, That upon the trial of one Axtell, a soldier, who commanded the guards at the king's trial, and at his murder: he justified all that he did was as a soldier, by the command of his superior officer, whom he must obey or die. It was resolved that was no excuse, for his superior was a Traitor, and all that joined with him in that act were Traitors, and did by that approve the Treason: and where the command is traitorous, there the obedience to that command is also traitorous." Kelyng, p. 13.

Court. Let us try that.

Axtell. My lord, I did nothing but as a mere soldier: I had authority from the General: I would leave this before your lordships and the Jury, that what I have done hath been by authority of the General.

Lord Hollis. Sir, a word to you: if you could satisfy the Court that you had received a Commission from the General to do those things with which you stand charged it were something, then were it proper for you to plead it, and the Court to judge. Pray take this along with you, the General gave you no such command: what you are charged with in the Indictment is, for compassing and imagining the death of the king, and that by such and such overt-acts, as making your soldiers cry out Justice and Execution, for being active and forward in sending for the Executioner, and such other acts: prove these are in your Commission, and you say something: I am sure you cannot be ignorant that that very authority that you now do urge to give life and power to your actions, that you destroyed it, laid it in the dust, acted contrary to it several ways: when the parliament protested against fetching the king from Holmby, as they did, when they went on proceeding in the way of peace, then came you up to the bar, (I think you yourself,) and charged some of the members: first eleven as rotten members, and these men were forced away: this you know your General had no Commission to do: and this you know was a violation of that power that gave your General the Commission. After that, when the treaty was brought on in the Isle of Wight, when there was great hopes of peace, then you know the king was hurried thence by force, which the parliament protested against. After that, when both the house of commons and lords came to consider of one particular that passed, they resolved that it was sufficient ground to proceed on for the settlement of peace; then did you fall upon these houses, and tear them in pieces, and throwing out above 200, suffered only about 40 to remain, and they were glad to send for one member out of prison to make up a house. That which you say of the supreme authority, and that by virtue of which you did act, it shews that you did not at all go by any authority, but you followed your own lusts; and therefore do not sew these fig-leaves together, which will stand you in no stead; if you would apply yourself to answer that which you are charged with, it were something.

Axtell. I do desire to have no more interruptions than is meet in making my own Defence. My lord, here are many things by way of motive urged to the Jury which is not within the Charge, I desire I may have that fair play, that nothing may be urged but what is in the Charge.

L. C. Baron. You give the occasion, Mr. Axtell, keep to the matter, and you shall not be interrupted.

Lord Hollis. I shall be very sorry to urge any thing against you which doth not necessarily follow; for what you say touching your authority, I shall shew you have no authority.

Axtell. My lord, I have the same Commission as the General; what I did was not of mine own head, I had a command: As for all that hath been charged against me I shall say this, I was none of the Court, I did not fetch the king from the Isle of Wight, nor advised, compassed, or imagined, his death, or sentenced him to death, or signed the warrant for his execution, or executed him; I am none of them, my lords; and therefore whoever did make any breach upon the House of Commons, they were grandees, persons of a greater quality; I was an inferior officer; I was never at the house bar, but upon presenting one petition to the parliament from the army. I shall now come to speak to the evidence which hath been given particularly against me; and the first, my lords, is Mr. Simpson, he saith, I had the command of the guards at Westminster-hall: My lords, I have told you already, shewn you by what authority I came thither, and that I ought not to refuse; if I had, according to the laws of war I must have suffered death; and that is all as to Mr. Simpson, only that a lady (he knows not who) spake something there.

L. C. Baron. He saith he heard you bid the soldiers give fire against the lady.

Axtell. My lord, I must say, if there was any lady that did speak, who she was I know no more than the least child here; but, my lord, to silence a lady I suppose is no Treason; if a lady will talk impertinently, it is no Treason to bid her hold her tongue.

L. C. Baron. A lady was speaking pertinently enough, when she heard Bradshaw say to the king, such a Charge is exhibited, a Charge of High Treason against him 'in the name of the Commons assembled in Parliament, and the good People of England;' she said, 'That was a lie, not half, nor a quarter of the People of England; that Oliver Cromwell was a Traitor;' then you took upon you to command the soldiers to fire at her, and accordingly they levelled the muzzles of their muskets towards her.

Axtell. My lord, as to that particular concerning Oliver Cromwell, or any other words concerning the Court, I understand them not; but if any interruption was made, to preserve the peace, to desire a woman to hold her tongue is no Treason. To the next particular, wherein col. Huncks saith, at a door of a certain lodging where Ireton and Harrison were in bed together, he saith that upon his refusal to sign the warrant for executing the king, I said to him, 'Col. Huncks, I am ashamed of you, the ship is now coming into harbour, and will you strike sail before we come to anchor?' Truly my lord, I think all that amounts to nothing: if it were so, which I deny it, for to bring the ship into harbour, what is that? There is no person named, fact named, nor design named; and I appeal to my conscience, I remember not the time, place, person or words; and I can call for col. Phayre and col. Hacker, who were there; for I desire things may appear right, I desire they two persons may be called for their evidence in that point.

L. C. Baron. They both are in the same condition, col. Hacker in the prison behind you, col. Phayre in the Tower; Mr. Axtell, you know the strength of one affirmative witness; 'I saw such a man, and heard such a man say,' &c. is more than if twenty should witness they stood by, but did not see him, or hear him speak.

Axtell. My lord, he saith only this, I saw you at the door going into Ireton's chamber, and said, 'Will you strike sail, &c.?' Truly, my lord, he doth not say what, or how, any thing I meant; there must be according to sir Edward Coke's 7th book of his Institutes, that oracle of the law, he saith, 'That evidence ought to be as clear as the sun at noon-day;' all that you can say is this, it must be a wide inference, a large inference; I conceive there is nothing in these two witnesses, and if the two prisoners were here they would clear me in this.

L. C. Baron. If by the law you could have had them, you should; but I fear if they could be admitted they would not be to your advantage.

Axtell. Then, my lord, in the next place, col. Temple is pleased to say, that the lady Fairfax saying something against the Court, (which in truth, as I said before, I know not who it was, or what the words were) he saith, I bid fire against them; I did nothing but what I was commanded upon pain of death to preserve peace, and in pursuance of that command from the superior officers of the army, silence was required, and that was all that was done. I suppose where a man is commanded to keep silence, as the sheriff is required to keep all at peace in a Court, if he restrain a person that will not be quiet, it is not Treason in him, nor in me, in this particular. My lord, in the next place, Mr. Temple is pleased to say, that I stood upon the pavement laughing, while others sighed; truly, my lord, I know not whether I saw the gentleman, or no; certainly smiling is no Treason, if I did so, though I believe I had as great a sense that day as many other persons there: this is the sum of that he saith, only he further adds that I bid the soldiers cry for Justice: truly, my lord,——

L. C. Baron. Because it may be your notes are short, I will acquaint you there was a little more in it: he said, you bid the soldiers cry out 'Justice, Justice;' and they coming not very readily to it, you struck some of them, till they with yourself cried out 'Justice, Justice;' till they with yourself did it.

Axtell. My lord, to that I answer, that in the hall there was some kind of people did set up a crying some kind of words, and may be some of the soldiers might cry so too: I might command them to hold their tongues, and to say, 'I'll teach you to cry Justice,' and so the gentleman standing by might believe I was the person that bid them do it: Truly, my lord, this is all that the gentleman says, which I humbly conceive is nothing, because he does not say against any person; and therefore, my lord, I do hold to that maxim in the law, as sir Edward Coke holds, (that man of great parts, of learning and knowledge,) 'That in matters of Treason, wherein a man is the highest concerned in his life and posterity, there ought not to be construed against him inferences or presumptions, or strains of wit: there is no more in this, and this is all that I say in this particular. In the next place, Mr. Temple is pleased to say, that after the Court had sentenced his majesty, he was hurried away in a sedan: truly, whether he was, or not, I know not; there was a guard of halberters, whereof col. Huncks was one, and several others, as I have heard: they were select guards of his majesty, guarding him from St. James's to other places; how he came to be hurried, I know not, it was not by me: and whereas he says during the whole trial I was there, truly I think I was there by command of my General, by authority of the Lords and Commons.

L. C. Baron. You speak this that the jury may understand you did it by command of your general. Do you mean by express command?

Axtell. I did not move a day but by special command.

L. C. Baron. By whom?

Axtell. The lord Fairfax gave his orders every morning to his adjutant-general, or major general, and they issued them out to such and such persons as he appoints.

L. C. Baron. Who gave these orders out?

Axtell. The lord Fairfax; we did all under him.

L. C. Baron. You had not the order immediately from him?

Axtell. The major-general had.

L. C. Baron. What major-general gave you that order?

Axtell. There was Cromwell and Ireton.

L. C. Baron. The lord Fairfax gave you no immediate commission.

Axtell. He gave my superior officers.

L. C. Baron. How do you know that?

Axtell. My lord, because they told me so, it was by his command.

L. C. Baron. The question is now understood.

Axtell. The next person that speaks is Mr. Bodurdoe, and he says that I commanded the soldiers at the king's trial; and that a lady that was speaking was commanded silence, to this purpose; truly, my lord, this is but the same as before.

L. C. Baron. You said shoot too.

Axtell. No, (my lord,) I said not any such word, or any thing like it; I heard there was an officer went up and intreated her to be silent; I say, it is the same with the former, it is no treason to desire one to be silent. My next witness that speaks in evidence to me is Mr. Young; he says this, I bid the soldiers cry for justice; it is very like that person, as well as Mr. Temple, might see me in the croud speaking to make the soldiers quiet, I might repeat the words that the people said, repeat the word justice, or some such word, as the people's words.

L. C. Baron. Remember how he repeats them; he saw you active in setting on the soldiers to cry justice.

Axtell. If I have taken them right; one says he heard me say such words as justice; and that he saw me strike two or three soldiers; if in the tumult such a word should be started, I hearing of them, I might strike those soldiers that said Justice, Justice, and might repeat the words, I will give you Justice, and so strike them; that is a good evidence that it might be a repetition of their words, and not any of mine own: they both speak as to the word Justice, but here was not Justice mentioned to any person: I might repeat their own words, and chastise them for those words; besides this, (though I do not say the word was spoken by me) if the word Justice had been spoken, my lord, I hope it is no treason to say, I desire justice; it is God's great attribute, it is God's ordinance, and that can be no treason. I have read in law-books, (though but lately) and I cannot find that the word justice should be made treason; then there is no person to whom that adjunct doth belong. The next evidence my lord, is captain Jenoar, he saith I commanded a guard; truly several regiments took their turns as they were commanded by the general, and I, as an inferior officer, was there; but that is no more than what was said before, it was done by the authority of the general; if I had not done it, I had died by the law of war: he saith, there was a cry for justice; I can say nothing more than I have formerly said; it may be in the tumult the soldiers might say so, and I chastising of them, and repenting that in my chastisement, they might think they were mine own words.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Axtell, I would help your memory; he swears the last day you encouraged the soldiers to cry, Execution, Execution.

Axtell. For that particular I am coming to it, (I thank your lordship for helping me;) my lord, for that of execution, truly I cannot say whether I was there that day or no; one day I was commanded to be there with some companies in Westminster-Hall, but whether I was there any more than that one time is the question: admit I was there that day, I was never there but when I was commanded; when the colonel that commanded the regiment was there, I, as an inferior officer, ought to be there; I was there by a special order, and not by a voluntary act of mine own, and so it cannot be compassing the death of the king. For as to the word Execution, what can be the sense of this word? Execution is a single word; those people that started the word Justice might put it in the heads of the soldiers; which I might strike to command silence; they likewise might upon the same account cry out Execution, and so to hinder all tumults, and hubbubs, and the like, in the place; I might repeat their words in correcting of them for it, I might say, I will Justice you, I will Execution you: but, my lord, this word Execution of Justice, it is a glorious word: not that there can be an inference that what they did I should say was justice, or to approve of any thing that they did, but only in general Execution of Justice, which, my lord, relates not to any person; possibly the rude people might be speaking (as hath been said before) in that manner, and the soldiers might take it up, and I might reprove them, and make use of their own words by way of repetition, I will Justice you, I will Execution you.—My lord, in the next place I do desire to speak to that of Mr. Burden; he did observe to your lordships and the jury, my country-men, my brethren, with whom are the issues of life and death, for whose life they must answer before the Lord as to righteousness, judgment, and equity; I say, my lord, as to Mr. Burden, he tells you, that for my sake he was imprisoned; saith he, 'I have suffered much by him;' and speaks it with much indignation of spirit; 'I have suffered, and been imprisoned by him,' and afterwards he comes to speak his evidence; how much his evidence may be of force I desire, my lord, the jury may consider of that; and then he comes and saith, I commanded a guard at the Banqueting house in White-Hall. Truly, my lord, the lord Fairfax commanded a regiment to quarter there, and I, as an inferior officer, might be there. In the next place, my lord, he saith, I sent Elisha Artell to fetch the hangman; truly, my lord, I wonder this person is not come from Ireland; (if this were so,) the authority there would not send that person with his great evidence, as well as this person; he may as well charge any person with this as me: it is evident, Ireton, Harrison, and Cromwell, they did all amongst themselves; I never was with them, amongst them, received no command from them, nor obeyed them; nor did any thing but what I had command for from the general, whom, by the law, I was bound to obey as a soldier. I shall only observe one thing more; this person being so long a prisoner, to extricate himself out of his imprisonment and chains, poor man! he may say more than is true. I wonder he should say I sent for the executioner; I never knew of any circumstance touching consultation about his death, or took him prisoner. When they sent to me to be one of his guard, I never would go; I humbly conceive there is nothing sticks upon me in this, considering the circumstances, and the words of the person that spoke them.—My lord, the next person that speaks against me is Mr. Cook, he saith he heard me say, 'Thrust that lady down that made a disturbance in the Court,' or words to that purpose; it is probable there might be a desire of silence. The next evidence is lieutenant colonel Nelson, he saith, that upon a discourse—

L. C. Baron. I would put you in remembrance, lest you should forget what sir Purbeck Temple said, that by leave of persons under your command he saw the body of the king. It is only a circumstance.

Artell. I have heard there were chirurgeons, physicians and halberteers, appointed by whom I know not; they had the care of such things, and had the keeping of him; he was locked up by them; no body could come in but by them; I never had a key; possibly colonel Temple might come to me, quartering there, and desire me to speak to some persons that had the charge of it to let him in; whether I did or no I cannot remember; but if it were so, I hope it will not amount to treason. The last thing given in evidence against me is by Mr. Nelson, he saith, that upon some discourse between us, he was asking what person cut off the king's head, and that I should say Hewlet, &c. Truly, my lord, I was never privy; and I appeal to Mr. Rushworth, if he were here, who was secretary, if ever he saw me in any counsel, to advise, or act, or any thing in that kind, in relation to the king's trial, sentence, or execution; for me to know the person that was imployed about the execution it is strange, when (as I said before) they did all within themselves. I had no knowledge thereof, and meddled not with any thing but within my own sphere as a soldier under my lord Fairfax, by authority of parliament. For naming any person, truly, my lord, it would be a wonder to me that I should name any person to go to do any person that wrong and injury, to say he was the person; I must invent it, for I knew nothing of it. But by common fame up and down the city it was said to be another person, but who it was I cannot say, my lord; but to all this that hath been said against me, there are but two things upon two witnesses that are placed upon me; the first, my lord, here is two witnesses for crying Justice, and Execution.

L. C. Baron. I think you have more than two to those words.

Artell. Not for both together.

L. C. Baron. No, but several for Justice.

Artell. There is three to that; I shall only say this to your lordship, and this jury, in whose hand this life of mine is, and is committed to them, either to acquit or condemn me; and God knows the hearts of all men, and my innocence and integrity; I shall say nothing to the witnesses, it is a day of temptation; and I desire the jury, my countrymen, my fellow-citizens, and my brethren, that they would well consider of it, the word Execution and Justice; admit I had said them, (which, my lord, I do not, I must not grant) there being an uproar of people, there such words might be used, and possibly soldiers might take them up from them, and chastising the soldiers I might repeat the words, I will Justice, I will Execution you.

L. C. Baron. The evidence is, that you beat them because they did not readily cry Justice, Justice.

Axtell. It might be more probable I beat them because they did do it, I might chastise them for doing of it, and repeat it as a reason for their chastisement; and but admitting it was true, which I grant not, yet I hope Justice, an Execution of Justice, as it is so great an attribute of God, by God's laws, or man's laws, is no where made treason, but mercy attends it, and judgment attends the contrary; I leave it upon the consciences of the Jury to weigh it carefully, how I should be guilty of compassing and imagining the death of the late king, when nothing is charged against me to be either of counsel, sentencing or signing, or to be at the execution; only one man, as I told you before, he spoke something wrathfully, and that he had suffered much, and therefore he is come over now, and saith I should send for the executioner, which I never knew of, or had any hand in sending for; how much validity that hath, I leave to the Jury; if it were so, it is not treason; for words may make a heretic, not a traitor; I speak that by way of preface; I do humbly conceive that these being only noted words, Execution and Justice, the king not so much as named, or any thing done to it by me, I say, I conceive it doth not amount to treason by the law; and besides, it is against the law of the great Judge, the Judge of Judges; all of us that are now, and are to come, shall stand before him to receive our deserts; I say it is against the law of God to make me an offender for a word. I have heard the Judges say, that the laws of England are grounded upon the laws of God, and the laws of England are laws of mercy, not of rigour: My lord, if a man shall be destroyed in his life, in his posterity, for a word, (admit the thing had been so) I leave upon the consciences of my Jury, before the presence of Jesus Christ, and before whom they and I must come to be re-judged again at the tribunal; and besides it is only words, and words uncertain; and sir Edward Coke saith, he must declare plain truth in matter of treason; nothing must be taken for evidence that may be a presumption or inference, or strain of wit; I hope upon this consideration that the word Justice, fixed upon me by two witnesses, may be taken up at second or third hand from the people or soldiers, by chastising them for the tumult. Then, my lord, in the next place, these words were never put in writing, and so not treason; then, my lord, there was never an overt-act done by me; for that act of indemnity that his Majesty and both Houses of Parliament passed, wherein they were pleased the very last to except me, I wondered when I came to be excepted of that number. I do come back to the place where I left, and that is the overt-act. My lord, I would only bring it in this place; when I was excepted by the House of Commons, one of the twenty, I was excepted thus, not extending to life; I went up and down free at noon day; I did not hide myself; engaging a person that was one of his Majesty's servants to do me a courtesy, he promised me he would do it, and contrary to his promise, he was pleased to bring the king's warrant to carry me to the Tower; and after that I came to be excepted with that black catalogue of excepted persons, and to be brought to the trial of the law. Now (my lord) I return to that overt-act, as it was but words uncertain, and they may be words repeated from the third or the fourth hand, for they were not put in writing, according to that act of indemnity, which I understand the meaning of to be thus; that for their execrable treasons in sentencing, signing, or otherwise instrumental, they are excepted out of this act, and to be tried according to the laws of this nation. I understand that to be instrumental, to be instrumentally the executioner of the king; I never had any hand in that. Upon the whole, this is the fact that is proved by two witnesses; they heard me say; Justice and Execution, which must relate to the Execution of Justice, which by the law of God is not treason, especially when there was not the word King; for a word, to take away, and destroy so many, my life, wife, children, and many fatherless that are under the charge of the prisoner at the bar, is very sad; the words I do not grant, but upon such probabilities as I have said I might repeat them, I will Justice you, I will Execution you; and then the words were not written; I say as sir Edward Coke said, 'They may make a heretic, but not a traitor.' The other part of the evidence is this, that I was there with soldiers at Westminster-hall; I must say, if that be treason to be guided by the judgment of Lords and Commons in Parliament, I must say, if that be treason to take up arms for a Parliament upon such grounds and expositions of the statute which they have made and published by their own authority, if I am guilty under the general, then the Parliament would be guilty of treason.

L. C. Baron. That you have spoke to—I am loth to interrupt you.

Axtell. I thank your lordship for informing me, but I was commanded to be there by my general; if I had not gone I must have died; I did only stand there for preservation of the peace, in no other sense; if the general order me to be at such a rendezvous, I must be there; if I had disobeyed he would have condemned me by the law of war. The next thing against me material are these two things, that is, that I should send one Elisha Axtell for the executioner; I must say it is most admirable such things should be laid to my charge; I hope your lordships and the Jury do observe, he told you, he suffered much, and a poor man, under his extremities, and losses, and sufferings, perhaps might start some unadvised words, and being now sent over, may ascertain it. But doubtless this Elisha Axtell being in Ireland, if by command it had been so, would have been sent over; truly I must say, I had no hand in the business; it was left wholly to them amongst themselves, and what ever was done, or whatever was said, it was said and done by them; I never was acquainted with any thing of that nature. He said he heard I should send Elisha Axtell for an executioner; if hear-says may be treason it will be a hard lesson; and, my lord, sir Edward Coke saith, there must be two witnesses, here is but one. It comes from such a man, my lord, as the providence of God—but I will say no more as to that, but pray the Jury will take notice of it.

L. C. Baron. You need not doubt of it, it shall be taken notice of, this of Burden.

Axtell. Now, my lord, I have but two or three words more, the statute of the 25 Edw. 3., it doth intend private persons, my lord, here is my commission.

L. C. Baron. It is owned you had it from your general.

Axtell. My lord, his Majesty is pleased to say in his gracious Letter, 'We do by these presents declare, That we do grant a free and general pardon to all our subjects, of what degree or quality whatsoever, who within four days after the publishing hereof shall lay hold upon this our grace and favour, excepting only such persons as shall hereafter be excepted by parliament;' that is, a parliament called by his own writ. You know this parliament—

L. C. Baron. Mr. Axtell, I would not interrupt you to that, but this very objection was made by one of the prisoners before; this answer was given, first, the king's declaration is not a pardon in point of law, it must be under the broad seal, but God forbid it should bind in honour. You instanced in the word parliament, what was meant by the word parliament: You must know this, the exigency of the times were such, that there were many noble persons that took the advantage to assemble themselves together to reinstate the king; they did that which was just and lawful, according to the exigency of the times; this declaration he sent to the two houses, he called them his two houses, so that it appears clearly and manifestly they were then sitting, they being accepted by the king, and owned by him; and they did sit in the way of convention, according as a parliament, and his majesty sent his letter to them; and these are the persons that have thought fit to except you out of that act.

Axtell. My lord, may I speak to that any further?

L. C. Baron. If you do, it will be overruled.

Axtell. I submit—with submission to the providence of God; I did apply to sir Harbottle Grimstone for the mercy and favour of his majesty, according to his declaration, and here is sir Harbottle's own hand for a certificate.

L. C. Baron. This is allowed you, that you did claim that benefit within the time, but you may remember that it was referred to those two houses of parliament, they were to consider who was fit for the pardon, and you are by them excepted out by name: Your question now is no more, but whether Guilty? or Not Guilty? And these are but extravagant discourses that you say otherwise, and rather do you harm than good.

Axtell. I hope you will pardon me, my lord; I hope I have spoken to clear the point, the fact charged by your lordship, and before the jury; and I hope the Lord will give the jury a memory of it, and a right understanding in what I have said for my own defence. My lord, the next thing I have to offer, is this, to expound that act of parliament, that it was the intention of his majesty and parliament that all should be excepted, but those guilty of counselling, signing, or sentencing. Truly, my lord, I humbly conceive, I being none of those, am not Guilty of treason. I shall only speak one word to my jury, that they will remember what I have said, that there is but two things, two witnesses, as to justice and execution; that it relates to no person, but in general; and then I do not own the things, but possibly they might hear such words, I taking of them up upon a rebound, reproved the soldiers; for the other, that I should send one for the executioner, (he heard so,) and that I should name who was the executioner, I would not have that person, or any other, to suffer for that.

L. C. Baron. This is not at all pressed upon you, not as to any charge.

Axtell. I thank your lordship. I am very ignorant.

L. C. Baron. Have you done, sir?

Axtell. I leave the matter to the jury, in whose hands I, and my little ones, and family, are left: I only say this to you, remember your ancestors, remember your posterity. I never heard it before that words were treason. In queen Mary's time Throckmorton was acquitted for words by the jury.* Gentlemen of the jury, I leave my case, my life, my all, in your hands.

L. C. Baron. Gentlemen of the jury, there have been several things offered by the prisoner at the bar, so near as my memory will give me leave in so long a discourse, I shall repeat all things which he saith for himself, and which are said against him. There are some things that he seems to utter as tending to matter of law, and something merely of fact, proper only for you of the jury. For matter of law, he hath urged several things for himself: not by way of justification of the fact (I must do him that right), but in excuse of himself; and I hope his conscience hath so wrought upon him, that he is of opinion the fact is a horrid fact, which was so indeed. For that which he hath said for himself, first, he doth alledge to have his commission from the lord Fairfax, my lord Fairfax had his commission from the two houses of parliament, and this gentleman's was in March, the beginning of the year 1648. He saith, what he did was in obedience to his superiors, as a soldier, that he never consulted or advised about any thing of the trial or execution of his majesty. For this point, it hath already been spoken to, gentlemen; for that which hath been spoken to at large heretofore I must repeat it here, that he may know it, that no person whatsoever, no community, not the people, either collectively or representatively, have any coercive power over the king; neither the lord Fairfax, his general, nor he, nor any other person, could be excused for this horrid fact of bringing the king to trial, no person, as I said before, nor community, have any such power. The law-books which he hath lately seen, (and truly he hath employed his time well in that,) the law-books tell us, that whereas the two Spencers* had broached a damnable and detestable principle, that the homage was only due to the king, in respect to his crown; that if he did not demean himself according to such and such rules, his subjects might rule him per asperitatem, by asperity and sharpness; but this was condemned by two acts of parliament; they both appear in my lord Coke, in Calvin's Case. I do not go to repeat all the evidence that might clear this truth; I say, had there been any such thing, but it hath been told him there was no such thing in fact. My lord Fairfax's commission was for the preservation of the king, as well as for the liberties of the people. The 11th of Richard 2, Robert de Vere, and others, for levying a war, was punished, but this gentleman was not charged for levying of war. If either of the houses of parliament should command such a thing as tends to the death of the king, it would be void in itself. Something he let fall of the parliament not being dissolved. My masters, for that you have heard some of my lords declare how, and in what manner, this was an authority of parliament, but it was clearly nothing at all; this gentleman goes by virtue of a power from the lord Fairfax. The next thing he urges in point of law was this, he comes by way of dilemma; saith he, either I must obey my general, or die by the law of war. He goes further, and urges the statute of 11 Henry 7. He comes further, and saith, in the 25th Edward 3, that concerns single persons, truly it concerns every man. The Indictment, you see how it is laid, it is for imagining and compassing the death of the king. The overt-acts in the Indictment, you have heard what they are; there must be more than one witness for treason. It is very true; but if one person prove one thing, another person another; if one swear he did cry, Justice, Justice, Execution, Execution, and another swear some other part, gentlemen, this was here before delivered to you for an overt-act. It is any thing that opens and makes it appear to the jury that he did do the things for which he is indicted; I say, any one of these, that they did meet together, and did consult in order to the putting the king to death. That they did meet in a traitorous assembly about the king's death, I shall say no more: you need not, I think, go from the bar.

* See No. 52, vol. 1, p. 869.

[The Jury go together, and after a little consultation among themselves, they returned to their places.]

Clerk of the Crown. Gentlemen of the Jury, are you agreed of your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our foreman.

Clerk. Daniel Axtell, hold up thy hand. Gentlemen, look upon the prisoner at the bar. How say you, is he Guilty of High Treason whereof he stands indicted and hath been arraigned, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Clerk. Look to him, keeper. What goods and chattles?

Jury. None to our knowledge.*

TRIAL OF COLONEL HACKER.

October 15, 1660.

Clerk of the Crown. Set Francis Hacker to the bar.† [Which was done accordingly.]

* See particulars of his Behaviour and Execution, infra.

† "Colonel Francis Hacker being appointed to appear also in this tragical scene, he was brought to the bar; where an indictment for compassing and imagining the death of the king was read against him: and to prove the accusation, witnesses were produced; who deposed, That he was one of the persons that were upon the guard, and kept the king prisoner; that the warrant for seeing the sentence that had been pronounced by the high court of justice put in execution, was directed to him with others; that, in prosecution of that commission, he had signed a warrant for executing the king; and that he took the king, by virtue of the warrant he had received, out of the custody of colonel Tomlinson, and conducted him to the scaffold on which he had been put to death. Colonel Hacker excepted not against any of the jury, finding all of them to be of the same stamp; and said little more in his defence, than that he had acted by the command of his superiors, and that he had always endeavoured to serve his country in all his public actions. So that his trial was quickly dispatched, and he declared guilty of high treason. He was a gentleman of a considerable estate, derived to him from his ancestors, who lived in the county of Leicester. He had passed through several degrees of command in the service of the parliament; and particularly distinguished himself at the battle of Worcester, in the head of a regiment of horse, which he had raised on that occasion for the defence of his country. He refused his assistance to support the usurpation of Mr. Richard Cromwell, though he had forced Clerk. Francis Hacker, hold up thy hand. These men that were last called are to pass upon you, &c. If you will challenge all, or any of them, you must challenge them when they come to the book before they are sworn.

L. C. Baron. You may challenge 35 peremptorily, but no more.

Hacker. My lord, I shall challenge none.

Tho. Bide, Robert Sheppard, William Dod, sir Tho. Allein, sir Hen. Wroth, Tho. Morris, Ralph Halsal, John Galliard, John Nichol, Tho. Ufman, Tho. Nicol, Christopher Adby, in all twelve. The Jury called and sworn.

Clerk of the Crown. Make Proclamation. If any man can inform my Lords the King's Justices, &c.

Clerk. Francis Hacker, hold up thy hand. Look upon the prisoner, you that are sworn of this Jury. You shall understand that Francis Hacker, prisoner at the bar, stands indicted, &c.

Mr. Serjeant Keeling. My Lords, and Gentlemen of this Jury, Francis Hacker, the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted, amongst others, for compassing and imagining the death of the late King Charles the First, of happy memory. The compassing and imagining is the treason itself; the other points, as convening, assembling, meeting together, and the actual villainy that followed all these, are but as evidences of that imagination. As to this person at the bar, our evidence will be thus: we shall make it appear to you that he was one of the persons that were upon the guard, and kept the king a prisoner, that he might be sure to be brought to that Mock Court of Injustice. Then it will appear to you that this prisoner at the bar was highly trusted by all those miscreants that thirsted for the king's blood, by their bloody warrant directed to him and others, to take the king's person into custody, and to see execution done. This was the person that kept him till he brought him to that fatal stage. That this warrant was lately brought from his own house by his own wife to the House of Lords. And then we shall shew you that this person set his hand to the warrant to the executioner for execution. That he did not do it ignorantly nor unwillingly, for he heard the warrant read. We shall make it appear that he was upon the scaffold, and had the axe in his hand.

Counsel. Crier, call Holland Simpson, co-

a knight, as it is called, upon him, and presented him with two swords; refusing to obey his orders, and joining with the commonwealth-party in his deposition. He had continued in the command of his regiment till he was taken in custody; having had assurances from Monk, that he should be fully indemnified. So that when he came to London, he made a visit to Monk, and was received with all the appearances of friendship and affection. But the next day after he had been thus caressed, he was seized, examined, and sent to the Tower." 3 Ludlow, 72.

lonel Tomlinson, Mr. Nunnally, Mr. Nutley, Hercules Hunks, and Benj. Francis: who were all sworn as witnesses.

Counsel. Mr. Simpson, speak your knowledge of the employment of the prisoner, touching the trial and execution of the king.

Hacker. My Lords, I will confess what I know in this case, to save your lordships the trouble. I confess I was upon the guard, and had a warrant to keep the king for his execution. [The Warrant being shewn to the prisoner, he confessed that to be the warrant.]

Counsel. After you had that warrant brought to you, did you by virtue of that direct another warrant for execution of the king? Did you not take the king (then prisoner) from the custody of colonel Tomlinson?

Hacker. No, Sir.

Counsel. We shall prove it; [the Warrant was read.] 'At the High Court of Justice for Trial, &c.' My Lord, at the time that this warrant was signed, the person of the king was in the custody of colonel Tomlinson; Did not you take and demand from colonel Tomlinson the person of the king, as soon as you received that warrant?

Hacker. No, Sir, I demanded him not.

Counsel. Colonel Tomlinson, tell my Lords the manner of that business.

Tomlinson. My Lords and Gentlemen of this Jury, I shall, as my memory enables me, make a faithful narrative of this business: I had indeed to do with the guard that had to do with the person of the king about St. James's. Being then an officer of the army, a colonel of horse, when the king came to St. James's, it was observed by some that there was too great an access of people admitted to the king; and within one day or two after, there was a party of halberteers appointed, for the stricter observing the guard; they were commanded by three gentlemen, of whom this prisoner at the bar was one; the orders every day for removing the person of the king were commonly directed to four persons, and those were myself, lieut. col. Cobbet, captain Merryman, and one more; but the guards that still went along were the halberteers. So that every day when the king did go to Westminster, he went to sir Robert Cotton's house, and so far I went with him, and no farther; I never went with him, nor saw him, at that pretended High-Court of Justice. When he used to go to the High-Court of Justice, commonly (every time indeed) the serjeant Dendy (as I remember his name was), he used to come and demand that the king should go to the High Court of Justice, and colonel Hacker did ordinarily go with him, with the halberteers. It was my custom to stay in the room till he came back again; these orders continued during the time of his trial. After the sentence was given, on the day whereon the execution was to be done, it was ordered, (which order may be produced, if significant) that the guards that were for the security of the person of the king should cease, when a warrant from the High Court of Justice should be produced: I would not omit any thing that I well remember; and this I remember, that the night before the execution, the king called me into his chamber, and told me several things; I will take the occasion to trouble you with a short discourse of it: He told me of some legacies he had given; he told me he had prepared something that he would speak the next day; and in the close of it, he desired me that I would not leave him; (for I speak it in truth), there were many times several incivilities offered to him; and though I was upon a duty that was of a harsh and unpleasing nature to me, and did desire several times to be released from it, (as I believe it is well known to some), yet I did not admit any time that any incivility should be offered to him; people would take tobacco before him, and keep their hats on before him, I always checked them for it; he was pleased to have a consideration of that care that I had in that capacity I then stood. That very night before his death he was pleased to give me a legacy, which was a gold tooth-picker and case that he kept in his pocket. The next day, when the warrant came, the guard of halberters went with him through St. James's Park, I was present, walking near the king, the bishop of London (now of Canterbury) was with him, and some others. As we were going through the Park, he was pleased to discourse something of what he had been discoursing before, touching his burial; he wished that the duke of Richmond, and some others that he should bring, should take care of it. That morning, in the Park, he told me he had been thinking of what he had said the night before. He told me he had some thoughts that his son might come to bury him, and desired he might not suddenly be buried; I gave him assurance I would communicate his desire, and so I did: When he came to Whitehall, he went into a room in the gallery, (I know not the name,) the guard stood in the outer room there. There was a gentleman that came to me there, and told me he was endeavouring to present a letter from the prince to the king, and told me he could not get an opportunity; I said he should not want an opportunity, if I could help him; it was Mr. Henry Seymour; it was delivered, and the king read it, and he gave several things in charge to Mr. Seymour, to acquaint the prince with, and was pleased to mention to him something of civility that I had shewn him in his imprisonment; the effect and fruit of it I find, and do most humbly acknowledge before all the world my thanks to his most gracious majesty the king, and to the Lords and Commons. After Mr. Seymour was gone from him, (I do not well remember the time, whether it was twelve, one, or two o'clock,) col. Hacker came in, and there was present with him the two other gentlemen that were named in the warrant, as I remember, I am sure col. Hacker, if my memory fail me not, did produce the warrant. Myself, and those gentlemen that were concerned in the former orders, looked upon this warrant, by which the orders which we had were at an end. I must confess I did not, nor none of those did tell him, that the orders for security of his person were at an end; but col. Hacker did go in to him, and after a little while col. Hacker comes to the door, and the king was coming forth, and he told me that the king desired I should go along with him: and indeed the night before, when the king told me that he had prepared something to speak, he desired I would not leave him. So col. Hacker led him forth, the bishop of London followed him, and I followed the bishop of London: the guards were prepared without, and they went on to the scaffold; when we came to the scaffold, I went so far as to the entrance upon it; the king was upon it, and had looked a little while about it, and was thinking to have spoken over, but he turned about to me, and began to direct his speech to me. I cannot trouble you with what the king said, for I cannot remember it: but that col. Hacker was there in prosecution of that warrant, and upon that warrant our orders were at an end, I do aver.

Counsel. You delivered him upon that warrant, did you?

Tomlinson. He went and received the king upon that warrant: it was a chamber that was known then by the name of the Horn-Chamber, and there the king was in the inner room: this is the substance of all.

Counsel. We will trouble you with one or two witnesses more.

Counsel. Mr. Tomlinson, did Mr. Hacker, or his soldiers, take tobacco to the offence of the king?

Tomlinson. I do not say that any tobacco was taken there by Mr. Hacker: but the soldiers would be stepping in, and take tobacco at his chamber in St. James's, and committed other incivilities.

Counsel. We have proved that the prisoner did demand, and had the person of the king: Now we will prove to you that himself had the boldness to make a warrant in pursuance of the former, for the execution of the king.

Counsel. Crier, call Mr. Huncks. [He being sworn, said.]

Huncks. My lords, and gentlemen of the Jury, that day the king died, a little before the hour he died, I was in Ireton's chamber, where Ireton and Harrison were in bed together, there was Cromwell, col. Hacker, lieutenant-col. Phayre, Axtell, and myself: standing at the door: this warrant for the execution was there produced, and you [looking upon Mr. Hacker at the bar,] were reading of it, but Cromwell addressed himself to me, commanding me, by virtue of that warrant, to draw up an order for the Executioner: I refused it, and upon refusing of it there happened some cross passages. Cromwell would have no delay. There was a little table that stood by the door, and pen, ink, and paper being there, Cromwell stepped and writ. (I conceive he wrote that which he would have had me to write :) As soon as he had done writing, he gives the pen over to Hacker; Hacker, he stoops and did write, (I cannot say what he writ,) away goes Cromwell, and then Axtell; we all went out; afterwards they went into another room.

Counsel. What followed?

Huncks. Immediately the king came out, and was murdered.

Mr. Secretary Morrice. Mr. Huncks, you did tell us in the Tower, (when we were sent by his majesty's council to examine you, and others there,) that col. Hacker did then sign that warrant for nominating and appointing the execution.

Huncks. My lord, Cromwell comes to me, and bids me write a warrant for that purpose: I refusing of it, Cromwell writes himself, and Hacker writing on the same paper, what should I conceive but that it was the warrant? (the king presently after coming to the Scaffold).

Counsel. Did Cromwell give you no bad names because you would not write that order? Did not he say you were a coward?

Huncks. He said I was a froward, peevish fellow.

Counsel. Did Hacker only write his name, or give directions in the drawing up of the order?

Huncks. I conceive he only writ his name.

Counsel. My lord, we have only that eye-witness.

Huncks. Hacker confessed to the gentleman jailor of the Tower, that if he did do it he did it by order.

Mr. Secretary Morrice and the Lord Annesley, sworn.*

Counsel. Mr. Secretary, we desire you would be pleased to tell my lords what col. Hacker the prisoner at the bar did confess to you, and others touching this business.

Mr. Secretary. When col. Huncks (for that title he now assumes,) was brought over out of Ireland, and committed to the Tower of London, there was three of the council, by order of the board, sent to examine him, sir Anthony Ashly-Cooper, Mr. Annesley, and myself: In obedience to that order we repaired to the Tower, and had col. Huncks brought before us; we told him, that he (being one of those which were appointed by warrant from the supposititious High Court of Justice to carry on the execution of the king, and see it done,) must needs know who was the Executioner: Whereunto he answered, that he, for his part, did not know who was the Executioner, for the warrant whereby the Executioner was nominated and appointed was refused to be signed by him, but col. Hacker signed it, and therefore col. Hacker must know it. Accordingly, upon our return, we made our report to the board, and upon this there was an order that col. Hacker should be sent for, taken into custody, and brought before the lords of the council: Accordingly he was apprehended, and the same three counsellors were sent down to examine him. We took him into a private room, and examined him, and told him, (amongst other things,) that he being the man that (as we are informed,) did sign the warrant for the nominating and appointing the Executioner, doubtless he must needs know who that was; at first he said he did not sign this warrant: I told him I would have him well advised what he said; for if you deny it, it will be proved by such a man, naming col. Huncks, and that you will do yourself a great prejudice if you deny that; saith he, 'I do believe I did sign the 'Warrant for appointing the Executioner;' this is all I can say.

Lord Annesley. Gentlemen of the jury, it is very true as you have been told already, that I was amongst those that the council sent to the Tower of London, first to examine col. Huncks, and Mr. Cook, that hath been condemned, Hulet, and some other prisoners. We did examine col. Huncks, and he did by his examination acquit himself from signing that warrant that he was charged with, being one of the three appointed to see execution done; but they appointed another to sign the warrant, (col. Huncks refusing,) and upon his refusing, (as he said,) Cromwell, that urged him to it, said he was a cowardly fellow, or something to that purpose: when we examined him about the person in the frock, he said he knew nothing of that, but that col. Hacker signed that warrant for execution; this examination being reported to the council, the lords sent for Hacker. I think upon notice col. Hacker came; he had been of the army, and continued till that time an officer. When he came thither, the lords of the council having notice of it, commanded the same persons formerly appointed to go out and examine him; we had him into a little room belonging to the clerks of the council, and examined him to that point concerning the man that cut off the king's head, whether he knew any thing of it? He did affirm positively he did not know; we told him that he was the man by testimony that signed a warrant for execution of the king, and then certainly he must know the person that he appointed by his warrant; he said, if I did sign any warrant it was by command of the general; that being but hypothetical, we thought it meet to make it more positive, whereupon we asked him whether he was the man that signed the warrant, or no? Thereupon, (as I remember, and as the examination, which was all written with mine own hand, doth help my memory,) he did say he did believe he did sign such a warrant; thereupon he was asked further, how could it be possible that he could forget the man, if he signed the warrant; he knew who the man was that was appointed; he said for that, that he did believe the warrant was read to him, and that therein the man's name might be, but he could not now remember his name; this was the effect of his examination and confession.

* "Memorandum. That Secretary Morrice and Mr. Annesley, President of the Council, were both in commission for the trial of the prisoners, and sat upon the bench, but there being occasion to make use of their testimony against Hacker, one of the prisoners, they both came off from the bench, and were sworn, and gave evidence, and did not go up to the bench again during that man's trial: and agreed by the Court they were good witnesses, though in commission, and might be made use of." Ke-tyng, p. 12.

Counsel. Mr. Francis, did you see col. Hacker, at the time of the execution, upon the scaffold?

Francis. Yes, I did see him as a principal commander there; I was coming out of Westminster into London, about half an hour before the king came upon the scaffold; coming near the scaffold, as soon as I was engaged in the throng, (when I had passed about eight or ten yards,) I could not pass backward nor forward; I was enforced to stand there: during that time I saw the scaffold, and the ax, and the block, taken up by divers people; and principally I saw a man that is not here, he is in custody, I saw him take it up, and try it with his thumb, and lay it down; this was James Berry, he came off, and came not upon the scaffold again, unless disguised.

Counsel. Did you see Hacker there? Did you see him upon the scaffold when the king came on?

Francis. I did see him, he was there; his majesty came to the side of the scaffold next to St. James's; he looked that way and smiled; after a while the block and ax laying down about the middle of the scaffold, there was a black cloth hung about the rails of the scaffold.

Counsel. We have another evidence, the prisoner hath confessed enough; but we have proved that he had the king in custody; he confessed that he believed he did sign the warrant, and that he at the time of execution was there to manage it. What do you say for yourself?

Hacker. Truly, my lord, I have no more to say for myself; but that I was a soldier, and under command, and what I did was by that commission you have read.

L. C. Baron. Can you deny any thing that Mr. Secretary and Mr. Annesley have declared?

Hacker. I cannot tell what I might then say, the gentlemen were very strict with me; truly I have been no counsellor, no adviser, nor abetter of it, but in obedience to the command over me I did act. My desire hath been ever for the welfare of my Country, and that civil power might stand.

L. C. Baron. Have you yet resolved who you gave the warrant for execution to?

Hacker. No, my lord, I delivered none.

L. C. Baron. But you know who it was directed to?

Hacker. No indeed, my lord; he pleased to ask col. Haucks whether I read this warrant or no.

L. C. Baron. This is all you have to say for yourself?

Hacker. Yes, my lord.

L. C. Baron. Then, col. Hacker, for that which you say for yourself, that you did it by command, you must understand that no power on earth could authorize such a thing, no command in such a case can excuse you. There is a twofold obedience, a passive obedience, to suffer rather than do things unlawful; and an active obedience, to do that only which is lawful; and therefore this will not excuse your obedience to those unlawful commands.—Gentlemen of the jury, you see the prisoner at the bar stands indicted for compassing and imagining the death of the late king; and there are several open acts set forth in the indictment, which tend to prove that matter; one is assembling and meeting together, another is sitting upon the king, another sentencing, and at last concludes with the murder of the king, as the consequence of all. Any thing that tends to the proving of this compassing and imagining his death in any one of these particulars, that is an evidence to you to prove the whole indictment. This gentleman was commander of halberters; col. Tomlinson saith, that though he kept the guards that were about the king's person, this gentleman, with two other persons, brought halberters, that there might not be such frequent access as formerly to the king; there is one act. He commands these halberters at that time, when the business was in agitation, before that High-Court, as they called it. You see after the sentence was given that he was one of the persons to whom the warrant for execution was directed; you see afterwards there was a consulting together, Cromwell, Ireton, Harrison, and Axtell, were in the chamber, when col. Haucks refused to sign; the prisoner signed the warrant, but knows not the person to whom it was directed: you see besides col. Tomlinson's testimony, who saith further, that when they were discharged, col. Hacker went in, and the king was brought out presently after to that fatal place. Col. Haucks swears that when the warrant was offered to him he refused it; that Hacker, the prisoner at the bar, signed a warrant, though he doth not remember the name of the person to whom; it appears by two witnesses (honourable persons) he confessed he signed it, but he did not know the person to whom directed. You see another witness, Benjamin Francis, he saith he saw Hacker upon the scaffold with the king.—He doth not deny the fact; you need go no further, it is very plain he had a hand in this business, a principal agent in it; he that brought the king to the scaffold, he that had the care in managing that business, he that signed the warrant to the executioner, either he is guilty of compassing the death of the king, or no man can be said to be guilty.

The Jury went together, and after some little consultation returned to their places.

Clerk of the Crown. Gentlemen of the jury, are you agreed on your verdict? Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our foreman.

Clerk. Francis Hacker, hold up thy hand. Gentlemen, look upon the prisoner at the bar, how say you, is he guilty of the high-treason, whereof he stands indicted, and hath been arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Clerk. Look to him, keeper.

Clerk. What goods and chattels, &c.

Jury. None that we know of.*

TRIAL OF WILLIAM HULET.†

October 15, 1660.

Clerk of the Crown. Set William Hulet to the bar, [who was brought accordingly.] William Hulet, alias Houlet, hold up thy hand. Those persons that were last called of the jury are to pass, &c. if you will challenge them, or any of them, you must challenge them when they come to the book before they be sworn.

L. C. Baron. Understand you have power to challenge five and thirty men, and not above; you may challenge them without cause shewn. If you have cause for any other you may challenge them also. If you will have pen, ink, and paper, you may have them.

Hulet. Truly, my lord, I cannot write but a very little; I shall not need them. I did not understand my Indictment well, I desire to hear it again.

L. C. Baron. You will hear it read again.

Clerk. Sir Thomas Allen, sir Henry Wroth, Tho. Bide, Robert Sheppard, Thomas Morris, Ralph Halsal, John Gallyard, John Nichol, Thomas Ufinan, Christopher Abdy, William Dod, in all twelve. Jury called and sworn.

Clerk of the Crown. William Hulet, alias Houlet, hold up thy hand. You gentlemen that are sworn, look upon the prisoner.

Clerk. You shall understand that he stands indicted of high-treason, by the name of William Hulet, alias Houlet, late of Westminster in the county of Middlesex, gent. for that he as a false traitor, &c. [here the indictment was read,] unto which indictment he hath pleaded Not Guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon God and the country, which country you are: now your charge is to enquire, &c.

* See particulars of his Behaviour and Execution, infra.

† "Capt. William Hulet was also accused, and tried, for cutting off the king's head, or at least for being one of the persons that stood masked upon the scaffold during his execution: and though divers creditable witnesses deposed, that Gregory Bandon, who was common hangman, had confessed and owned to have executed the king; yet the jury found him guilty of the Indictment. But the Court, being sensible of the injury done to him, procured his reprieve." 3 Ludlow 73.

VOL. V.

Sir Edward Turner. May it please your lordships, and you gentlemen that are sworn of this jury, we are now entering upon the last act in this sad tragedy of the murder of the late king; there have been before you some of the judges, the counsel, the chaplain, and the guard; this prisoner at the bar, in the last place, was one of those, which came with a frock on his body, and a vizor on his face, to do the work. The course of our evidence will be this; first, we shall prove by witnesses that saw him, and knew him, that he was thus disguised; he hath confessed that he was upon the scaffold, that he hath had several preferments; and I fear it will appear, that it was he, that gave that fatal blow; for he hath confessed he had an hundred pounds given him for his service therein; and we doubt not but to pluck off his vizor by and by. The indictment is for compassing and imagining the death of his late majesty of glorious memory; if we prove to you any circumstantial Overt-Act whereby you shall be convinced of this, you are to find him guilty.

Richard Gittens sworn.

Counsel. Mr. Gittens, tell my lord and the jury what you know concerning the prisoner at the bar.

Gittens. The thing is this, my lord, this gentleman at the bar and myself were both in a regiment in one company as serjeants about twelve or thirteen years together. About a day or two before the king came to the scaffold, col. Hewson did give notice to the lieutenant that we should come to him, about 38 of us, and he put us all to our oaths, that we should say nothing of what they did; he swore us to the book; after he had sworn us, he asked us if we would undertake to do such an act; if we would we should have an hundred pounds down, and preferment in the army as long as that stood, and the parliament. Afterwards we refused, every person; we thought capt. Hulet did refuse; after all refused, it seems he did undertake to do the deed. When the king was brought on the scaffold, we were in Scotland-yard, and they were upon the guard in the Banqueting-Chamber; when they were there I laid down my arms, and got into the company; capt. Webb kept the guard, with his halbert in his hand, by the scaffold, and I did bustle to come near to them; then I returned back. Hulet (as far as I can guess) when the king came on the scaffold for his execution, and said, Executioner, is the block fast? then he fell upon his knees.

Counsel. Who did?

Gittens. Hulet, to ask him forgiveness; by his speech I thought it was he; captain Atkins said, who would not undertake to do this fact? I told him I would not do it for all the city of London; no, nor I neither for all the world, saith Atkins; you shall see Hulet quickly come to preferment; and presently after he was made captain-lieutenant.

Counsel. Was he with his regiment that day?

4 G

Gittens. We could not see him with the regiment all that day; he was never absent at any time before.

Counsel. Did you know his voice?

Gittens. Yes, sir.

Counsel. Did you mark the proportion of his body, or his habit, what disguise he was in?

Gittens. He had a pair of freeze trunk breeches, and a vizor, with a grey beard; and after that time col. Hewson called him 'father grey beard,' and most of the army besides, he cannot deny it.

Hulet. I desire as to this witness; he doth alledge that he and I were serjeants in one company, which I deny; he was not in that company I was in; I desire to know of him how he comes to know that I was there at that time.

Gittens. By your voice.

Hulet. I will swear that this man was with the regiment under the scaffold; where were you at that time when the act was done?

Gittens. Where was I? By captain Webb.

Hulet. Where was he?

Gittens. At the door of the Banqueting-house.

Hulet. Was you on the scaffold, or no, sir?

Gittens. I was on the scaffold end.

Hulet. My lord, I desire you to consider what this person saith, that he was upon the guard in Scotland yard, and at the scaffold with capt. Webb. My lord, I desire again, whereas he said I had a grey beard, let any man besides himself say that ever I was called by that name grey-beard, throughout the regiment.

Stammers sworn.

Counsel. What have you to say concerning the prisoner at the bar?

Stammers. He was a captain-lieutenant to col. Hewson's troop; when I had entered myself into that troop I was a while in Dublin, and I was commanded by the prisoner at the bar, I and the rest, to march to a place called Lutterels-town, about 5 miles beyond Dublin; the prisoner at the bar came thither to us two days after; then being in his chamber he sent for me up; I went up and sat down; he examined where I had served: I told him I did formerly belong to the lord of Inchiqueen; he asked me if I was ever in the king's army; with that he walks about the room two or three turns; saith he, I was the man that be-headed king Charles, and for doing it I had an hundred pounds, saying, I was a serjeant at that time.

Hulet. I desire to ask him a question; I confess—(what is your name?)

Counsel. Stammers, his name is Stammers.

Hulet. Such a one was under my command: I think I have not seen you these eight years: I desire to know when these words were spoken, and the place.

Stammers. I say in Lutterels town, in your own chamber, and that was nine or ten years ago.

Hulet. It is about eight years ago since I left that command: Who was by at that time?

Stammers. No body.

Hulet. 'Tis strange: How long had you been in the troop before?

Stammers. I was in Dublin about a fortnight's time, then you sent for me, and I came to Lutterels town; the first time that I came to the troop was at Dublin, and then you came to me with two orders from Hewson, and then you did pretend you was brother to one Mr. Chambers, and then we went and quartered in Lutterels town.

Hulet. My lord, his examination in Ireland and this doth not agree; you did deny this before Baldwin a trooper; I desire his examination may be read (which was accordingly read, and agreed with the testimony now given). I desire he may mention what man that was, that I sent for him.

Stammers. I cannot tell what man.

Hulet. My lord, I desire that servant may be either named or produced.

Stammers. I cannot remember the man, it was seven years ago.

Hulet. Then again upon another account, as he speaks before, that I should examine him where he had been, and that he should say at the lord Inchiqueen's.

Captain Toogood sworn.

Toogood. I shall first give your lordships and the jury what I have heard others say concerning the prisoner at the bar, and that is first colonel Hewson; I was in 1650, about September, in Dublin castle, about some business with Hewson; Captain Hulet, the prisoner at the bar, came into the room, he talked with col. Hewson a little while; I observed them very familiar, and I asked Hewson what he was, he told me he was his captain lieutenant of horse; I desired to know where he had him? he told me he made him so from a serjeant, and a very mettled fellow he was; it was he that did the king's business for him upon the scaffold. In 1653, there was a disbanding of the army in Ireland; this gentleman was then continued captain lieutenant in Pretty's regiment: I discoursed with Pretty concerning him, and one part of it, I remember, was about the king's death; and he did tell me that he was assured by colonel Hewson, that Hulet either cut off the king's head, or held it up, and said, 'Behold the head of a Traitor;' col. Pretty would not tell me which of the two it was; but I saw the person that did it, and methought he did resemble this person. About 12 months after I came to live near the prisoner in Ireland; once I remember at one Mr. Smith's at the White-horse in Carlow I met him there, and I was asking the prisoner at the bar the question, whether he was the man that cut off the king's head, or not? saith he, Why do you ask me this question? I told him, I had heard so by several, namely, by Hewson and Pretty; upon that he said, 'Well, what I did I will not be ashamed of; if it were to do again, I would do it.' Once since that time, about half a year afterwards, I was in the same place, and there talking with him about the king's death; he was telling me it was true, he was one of the two persons, that were disguised upon the scaffold. I desired to know what if the king had refused to submit to the block? saith he, there were staples placed about the scaffold, and I had that about me that would have compelled him; or words to that effect; other times I have heard him speak something to this. November the last, in the Queen's county at Maryborough, colonel Jones took upon him to be governor, and to chuse two out of a regiment that might be the rulers of the people, legislators I think they called them; I did discourse about the business again, and did oppose it all: after a while he began to be very hot in the business about Lambert: said I, you were heretofore too forward; says he, if it be the business of the king's head I will never deny it, call me to an account when you will: I have observed in Ireland, that it hath been generally reported that he was either the man that cut off the king's head, or that held it up, as I said before, and I have heard them sometimes call him Grandsire Greybeard.

Hulet. My lord, I do confess I know the gentleman very well, we were in a regiment together; I never discoursed with any concerning this, but only once at a place going from Cullen to Munster we did drink at a place called Goran, we were discoursing about the business of the king, the justification of the cutting off his head; saith Stammers, I did hear that you were one of the persons for that purpose; said I, they that say so, do me wrong: saith he, it is no matter if you were so, for it was a just act: said I, whether it was or no I have nothing to do to justify it; he was speaking, as I hope to be saved, I would have done it.

Walter Davis sworn.

Counsel. What can you say, Mr. Davis, to this business?

Davis. Gentlemen, that which I can say is this; in January last was two years I was at Dublin, I met captain Hulet, he invited me to take share of a pint of wine, I went with him to a tavern; when we were in the tavern he called for a pint of wine, and I called for another; before we had drank the last pint of wine, said I to captain Hulet, I pray resolve me this one question; it is reported that you took up the king's head, and said, 'Behold the head of a Traitor;' Sir, said he, it was a question I never resolved any man, though often demanded; yet, saith he, whosoever said it then it matters not, I say it now, it was the head of a Traitor.

Hulet. I confess we did meet together, as you say, but I must and do deny the words.

Lieut. Colonel Nelson sworn.

Nelson. My lords, and gentlemen of the jury, upon a discourse with colonel Axtell, as I related once this day,* about six years since, in many other discourses we fell to discourse about the death of the late king; I supposing he had been acquainted with that affair, I desired him to tell me those two persons disguised upon the scaffold; he told me I knew the persons as well as himself; saith he, they have been upon service with you many a time; pray, sir, said I, let me know their names? truly, said he, we would not employ persons of low spirits that we did not know, and therefore we pitched upon two stout fellows; who were those, said I? It was Walker and Hulet, they were both serjeants in Kent when you were there, and stout men; Who gave the blow, said I? saith he, poor Walker, and Hulet took up the head; pray, said I, what reward had they? I am not certain whether they had thirty pounds apiece, or thirty pounds between them.

Hulet. Pray let Mr. Axtell speak to this, he is hard by.

Colonel Tomlinson sworn.

Counsel. Pray tell my lords your knowledge in this business.

Tomlinson. My lords, and gentlemen of this jury, I cannot punctually remember what their habits were; they had close garments to their bodies, they had hair on their faces, one was gray to the best of my remembrance, the other was flaxen.

Counsel. Can you tell who struck the blow?

Tomlinson. My lord, I cannot remember, but I think he with the gray hair on his face did it.

Nelson. My lord, I will not positively say it, but it came lately to my mind, that I did hear in Ireland by col. Pretty that Hulet did it; my lord, this colonel Pretty is alive in Ireland.

Benjamin Francis sworn.

Francis. My lords, and gentlemen of the jury, as to the prisoner at the bar, he was very active in that horrid act; there was two of them had both cloaths alike, their frocks were close to their bodies, (as I remember,) they were rather in butchers habits of woollen; one had a black hat on his head cock'd up, and a black beard, and the other had a gray grisled perriwig hung down very low; I affirm that he that cut off the king's head was in the gray perriwig, and I believe this was about that man's stature, (pointing to Mr. Hulet,) and his beard was of the same colour, if he had any. I was coming from Westminster, the scaffold was encompassed within with a great guard of soldiers of Red-coats, I think commanded by Biscoe.

Hulet. Was you upon the scaffold?

Francis. No, Sir, there was none of my constitution upon the scaffold.

Counsel. Fuller evidence I think cannot be expected; you have heard all the witnesses; what can you say for yourself?

Hulet. My lord, here are several witnesses examined concerning the business, and for my part I do not understand the law; I must leave it to the Court. I can upon the other account prove where I was at that very time; I can in the next place, my lord, since I came into London, for I did not hear it before, I can tell you who was the person, that did that act; I can bring forty and forty witnesses that will prove, who they were that did it, as I have been informed by several witnesses, that they know who was the person that did it: Upon the other account, I can prove where I was that day, but I did not know, when I was arraigned, what was laid to my Charge; here were some Examinations taken before my Lord Mayor concerning the person or persons, that did that act. [Here he offered a paper, a copy of the said Examinations, subscribed Mary Brandon, and divers others.]

* See Axtell's Trial, and the Note p. 1156.

Mr. Sec. Morrice. Was you not examined in the Tower?

Hulet. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Sec. Morrice. Did not we tell you that you were charged with cutting off the head of the king?

Hulet. Yes, Sir, you did tell me so.

L. C. Baron. Then you had time to provide your witnesses.

Hulet. I was a close prisoner.

L. C. Baron. Where were you on the day of Execution?

Hulet. I was a prisoner then at Whitehall.

L. C. Baron. For what?

Hulet. Upon this account we were taken up, about seven or nine of us were taken up, we were all serjeants, three of colonel Hacker's, the rest of Pride's and Fairfax's, and about ten o'clock at night were discharged.

L. C. Baron. For what was you imprisoned?

Hulet. For refusing to be upon the scaffold.

Burden. It was a common speech among the soldiers, that Hulet cut off the king's head.

L. C. Baron. How long before did you see Hulet upon the guard?

Burden. The day before, but not that day, nor the day after.

L. C. Baron. William Hulet, the evidence against you is twofold, one concerning the cutting off the king's head, the other that you were in a frock; if it be proved that you did not cut off the king's head, yet if you were in a frock in that place, it will not excuse you; if you have anything to say I shall be glad to hear it.

Hulet. I desire the persons may be examined upon Oath, prisoners and others, who was the person that did it; I mean Hacker, Huncks and Phayre.

L. C. Baron. You that are the prisoner, for that which concerns Hacker and Phayre, you know what conditions they are in, one already tried for his life, the other a prisoner in the Tower; and Hacker saith himself he doth not know the person at all; you that are prisoner at the bar, the Court conceives you have had time to get your witnesses here; you were informed of the business before you came here, yet notwithstanding, it is conceived there are some here that can say something tending to the information of the jury, but they are not to be admitted upon Oath against the king.

Sheriff's Officer examined.

Sheriff's Officer. My lord, all that I can say in this business is this; one of our fellows that belong to our master, the sheriff, John Rooten by name, he and I were talking about this very story, and he did acquaint me with this, That he was in Rosemary Lane, a little after the execution of the king, drinking with the hangman, that he did urge him whether he did this fact: God forgive me, saith the hangman, I did it, and I had forty half-crowns for my pains.

Abraham Smith examined.

Smith. My lord, as soon as that fatal blow was given I was walking about Whitehall, down came a file of musketeers; the first word they said was this, Where be the bargemen? Answer was made, Here are none; away they directed the hangman into my boat; going into the boat he gave one of the soldiers a half-crown; said the soldiers, Watermen, away with him, be gone quickly; but I fearing this hangman had cut off the king's head, I trembled that he should come into my boat, but dared not to examine him on shore for fear of the soldiers; so out I lauched, and having got a little way in the water, said I, who the Devil have I got in my boat? Says my fellow, says he, why? I directed my speech to him, saying, Are you the hangman that cut off the king's head? No, as I am a sinner to God, saith he, not I; he shook every joint of him; I knew not what to do; I rowed away a little further, and fell to a new examination of him, when I had got him a little further: Tell me true, said I, are you the hangman that hath cut off the king's head? I cannot carry you, said I; No, saith he, I was fetched with a troop of horse, and I was kept a close prisoner at Whitehall, and truly I did not do it; I was kept a close prisoner all the while, but they had my instruments. I said I would sink the boat if he would not tell me true; but he denied it with several protestations.

William Cox examined.

Cox. When my lord Capell, duke of Hamilton, and the earl of Holland, were beheaded in Palace-yard in Westminster, my lord Capell asked the common hangman, said he, Did you cut off my master's head? Yes, saith he. Where is the instrument that did it? He then brought the ax. This is the same ax, are you sure? said my lord. Yes, my lord, saith the hangman, I am very sure it is the same. My lord Capell took the ax, and kissed it, and gave him five pieces of gold. I heard him say, Sirrah, wert thou not afraid? Saith the hangman, they made me cut it off, and I had thirty pounds for my pains.

Richard Abell examined.

Abell. My lord, in the house of one Mr.

Bramston I did hear Gregory himself confess that he cut off the king's head.

Lord Chief Baron. You that are the prisoner at the bar, the Court is willing to give all full scope, as far as may be, to examine the truth of the fact; as they would not condemn the innocent, so they would not acquit the guilty: Do you desire further time to examine the truth of it, before it be put upon the Jury?

Hulet. I do confess I do not understand the laws, I desire a little further time; I desire the Jury may be withdrawn; I desire a fortnight's time, but submit to the Court.

A Stranger examined.

Stranger. My lord, I was with my master in the company of Brandon the hangman, and my master asked Brandon whether he cut off the king's head, or no? He confessed in my presence that he was the man that did cut off the king's head.

Lord Chief Baron. You that are the prisoner at the bar, the Court was willing to give you as much time as they could by law; the Jury hath been charged, and evidence given; all those witnesses have been examined that we could hear of now for your advantage; I will say something to you. It was here said, and given in evidence, that Axtell did send a boat to fetch the common hangman: If we knew more that might tend to your advantage, it should be repeated. You Gentlemen of the Jury, mark it; There is first Gittens, he swears that he was in the same regiment that you were in 12 or 13 years together; he saith that he and others were called together upon their oaths, and you among the rest; and there was an oath of secrecy, asking them if they would do such an act; they all refused to do it, so did you; but he said, the day of execution of the king this Gittens got among them, and one captain Webb kept the door, and he saw you fall before the king, and ask the king forgiveness; he said he heard your voice, and so knew you; and that the day after captain Atkins said, you shall see Hulet shortly come to preferment; and he saith he did not see you in the regiment that day; and that Hewson and all the regiment used to call you Father Grey-beard. Stammers he saith, that you was captain-lieutenant to col. Hewson's troops; and you coming to Lutterels town. asked him several particulars, whether he had been in the king's army? Walking up and down, you said you were the man be-headed king Charles, and for that you had one hundred pounds; this he swears positively. Sampson Tongood, he swears he saw you come to col. Hewson's in 1650, you talked to him very familiarly; when you were gone he asked who you were? he told him you were a captain-lieutenant of horse; and he said that you were a very mettled fellow, and did the king's business upon the scaffold; that afterwards col. Hewson's regiment being discharged, you came to be of Pretty's regiment, and that he told this gentleman that he was assured by col. Hewson that it was you that either cut off the king's head, or took it up and said, 'Behold the head of a Traitor.' He saith afterwards, that in 1654 in Carlow he asked you the same question, and you demanded of him, Who told him; he answered he was told by several persons, namely, Hewson and Pretty; you said; what I did I will not be ashamed of, and if it were to do I would do it again; he says again, at another time, that you were one of the two persons who were then upon the scaffold, and that there were staples to enforce the king to submit, if he struggled; I had that about me which would have done the business. And he says, in November last you came to a meeting upon a summons of col. Jones, and then did avouch Lambert's quarrel; he said you were too forward heretofore; you said, if it be the business of the king's head I will never deny it, call me to an account when you will. He heard many call you 'Grandsire Grey-beard.' Then there is another witness, I think his name is Davis, he was in discourse with you drinking two pints of wine; it is reported (says he) you took up the king's head, and said, 'Behold the head of a Traitor;' and he desired you to resolve him whether it was so or no; you said again, it had been demanded often, but you never resolved any man: you said, whosoever said it then, I say now, it was the head of a traitor. Nelson, he swears, That about six years since he was in discourse with Axtell about it, and Axtell told him they were a couple of stout men to your knowledge, (speaking to Nelson;) I was one to do in that affair; we made choice of two, Walker and Hulet: who gave the blow? Walker; but Hulet took up the head. Col. Tomlinson, he says, that there were two on the scaffold, one that had a gray beard, and the other somewhat flaxen. Nelson also heard by col. Pretty, that you did it. And then Ben. Francis, he says, they had both frocks alike, one a black beard, and a gray-griated perriwig, and believes he was about your stature. This is the substance of what the witnesses have said against you. Gentlemen, you hear what has been proved on behalf of the prisoner, that is, if you believe the witnesses that are ~~not~~ upon oath, that Brandon confessed it, and denied he did it: Several witnesses that say Brandon confessed he did it, and that he told them of a sum of money that was given him. Gentlemen of the Jury, you see the whole point in this case, the indictment is for compassing and imagining the death of his late majesty; the evidence goes two ways, part of the witnesses one way, part another way; if you believe either of them, then you ought to find that the defendant is guilty; if either he was in the frock, though he was not the man that did it; or if you find he did it, it is a clear testimony of his imagining and compassing the death of the king. Now it rests upon you to consider the evidence that is given for the common hang-man, that he should be the man that did it, that the prisoner at the bar did not cut off the head: On the other side, if you do believe he was one of the two in the frocks, upon the relations of these persons, Pretty, Hewson, and Axtell; if you believe it upon these relations, and after his own confession, that if he was to do it again, he would do it; then upon this evidence that is given you, he is to be found guilty, though he did not cut off the king's head. You have heard the evidence on all sides, it rests upon you; pray, go together, and consider of your verdict. I have forgotten one thing. God forbid I should omit any thing that may be as well for advantage, as against the prisoner at the bar: If you take it singly, if you have nothing, of other proof, what another man says of me doth not charge me, unless there be something of my own; what you have heard from himself, and what you have heard by relations from others, that is to be left to you. It is my duty to tell you, that which is said by another of me, that alone is not a pregnant evidence; you must remember withal what is sworn positively, what he said himself; this being said I must leave it to you. Pray go together.

[After a more than ordinary time of consultation, the Jury returned to their places.]

Clerk. Are you agreed of your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our foreman.

Clerk. William Hulet, alias Holet, hold up thy hand. Gentlemen, look upon the prisoner at the bar: how say you, is he Guilty of the High-Treason, &c.

Foreman. Guilty.

Clerk. Look to him, keeper. What goods and chattels?

Jury. None, to our knowledge.

[And then the Court adjourned till to-morrow morning seven o'clock, in this place.]

October 16th, 1660.

Sessions House in the Old Bailey.

Proclamation being made.

Clerk of the Crown. Set Isaac Pennington, Henry Marten, Gilbert Millington, Robert Tichburn, Owen Roe, Robert Lilburn, Henry Smith, Edm. Harvey, John Downs, Vincent Potter, Augustin Garland, Simon Meyne, James Temple, Peter Temple, and Tho. Wayte,* (in all fifteen) to the bar; which was done accordingly.

* "Those whom I mentioned before," says Ludlow, "to have been excepted both for life and estate, with a reserve that if upon trial they should be found guilty, sentence of death should not be executed against any of them, except by act of parliament, were brought to be tried before this Court: where some of Charles Pitfield, Christopher Abdy, Richard Cheyney, George Tirrey, Daniel Cole, ——— Hall, Richard Abell, Edward Starnel, Edmund Pit, Will. Witcomb, Fran. Dorrington, and T. Nicoll, called and sworn of the Jury.

Clerk of the Crown. Isaac Pennington and Henry Marten, &c. Hold up your hands. Gentlemen that are sworn, look upon the prisoners at the bar. You shall understand that the said Isaac Pennington, &c. together with, &c. [Here the Indictment was read.] unto which they and every of them have severally pleaded Not Guilty, and for their trial have put themselves upon God and the country, which country you are: Now your charge is to enquire, &c.

King's Counsel. May it please your lordships, and you gentlemen of the jury, the prisoners at the bar stand indicted of High-Treason, for compassing and imagining the death of the late king Charles the first, of glorious memory. The Indictment sets forth several overt-acts, by which that imagination doth appear, the treason itself is the compassing: Our evidence will go on thus; we shall prove against them all, that they did sit, in that which they called the High Court of Justice, upon the king, whilst the king was a prisoner, at the bar, most of them did sentence him; all but Harvey and Pennington did sign that bloody warrant for his execution; and that one of the prisoners at the bar was in before the High Court of Justice, consulting of bringing it about. When we have proved this, I think it is enough. Pray call the witnesses.

Harvey. My lord, according to my duty, I shall save this honourable Court all their trouble. I do humbly acknowledge that I was and did sit in that Court, but I did not sign and seal that warrant.

them pleaded guilty simply; but others, though they acknowledged the guilt, denied the malice; and some confessing the fact, denied the guilt. Of this last number was col. Henry Martin; of whose trial I shall only mention some few of the most remarkable passages, and so leave this melancholy subject."

He then gives a very brief account of what Martin said on his trial, and concludes thus:

"But notwithstanding these, and divers other things which he said in his defence, with as much presence of mind as solidity of argument, he was brought in guilty of the treason for which he had been accused. In pursuance of which verdict, the sentence of condemnation was passed against him; the convention making no provision for securing the lives either of him or the rest of the gentlemen that had been decoyed into a surrender of their persons, though they had implicitly promised them favour."

L. C. Baron. It is very true, Mr. Harvey.
Harvey. I hope your lordships and this honourable bench will give me leave, (in that time which you shall appoint) to shew you my reasons that I did it not of malice, and it was an error not of will, but of judgment; what I have to say will be thought not for the annihilating, yet for the extenuation of my crimes.

L. C. Baron. Say now what you will, only consider with yourself whether you have not already spoken as much as you can for the extenuation of it; say what you can further.

Harvey. Let me speak a word.

L. C. Baron. Go on, sir.

Harvey. My lord, I do humbly conceive, if I had conceived that I had then done any thing of treason, I would not for all the world have been there; I was present when his majesty did not own the Court, desiring that both his houses might meet, that he might have a conference with them for settling of the peace: My lord, heartily and unfeignedly I did endeavour that that advice might be embraced, and that no sentence might be pronounced. I was one of those, with some others, that did so far promote it, that that which they called the High Court of Justice did withdraw to consider of it, but the major part of it did dissent. But, my lord, I was so unhappy as to return to the Court, though with reluctancy; I went with a resolution not to go more to them, nor never did; I was summoned to come to the court; I did declare I abhorred the thing, that my soul had reluctancy against it, and I was greatly grieved and troubled at it, and I did refuse any more to come, or to consult about any thing, that followed, in order to his majesty's death, and to sign, and to seal. And that I may make it appear to your lordships, I pray I may have a witness or two examined.

L. C. Baron. Name them. Did he sit upon the day of Sentence?

Counsel. Yes, he did; he followed it.

Mr. Edward Corbet examined.

Mr. Corbet. My lord, the attestation which I this day make solemnly, in the holy fear of Almighty God, and in awful reverence of this great tribunal, hath only this great scope, that colonel Harvey, the prisoner at the bar, upon that day of signing the warrant for that horrid execution of his most excellent majesty, not in title only, but in reality, he finding me as I was passing to the duty of my place in the Assembly of Divines then sitting, he seized on me, and desired privacy of time and place, that he might disburden his soul and spirit unto me; it was then about nine o'clock in the forenoon to the best of my remembrance.

L. C. Baron. What day, I beseech you?

Corbet. To the best of my remembrance upon the Monday; Sir, says he, I desire to make known unto you the deep horror that sits upon my spirit, the sadness and grief, above all expressions, that my present case has cast me into; I have endeavoured, Sir, (says he) in the sight of God, all that possibly I could to divert them from the sentence, I could not prevail. Sir, says he, I have been this morning solicited with very much earnestness, that I would go and sign, and seal, and order that wicked execution, which my soul abhors; and, Sir, that I might be removed and withdrawn from all temptations and solicitations of such a wicked fact, I beseech you spare me your time this day; which I did, in the presence of another divine, till four o'clock in the afternoon, and then I parted and went to Westminster, to sign and assist that which I did apprehend my bounden duty, the Vindication of the Assembly of Divines, wherein we did testify, that it was far from our thoughts to advise the parliament to any such unheard-of unnatural act.

Counsel. We do admit that after he sat, and sentence past, that he did not sign.

Harvey. Be pleased to call on Mr. Thomas Langham, he hath heard me often declare against that act.

Mr. Thomas Langham examined.

L. C. Baron. What do you say, Mr. Langham, as to this business?

Langham. Sir, about the time that his majesty was executed in 1648, I was then servant to alderman Sleigh, who was formerly partner with this colonel, and he frequently came to alderman Sleigh's every night; and the alderman having some business with him, would ask him what news there was at the High-Court of Justice; he usually told him the passages upon any day; the alderman asked him, if so be he thought his majesty might escape? He told them this, That he would do what lay in his power, that he might not come to have sentence pass: Upon Saturday, being also there, he told him this, That he had done what lay in his power, to hinder the sentence, but could not attain his design; but he was resolved he would never sign nor seal to his majesty's death, for it was utterly against his judgment.

Harvey. There is another, (my lord,) and but one more, that is George Langham.

L. C. Baron. To what purpose? This is believed.

Harvey. I shall only crave and supplicate this favour of this honourable bench, that this honourable bench would be pleased, on my behalf, (since I have endeavoured it two months before,) to present my humble Petition to his sacred majesty, and to intercede for mercy and favour on my behalf; myself, my wife, and thirteen children, shall humbly pray.

[The Court received the said Petition, and promised to present it to his majesty.]

Millington. I do not know whether it will be seasonable for me to interpose now, I would speak a little.

L. C. Baron. Is he next in order?

Clerk. No, my lord, Pennington is next.

Pennington. I am unwilling to be troublesome to the Court. This I shall take the boldness to say, (which shall be nothing but truth,) I never had a hand in plotting, contriving malicious practices against his majesty, demonstrated by my utterly refusing to sign the warrant for his execution, though often solicited thereto; I cannot deny but I sat amongst them that day of the sentence, but I cannot remember I was there when the sentence passed. My sitting amongst them was out of ignorance, I knew not what I did, therefore I hope you will believe there was nothing of malice in any thing I did; I was mis-led to it.

L. C. Baron. I cannot hear you. [He not speaking aloud.]

Pennington. It was ignorance, not malice, that led me; If I had known what I had done I would not have done it; I humbly pray that there may be a favourable construction made of it, I humbly leave it with you. I did my duty to pray for the king, but had no malice to act willfully against him.

Clerk. Henry Marten.

Counsel. He did both sign and seal the precept for summoning the Court, and the Warrant for execution; sat almost every day, and particularly the day of sentence.

Marten. My lord, I do not decline a confession, so as to the matter of fact, the malice set aside, 'Maliciously, murderously, and traitorously.'

Counsel. If you have any thing to say to that, we will prove it.

L. C. Baron. That I may inform you in it, there is malice implied by law, malice in the act itself: That which you call malice, that you had no particular intention or design against the king's person, but in relation to the government, that will not be to that present business; if it should extenuate any thing, that would be between God and your own soul; but as to that which is alledged in the indictment, maliciously, murderously, and traitorously, they are the consequences of law. If a man meet another in the street, and run him through, in this case the law implies malice; though but to an ordinary watchman, there is malice by the law in the fact; if there was no such expressed personal malice as you conceive, yet the fact done implies malice in law.

Mr. Sol. Gen. My lord, he does think a man may sit upon the death of the king, sentence him to death, sign a warrant for his execution, meekly, innocently, charitably, and honestly.

Marten. I shall not presume to compare my knowledge in the law with that of that learned gentleman; but according to that poor understanding of the law of England that I was capable of, there is no fact that we can name that is a crime of itself, but as it is circumstantiated. Of killing a watchman, as your lordship instanced, a watchman may be killed in not doing his office, and yet no murder.

L. C. Baron. I instanced that of a watchman, to shew there may be a malice by law, though not expressed; though a man kill a watchman, intending to kill another man, in that case it is malice in law against him: So in this case, if you went to kill the king when he was not doing his office, because he was in prison, and you hindered him from it, the law implies malice in this. It is true, all actions are circumstantiated, but the killing of the king is treason of all treasons.

Justice Foster. If a watchman be killed it is murder; it is in contempt of magistracy, of the powers above; the law says that contempt adds to the malice.

Counsel. We shall prove against the prisoner at the bar (because he would wipe off malice,) he did this very merrily, and was in great sport at the time of the signing the Warrant for the king's execution.

Marten. That does not imply malice.

Ewer sworn.

Counsel. Come, Sir, you are here upon your oath, speak to my lords and the Jury; you know the prisoner at the bar very well, you have sometimes served him; were you present in the Painted Chamber, Jan. 29, 1649, at the signing the Warrant, the parchment against the king.

Ewer. The day I do not remember, but I was in that chamber to attend a gentleman there; I followed that gentleman, [looking at Mr. Marten,] I followed that gentleman into that chamber.

L. C. Baron. After what gentleman?

Ewer. Mr. Marten, my lord. I was pressing to come near, but I was put off by an officer, or soldier there, who told me I should not be there; I told him I was ordered to be by that gentleman. My lord, I did see a pen in Mr. Cromwell's hand, and he marked Mr. Marten in the face with it, and Mr. Marten did the like to him; but I did not see any one set his hand, though I did see a parchment there with a great many seals to it.

Sir Purbeck Temple sworn.

Counsel. What do you know of that gentleman in his carriage of this business?

Sir P. Temple. My lords, I being present in town, when that horrid murder was contrived against the late king, there came some persons of honour, servants to the late king, to my father's house, sir Edward Partridge, to engage me to join with them to attempt the king's escape. In order whereunto they told me, nothing would tend so much to his majesty's service, as to endeavour to discover some part of their counsels, for that it was resolved by Cromwell to have the king tried at the High-Court of Justice, as they called it, the next day, and desired me (if possible) to be there to discover their counsels, whereby the king might have notice, and those that were to attempt his escape. In order whereunto, the next day, by giving money to the officer of the Painted Chamber, I got in by day-light in the Lobby of the lords-house; I espied a hole in the wall, under the hangings, where I placed myself till the council came, where they were contriving the manner of trying the king when he should come before them: and after the manner of praying, and private consults amongst themselves, when their prayer was over, there came news that the king was landed at sir Robert Cotton's stairs; at which Cromwell run to a window, looking on the king as he came up the garden, he returned as white as the wall: returning to the board, he speaks to Bradshaw, and sir Henry Mildmay, how they and sir William Brereton had concluded on such a business; then turning to the board, said thus: 'My masters, he is come, he is come, and now we are doing that great work that the whole nation will be full of; therefore I desire you to let us resolve here what answer we shall give the king when he comes before us; for the first Question that he will ask us will be, by what authority and commission we do try him? To which none answered presently. Then after a little space, Henry Marten, the prisoner at the bar, rose up, and said, In the name of the commons and parliament assembled, and all the good people of England; which none contradicted, so all rose up, and then I saw every officer that waited in the room sent out, by Cromwell, to call away my lord such-a-one, (whose name I have forgot,) who was in the Court of Wards Chamber, that he should send away the instrument, which came not, and so they adjourned themselves to Westminster-Hall, going into the Court of Wards themselves, as they went thither. When they came to the Court in Westminster-Hall, I heard the king ask them the very same question that Cromwell had said to them.

Sol. Gen. Gentlemen, the prisoner at the bar confesses his hand to the warrant for executing the king; you see by his servant how merry he was at the sport; you see by this witness, how serious he was at it, and gave the foundation of that advice upon which they all proceeded; and now he says he did it not traitorously, I humbly conceive he means it was justifiable.

Sir P. Temple. At another time I was in town on a Friday, and wanting horses I went to Smithfield, where I saw the horses of state of his late majesty, to be sold in the common market; at which I called to the rider, said I, What makes these horses here? Says he, I am to sell them; why, said I, there is the king's brand upon them, C. R. and he shewed them me: said I, will you sell these horses? What price? He asked me three or four-score pound a piece; says I, who warrants the sale of these horses? Says he, Mr. Marten and sir William Brereton. Afterwards I heard the horses were taken into the Mews by the prisoner at the bar, and sir Will. Brereton.

Counsel. Was this before the trial?

Sir P. Temple. It was in 1642, or 1643.

Counsel. That's nothing to this business.

Marten. My lord, the commission went in the name of the commons assembled in parliament, and the good people of England: and what a matter is it for one of the commissioners to say, let it be acted by the good people of England?

VOL. V.

Sol. Gen. You know all good people did abhor it. I am sorry to see so little repentance.

Marten. My lord, I hope that which is urged by the learned counsel, will not have that impression upon the court and jury that it seems to have, that I am so obstinate in a thing so apparently ill: my lord, if it were possible for that blood to be in the body again, and every drop that was shed in the late wars, I could wish it with all my heart: but, my lord, I hope it is lawful to offer in my own defence that, which, when I did it, I thought I might do. My lord, there was the house of commons, as I understood it, (perhaps your lordships think it was not a house of commons) but then it was the supreme authority of England; it was so reputed both at home and abroad. My lord, I suppose he that gives obedience to the authority in being, de facto, whether de jure, or no, I think he is of a peaceable disposition, and far from a traitor. My lord, I think there was a statute made in Henry the seventh's time, whereby it was provided, that whosoever was in arms for the king de facto, he should be indemnified, though that king de facto was not so de jure: and if supreme officers de facto can justify a war, (the most pernicious remedy that was ever adjudged by mankind, be the cause what it will) I presume the supreme authority of England may justify a judicature, though it be but an authority de facto. My lord, if it be said that it is but a third estate, and a small parcel of that, my lord, it was all that was extant. I have heard lawyers say, that if there be commons appurtenant to a tenement, and that tenement be all burnt down except a small stick, the commons belong to that one small piece, as it did to the tenement when all standing. My lord, I shall humbly offer to consideration, whether the king were the king indeed, such a one whose peace, crowns, and dignities, were concerned in public matters: my lord, he was not in execution of his offices, he was a prisoner. My lord, I will not defer you long, neither would I be offensive: I had then, and I have now, a peaceable inclination, a resolution to submit to the government that God hath set over me. I think his majesty that now is, is king upon the best title under heaven, for he was called in by the representative body of England. I shall, during my life, long or short, pay obedience to him: besides, my lords, I do owe my life to him, if I am acquitted for this. I do confess I did adhere to the parliament's army heartily; my life is at his mercy; if his grace be pleased to grant it, I have a double obligation to him.

Sol. Gen. My lord, this gentleman, the prisoner at the bar, hath entered into a discourse that I am afraid he must have an answer in parliament for it. He hath owned the king, but thinks his best title is the acknowledgment of the people; and he that hath that, let him be who he will, hath the best title. We have done with our evidence.

Marten. I have one word more, my lord, I humbly desire that the jury would take notice, that though I am accused in the name of the king, that if I be acquitted, the king is not cast : it doth not concern the king that the prisoner be condemned, it concerns him that the prisoner be tried : it is as much to his interest, crown and dignity, that the innocent be acquitted, as that the nocent be condemned.

Sol. Gen. My lord, this puts us now upon the reputation of our evidence ; and you may see how necessary it is to distinguish between confidence and innocence ; for this very person that desires you to have a care how you condemn the innocent, he doth seem to intimate to you, that he is an innocent person at the bar ; and yet confesses he did sit upon the king, did sentence him to death ; that he signed the warrant for the execution ; and yet here stands the person that desires you to have a care of condemning innocence : what is this at the bottom of it, but that the fact is such as I dare not call innocence, but would have you to believe it such ? Gentlemen of the jury, was it your intention the king should be so tried as this prisoner moved ? It will concern you to declare, that the people of England do abhor his facts and principles ; every fact the prisoner hath confessed himself, the sitting in that Court, which was treason ; his sentencing was treason ; signing the warrant for execution was the highest of treasons : gentlemen, all that he hath to say for himself is, there was an authority of his own making, whereby he becomes innocent ; but we hope out of his own mouth you will find him guilty.

Gilbert Millington. I desire you to hear me ; I come not hither to dispute, but to acknowledge ; I will not trouble you with long discourses. My lord, it is not fit for wise men to hear them, I am not able to express them ; I will not justify myself, I will acknowledge myself guilty. My lord, the reason why I said the last day, Not Guilty, was in respect of being upon the scaffold, and murdering the king, and those things ; but I will wave all things, if your lordship will give me leave, and will go unto the lowest strain that possibly can be ; I will confess myself Guilty every way. I was awed by the present power then in being. This I leave with you, and lay myself at your feet, and have no more at all to say, but a few words in a petition, which I desire you will please to accept, and so I conclude.

Counsel. We do accept this honest and humble confession, and shall give no evidence against him to aggravate the matter.

L. C. Baron. Your petition is accepted, and shall be read.

Robert Tichburn. My lord, when I first pleaded to the Indictment, it was, Not Guilty, in manner and form as I stood indicted ; my lord, it was not then in my heart, either to deny or justify any tittle of the matter of fact ; my lord, the matter that I was led into by ignorance, my conscience leads me to acknowledge ; but, my lord, if I should have said Guilty in manner and form as I stood indicted,

I was fearful I should have charged my own conscience as then knowingly and maliciously to act it. My lord, it was my unhappiness to be called to so sad a work when I had so few years over my head ; a person neither bred up in the laws, nor in parliaments where laws are made. I can say with a clear conscience, I had no more enmity in my heart to his majesty, than I had to my wife that lay in my bosom. My lord, I shall deny nothing ; after I was summoned, I think, truly, I was at most of the meetings ; and I do not say this, that I did not intend to say it before, but, preserving that salvo to my own conscience, that I did not maliciously and knowingly do it, I think I am bound in conscience to own it : As I do not deny but I was there, so truly, I do believe I did sign the instrument. And had I known that then, which I do now, (I do not mean, my lord, my afflictions and sufferings, it is not my sufferings make me acknowledge), I would have chosen a red-hot oven to have gone into, as soon as that meeting : I bless God, I do this neither out of fear, nor hopes of favour, though the penalty that may attend this acknowledgment may be grievous ; my lord, I do acknowledge the matter of fact, and do solemnly protest I was led into it for want of years ; I do not justify either the act or the person ; I was so unhappy then as to be ignorant, and I hope I shall not now, (since I have more light) justify that which I was ignorant of : I am sure my heart was without malice : if I had been only asked in matter of fact at first I should have said the same ; I have seen a little : The Great God before whom we all stand, hath shewn his tender mercy to persons upon repentance ; Paul tells us, though a blasphemer, and a persecutor of Christ, it being done ignorantly, upon repentance he found mercy ; my lord, mercy I have found, and I do not doubt but mercy I shall find. My lord, I came in upon the Proclamation, and now I am here, I have in truth given your lordship a clear and full account, whatever the law shall pronounce, because I was ignorant : yet I hope there will be room found for that mercy and grace that I think was intended by the Proclamation, and I hope by the parliament of England. I shall say no more, but, in pleading of that, humbly beg that your lordships will be instrumental to the king and parliament on that behalf—

Counsel. We shall give no evidence against the prisoner ; he says he did it ignorantly, and I hope and do believe he is a penitent ; and as far as the parliament thinks fit to shew mercy, I shall be very glad.

Owen Roe. I have not much to say, I never had any ability ; therefore, my lord, it was never my intent upon my plea, as was said before, to deny any thing I have done ; for I was clearly convinced that I ought to confess it before, and I do confess against myself, that I did sit there several times, and to the best of my remembrance I did sign and seal the warrant for his execution ; and truly, my lord, it was never in my heart to contrive a plot of this nature. How I came there I do not know, I was very unfit for such a business, and I confess I did it ignorantly, not understanding the law, so was carried away hidden in the business, not understanding what I did; therefore, my lord, I humbly entreat this honourable Court, that you will consider of it, and look upon me as one that out of ignorance did it; and if I had known of my act, I would rather have been torn in pieces with a thousand horses. When I heard of the Declaration and Gracious Pardon of his majesty, I confess I went to my Lord Mayor's, and laid hold of it, and I thought my life as secure as it is now in my own hands; but I do wholly cast myself upon the king's mercy; and as I have heard he is a gracious king, full of lenity and mercy, so I hope I shall find it. I was never against government; it is a blessed thing that we have it; I hope all the nations will be happy under it. I shall submit to his majesty and government. I can say no more; I was not brought up a scholar, but was a tradesman, and was merely ignorant when I went on in that business; I do humbly entreat your lordships, that you would, as tenderly as may be, present my case to the king, whom I rest upon, and leave all to your lordships' wisdom and discretion, to do what you will concerning me.

Counsel. We accept his confession, and do hope he is penitent before God, as well as before the world.

Robert Lilburn. Be pleased to give me leave to speak a few words; I shall be ingenuous before your lordships, I shall not wilfully nor obstinately deny the matter of fact; but, my lord, I must, and I can, with a very good conscience, say, that what I did, I did it very innocently, without any intention of murder; nor was I ever plotter or contriver in that murder; I never read in the law, nor understood the case thoroughly; whatever I have done, I have done ignorantly.

L. C. Baron. Because you shall not be mistaken in your words, God forbid that we should carp at your words; the word innocent hath a double acceptation, innocent in respect of malice, and innocent in respect of the fact.

Lilburn. The truth is, my lord, I was for the withdrawing of the Court, when the king made the motion to have it withdrawn; and upon the day, my lord, that the king was put to death, I was so sensible of it, that I went to my chamber and mourned, and would, if it had been in my power, have preserved his life. My lord, I was not at all any disturber of the government; I never interrupted the parliament at all. I had no hand in those things, neither in 1648, nor at any other time. I shall humbly beg the favour of the king, that he would be pleased to grant me his Pardon, according to his Declaration, which I laid hold on, and rendered myself according to the Proclamation.

Counsel. We shall say nothing against him.

Henry Smith. My lord, I shall not desire to spend your lordship's time: what I have done,

I did it ignorantly, not knowing what I did. I shall not deny the matter of fact; but as to that I pleaded Not Guilty before, it was in relation to that which I was ignorant of, the law of the nation; I have not been bred to it. I humbly desire your lordships to consider, that what I did was done ignorantly, not knowing the law.

Counsel. What was that?

Smith. I do confess that I sat in the Court, I do not remember that I signed or sealed. [both the Warrants being shewed him adds] My lords, I confess the hands are like mine, but whether they be so or no, I know not.

Counsel. Then we will prove it. Is the seal yours?

Smith. I do not know.

Counsel. Do you confess you were in the Painted Chamber the 29th of Jan.? Do you remember any thing of that?

Smith. I do not certainly know that.

Counsel. My lord, he hath said enough. Shall the Jury doubt of that which he believes?

Smith. I do not remember that I did write it.

Counsel. My lord, we press it no farther, he hath confessed enough.

Smith. My lord, what I have done I beseech you consider I did it in ignorance, not knowing the law; there were those about me that were able to call me, who were then in authority, whom I dared not disobey, if so, I had been in danger also.

Counsel. My lords, we have done; be pleased to direct the Jury upon these several evidences and confession.

Smith. I beg one word, I must declare this, I can speak it seriously, that from the first to the last of these unhappy wars, I have been a man of trouble and sorrow; I have been, as many wiser men have been, run upon error. My lord, I know not what I have done; I pray that this Court will be pleased to be a mediator for me, that I may have his majesty's favour, and that this Petition may be received on my behalf. [He then delivered his Petition to the Court.] I can rejoice for that happy settlement that is again in the nations, and declare cheerfully my humble submission to that government, and desire the Lord will bless and prosper his majesty and the parliament in these nations; my lord, I rendered myself according to the Proclamation; I shall say no more.

L. C. Baron. Gentlemen, you of the Jury, these prisoners at the bar, that is, Mr. Harvey, Pennington, Marten, Millington, Titchburne, Roe, Lilburne, and Mr. Smith, there are eight, these are persons who by the Act of Indemnity are to be tried for their lives for the treasons they have committed, but no execution is to be until the parliament have further considered the matter that is before us, and you are to find the matter of fact: what mercy they shall find hereafter, that is to be left (as I told you) to the consideration of the parliament, we are to proceed according to law and justice. They are all indicted for compassing and imagining the death of our late sovereign lord Charles the First, of most glorious memory; and for that that hath been opened to you there are so many overt-acts, which are as so many evidences to prove that indictment, which is the compassing and imagination of their hearts to put the king to death. If any one of these be proved, that is alone enough to prove the Indictment, which is the compassing and imagining of the heart, that is the treason, the others are but evidences. If any thing burst forth from the mouth, or from the hand, as here it is, these are evidences of the imagination of the heart; for this you have heard by the confession of all of them, that they did enough to find the indictment: they have all of them confessed their sitting upon the king in that traitorous assembly which they called the High Court of Justice. There is one of the overt-acts expressly laid down in the indictment, they took upon them an authority to consider how to put the king to death, and that they did put the king to death, but they were mistaken, as some of them said, that the actual murdering of the king was not their meaning. But if they did that which tended towards it, they are all guilty of treason; it is all one to you, if they be guilty of any of these; either sitting, sentencing, or signing, they are guilty; and all of these, except two, are guilty of all these; the matter is clear and pregnant. There is something hath been said by many of them, with a great deal of expression of sorrow; they did confess (all but one) the fact; and that which tended to their defence was ignorance; but that doth not at all concern you. It will be taken in its due time into consideration; the several deportments of them all, that is for another judicature. Your business is to find the matter of fact; only let me repeat unto you, there is Mr. Harvey, who hath pleaded several matters which are not proper for you, expressing his sorrow and penitence, we shall not trouble you with that, because they are for the consideration of another court; we ought all to have a tender compassion, ought to be sorry with and for them that are sorrowful. The like of alderman Pennington. Marten hath done that which looks forward more than backward. I could wish with all my heart he had looked more backward; that is, to repentance of that which is past, than obedience to that which is to come; it is a trouble to repeat those things which he said himself, and truly, I hope in charity he meant better than his words were. Millington, he hath done the like with the rest, confessed the fact, put himself upon mercy wholly, and said, he 'was overawed by the present power.' This I repeat, not as any thing to you, who are to consider only matter of fact. For alderman Titchburn, he hath spoken very fully, and truly very conscientiously—upon the whole matter, acknowledges his ignorance, his sorrow, his conviction—— of conscience; and I beseech God

Almighty to incline his heart more and more to repentance. 'They that crucified Christ' (to use his own words) 'through ignorance, found mercy.' Colonel Roe, he confesses the same wholly, and casts himself upon the king's mercy, and he thought it a blessed thing that the king was restored again, and submitted wholly to mercy; and so did Mr. Lilburn, he said he went to his chamber and mourned the day the king was beheaded; I am very glad he had so early a sense of it. Henry Smith he did it ignorantly, he was not guilty thus far; that was, he was led on, even like one silly sheep that follows another; by what relation I have heard of the person, at that time he was not thought fit to be of the Privy Council. There is nothing more to say to you. The fact is confessed by them all. It is so clear you need not go from the bar.

[After a little consultation between the Jurors, they returned to their places.]

Clerk of the Crown. Are you agreed of your verdict?

Jurors. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our foreman.

Clerk. Edmund Harvey, hold up thy hand. How say you, is the prisoner Guilty of the treason whereof he stands indicted, and hath been arraigned? or Not Guilty?

Jury. Guilty.

Clerk. Look to him, keeper.

Clerk. What goods and chattels, &c.

Jury. None to our knowledge.

The same question being asked touching alderman Pennington, Henry Marten,* Gilbert

* "One person escaped, as was reported, merely by his vices: Henry Marten, who had been a most violent enemy to monarchy. But all that he moved for was upon Roman or Greek principles. He never entered into matters of religion, but on design to laugh both at them and all morality; for he was both an impious and vicious man. And now in his imprisonment he delivered himself up to vice and blasphemy. It was said that this helped him to so many friends, that upon that very account he was spared." Burnet.

In Mr. Coxe's Historical Tour in Monmouthshire, is given a whole chapter of 'Anecdotes of Henry Marten;' from which the following passage is extracted:

"He was first confined in the Tower, but soon removed to the castle of Chepstow; in both of which places he was treated with great lenity. His wife was permitted to reside with him; he had the full enjoyment of his property, and was allowed to receive visits, and to frequent, in company with a guard, the houses of the neighbouring gentry, particularly that of St. Pierre, where his portrait is still preserved. His situation could not be distressed, as Mrs. Williams recollected two of his maid servants, who always mentioned him as a kind master, and were able to save money in his service.

Millington, alderman Titchburn, colonel Roe, colonel Lilburn, and Henry Smith, they were severally found Guilty by the Jury in manner aforesaid. All which prisoners finding the place where they stood to be cold and unwholsome, prayed the court they might have leave to be returned to the prison 'till the court shall be pleased to command their farther attendance; which was granted.

The rest of the Prisoners aforementioned, together with W. Heveningham, brought to the bar.

Clerk. You the prisoners at the bar, those “ Misfortune and imprisonment however do not seem to have had the smallest effect in changing his regicidal principles. His epitaph, composed by himself, proves that he died as he lived, a staunch republican; and an anecdote current in the family of St. Pierre, confirms this fact: conversing one day on the politics of past times, Mr. Lewis asked him if the scene could be brought back, and the actors again introduced on the stage of life, whether he would sign the warrant for the execution of his sovereign? Marten replied in the affirmative. Mr. Lewis, disgusted with this answer, withdrew his protection, and never again received him at St. Pierre.

“ Marten lived to the advanced age of 78, and died by a stroke of apoplexy, which seized him while he was at dinner, in the 20th year of his confinement. He was buried in the chancel of the parish church at Chepstow. Over his ashes was placed a stone with an inscription, which remained there until one of the succeeding vicars, declaring his abhorrence that the monument of a rebel should stand so near the altar, removed the stone into the body of the church.

“ The epitaph, composed by himself, is in these words:

HERE

Was buried a true Englishman
Who in Berkshire was well known To love his country's freedom 'bove his own persons last called of the Jury are to pass, &c. If you, or any of you, will challenge all, or any of them, you must challenge them when they come to the hook, before they be sworn.

Clerk. Charles Pitfield, Christopher Abdy, George Terry, Daniel Cole, Anthony Hall, Richard Abel, Edmund Starnel, Edmund Pit, William Whitcomb, Francis Dorrington, Tho. Nicholl, Robert Sheppard, in all twelve, admitted and sworn of the Jury.

Clerk. If any man can inform, &c.

Clerk. John Downes, hold up thy hand, &c. and the like was said to all the other persons following, viz. Vincent Potter, Augustine Garland, Simon Meyne, James Temple, Peter Temple, Thomas Waite, and William Heveningham. Look upon the prisoners at the bar, you that are sworn; you shall understand that John Downes, the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted, &c.

King's Counsel. May it please your lordships, and you gentlemen of the jury, the prisoners at the bar stand indicted of high treason, for compassing and imagining the death of the late king Charles the First, of blessed memory: the evidence by which we shall make out against them this treason of their heart, in compassing and imagining the king's death, (for that is the substance of the Indictment, and all that follows is but evidence,) will be by proving that they did sit as judges in that pretended Court of Justice when the king stood a prisoner at the bar; that they did sentence him to death, every one of them; and we shall prove against all but one of them that they did sign that Bloody Warrant for murdering of the king; and against one of them that stands at the bar we shall prove (to his shame and confusion of face) that he did spit in the face of our late sovereign lord.

John Downes. My lord, I have humbly pleaded Not Guilty; not with any intention to justify the fact, or to extenuate it; but, my lord, in regard there is that charged in the Indictment, that my conscience saith I am not guilty of, I durst not plead Guilty; otherwise, my lord, I should not have troubled you with Not Guilty, but should have humbly taken the shame and confusion for it; it is my intantion to put the Court to as little trouble as possibly I can; therefore I do humbly intreat of your lordships, and the Court, that you will permit me to acknowledge that which will be a sufficient evidence of my conviction, if the Court so please, and that you will be pleased to hear me on my behalf; if I can humbly offer to you some special thing which is not in the case of another (I could wish it had, if it had we had none been here.) I do humbly acknowledge, that to sit upon that occasion in that place is evidence enough to convince what is in the heart, except by some signal actions that might happen from some that might shew how it was his unhappiness to be put into such a business, yet had neither malice nor treason in his heart; I do humbly conceive that there is that goodness in you, that this plea, this allegation will be most welcome to you. My lord, though there was such a thing, such an unparalleled thing, I was thrust into this number; but never was in consultation about the thing: God is witness I was not put in 'till the act was ready to pass in a second commitment, by one of the same number; I denied it, yet they said I must make one, I must take my share; so I came in. Never did I know of his majesty's being brought to London till he came. My lords, in this great unhappiness I think it is some mitigation, and I judge it a happiness, that so wise, prudent persons as this Court consists of, that you are my judges, that can look back, my lord, and consider what the times were then, and can, my lord, account it a happiness that there is a special wisdom in you, that in nice cases you will be able to make a distinction. I do indeed, my lords, sadly and seriously confess, that I was divers times with those persons that were called judges of the late king, at several meetings and sittings; it is long ago, I cannot say how often; I was several times there. My lord, I do humbly beg of your lordships, (I will trouble you as short as I can,) that you would be pleased so far to favour me as to give me leave to give you a short account of the business: the last day his majesty came to that which was called then a Court, several times he was brought, (I think thrice,) and his Charge was given in words high enough; he said he could not acknowledge their jurisdiction; that was the answer, my lord, till the last day; then I confess I was there. He that was called President did again and again tell him the heads of his Charge: told him he had several days given for consideration, that this was the last day that the Court (as they called themselves) would give him for his final answer; if he stood still to-day, and moved to the jurisdiction of the Court, they must take all pro confesso, and would give Sentence: My lord, to this his majesty indeed with a great deal of composedness and wisdom told them to this effect, I cannot own your jurisdiction; you have power enough indeed, I wish you may use it well; but because you are so ready to give a sentence which may be sooner given than avoided, I think fit to let you know that I have something that I desire to speak to my parliament, for I have something to offer unto them that will be satisfactory to you all, and will be for the immediate settlement of the kingdom in peace. My lord, he that was called President answered, that no notice could be taken of any thing, but only whether he would answer to his Charge: Upon that, my lord, his majesty indeed, (with the greatest earnestness that ever I beheld, and yet in no unseemly passion,) told them they might soon repent of such a sentence; that he did conjure them to withdraw once again, and to consider of it, if it were but half an hour, or (saith he, if that be too much for you) I will withdraw. My lord, here I can make my appeal to him that must judge me when you have done with me, I had not a murderous nor a traitorous thought against him; but sir, I confess such deep passions did fall upon me, that truly myself I was not. I remember the persons between whom I sat, as it fell out, were one Mr. Cawly, and col. Walton, these two I sat betwixt, these were the words I spake to them, Have we hearts of stone? Are we men? They laboured to appease me; they told me I would ruin both myself and them; said I, if I die for it I must do it. Cromwell sat just the seat below me, the hearing of me make some stir, whispering, he looked up to me, and asked me if I were myself? what I meant to do, that I could not be quiet? Sir, said I, no, I cannot be quiet; upon that I started up in the very nick; when the President commanded the Clerk to read the Sentence, I stepping up, and as loud as I could speak, spoke to this effect, these words, or to the like purpose; My lord, (said I) I am not satisfied to give my consent to this sentence, but have reasons to offer to you against it, and I desire the Court may adjourn to hear me; presently he stepped up and looked at me; nay, saith he, if any one of the Court be unsatisfied, the Court must adjourn: Sir, accordingly they did adjourn into the Inner Court of Wards; when they came there I was called upon by Cromwell to give an account why I had put this trouble and disturbance upon the Court? I did speak, sir, to this effect, (it is long ago, the very words I think I cannot speak,) but to this effect I did speak: My lord, I should have been exceeding glad if the Court had been pleased to condescend to this gracious expression; but it is not too late for me: I desire not his death, but his life, and that the nations may be settled in peace: The king now is pleased to offer, that if he might but speak with his parliament, he would offer to them such things as should be satisfactory to us all. So (said I) what would you have? Your pretence of bringing him to these proceedings was, that after such a long and bloody war his majesty would not condescend to such concessions as might secure the parliament's party; but now you hear him, that he will give every one of us satisfaction: I told them, sadly told them, (I think I may truly say more sadly than at this time,) that if they should go precipitantly on and give judgment upon him, before they had acquainted the parliament with what the king was pleased to offer, we should never be able to answer it; the rather, my lord, (and that I did press with all the little understanding that I had) if they did but consider the last concluded order that the parliament made after the passing of the act for trial, (that which was so called,) I say there was this order that shut up all, that upon any emergency that could not at that time be thought on in the house, the Court should immediately acquaint the house with it. My lord, I did infer as strongly as I could to them, that if this were not emergent I could not tell what was: The king denied the jurisdiction of the Court, and yet with all vehemency desired to speak with his parliament; were not these emergencies? If not, I knew not what were emergencies. My lords, besides this, there was another thing I did press, that I thought was of greater consequence than this, as to the satisfaction of every man's particular conscience; that admitting (if it might be admitted) that the king was liable to his subjects, that they might call him to an account, and might condemn him, (I beg your pardon that I take the boldness to make such admissions,) but if such a thing might be admitted, certainly it did exceedingly become those judges that were to give such a sentence, (not against a common person, but against the greatest,) to be very well satisfied in matter of fact, to a full evidence before them, that such and such things that were said were true. I do acknowledge this, that to the best of my apprehension, (I wish it had been so to others,) there was a great shortness in this; I do humbly affirm this, that not one member of the Court did hear one witness viva voce; I did press that if the Court did give judgment against the king, without a fair examination, I said it was such a thing as no judge at any assizes would do against a common person. What I had was from Peters, and from some private whispers from one of them that is gone, and hath received his sentence and doom. Cromwell did answer with a great deal of storm; he told the president, that now he saw what great reason the gentleman had to put such a trouble and disturbance upon them; saith he, sure he doth not know that he hath to do with the hardest-hearted man that lives upon the earth; however, it is not fit that the Court should be hindered from their duty by one peevish man; he said, the bottom was known, that he would fain save his old master; and desired the Court, without any more ado, would go and do their duty. Another that spoke to me in answer was one that hath been before you, and hath received his sentence, but is not dead, (and I desire I may not name his name,) his answer was to what I have said, that some men were either scepticks, or infidels. After this I did go into the Speaker's Chamber, and there I did ease my mind and heart with tears, God only knows. I have an unhappy memory; I have slipt many things.

L. C. Baron. Remember yourself by papers; if you have any, no man will hinder you.

Downes. I have no papers; but, my lord, for the truth of this I have said, there are some witnesses that will make the substance, the effect of this appear.

L. C. Baron. Mr. Downes, there is one particular before you come to the witnesses, that after all these convictions you signed the warrant; if you deny it, the Council will prove it.

Downes. I did never hope, or think, that any thing I can say should be so satisfactory to you, but things might be retorted upon me; and perhaps what I thought might be for extenuating my crime may fall out to my disadvantage; I understand you do proceed upon three particulars, either signing the first warrant for constituting the Court; to my remembrance I know not of it; if my hand was to it I have forgot.

Counsel. Your hand is not to that, but we mean your hand is to the Warrant for Execution. Pray shew it him. [It was shewn him.]

Downes. My lord, how to reconcile that which hath been said before, with this that comes after, I leave it to you, I am totally at a loss. When those times were, how impetuous the soldiers, how not a man that durst either disown them, or speak against them. I was threatened with my very life, by the threats of one that hath received his reward I was induced to it. Certainly, my lord, it doth argue that there was not malice predominant; love and hatred cannot be at the same time in one person. Design, my lord, what should be my design? A poor, ordinary, mean man. Surely, my lord, I could not design any great matters or places. I knew myself unfit; I humbly beg you would give me leave to tell you a little what I got—

Mr. Sol. Gen. By your favour, my lord, the prisoners at the bar may say what they will by way of extenuation; but we expect that when they enter upon these discourses they will save your lordship's time, and ours, by a public confession, and evidence of sorrow. We cannot spend so long time to hear these long discourses: we will rather prove it against every man singly.

Downes. I will trouble you no further, I do acknowledge all; I humbly submit, and beg your favour, and leave myself upon my countrymen the Jury, and beg the king's mercy specially. Pray spare me one word, that you will hear but a witness or two unto that business.

Counsel. He doth confess he sat and signed; we believe he is sorrowful, and against his conscience he did sign: and that he did it out of fear, and from a threat; that he was over-awed; (so was the hangman too;) but after he had apprehended this sorrow, and declared his judgment upon the fact, he signed the warrant.

Downes. My lord, I do humbly beg his majesty's mercy; I came in upon the proclamation.

Vincent Potter. My lord, my condition requires ease for my body; [he had a fit of the stone upon him at the same time;] I pray that the passing the sentence for execution may be suspended.

L. C. Baron. The execution must be suspended, for you are within that qualification.

Potter. I desire only this, I am not in a condition to declare what I know, and would speak; I am mighty full of pain; if I am under that qualification, let me rest under that.

Counsel. Do you confess the indictment? Or will you put us to prove it?

Potter. I am one that came in.

L. C. Baron. It is thus with you, whether or no did you sit, sign, or act in this High Court of Justice against the king?

Potter. I will deny nothing; I confess the fact, but did not contrive it; I am full of pain.

L. C. Baron. According to the demerit of the case in law you must receive judgment here, but no execution of that judgment shall be, until the king, by advice and consent of Lords and Commons, shall order the execution of it; you are to be tried now; do you confess you signed the warrant for execution of the king?

Potter. I do confess it, my lord.

Counsel. We do accept it.

Potter. I beseech you let me go to ease myself.

L. C. Baron. Officer, set a chair for him; [which was done.] Mr. Potter, sit down.

Aug. Garland. May it please your lordship, I came here this day intending to have waved my plea, and referred myself to this honourable Court, to be recommended to the king's mercy and the parliament; but hearing of some scandal upon me, more than ever I did hear till within these few days, I shall desire your favour in hearing of my trial.

Mr. Sol. Gen. My lord, he saith well; for if he had confessed the indictment we should not have accepted it. Call the Witnesses.

Garland. I do confess this; I sat, and at the day of Sentence signed the warrant for execution.

Mr. Sol. Gen. And we will prove that he spit in the king's face.

Garland. I pray let me hear that, otherwise I would not have put you to any trouble at all.

Clench sworn.

Counsel. Do you know the prisoner at the bar, Augustine Garland?

Clench. I know him very well.

Counsel. Tell my lords and the Jury how you saw him behave himself to our sovereign lord the king when he was at the bar.

Clench. I was that day at Westminster-hall when the king had sentence; they hurried the king down, and Mr. Garland came down stairs by them; towards the bottom of the stairs he spit in his face at a little distance.

Counsel. Do you believe he did it on purpose, upon your oath?

Clench. I suppose he did it somewhat suspiciously in that way; I did see the king put his hand in his left pocket, but I do not know whether the king wiped it off.

Mr. Sol. Gen. The king wiped it off, but he will never wipe it off so long as he lives: He hath confessed that he sat, that he sentenced, and that he signed: We say he contrived it at the beginning, and at last bid defiance to the king; I shall desire he may be remembered in another place.

Garland. I do not know that I was near him at that time: I do not remember this passage; I am afraid he is an indigent person. If I was guilty of this inhumanity, I desire no favour from God Almighty.

L. C. Baron. I will tell you this doth not at all concern the Jury, but this circumstance possibly may be considered in another place.

Garland. I refer myself whether you be satisfied that I did such an inhuman act, I submit that to you; I dare appeal to all these gentlemen here, (looking upon the prisoners,) or any other, whether they ever heard of it, nor was I ever accused for such a thing till a few days since; but I wave my plea, and refer myself to the Court. Now, my lord, this is the truth of my case; there is that honourable gentleman, the Speaker of the house of commons, knows I lived in Essex in the beginning of these troubles, and was forced to forsake my habitation; I came from thence to London, where I have behaved myself fairly in my way. Afterwards in 1648 I was chosen a member into the parliament; in June 1648 I came in a member of the parliament. My lord, after the division of the house by the insolence of the soldiery, some came to me, and desired me that I would go to the house; I was then at my chamber at Lincoln's-Inn; I forbore a week and more; said I, I do not expect to be admitted, for they look upon me as another person; said they, if you will go you shall have no contradiction; I went, and went in; when I was in, the first business that came was the business of trial upon the king, and it was put on me to be chairman for bringing in this act for trial; I did not know how to contradict that power or authority, (be it what it will,) but I must obey; (I fear my ruin will follow it, in that respect) my lord, when I came there I was forced to run throughout what they imposed upon me.—Having seen me I could not shrink from them for fear of my own destruction, and thereupon I did go in, and did that which I have confessed to your lordships, not out of any malignity to his majesty, I never had any disrespect to him in my life; my lord, I did not know which way to be safe in any thing, without doors was misery, within doors was mischief. I do appeal to all that had any thing to do with me, that I never did any wrong to any that was of the king's party, but helped them as I was able. My lord, when the government was thus tossed, and turned, and tumbled, and I know not what, and the secluded members came into the house, I knew not what to do in that case neither. As soon as this parliament had declared the Treaty, which was the 8th of May, the 9th of May I appeared before the right honourable the Lord Mayor of London, and did claim the benefit of his majesty's gracious Declaration, and to become a loyal subject, as in my heart I always was; and my Lord Mayor being there, I hope he will testify that as soon as I heard of the Proclamation, I rendered myself according to the Proclamation; my lord, this hath been the carriage of me, being always under fear and force; I refer myself to your lordships.

Simon Mayne. When I was last here, my lord, that I did then speak Not Guilty, was not as to the matter of fact, but my conscience telling of me that I had no malice or ill intention to his majesty, that was the reason. For matter of fact I shall acknowledge what I have done, and lie at his majesty's feet for mercy. I am an ignorant weak man in the law, I will confess the fact.

Counsel. Did you sign the warrant for summoning that court? And did you sign the warrant for execution of the king?

Meyne. I did sit in court.

Counsel. Did you sign the warrant for execution?

Meyne. My lord, I knew not of the king's bringing up, I never was at any committee.

Counsel. We do not ask you that; look upon the warrant, and see if your hand and seal be not to it.

Meyne. My lord, it is my hand.

Counsel. Then, my lord, we have done.

Meyne. My lord, I acknowledge it is my hand, by what importunity it may be known to some here; I was very unwilling to it; I was told, what fear was there when forty were there before, and twenty was of the Quorum? I was thereupon drawn in to set my hand to it. My lord, I never plotted nor contrived the business. There was a gentleman that told me, if I did offer to speak in the house, (and plucked me down by the coat) and he told me I should be sequestered as a delinquent; (the name of this person I shall omit; saith he, you will rather lose your estate than take away the king's life. I leave it with you.

James Temple. At the last time I pleaded to the Indictment Not Guilty, but I shall now desire to see my hand, and if it be my hand I must confess all circumstances must follow. [The Warrants being shewed him,] I do acknowledge it is my hand to both; I never did consult concerning the Court.

Counsel. There are some worse than he, but he is bad enough.

James Temple. I refer myself to the king and parliament; [and presented a Petition, which was received by the Court.]

Peter Temple. When I was here the last time I pleaded Not Guilty, the reason was, because there are divers things in the Indictment that my conscience tells me I am Not Guilty of; for I had not a malicious or traitorous heart against the king. To save your lordship's time I will confess what I am Guilty of: I was in the Court, sat there; if I see my hand I shall confess it.

Counsel. Were you there when Sentence was given?

Temple. Yes, Sir.

Counsel. Shew him the Warrants, [which being shewed him] I acknowledge they are my hand, and refer it to your lordships.

Counsel. Mr. Waite, you heard the charge read against you, what say you to it?

Thomas Waite. Truly, my lord, when I was here last I pleaded Not Guilty; I humbly desired then your lordships to hear me a word or two. You promised me then I should be heard; I shall desire to speak for myself.

L. C. Baron. God forbid but you should.

VOL. V.

Mr. Sal. Gen. By your lordship's favour we must speak first; if he will confess the fact he may speak what he will. Did you sit in the Court?

Waite. Yes.

Counsel. The day of Sentence?

Waite. Yes.

Counsel. Is your hand to the warrant for execution?

Waite. I know not; pray let me see it, [it was shewed him]. My lord, I confess it is like my hand, but I do not remember it.

Counsel. If you do not acknowledge it, it will be proved.

Waite. Truly, my lord, I do believe it is my hand.

Counsel. Then the Jury will not doubt it.

Waite. But I desire to be heard. I am loth to trouble you much; I will tell you how I was brought into this business. My lord, I was a member of that house that erected this court when the treaty was in the Isle of Wight. Immediately after the army came up I was utterly against that act in the house. When the army came up to purge the house I was much troubled at it; I desired to know the charge they had against them. Two or three days after I did move, and there were other gentlemen that did move, to know what charge there was. They sent word we should have a charge in due time; we sent, and none came, but said we should have it in due time; I went to those worthy gentlemen to see them in prison, and seeing nothing would be done, I took my leave, and made account to see them no more, and went down into the country to Leicestershire; I was sent for up several times; I would not come with threats upon pain of sequestration. My lords, there were petitions going up and down the country for bringing the king to that business, which was against my conscience. I went to Rutlandshire, I heard there were some things working there; I used my interest, and I thank God I stopped it; I came then to London when all these things were destroyed, I came to London the day before the sentence was given; I went to the house, (thought nothing) some were sent to the Tower, and I was sent for to the house, and my name was in the act unknown to me; but one sent a note in my lord Gray's name, that he would speak with me. I went to him and I said, my lord, what would you do with me? Saith he, I did not send for you; thereupon Cromwell and Ireton laid hold on me; said they, we sent for you, you are one of the High-Court; no, said I, not I, my judgment is against it; they carried me to the Court. When the king desired to speak with his parliament, I rising up, one told me I must not be heard, for the president was to give judgment, and said, there was an order that none should speak in Court. Mr. Downes did move, and they did adjourn the Court, and I was glad I got out; Cromwell laughed, and smiled, and jeered in the Court of Wards. I hope your lordship will be pleased to consider

† I

I was no contriver, no soldier that put the force upon the house that erected the Court, none of the lawmakers, or did any thing maliciously against the king. My lord, I was looked upon with an evil eye for regarding the king's friends in the country; Gray told me the king would not die: I hope he will not, said I: the next day, on Monday, I went to the house, they were labouring to get hands for his execution at the door; I refused and went into the house; saith Cromwell, those that are gone in shall set their hands, I will have their hands now. That night I went to the lord Gray's, and he said, I am afraid they will put him to death. I said so also. My lord, I have been a great sufferer. I was drawn in, trepanned into it, since being a friend to the king's friends, I am almost ruined in my estate; I beseech your lordships make the best interpretation. I hope you will believe I was no contriver; I humbly lay hold on the king's mercy and favour. I came in upon the proclamation; I pray this honourable Court will prefer my petition to the king, and both houses of parliament: [which the Court then received.]

William Heveningham. My lord, in 1648 we were under a force, under the tyranny of an army; they were our masters; for a malicious and traitorous heart I had not. I do absolutely deny the signing the warrant for execution of court, and also that warrant for execution of the king; at the time of sealing I had that courage and boldness that I protested against it.

Counsel. We do not question him for that, but for sitting in the High Court of Justice, and that upon the day of the sentence; do you deny that?

Heveningham. My Lord, I cannot say positively?

Counsel. If you deny the matter of fact, it must be proved.

Heveningham. My lord, I cannot say positively, but it may be I might.

Counsel. Either say positively you did, or else let the witnesses be called.

Heveningham. Truly, my lord, I think I did; but my after-actions—

L. C. Baron. Mr. Heveningham, that shall be considered.

Counsel. My Lord, to sit upon the day of sentence was high-treason in itself, and is an evidence of compassing and imagining the king's death.

Heveningham. I shall lay hold of the declaration; I came in upon the proclamation; I pray your lordships to intercede for me to the king and both houses of parliament; I pray the mercy of this court.

L. C. Baron. You of the jury, they have all confessed, and therefore you may go together.

Simon Meyne. My lords, I have forgot my petition; it is at my lodging, I desire I may send it at night.

John Downes and Peter Temple prayed the like favour.

L. C. Baron. Do, send them, they shall be received.

The Jury having consulted together a certain time, they went to their places.

Clerk. Gentlemen, are you agreed of your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our fore-man.

Clerk. John Downes, hold up thy hand, look upon the prisoner; how say you? Is he guilty of High-Treason whereof he stands indicted, and hath been arraigned? Or Not Guilty?

Fore-man. Guilty.

Clerk. Look to him, keeper. What goods and chattels, &c.

Fore-man. None to our knowledge.—And the like verdicts at the same time passed in the same manner against Vincent Potter, Augustine Garland, Simon Meyne, James Temple, Peter Temple, Thomas Waite, and William Heveningham.

Potter. I hope I may be freed from irons, I am in pain, and a man of bulk.

L. C. Baron. We can give no order in it, we must leave it to the sheriff.

Potter. I beg it of you, my lord.

L. C. Baron. We must leave it to the sheriff. Mr. Heveningham, you must withdraw from the bar.

Clerk. Officer, bring down Waller, Fleetwood, Hacker, Axtell, Hulet, Pennington, Marten, Millington, Tichburn, Roe, Lilburne, Smith, and Harvey, and set them to the bar. Which was done accordingly.

Clerk. Hardress Waller, hold up thy hand. Thou hast been indicted, and found guilty of high-treason, what canst thou say why judgment should not pass on thee to die according to law?

Waller. My lords, I am now, it seems, convicted by law, and so adjudged: your lordships the other day on my desire told me I might have liberty to speak upon my trial, I must now beg the like upon a condemned person.

L. C. Baron. You are convicted, not condemned.

Waller. My lords, I was the first that pleaded Guilty, I bless God that he gave me a heart to do it, I find most peace in the doing it; and since there is nothing left but hopes of mercy, I humbly submit it to your lordships to hear me in this sad condition, that that may make me seem more capable of mercy. I have, my lords, been so unhappy to have been transplanted out of my country these thirty years. I have been but once these eleven years in England, this must needs make me a stranger.

L. C. Baron. I must not hinder you, because it is for mercy that you plead; but consider with yourself whether it will not be better to give it in a petition: I leave it to you, we can do nothing in point of mercy but judgment.

Waller. Only this (my lord), whether I am not the more capable of your mercy.

L. C. Baron. That you may understand it, the act of indemnity of parliament hath excepted you; yet upon some qualifications: we are to proceed according to law, that is, to go to conviction and judgment. The act says, that after judgment there shall be no execution, but that it shall be suspended till a further act of parliament to be passed for that purpose; so that in the mean time we are to proceed no further than judgment. That which concerns mercy is referred to another place. If you please to say any thing to satisfy us, or to go by way of petition, it must be left to you, but what you say for mercy is nothing to us.

Waller. I humbly thank your lordship for this clear and noble dealing, and withal, I would beg that these people that are witnesses of my shame and guilt, may know that it was a force and temptation upon me; I shall not insist much, I have said that I did plead guilty, which was most safe to my own conscience, yet I should make it appear that I did appear more to preserve the king from trial and sentence than any other.

Lord Finch. Sir Hardress Waller, I have heard of late of your sorrow, which I was glad to hear of, because you are my kinsman, both by your father and mother's side, and also my country-man; I was glad to hear of your great penitence for that horrid crime, and I would have been glad to have seen it now; advise with yourself, whether you do yourself any good in speaking to extenuate, when you know there is no man against whom there are such circumstances of aggravation as against you; consider whether a public penitence would not be more proper.

Waller. I beseech you report me both to his majesty and parliament, and receive me into your grace, as being penitent, truly penitent: to say so now were a small thing, for the fear of the punishment may procure it; but I have been more penitent when no eye hath seen me but God; when I never imagined to be questioned for this sin, then my heart hath yearned in the business; but I shall not trouble your lordships. God holds forth mercy, his majesty holds forth mercy, the parliament holds forth mercy. My lord, let me say something to you (though it be but a word), of the violence and force of temptation; you may have been under it, or may come to it; Christ himself was under it; we find that faithful Abraham, by the power of a temptation, delivered up his wife to commit adultery, which scarce a heathen would; we find that valiant Peter denied his master; righteous Lot committed incest. None abhors this fact more than I do; I have done it so long beforehand, I need not be afraid to speak it in the face of the judge of all men; that is all I shall say. I rendered myself three times; I had as much opportunity to make my escape as any person whatsoever.

L. C. Baron. It is understood, sir Hardress.

Clerk. Isaac Pennington, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition as the former, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

Pennington. My lord, I have said what I have to say, and shall not trouble your lordships any further.

Clerk. Henry Marten, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

Marten. I claim the benefit of the Proclamation.

Clerk. Gilbert Millington, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

Millington. I shall not trouble you with long discourses; I shall say no more but this, I have made a public resentment of my sorrow for this offence formerly, and many times. I shall now desire no more, but humbly beg that I may have the benefit of the Proclamation, and pray his majesty's most gracious pardon.

Clerk. Robert Tichburn, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

Tichburn. My lord, I will not trouble you with any repetitions, I have made my humble request before, I leave it with you.

Clerk. Owen Roe, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

Roe. My lord, I have no more to say than I said before.

Clerk. Robert Lilburn, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

Lilburn. I shall refer myself without further trouble to the court; my lord, I beg the benefit of the Proclamation.

Clerk. Thomas Waite, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

Waite. I can declare no more than what I have already: my heart is sorry for what I have done: I beg the benefit of the Proclamation.

Clerk. Edmund Harvey, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

Harvey. My lords, I have no more than what I said before.

Clerk. John Downes, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

Downes. I shall not trouble you any further; I shall desire the benefit of his majesty's Proclamation.

Clerk. Vincent Potter, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

Potter. My lord, I do not know law, I understand it not; I am not in a condition to speak what I would have willingly spoke: I desire that God would have mercy, and I look for mercy from God [and wept].

Clerk. Augustine Garland, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

Garland. I humbly desire your lordship's charitable opinion of me: notwithstanding what has been objected against me, I humbly refer myself to the parliament.

Clerk. George Fleetwood, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

Fleetwood. My lord, I have already confessed the fact, I wish I could express my sorrow [and wept.]

Clerk. James Temple, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

James Temple. My lord, I can say no more, I beg the benefit of the Proclamation.

Clerk. Simon Meyne, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

Meyne. I have told you before, my lord, I have no more.

Clerk. Peter Temple, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

Peter Temple. My lord, I came in upon the Proclamation, and I humbly beg the benefit of it.

Clerk. Francis Hacker, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

Hacker. My lord, I have nothing to say but what has been before your lordships.

Clerk. Daniel Axtell, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why judgment, &c.?

Axtell. May it please your lordships, my case differs from the rest of the gentlemen.

L. C. Baron. I would be loth to hinder you, but I must tell you that what hath been over-ruled must not be spoke to; if you have any thing against the Indictment matter of law, go on.

Axtell. I have one thing more that I did not then mention.

L. C. Baron. If it tend not as an exception to the Indictment, it is not to be heard.

Axtell. My lord, then I shall apply myself to that point; I humbly conceive, my lord, that my overt-acts were not sufficiently set down in the Indictment, as might be sufficient in law to attain me of high-treason; I do not remember that the Overt-act that was applied to me in evidence was charged in the Indictment; I have only that exception, because of the insufficiency of that point. In the next place, my lord, there is not the right additions to my name; there are many persons of the same name; I am arraigned by the name of Daniel Axtell of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman. I think none knew me to live there, and inhabit there.

L. C. Baron. I would not interrupt you; this is past; you should have made your exception to that as master Marten did before concerning his name; that should have been first done; you have appeared and pleaded to that name, and it was, 'late of Westminster.'

Axtell. My lord, I have this to speak in arrest of judgment, that the Indictment being grounded upon that statute of the 25th of Edw.

the 3d, it is either mistaken, or not pursued; my lords, I did yesterday give you the judgment of the Lords and Commons concerning the statute in relation to my case; I say the statute was mistaken, or not pursued.

L. C. Baron. That was offered before, Sir, as to the matter of it.

Axtell. My lord, I think not, I am mistaken if it were.

L. C. Baron. Then open it.

Axtell. My lord, I do not find in that statute that words are an Overt-act, words only.

L. C. Baron. This was over-ruled. The things that you objected were these, that there is not any Overt-act that is laid that could be applicable to your case; if it were not particularly applicable (you are found guilty by the jury), it would be nothing: But there is an Overt-act, you were present at the Court, beating the soldiers, sending for an executioner: but for words, if any man should say, here is the king, go and kill him, this is treason; but you were guilty in all, according to law. You being there, and doing this, you were not guilty only of the words, but of all that was done; there is none but principals in treason. What we say and do to you we well know we must answer before God Almighty for it.

Axtell. I have but one word more; truly I do appeal to God, before whom I shall have another trial, I do not find myself guilty either of consulting, contriving, or having a hand in the death of the king, I am innocent, and I pray God that my innocent blood—

L. C. Baron. Pray, Sir—

Axtell. May not cry—

L. C. Baron. You are now to speak in arrest of judgment.

Axtell. I have no more; I pray your lordship's favour and mercy to me.

Clerk. William Hulet alias Howlet, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition, what canst thou say for thyself why, &c.?

Hulet. Truly, my lord, I have little further to say; if you had been pleased to give me further time I should have cleared myself. I call God above to witness upon this account that I am as clear as any man; I submit to the mercy of the Court.

L. C. Baron. For that, I do believe (but cannot positively say it), that at your request (notwithstanding that judgment will pass against you) there may be some time till his majesty's pleasure be known before any execution will be upon that judgment against you; in the mean time we must proceed according to law and justice.

Proclamation for Silence whilst Judgment is given.

THE LORD CHIEF BARON'S SPEECH before the Sentence pronounced against the aforementioned prisoners found Guilty.

"You that are prisoners at the bar, you stand here in several capacities, yet all of you persons convicted of the detestable and execrable murder of our sovereign lord king Charles the 1st of blessed memory. Mistake me not, I do not say that you are all of you guilty of executing the fact, but in law, and in conscience (pro tanto though not pro toto), you are guilty of it, in that you prepared the way and means to it, in that you brought his head to the block, though you did not cut it off. You are here in three sorts, and I must apply my words accordingly; and truly I do it with as much sorrow of heart as you have, many of you being persons of liberal education, great parts; I say you are of three sorts. There are some of you, that, though the judgment of death is to pass against you, by his majesty's grace and favour, and the mercy under him, of the two houses of parliament, execution is to be suspended until another act of parliament shall pass to that purpose, that is, all of you but three; for those three, the one of them that was last called, William Heveningham, he is in another capacity too; for I presume some time will be given to him to consider of something relating to him, before any order will be given for his execution; there are two others of you, and that is Daniel Axtell and Francis Hacker; and for you, as it yet stands before us, there is no mercy, there is no room for it: But though you be in those several classes, yet what I shall say will concern you all, because I do not know how it may fall with you; none of us knows how soon we may come to our deaths, some (probably) sooner than others; all must come to it: You are now before the tribunal of man, but that is for judgment for your offence here; but there is another judgment hereafter, and a tribunal before which both you and we must stand, every man here, and we must receive according to our work; those that have done ignorantly, by a serious and unfeigned repentance God Almighty may shew mercy unto them. He hath reserved mercy even for the greatest offenders. St. Paul, himself, when he persecuted Christ ignorantly, upon his repentance he found mercy; those of you that are not yet convicted in your conscience of the foulness of this horrid fact, look into your consciences a little more, and see if it be not a great judgment for your former offence, that you should be given over to a reprobate sense; let me tell you, a seared conscience, a bold confidence, not upon good grounds, is so far from securing the conscience, it may stifle, perhaps, the mouth of conscience, but it will rise up more in judgment against you. Here you have made your defence, and I do not blame you for it; life is precious, but remember the thoughts of your hearts are open: whether you did it ignorantly, covetously, or to get the government into your own hands, that I am not able to search into, God and you only know that; give me leave to say something, perhaps I have repeated it by parts before; God is my witness what I speak I speak from mine own conscience, and that is this, gentlemen, because I saw it stuck with some of you, that is, that whatsoever the case was, that by the laws of these nations, the fundamental laws, there could be any coercive power over your king. I speak it again, because I would as near as I could speak the whole truth, and would not mislead any man in such a case: remember that no power, no person, no community or body of men (not the people, either collectively or representatively), have any coercive power over the person of the king, by the fundamental laws; for that, gentlemen, I shall begin to shew you that which all of you might remember, that is, your oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and to add to this that obligation which all this whole nation did oblige themselves to, by the parliament, without question, then rightly represented, and in being, the first of king James; whereby to shew you, that not only persons, but the body politic of the nation, not only the single members, but the members in both houses of parliament, were loyal and obedient subjects to the king, their head, even to yield a natural and humble obedience and allegiance. I told you the act of 1 king James, when king James came first into England, 'We the lords and commons representing the whole people of this nation,' the very words of the act are so, 1 Jac. ch. 1, 'representing the whole body of the nation, do acknowledge an humble and natural liege obedience to the king as supreme, his heirs and successors; and in the name of themselves, and all the people, humbly submit themselves until the last drop of their blood be spent in defence of the king and his royal posterity;' and therefore they did oblige themselves and all the people of England, as far as I could represent them, the words are more full than I can express them, and indeed it is so dark I cannot read them: They did acknowledge to be bound to him and his imperial crown. Remember these were not words of compliment; you shall find that they all of them, and so did so many of you as are members of parliament, yea, all of you, before you came into the house of commons, did take the oath of allegiance, which was made after this recognition, the third and fourth of king James, or otherwise were not to be members. What was that oath of allegiance that you took? It was, that you should defend the king, his person (that is in 3 Jac. ch. 4), his crown and dignity: What was it? Not only against the pope's power to depose, but the words are 'or otherwise:' look into the act, and reflect upon your own conscience, and you shall find that all did swear to defend the king, his crown and dignity, and there it is called 'Imperial Crown.' I would have you lay this to heart, and see how far you have kept this oath: Gentlemen, in the Oath of Supremacy, which you all took, therein you did further acknowledge that the king was the only supreme governor of this realm: Mark the words, I will repeat them that you may lay it to heart; you that have more time to apply it to your fact; and you that have less time, for ought I know, you have reason to consider what I have to say; you swore then, that the king by the oath of supremacy, which all of you have taken, or ought to have taken; if any of you have not taken it, yet notwithstanding you are not absolved from the obligation of it; but most of you did take it; there you did swear that the king is the only supreme governor of this realm; and you swear there that you would defend all jurisdictions, privileges, pre-eminences, and authorities, granted or belonging to the king's highness, his heirs, and successors, or united and annexed unto the imperial crown of this realm. For the first, if the king be supreme, then there is no co-ordination, 'Non habet majorem, non habet parem;' that word 'Imperial Crown,' is at least in nine or ten several statutes; it is the very word in this act that was made lately in pursuance of former acts concerning judicial proceedings. And so in the time of king Charles, they acknowledged him to be their liege sovereign; I say that word 'supreme,' and so the word 'imperial crown,' is in the 1st of queen Eliz., the 3d and 8th of Eliz., the 24th of Hen. 8, ch. 12, there it is said this kingdom is an 'imperial crown, subject to none but God Almighty,' Before these times you shall find in the 16 of Richard 2, the Statute of Præmunire, the crown of England subject to God alone. I will go higher, William Rufus (some of you are historians, and you shall find the same in Eadmerus, and also in Matthew Paris, shortly after William Rufus his time), when he wrote to the pope he challenged, and had the same liberty in this kingdom of England, as the emperor had in his empire; (mistake me not, I speak only as to the person of the king) I do not meddle of rights between the king and subjects, or subject and subject; you see in this case concerning the death of his majesty's dear father, and our blessed sovereign, of happy memory, he doth not judge himself, but according to law; that which I assert is as to the person of the king, which was the privilege of emperors, as to their personal privileges; if he had offended, and committed an offence, he was only accountable to God himself. I will come back to what I have said; you swore to be faithful to the king as supreme. The king of Poland hath a Crown, but at his oath of coronation it is conditioned with the people, that if he shall not govern according to such and such rules they shall be freed from their homage and allegiance. But it differs with our king, for he was a king before oath. The king takes his oath, but not upon any condition; this I shew you, to let you see that we have no coercive power against the king. The king of England was anointed with oil at his coronation, which was to shew that absolute power (I do not say of government). but of being accountable to God for what he did: the law saith, 'The king doth no injury to any man;' not but that the king may have the imbecilities and infirmities of other men, but the king in his single person can do no wrong; but if the king command a man to beat me, or to disseize me of my land, I have my remedy against the man, though not against the king. The law in all cases preserves the person of the king to be untouched; but what is done by his ministers unlawfully, there is a remedy against his ministers for it; but in this case, when you come to the person of the king, what do our law books say he is? They call it, Caput reipublicæ, salus populi, the Lieutenant of God; and let me tell you, there was never such a blow given to the church of England, and the Protestant religion. There was a case, and that of the Spencers, you shall find in the 7th Report of the lord Coke, in Calvin's case, that homage is due to the king in his politic capacity; and then they made this damnable inference, that therefore if the king did not demean himself as he ought, that he should be reformed, per asperitæ, by asperity, sharpness, or imprisonment: but these were condemned by two acts of parliament in print, that they could not do that even in that case; one was called the Banishment of Hugh Spencer; and the other is in 1 Edward 3, upon the roll. My masters, in the first of Henry the 7th you shall find it in the printed Seven Books, he saith, 'That as to the regality of his crown, he is immediately subject unto God.' Mark the doctrine of the church of England, gentlemen; I do not know with what spirit of equivocation any man can take that Oath of Supremacy: you shall find in the Articles of the Church of England, the last but one or two; it is that Article which sets forth the Doctrine of the Church of England; they say, That the queen, and so the king, hath the supreme power in this realm, and hath the chief government over all the estates of the realm; the very words are so; this was shortly after making the act; the Articles were in 1562, and she came in 1558, or 1559: it is to shew you the king hath the chief government over all the estates within the nation; and if you look upon it, you shall find it was not only the judgment of the church, but of the parliament at the same time. They did confirm this Article so far, that they appointed that no man should take, or be capable of a living, but those that had taken that oath. God forgive those ministers that went against it. The queen, and the church, were willing that these should be put into Latin, that all the world might see the confession of the church of England, and of the people of England; you may read it in Camden: I have told you how, and wherein, the chief power consisted; not in respect the king could do what he would; no, the emperors themselves did not challenge that; but this they challenge by it, that they were not accountable to man for what they did: no man ought to touch the person of the king; I press it to you in the point of conscience; you see in the scripture, in Psalm li. the Psalm of Mercy, wherein we ask pardon of God of our great offences; I think none of you in this condition but will join in this; you know the adultery and murder that David committed, this penitential Psalm was made for that; what doth he say? 'Against thee, thee only, have I sinned,' &c. 'Tibi soli peccavi, Domine;' not because he had not sinned against man, for it is plain he had sinned both against Bethsheba and Uriah too; but because he was not liable to the tribunal of man, he was not bound or accountable to any man upon earth. And now, my masters, I beseech you consider, that some of you for ought I know suddenly, and some of you for ought I know not long after, all of us, we do not know how soon, must come to make a right account to God of what we have done. After this life you enter into an eternity, an eternity, an eternity of happiness, or of woe; God Almighty is merciful to those that are truly penitent; the thief upon the cross, and to all that are of a penitent heart. You are persons of education, do not you go on in an obstinate perverse course, for shame of men, even this shame which you now have, and which you may have when you come to die; a sanctified use may be made of it; you pay to God some part of that punishment which you owe to him for your sins. I have no more to say, but the next thing I have to do, is to give the Sentence, the Judgment, which truly I do with as unwilling a heart as you do receive it. You prisoners at the bar, the Judgment of the Court is this, and the Court doth award, 'That you be led back to the place from whence you came, and from thence to be drawn upon an hurdle to the place of execution, and there you shall be hanged by the neck, and being alive shall be cut down, and your privy members to be cut off, your entrails to be taken out of your bodies, and (you living) the same to be burnt before your eyes, and your heads to be cut off, your bodies to be divided into four quarters, and heads and quarters to be disposed of at the pleasure of the king's majesty, and the Lord have mercy upon your souls.'"

Court adjourned till Friday morning seven o'clock.

Friday, October 19, 1660.

Set William Heveningham to the bar.

Serjeant Keeling. May it please your lordships, the prisoner at the bar, William Heveningham, hath been indicted for high treason, for compassing and imagining the death of the late king, of blessed memory; he has been tried, the jury has found him guilty, I do humbly move your lordships in the behalf of the king that you will proceed to Judgment.

Clerk. William Heveningham, hold up thy hand. What canst thou say for thyself why Judgment, &c.

Heveningham. My lords, I have nothing more to say than I said formerly, only I plead the benefit of the Proclamation, and cast myself upon the mercy of our most gracious sovereign, and desire your lordships to be mediators on my behalf.

L. C. Baron. By the Act of Indemnity (of which you claim the benefit, and we ought to take notice of it) we are to proceed to Judgment, but no execution of this Judgment is to be until by another act of parliament, by consent of the king, it shall be ordered. And therefore I need not speak any more of that, or any exhortation to prepare yourself for death; our work is only to give Judgment. The Judgment of the Court is this, and the Court doth award, that you the prisoner at the bar be led back to, &c. and the Lord have mercy upon your soul.

Of these, ten only were executed, viz.

Thomas Harrison,	Gregory Clements,
John Carew,	John Jones,
John Cook,	Daniel Axtell,
Thomas Scot,	Francis Hacker,
Hugh Peters,	Adrian Scroop.

Whose Behaviour at their Execution is thus related by their several friends:

Some Particulars of the subsequent Behaviour and of the Execution of Major-General HARRISON, the 13th day of October, 1660, at Charing-Cross. *

The day of his coming to Newgate from the Tower, at night he sent his wife word that that day was to him as his wedding-day.—When the Sentence was pronounced, he said, Whom men have judged God, doth not condemn, blessed be the name of the Lord. And as he was carried away from the Court through the croud, the people shouted. And he cried, Good is the Lord for all this; I have no cause to be ashamed of the cause that I have been engaged in. Some friends asked him how he did, he answered, Very well; and cannot be in a better condition if I had the desires of my heart; we must be willing to receive hard things from the hands of our Father, as well as easy things: When he came to Newgate there was chains put upon his feet; and he said Welcome, welcome, Oh this is nothing to what Christ hath undergone for me; this is out of his great loving kindness and faithfulness, and my God is all-sufficient in all conditions. And also soon after his coming into the dungeon in order to his execution, a woman belonging to the gaol, who was sent to make clean the room, and to make a fire for him, was asked when she came out by divers people (whereof some were scoffers) how the major general behaved himself, and what he said. To which she answered, she knew not what he had done to deserve to be there, but sure she was that he was a good man, and that never such a man was there before, for he was full of God, there was nothing but God in his mouth; so that it would have done any one good to have been near him, or with him; and his discourse and frame of heart would melt the hardest of their hearts.

* See the Trial of Brewster, Dover, and Brookes, for publishing the Speeches and Prayers of these people, A. D. 1663, infra.

Sometime after he was put into the hold, three ministers of the city were sent by the sheriff to discourse with him. And their discourses was to endeavour to convince him, 1. Of being guilty of the king's blood. 2. Of Mr. Love's death. 3. Of breaking the old parliament. 4. Of being loose in family duties, and the observation of the Lord's day. 5. Of the justness of this thing that was upon him by reason of his iniquity. To which he answered, 1. As to the blood of the king, I have not in the least any guilt lying upon me; for I have many a time sought the Lord with tears to know if I have done amiss in it, but was rather confirmed that the thing was more of God than of men; And besides what I did, I did by authority of parliament, which was then the only lawful authority, for God owned it by pleading their cause, and fighting their battles for them; the Lord's people owned it by rejoicing in it and praying for it; the generality of people both in England, Scotland and Ireland owned it by yielding obedience to it; Foreign Princes owned it by sending their Embassadors, therefore it was rather the act of the parliament, than ours that were their servants. He declared that he was very tender of the king, insomuch that the king himself did confess that he found him not such a person as he was represented to them (when he was brought out of the Isle of Wight) and that he had some skill in faces, so that if he had but seen his face before, he should not have harboured such hard thoughts of him. 2. As to Mr. Love's death, I was in Scotland when he was condemned, and had no hand in it in the least. They desired to know if he did not say then, That if a godly man so transgress as to bring himself under the condemnation of the law, it were not a just thing for him to suffer for his sin; he told them that he did not remember that he did say so, but then said, if a godly man did so transgress a righteous law, he ought to suffer as another man. 3. The breaking of the parliament was the act and design of general Cromwell, for I did know nothing of it; that morning before it was done he called me to go along with him to the house, and after he had brought all into disorder, I went to the Speaker and told him; Sir, seeing things brought to this pass it is not requisite for you to stay there: he answered he would not come down unless he was pulled out; Sir, said I, I will lend you my hand, and he putting his hand into mine came down without any pulling, so that I did not pull him. Indeed, afterwards I was glad the thing was done, for I did see they did intend to perpetuate themselves without doing those desirable things which were expected and longed for by the Lord's people; and apprehending that God had done this work by them, and that he had some more worthy persons to come upon the stage; the Lord is my witness, that I had no self-end in that action, but it was out of the integrity of my heart as to the Lord. Afterwards when Cromwell and his party did set up themselves in their room, I abhorred them and their ways, and suffered imprisonment by reason I would not join with them in that iniquity and go against my conscience; there is nothing of this also that lies as guilt upon me.—4. Concerning family-duties, and the observation of the Lord's-day, there stands my servant, let him speak to it; for he hath lived with me about this eight years. The servant answered, That those reports were very false; for his master was a man in a manner wholly devoted to religious exercises, very frequent in prayer, and diligent in expounding the Scriptures, to the great comfort and consolation of his whole family, and that he was very zealous in observing the Lord's day.—5. He said that the Lord's spirit did witness with his spirit, That all his sins were done away by Jesus Christ, that he had peace with God, and was assured that this was not come upon him for his iniquity.

They discoursed of many other things, but these were the chiefest, so far as one then present could afterwards remember. He parted very sweetly and lovingly with the said ministers, and they told him that they came then by the desire of the sheriff; but that they would willingly come again upon a Christian account. Many friends came to visit him whilst he was in that place, and found him full of the joy of the Lord; so that some apprehended he was cloathed with the spirit of the Lord.

The Sheriff came that morning that he was to die, and told him, that in half an hour he must be gone; he answered, that he was ready, and would not have him stay at all on his account. But the sheriff left him to stay a little longer, and in the mean time, he was longing for the sheriff's coming, and as his friends judged he was in haste to be gone, and said, He was going about a great work for the Lord that day; and that his support was, that his sufferings were upon the account of Jehovah, the Lord of Hosts. He said, he looked upon this as a clear answer of his prayers; for many a time, said he, have I begged of the Lord, That if he had any hard thing, any reproachful work, or contemptible service to be done by his people, That I should be employed in it; And now blessed be the name of God, who accounteth me worthy to be put upon this service for my Lord Christ: Oh, this is nothing to what Christ suffered for me!

He parted with his wife and friends with great joy and cheerfulness, as he did use to do when going some journey, or about some service for the Lord. He told his wife he had nothing to leave her but his Bible; but that he was assured that God would make up all her losses in due time; and desired, that those that did love him, should manifest their love in being loving and tender to his dear wife.

The Sheriff commanding the Keeper to acquaint Mr. Harrison he must go to suffer, the Keeper came forth, and returned answer, That he was ready when he pleased: Then the Sheriff commanded the Keeper to fetch him forth; so he came forth immediately, sooner than was expected; (running down the stairs with a smiling countenance;) by reason of his sudden coming, the door (that he was to go up a pair of stairs at) was not opened, which occasioned his stay in the Hall till the Keeper could be found; and there one Mrs. M. took him by the hand, and said, with a loud voice, 'Blessed be the great God of Hosts, that hath enabled you, and called you forth to bear your testimony; the God of all grace and peace be with you, and keep you faithful to the death, that you may receive a Crown of Life.' With that one of the officers pulled the woman away by the shoulder, saying, Away with this woman, she stands prating here. But the Major-General replied, Be not offended with her, she speaks Scripture-language: So they thrust her away from him, and would not permit any to speak more to him in that place.

Then he was carried into a room where the common prisoners were, and told them what a sad thing it was to be condemned to die, and to want the love and favour of God; but it is not so with me; for though I die, yet I know I shall live with Christ to all eternity, and this is out of the exceeding riches of the grace of God; for he it is that maketh the difference: For as I am in myself, I am a base, vile, and nothing creature; but complete in him who is the head of all principalities and powers. Poor men! I wish you all as well as I do my own soul. Oh that you did but know Christ! his bowels yearn towards the greatest of sinners; his blood is sufficient to do away the deepest iniquity; he waiteth to be gracious, and is willing to receive all that come unto him: Oh therefore labour to come to Christ! your time in this world is short and uncertain; you are walking upon the brink of eternity, and are ready to drop in every moment; if you die without the fear of our God, you will be miserable for ever and ever; but if you come to know Christ to be yours, it will be your joy and happiness world without end. He then put his hands into his pocket and gave them some money, and wished them to take heed of sinning against the Lord. And from thence was carried upon the leads on the top of Newgate, so that he could see the greatest part of the city; he then said, 'The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof, and there is nothing hid from his eyes.' From thence he was carried down two pair of stairs, where he was tied about the back, breast, and shoulders; he took the rope in his hand and said, 'Friends take notice that God gives me power to receive this with thanksgiving,' and he helped the serjeant to put on the rope. Then a friend came weeping to him to take her leave of him, he said, 'Hinder me not, for I am going about a work for my master.' Then looking about him, said, 'Sirs, it is easy to follow God when he makes a hedge about us, and makes liberal provision for us; but it is hard for most to follow him in such a dispensation as this; and yet my Lord and Master is as sweet and glorious to me now, as he was in the time of my greatest prosperity.'

He also said, This I can say for myself, That according to the light that God hath given me, I have served him and my country with integrity and uprightness of heart, not willingly nor wittingly wronging any: But this I have done with much infirmity and weakness. One telling him, that he did not know how to understand the mind of God in such a dispensation as this: He said, 'Wait upon the Lord; for you know not what the Lord is leading to, and what the end of the Lord will be.'

After this, addressing himself to a gentleman, he said, 'I dare not, nor cannot be a pleaser of men: A friend answered, It appeared so by your declining Cromwell's interest; which words he assented to, and further said, 'The manner of my speaking before the Court may seem strange to some; but my design was not to approve myself before men, but God; and what I said was according to my conscience.' And as the rope was tying on, he repeated Isaac's words to Abraham; 'Father, here is the wood, but where is the sacrifice?' and also said, 'If the Lord see good, he can provide another sacrifice, he can deliver those that are appointed to die; but his will be done, death is not terrible to me; yea, it is no more to me than a rush, I have learned to die long ago.' And was often heard to say, concerning the Lord's dispensation to him and his people, 'Shall not the Lord do with his own what it pleaseth him?' And so parting with his friend, went down stairs to the sledge, and asked which way must I sit? for I am not acquainted with this: 'Good is the Lord in all his ways.' Then he was carried away in the sledge, having a sweet smiling countenance, with his eyes and hands lifted up to heaven, his countenance never changing in all the way as he went to the place of execution, but was mighty cheerful to the astonishment of many. He called several times in the way, and spoke aloud, 'I go to suffer upon the account of the most glorious cause that ever was in the world.' As he was going to suffer, one in derision called to him and said, 'Where is your Good Old Cause?' He with a cheerful smile clapt his hand on his breast, and said, 'Here it is, and I am going to seal it with my blood.' And when he came to the sight of the gallows, he was transported with joy, and his servant asked him how he did; he answered, Never better in my life: His servant told him, Sir, there is a Crown of Glory ready prepared for you. O yes, said he, I see it. When he was taken off the sledge the hangman desired him to forgive him: I do forgive thee, said he, with all my heart, as it is a sin against me; and told him he wished him all happiness. And further said, Alas poor man, thou dost it ignorantly; the Lord grant that this sin may not be laid to thy charge! And putting his hand into his pocket, gave him all the money he had; and so parting with his servant, lugging of him in his arms, he went up the ladder with an undaunted countenance; from whence he spake to the multitude as follows:

"Gentlemen, I did not expect to have spoken a word to you at this time; but seeing there is a silence commanded, I will speak something of the work God had in hand in our days. Many of you have been witnesses of the finger of God, that hath been seen amongst us of late years, in the deliverance of his people from their oppressors, and in bringing to judgment those that were guilty of the precious blood of the dear servants of the Lord. And how God did witness thereto by many wonderful and evident testimonies, as it were immediately from Heaven, insomuch that many of our enemies, who were persons of no mean quality, were forced to confess, That God was with us; And if God did but stand neuter, they should not value us: And therefore, seeing the finger of God hath been pleading this cause, I shall not need to speak much to it; In which work I with others were engaged; for the which, I do from my soul bless the name of God, who out of the exceeding riches of his grace accounted me worthy to be instrumental in so glorious a work; and though I am wrongfully charged with murder and bloodshed, yet I must tell you I have kept a good conscience both towards God, and towards man; I never had malice against any man, neither did I act maliciously towards any person, but as I judged them to be enemies to God and his people; and the Lord is my witness that I have done what I did out of the sincerity of my heart to the Lord. I bless God I have no guilt upon my conscience, but the spirit of God beareth witness that my actions are acceptable to the Lord, through Jesus Christ; though I have been compassed about with manifold infirmities, failings and imperfections in my holiest duties; but in this I have comfort and consolation, that I have peace with God, and do see all my sins washed away in the blood of my dear Saviour. And I do declare as before the Lord, that I would not be guilty wittingly, nor willingly, of the blood of the meanest son, no not for ten thousand worlds, much less of the blood of such as I am charged with.

"I have again and again besought the Lord with tears to make known his will and mind unto me concerning it, and to this day he hath rather confirmed me in the justice of it, and therefore I leave it to him, and to him I commit my ways; but some that were eminent in the work, did wickedly turn aside themselves, and to set up their nests on high, which caused great dishonour to the name of God, and the profession they had made. And the Lord knows I could have suffered more than this, rather than have fallen in with them in that iniquity, though I was offered what I would if I would have joined with them; my aim in all my proceedings was the glory of God, and the good of his people, and the welfare of the whole Commonwealth."

The People observing him to tremble in his hands and legs, he taking notice of it, said:

"Gentlemen, By reason of some scoffing that I do hear, I judge that some do think I am afraid to die, by the shaking I have in my hands and knees; I tell you, no, but it is by reason of much blood I have lost in the wars, and many wounds I have received in my body, which caused this shaking and weakness in my nerves; I have had it this twelve years; I speak this to the praise and glory of God; he hath carried me above the fear of death: and I value not my life, because I go to my Father, and am assured I shall take it up again.

"Gentlemen, Take notice, that for being instrumental in that cause and interest of the Son of God, which hath been pleaded amongst us, and which God hath witnessed to my appeals and wonderful victories, I am brought to this place, to suffer death this day; and if I had ten thousand lives, I could freely and cheerfully lay them down all, to witness to this matter.

"Oh, what am I, poor worm, that I should be accounted worthy to suffer any thing for the sake of my Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ! I have gone joyfully and willingly, many a time, to lay down my life upon the account of Christ, but never with so much joy and freedom as at this time; I do not lay down my life by constraint, but willingly; for if I had been minded to have run away, I might have had many opportunities; but being so clear in the thing, I durst not turn my back, nor step a foot out of the way, by reason I had been engaged in the service of so glorious and great a God. However, men presume to call it by hard names; yet I believe, ere it be long, the Lord will make it known from heaven that there was more of God in it than men are now aware of."

[The Sheriff minding him of the shortness of time, if he had any thing to say to the people, he might.]

He said, "I do desire as from my own soul, that they and every one may fear the Lord, that they may consider their latter end, and so it may be well with them; and even for the worst of those that have been most malicious against me, from my soul, I would forgive them all so far as any thing concerns me; and so far as it concerns the cause and glory of God, I leave it for him to plead; and as for the cause of God, I am willing to justify it by my sufferings, according to the good pleasure of his will. I have been this morning, before I came hither, so hurried up and down stairs (the meaning whereof I knew not) that my spirits are almost spent; therefore you may not expect much from me.

"Oh the greatness of the love of God to such a poor, vile, and nothing creature as I am! What am I, that Jesus Christ should shed his heart's blood for me, that I might be happy to all eternity, that I might be made a Son of God, and an heir of Heaven! Oh, that Christ should undergo so great sufferings and reproaches for me! And should not I be willing to lay down my life, and suffer reproaches for him that hath so loved me; Blessed be the name of God that I have a life to lose upon so glorious, and so honourable an account; [Then praying to himself, with tears; and having ended, the hang-man pulled down his cap; but he thrust it up again, saying,] I have one word more to the Lord's people, that desire to serve him with an upright heart: Let them not think hardly of any of the good ways of God for all this; for I have been near this seven years a suffering person, and have found the way of God to be a perfect way, his word a tried word, a buckler to them that trust in him, and will make known his glorious arm in the sight of all nations. And though we may suffer hard things, yet he hath a gracious end, and will make a good end for his own glory, and the good of his people; therefore be chearful in the Lord your God, hold fast that which you have and be not afraid of suffering; for God will make hard and bitter things sweet and easy to all that trust in him: Keep close to the good confession you have made of Jesus Christ, and look to the recompence of reward; be not discouraged by reason of the cloud that now is upon you; for the sun will shine, and God will give a testimony unto what he hath been a doing, in a short time.

"And now I desire to commit my concerns into the hands of my Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, he that hath delivered himself for the chief of sinners; he that came into the world, was made flesh and was crucified; that hath loved me, and washed me from my sins in his own blood, and is risen again, sitting at the right hand of God, making intercession for me.

"And as for me, Oh! who am I, poor, base, vile worm, that God should deal thus by me? for this will make me come the sooner into his glory, and to inherit the kingdom, and that crown prepared for me? Oh, I have served a good Lord and Master, which hath helped me from my beginning to this day, and hath carried me through many difficulties, trials, straits, and temptations, and hath always been a very present help in time of trouble; he hath covered my head many times in the day of battle: By God I have leaped over a wall, by God I have run through a troop, and by my God I will go through this death, and he will make it easy to me. Now into thy hands, O Lord Jesus, I commit my spirit."

Then he was turned off, and was cut down, alive, for after his body was opened, he mounted himself, and gave the executioner a box on the ear*.

Some Particulars of the subsequent BEHAVIOUR and of the EXECUTION of Mr. JOHN CAREW, the 15th day of October, 1660, at Charing-Cross.

When the first tidings of the adversary's intentions to seize and apprehend him (being then in Cornwall) came to his knowledge, he uttered these words or to this effect. That he had committed both his life and estate to the Lord; to save or destroy, as he thought meet: and therefore he would not by any means go out of the way, though provoked thereunto by several friends. After he was seized upon in the country, and coming up to London, he had a gracious presence of the Lord with him; sweetly supporting him in the sense of the love of Christ to his soul; and being persuaded, that the cause of his suffering from man was such, as he had no cause to be ashamed of; otherwise, the many reproaches and hard usage in the way to London had been sufficient to have troubled his spirit. In most towns where he came, the generality of the people reviling him, with such words as these: Hang him rogue, pistol him, said others, hang him up said some (at Salisbury) at the next sign-post without any further trouble. Look, said others, how he doth not alter his countenance; but we believe he will tremble when he comes to the ladder. This is the rogue will have no king but Jesus. Indeed, the rage of the people all the way was such, that had he not been endued with strength from on high, he could not have undergone the wicked and barbarous deportment and carriage of the giddy multitude which he was subjected to.

After he came to London, and had many opportunities of escape, if he had thought it meet (before he was sent to the Tower) yet he would not, knowing how much the name and glory of God was concerned in his faithful witness to the cause of Christ for which he was in bonds. And the truth is, his joy in the Lord was such, that when many came drooping in spirit to him (by reason of the gloominess of this present dispensation) they went away refreshed and comforted by those many gracious words that came out of his mouth.

When word was brought him that major general Harrison was dead, he said, Well, my turn will be next, and as we have gone along in our lives, so must we be, one in our death. The Lord God grant, that I may have strength from himself to follow courageously to the last breath; and that I may much honour and glorify God, whom I have made profession of; I can do nothing of myself, but my strength is in the Lord of Hosts, who hath helped me from my beginning to this day, and will help me to the end. The night before he suffered, some of his natural relations came to take their leave of him, and when they were parting, they shed some tears, but when he perceived it, said, O my friends, if you did know and feel what joy I have, and what a glorious crown I shall receive from the hand of Christ (for this work) you would not mourn, but rejoice, that I am counted worthy to be a witness to this cause, and said further, The Lord preserve you all from the portion of this generation: for assuredly, there is great wrath from the Lord that will reach them to their destruction. When

Mr. L. came to take his leave of him, he asked this question, viz, how it was with him? he answered, Very well I bless my God; as to my interest in him I have not the least doubt, but do know assuredly, that when my soul shall be separated from this body, I shall be taken into his presence where is fulness of joy, &c. And by Jesus Christ he presented to my Father, without spot and blame in his own complete and perfect righteousness which is free, and not for any of mine own works: for I am a poor, sinful and wretched creature, and compassed about with many infirmities. And when it was asked him, if he had any thing of conviction upon him as to what he was to suffer for? he answered No, not in the least, for, said he, though man have condemned, yet the Lord hath and doth justify; he added, the Lord had justified it in the field once already in this nation (but that is now accounted as a thing of nought) but he will again do it with a witness, and prayed that the Lord would deliver him, viz. Mr. L. from that judgment that was at hand by which he would do it. To this effect spake he also to many that did quere with him about this matter; being told that his nephew and some others were doing their utmost for his reprieve, he replied, that there is nothing to be done: For the sheriff hath brought me word, just now, that I must die to-morrow, and that there was some that desired I might not be quartered, but it would not be granted. But death is nothing to me, let them quarter my body never so much, God will bring all those pieces together again. It was asked him if he had assurance of the love of God? he said, yea, yea, he had fought a good fight and had overcome, and he was ready to suffer the will of God. One asked him if he thought there would be a resurrection of the Cause? he answered, he died in the faith of that, as much as he did that his body should rise again, and if he did not believe that, he should not be so chearful at the sentence of death; he said also he had not the least regret or disturbance on his spirit about that for which he was to die, for what he did was of the Lord, and if it were to be done again, he would do it. And the way they took to suppress and destroy those that did not think the king's person sacred, their blood will make many hundreds more persuaded of the truth of it: it was grievous to him, to hear how at his trial they blasphemed God and his people; but he was resolved he would own the Lord among them, which they could not bear, therefore they were so violent against him: he said the gospel was going from London, and popery and superstition, &c. was coming in, and it would be a rare thing to find a professor of religion in London shortly; he encouraged those about him, 'to keep close to the Lord in this evil day. Oh! said he, who would have thought some years since, that popery and formality should have been let in again to these nations? he said, they were so barbarous, they would not allow him some small time to take a little rest before he was to suffer; which was all he needed or desired of them; for he was much tired with speaking to company that came continually in: He desired to be remembered to some friends, and tell them, That this was the last feast, and his rage was great, because his time was short. Some more expressions he uttered to this effect. But in all his words and manner of speaking, he manifested the highest Christian magnanimity and holy greatness of mind, and such a spirit of joy and glory rested upon him, even to astonishment. It was asked if he apprehended his confidence would continue to the death? he said, he was not strong in his own strength, but in the Lord's strength, which he still relied upon. And he said to one by him, will you not see how God will carry me through next day? and desired prayers for him. One asked him, what he thought of this severe hand of God? He said, that which was hid secret in the bosom of the Father should be manifested in due time: Oh! said he, it grieves me to think how popery is coming upon us like a flood in this poor nation, and the great judgment that will follow. But the Lord will be a hiding-place for his poor people until the indignation be overpast: let not our enemies think to break the spirit by putting us to death; for I am confident, that God will give his spirit seven-fold unto those that are left: but the enemy, the Lord hath set their feet in slippery places, so that when they come to their measure, they must be cast down: Therefore it is the duty of the Lord's people to wait patiently, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry. It is a trying time, and none but those that are endued with power from on high, will be able to hold out. One asking him, where his chain was? he said, here it is; and though I have worn it so long, that it hath entered into my flesh, yet it was as Joseph's, it had not entered into his soul. He was highly raised up in admiring the grace of God, that he should be accounted worthy to wear a chain for Christ, saying, they have been blessed chains to me; adding, that the Lord had crowned him beyond many of his brethren, being counted worthy to seal God's work with his blood; admiring that God should accept of such a crazy body: much of his strength being already spent; yet, that God should so honour it in the end; he much admired the depths of the love of God to such an unworthy worm. The Lord will bring my blood, saith he, to cry with the rest of the martyrs, How long, O Lord, holy and true, &c. As for death, or the fears of it, I am got above them, in and through the beholding of the glory of our God, into which I am entering: which glory shall be shortly for the reviving of the spirits of his saints, and destroying his enemies. A friend speaking to him (the night before he died) of this dispensation, he said, he was persuaded, that their blood would be of much advantage to the Cause in foreign nations. Two friends that came to visit him, being, as he thought, under some trouble of spirit, he directed his speech to them as follows; Be not troubled, there is nothing stands between me and the Father; for I go with all clearness and freedom, and, I know, that Jesus Christ is my complete righteousness; and this is my crown of rejoicing, That I die not in the Lord only, but for the Lord; and think not that this blessed Cause shall be lost; for it shall reach to the end of the earth. Think not your prayers lost, for your prayers and tears with our blood, shall come down shortly upon Babylon, although they think to heal her, yet they shall give her a greater blow than ever we could have given her in our persons. Those who have been pleading for sufferings, who so ready to run away from it! While the Lord hath given us a little of the spirit of rejoicing, that hath made us willing to be giving up ourselves unto him. And, although the enemy think to conquer us, they shall never do it; for we are got above them in the spirit of the kingdom; we trample upon them, and they are under our feet; and this blood that now is shed, shall warm the blood that hath been shed before; and shall come down and do notable execution upon the enemy. The Lord hath, in much wisdom, hid this death from us, and hath allured into it; but he hath fitted us for it, and be not troubled that he hath taken away two or three drops of the spirit; for he will in the room thereof pour it out upon you.

The day he suffered, and the hour being come, the rope being tied about him, he rejoiced exceedingly, saying, Oh, what am I, that I should be bound for the cause and interest of the Son of God? And when he was coming down Newgate stairs, to go into the sledge, in a very smiling chearful manner, he uttered words to this effect; 'My Lord Jesus, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, and despised the shame, and is now set down on the right hand of God; whose steps I desire to follow.' It was also observed, that the chearfulness of his countenance, all the way as he went to the gibbet, remained, to the encouragement of the faithful, and admiration of enemies, uttering by the way many chearful expressions, setting forth his joy in the Lord.

When he was brought to the gibbet, before he went up the ladder, his hands being bound, he exhorted several friends standing by, to be faithful unto death, and not to be ashamed of the Cause for which they suffered, and they should receive a crown of life. And further said to a friend that stood by, that he hoped the truths of the kingdom which he had preached up and down would not be the less esteemed, for that he came now to seal them with his blood.

After he had mounted the ladder, he made the following Speech.

"Truly, it is not words, nor that which I have to speak in mine own spirit, will glorify God, or give any advantage to your souls, or unto me: But it is, if I may speak a few words, in the spirit of the Lord, and in the power of his might, and from an unfeigned love unto Jesus Christ: That would indeed give me an open entrance, and make my passage very sweet; and a blessing may be behind, even upon you. The first thing, indeed, that hath been very weighty, and I desire to leave it upon all, upon saints, as well as upon those that are not acquainted with Jesus Christ, that eternity, immortality, and eternal life, it is a wonderful thing; the thoughts and apprehensions of it are able to swallow up a poor soul: we little think what it is; he that knows most of God, and most of Christ, and hath the greatest measure of the anointing, he little, little knows what it is to appear before the holy, the most glorious, the most righteous God of heaven and earth; to stand before his judgment-seat, before Jesus Christ that is at his right hand: And where all the holy angels are so ashamed, because of the glory of God, that they fall down and cover their faces, and cry, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty, which art, and wast, and art to come. And therefore, if such glorious creatures, if such excellent spirits, as these seraphins and cherubins be, if they do fall down before the glory and majesty of this most excellent and wonderful God, how should dust and ashes do? And how should they fear and tremble to appear before him? And therefore, I say, think of this, and of the righteousness of God, as well as of his glory and majesty, and of his justice; that when for one sin he threw down the angels, those glorious spirits, into hell, and he would take no ransom or redemption for them; and though he hath mercy on the sons of men, according to his own election and purpose, and according to that that he hath purchased for himself in Christ Jesus before the foundation of the world was laid, yet in time he made his Son a sacrifice before men and angels, to bring his chosen ones to glory. That he should take pleasure to send his own Son out of his bosom, who was the delight of his soul, and bruise him for our sins; yet it pleased the Father to bruise him. The most holy and righteous God, that had but one Son, one only begotten Son (that was the delight of his soul), and should take pleasure to bruise him, that we might be healed, and laid stripes upon him that we might be healed! Oh! the height and depth! Oh! the length and breadth of the love of God in Christ Jesus unto poor souls! Oh! this is that the angels do desire to stoop down and look into, and to know more of this great mystery of the love of God in Christ: And that God should take upon him the nature of man, and put him into that glorious union with his own Son: and that he should leave the angels, though Christ was made a little lower than they for suffering death for us: Yet now, because the nature of man is united to the Godhead by virtue of that marriage and union, we become the sons of God, and heirs of glory. Those that are adopted by Jesus Christ are brought near to the throne of glory, are in a high and glorious communion and fellowship with the Father and Spirit, owned of all the holy angels. And therefore they do stand without the throne, as in several places of the Revelations, and round about the elders, and round about those that were given to the Lamb, as in the fifth of the Revelations, and many other Scriptures, they stand without; but there is another company within, which is the twenty-four elders, and four living creatures, they fall down and worship God, they are nearer than the angels: Oh! who hath credited, who hath believed this report, and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed? Oh! how many professors are there in this day, in this nation, that call upon the name of Christ, and that say they shall be saved by Christ, and do live and trust most in their own works and righteousness: and never come to the knowledge and understanding of this great mystery of the love of God in Christ? Who never received those teachings from the anointing, and according to the new covenant, where it is promised, that they shall be all taught of God; all the children of God shall be taught of him; and there is no one can teach these but the Father, none can draw them to the Son but the Father; and no man can come to the Father but through the Son: and this great mystery is both by the light and operation of the Holy Spirit, who makes the new creature in the soul: O that God would pour out his Holy Spirit! That God would pour out the spirit of the new covenant, and the spirit of the Gospel, and the spirit that can declare the mystery of God's word in the spirit, and that he hath made manifest through Jesus Christ! Oh! there is much talking and speaking in the name of Christ, and how many men spend little time in getting evidences in the power and demonstration of the spirit, and come to apprehend God in Christ, that speak of him? Oh! there are few of these, the Lord knows. O that the anointing may be poured out more now, according to this faith, in the way of this grace, and in this love of God, even in the electing love of the Father; and in the redeeming blood of Jesus Christ, according to the purchased possession that he hath obtained through his own righteousness, wherein God hath been justifying the ungodly; and among them, such a poor simple piece of dust and ashes as I have been, and have to this day little glorified my Father; and yet I can call him Father, through some measure of his spirit, and Father, according to the spirit of adoption too; and can say the Lord Jesus hath given himself for me; and I take the Lord Jesus Christ as the great gift of the Father, desiring to bear witness of that love, and of that wonderful grace and glory, that he hath made me partaker of, in and through him. Oh! blessed be the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath called me to this hope, and who hath made me partaker of this glory, that the Saints are enlightened in. And now I long to see the face of this Father, and of his Son, though I have such a number of sins in me; and though I have an interest in him, and can call him Father at any time, without doubt, and in full assurance of faith in the Holy Spirit; yet if Jesus Christ were not there, to present me faultless before the presence of God, I should be afraid to appear before him; but he is able to do it, and therefore saith the Apostle, 'Now unto him' 'that is able to save you, and to present you' 'faultless before the presence of his glory with' 'exceeding joy,' &c. I am a poor sinful piece, full of iniquity, laden with many burdens, that have a body of death that I carry about me, and I am about to lay it down, and my soul shall enter into eternal life, and be made perfect in a moment, through the mighty power of God that hath wrought that glorious work of raising Christ from the dead. Oh! all my strength, and all my joy, and all my life is in Christ, and in him alone; and I have a righteousness already of his working, according to his own grace, and according to his own mercy that he hath been pleased to work in me; and so hath been pleased to keep me in a very wicked, and in a very evil day, by the power of his grace. And I desire to glorify my Father, and many years have I been in that work, that hath been of late in this nation; a few and evil have been the days of my pilgrimage, but I have desired to serve the Lord with faithfulness, and in the integrity of my soul, without prejudice against any creature, and it hath been the desire of my soul to approve myself faithful towards God, and towards man: and what I have done, I have done it in obedience to the Lord: that I had in my eye, and in my heart. There are many things that are laid upon many of those that profess the kingdom and glorious appearance of Jesus Christ, as if they were enemies to magistracy and ministry; and as if so be we were for the destruction of the laws and properties of mankind; therefore shall I speak a few words unto that: and if indeed we were such, we were fit to be turned out of the world; as some now think they should do God good service in sending such poor creatures quickly from hence. There is no such thing; I desire to bear witness to the true magistracy, that magistracy that is in the word of the Lord. And that true ministry, which ministry is a ministry from the anointing; that doth bear witness to the Lord Jesus, and hath his holy spirit. That testimony I desire to bear; and that testimony I desire to stand faithful in, with integrity to the Lord Jesus, as king of saints, and king of nations. And therefore it is, I say, to have a magistracy as at the first, and counsellors as at the beginning, men fearing God and hating covetousness; and that ministry as doth preach the everlasting Gospel."

Here Mr. Sheriff interrupted him, saying, 'Tis desired that you spend the rest of your time in preparing yourself. Another said, You spend yourself, sir, in this discourse. Another said, It rains. Then Mr. Carew said, I will pray.

Mr. Carew's Prayer.

"O most holy, and most glorious and blessed God, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of all glory: The God of the spirits of all flesh; unto thee, unto thee doth my soul desire to come through the new and living way, even through Christ my righteousness: and in him and through him to be offered up by the eternal spirit, a living and acceptable sacrifice, in which thy soul delighteth. O Lord, thou knowest my frame, and thou knowest my life, and what a passage this is; and what a wonderful thing it is, to enter into glory. And what a wonderful thing it is to stand before thee, and to stand in thy presence. O Father, Father, let my soul be filled with thy joy, and with peace in believing; O let my heart be in heaven while my body is here; and O let me be joined unto the Lord, through thine own spirit before this separation be. O Lord, thou only art able to take hold of my heart and spirit; poor creatures may speak words to thee, but oh! it is thine own power, and it is thine own spirit, that must take hold of the heart; it is thine own spirit that must carry through all, and it hath been thy spirit (blessed be thy name) that hath carried me through many trials, and many temptations, and many difficulties, that thy poor worm hath met with in this pilgrimage for many years. O blessed be thy name for all the goodness, and for all thy grace, and for all thy presence that hath been with thy poor creature far and near. Oh! blessed be thy name that thou hast kept me in any measure faithful unto thee, and made me willing to lay down my life for thy righteous work and cause. Oh blessed be thy name, that the Lord and Christ (that is at thy right hand) hath bought me with his own most precious blood. He hath redeemed me indeed. Therefore it is but my reasonable service that I should be offered up a sacrifice to him, my joy is in him, and my confidence is in him, that I shall be presented by him to my heavenly Father. O Father, when thy servant is to be presented before thee, let him know what it is to find mercy. Let him know what it is to have Jesus Christ an advocate; and what it is to be presented before thee by such a Redeemer. O that Jesus Christ might bid me welcome into thy presence; and may say to my soul, 'Well done good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of the Lord.' O blessed Father, it is not that I do expect any thing from thee upon any account below the account of the Lord Jesus: and whereinsoever thou hast been glorified by thy poor servant, it hath been by thine own power and thine own working. O nothing unto thy poor creature is due, but unto thy holy name be praise and glory. O holy Father behold thy work in the kingdoms, and behold the cause and interest of all thy people. O do thou revive it in thine own appointed time; O do thou strengthen the hearts of thy poor saints: O scatter all clouds, speak comfortably to their souls, that they may be able to stand under all storms, faithful unto the death, and receive a crown of life and glory. O bless thy poor saints in the city, and bless thy saints in the country: and bless thy saints in the West: O bless thy sons and thy daughters;

O bless all the meetings of thy people, let the blessing of the Lord appear unto them, let the glory of the Lord make haste; let the glory of the Lord be upon these nations. O remember thy promise to thy ancient people the Jews; O let thy people be taught of thee, O let these dry bones live, O let the spirit of life breathe upon them. O dear Father let the fullness of the Jews and of the Gentiles be brought in. Let multitudes be gathered out of every kindred, and tongue, and nation, unto the kingdom of Jesus Christ. O Father, Father, advance thy Son, set him as king upon the mountain of thy holiness; give him all glory, and power and dominion over the whole heavens, that thou hast promised according to thy word and covenant to give unto him: that he may reign in thine own word and law, through his own spirit for ever and ever. Lord, Lord, I desire thou wouldst gather up my soul, O gather up my soul O Lord, make this passage sweet, O make it comfortable. Lord Jesus thou hast taken away the sting of death, and born the burden of all this shame, and of all this reproach. And thou hast given thy poor servant something of thy presence, through the riches of thy grace this day. O Lord, now receive, O open thine everlasting arms: O now let me enjoy thy presence. O God, which I have desired to behold and see, and to behold thy face in Jesus Christ, O, and now let me enjoy what thou hast prepared for me: and fill me with the joys that are at thy right hand, and those pleasures that are in thy presence for ever more. O thou Lamb of God, lead me to the everlasting fountain, that living fountain that is able to supply all our wants. O Lord bless, bless, thy poor people; O comfort them in this day. Pour out sevenfold of thy spirit for what thou dost take away in any of thy servants, for thy holy name's sake. O let the cause and kingdom of Christ be dear and precious in thy sight, and live always. Lord little do these (poor creatures) know, or these nations know what a controversy thou hast with them, O that thou wouldst be pleased graciously to spare this people, spare thy people however; and let them that love Zion, and favour thy righteous cause, be glad for ever and ever. O now Father be near to me, do thou receive my spirit, take me into thine own glory, take me into thine own glory; let me know it is my portion, let me know there is a crown in the hand of Christ prepared for my soul. O blessed Lord, thou hast honoured thy poor creature, and brought him hitherto, O reward all the labours of love in any to him, in bonds or death; and give them a double reward into their bosoms. Reward it so to them and theirs. Blessed be thy name that thou hast brought thy poor one hither to suffer in thy cause. And O Lord, let thy spirit be poured forth upon the nations, until the whole earth be filled with the knowledge of thy glory. And that Christ Jesus may have all the honour, and praise, and glory, and dominion for ever, and ever." Amen.

"I am so exceeding dry that my tongue is ready to stick to my mouth. But I would fain speak a little more. Oh blessed be God! Oh! how many are the refreshments I have had from the presence of my God and Father, sweet, and secret communion betwixt him and my soul to day. And for that my soul hath seen of his riches and kindness. O that I might be more like Christ; for I have been very unlike to Jesus Christ, very unlike to my Father. But I shall leave all that is unlike Christ behind; And all his own workmanship he will purify and perfect through this passage into glory. O my dear Father, receive my soul, Oh! make this passage sweet, for now I am coming to thee; Lord help me, Lord spirit me, fill me with thy spirit, let me be ever with thee, let me know what it is to have thee at my right hand, that I may not be moved; that in my soul going out of the flesh, I may be let into the presence of God, and into the arm of Jesus Christ. Oh! That my soul may be breathed forth into the arms of God, into the bosom of Jesus Christ, through the anointing of the spirit."

His prayer being ended, a friend that stood by, said: It is expected you should speak something to the matter of your suffering. The under-sheriff said, 'Tis not to be suffered: What are you, that you put on men to speak? What are you, Sir?

Mr. Carew said, Farewel, my dear friends, farewel; the Lord keep you faithful. The friend said, We part with you with much joy in our souls.

Mr. Carew said to the executioner, Stay a while, I will speak one word, and then said very solemnly, with a loud voice, Lord Jesus, receive my soul; Lord Jesus, into thy hands I commend my spirit. And then was turned off.

Some Particulars of the subsequent BEHAVIOUR and of the EXECUTION of Mr. JOHN COOK, the 16th day of October, 1660, at the same place.

His wife coming to visit him in the Tower of London, but not having admittance to him, he saw her forth of his window, and said, Go home to thy friends my dear lamb, I am well, blessed be God they cannot keep the Comforter from me.

His wife asking the gentleman jailor to see him (another time.) He answered, she might see him suddenly in Newgate; her husband hearing of this, said, If the way to the new Jerusalem be through Newgate, blessed be God for Newgate, the King of Glory will set open his everlasting gates to receive me shortly, and then I shall for ever be with the Lord.

A Note sent by him from the Tower.

My D. L. Cheer up, heaven will make amends for all, blessed be God I am full of spiriteal joy, and do trust God to make what bargain for me he pleaseth, for he knoweth the appointed time of my composition and dissolution, let us look to Jesus, Heb. 12.

After Mr. Cook was brought to Newgate, discoursing with some friends there, he said, I am now going to my trial, wherein the Lord strengthen me. If I be attainted yet my estate in Ireland is not thereby forfeited without an act of parliament to that purpose, and indeed it is much set upon my heart, that if my small estate be taken away from my poor wife and child, it will prove as poison to those that enjoy it and consumptive to the rest of their great estates, for I bless God I never acted maliciously, or covetously, but in a spirit of simplicity and integrity, however the good will of the Lord be done.

I commit and commend my dear, loving and faithful wife and child to their blessed husband and father, with three scriptures especially for their portion. The widow's cruse and barrel of meal, 1 King. 17. Isa. 54, ver. 5, to 10. Jer. 49, 11. Earnestly desiring that my child may be religiously educated in the fear of the Lord. Thus if God hath appointed it, I shall go from the cross to the crown.

Speaking to some in prison, for the clearing of himself from false aspersions, said, Whereas some say I have done them wrong, they do much wrong me in so saying, I have relieved many so far as by law I could, knowing that the worst of men ought to have justice; I bless God I durst not wrong any man, for I know that I shall meet them at the last day before the bar of Christ's judgment, where I can with boldness look all men in the face as to matter of justice, for which I have great cause to bless the Lord, Holy be his name.

Some in the prison speaking of the differences in religion, Mr. Peters said, Pray talk not of controversies now, we have but a little time to live, and cannot spend it in such discourses.

Whereupon; Mr. Cook said, Blessed be God, brother Peters, we are going to heaven, where the Saints are all of one mind, which my soul hath long desired to see, it rejoiceth my heart to think what a perfect happiness I shall have there; the best condition here is but mixed, but in heaven there is no sorrow nor trouble, neither have I one dram of trouble upon my spirit at this time, blessed be God he hath wiped away all tears, and I could with Paul and Silas sing in prison for joy, Blessed be the Comforter.

Discoursing after he came into the dungeon, he said, When a poor creature comes about so solemn a work as to die, what a blessed thing is it to have a helper, and what can help but the holy Spirit; blessed be the Comforter, for I am full of spiritual consolation; if one of you was to have a thousand pounds a year after the death of an old man consumptive, that would not live three days, how would you rejoice; this is my condition through grace, I must in a little time put off the old man, and enter into the possession of heavenly glory. Let no good people fear a prison, for it is the only place, wanting other books to study the book of self.

A friend going about to comfort Mr. Cook from the consideration of the brevity and uncertainty of man's life, using some expressions of love, &c.

Mr. Cook replies, What dost thou speak thus for? if I were sick of a fever this might be a suitable discourse, but we must talk at a higher rate than this now; were I to chuse, I would rather chuse this death than to die of a fever, for there is much pains and sometimes distractions, but here a man is well when he goes upon the ladder and out of all pains in a quarter of an hour; and speaking to a friend, said, I am now going to heaven, and shall leave you in the storm.

Mr. Cook to some Friends in Prison.

Friends, I beseech you rejoice with me, O let us bless the Lord that he counts us worthy to be sacrifices to follow his steps, was not the Captain of our salvation made perfect through sufferings, and shall not I, Oh I long to be at home, out of the body with the Lord, though I go through a sea of blood to him; truly I think every hour ten, little do my enemies think what a friendly part they do me, to hasten me to my Father's kingdom, to my crown and glory; I had rather go to my dear Jesus with my chain and cross, than to sit down with an earthly king on his throne and wear a crown of gold.

Some disaffected to him being present said, the Jesuits suffered chearfully and confidently.

Mr. Cook replies, I bless God my justification is not built upon the merits of works, but alone upon grace in the blood of Christ.

The said person compared him and his fellow prisoners to Corah, Dathan and Abiram.

Well friends, said he, it matters not who condemns, when God justifies.

Mr. Cook (said they) do not justify yourself, but confess your sins, your heinous crime against the Lord and his anointed, and repent.

Mr. Cook replies, I must needs tell you, that if repentance was now to do, I was in a sad condition, but I bless my God he hath enabled me to confess my sin, and hath sealed my pardon in the blood of his dear Son, and given such peace as none can give or take away. I have no guilt nor trouble upon my spirit touching what is done, but such sweet peace in God as I cannot express, and I shall leave all with God who judgeth righteously, who will decide all things.

Mr. Cook, to Mr. Peters in the dungeon, said,

Brother Peters, we shall be in heaven to-morrow in bliss and glory; what a blessed thing is that? My very heart leaps within me for joy; I am now just as I was in the storm, almost in sight of heaven; read me Isaiah xliii. 9, 10. and lxi. 10, 11. Hos. xiii. 14.

Then looking upon his bed, said, That shall be my last pillow; I will lay me down and sleep a-while: and he slept about an hour and half, and then awoke, saying, Now farewell sleep, no more sleep in this world, and farewell darkness and night, I am going where there shall be no night, neither need of a candle, nor of the Sun, for the Lord will give us light, yea, the Lord will be our everlasting light, and our God will be our glory.

And welcome every thing that gives notice the hour is at hand, welcome the cock that crows, welcome sweet death, my good friend, that will bring me so near eternity. O blessed be God, blessed be his name! Oh this Christ is a blessed Christ! he answereth all things, and within few hours we shall be crowned with glory and victory; blessed be our Lord Jesus that hath given us the victory over sin and death. Welcome Mr. Loman, my Keeper, welcome angels, that will within a few hours take the office, and guard me into eternity.

At midnight he prayed very fervently, and the common prisoners heard him, and seemed very sorrowful by their expressions, saying, Sir, the Lord be with you; O that our souls might go where your soul goes. About the morning, speaking to Mrs. Cook, said, Lamb, do not dishonour my last wedding-day by any trouble for me: For if all my judges did but know what glory I shall be in before twelve o'clock, they would desire to be with me. And let the executioner make what haste he can, I shall be beforehand with him; for before he can say, Here is the head of a traitor, I shall be in heaven. Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly, my soul longeth for thee, and I wait to hear thy voice, saying, 'Come up hither, and immediately I shall be in the Spirit, and then shall I for ever be with the Lord.' And at midnight there was a cry heard, the bridegroom cometh, and they that were ready went in unto the marriage; This day I shall enter into the joy of my Lord.

Come, brother Peters, let us knock at heaven gates this morning, God will open the doors of eternity to us before twelve o'clock, and let us into that innumerable company of saints and angels, and to the souls of just men made perfect, and then we shall never part more, but be with the Lord for ever and ever, singing praises, singing praises to our Lord and everlasting king to all eternity: he said further, O what a good master have I served, that stands by me now, and supports me! with his everlasting arm he bears me up; then said, Come away, my beloved, make haste, and be thou like unto a young roe, or a young hart upon the mountains of spices. Behold I come, Lord Jesus, I come full sail to thee, I come upon the wing of faith, Lord Jesus receive me. And going to lie down on his bed, he said, it is no more to go to die to-morrow than it is to go to sleep to-night. I bless the Lord I am free from trouble, and my poor heart is as full of spiritual comfort as ever it can hold, and this joy can no man take from me.

The doors of the prison being opened in the morning, he spent that little time he had left in prayer and heavenly discourse with friends that came to visit him, preparing himself for his suffering with such a chearfulness, as was an astonishment to the spectators.

Then speaking to his wife, said, farewell, my dear lamb, I am now going to the souls under the altar, that cry, how long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on earth? and when I am gone, my blood will cry and do them more hurt than if I had lived. But I am now going to eternally, blessed be God, be not troubled for me, but rejoice, because I go to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God. And after some time spent in prayer, he desired his wife not to withhold him by an unwillingness to part with him now, when God called for him, to be offered up as a sacrifice for his name and cause.

After a little pause, she freely gave him up to the Lord; to which he replied, Now all the work is done, and said, I resign thee up to Jesus Christ, to be thy husband, to whom also I am going to be married in glory this day.

His wife shedding tears, he said, Why weep-est thou? Let them weep who part and shall never meet again; but I am confident we shall have a glorious meeting in heaven; here our comforts have been mixt with chequer-work of troubles, but in heaven all tears shall be wiped from our eyes.

He asked several times if the sheriff was not come, saying, Why stay the wheels of his chariot? why do they drive so heavily? I am ready, blessed be God, I have nothing to do but to die.

Word being brought that the sheriff was come, he makes haste to be gone, and his wife stepping after him, took him by the arm; whereupon he said, O do not hinder me from going to Jesus Christ!

And then with a chearful countenance, taking leave of his friends, he went to the sledge that carried him, whercon was also carried the head of major general Thomas Harrison, with the face bare towards him; and notwithstanding that dismal sight, he passed rejoicingly through the streets, as one borne up by that spirit, which man could not cast down. Being come to the place of execution, when he was taken out of the sledge, he said, This is the easiest chariot that ever I rid in, in all my life.

Being come upon the ladder, and the rope put about his neck, he rejoiced, saying, Blessed be the name of God, that I am hound for the sake of Jesus Christ.

Then he addressed himself to God in prayer:

Mr. Cook's Prayer before his Speech.

"Most glorious Majesty, this day is a representation of that great day when all thy poor people shall meet together, multitudes, multitudes in the valley of destruction, Thy poor servant is now come to pay the debt which he oweth to nature, blessed be thy name that thou hast prepared him for it, blessed be thy name sweet Jesus, blessed be thy name. O that all thy poor people that are here if possible may feel something of that divine power and assistance of God, that thy poor servant now feels at this time; blessed be thy name. I am a poor creature, a poor sinner, and the Lord might justly withdraw from me, and leave me to horror and searedness, if he should deal with me in justice. But this hath not been his method (blessed be his name) to leave and forsake his poor servant. Lord let thy blessing be upon us at this time, and let thy blessing be upon England, and let thy blessing be upon all these nations, and let thy blessing be upon all that are here; Assist us, O Lord, by thy divine power; give us to see much of thy power, and let not this meeting be in vain, but let every one here receive benefit thereby, to the praise and glory of thy great name, and the everlasting salvation of all our souls (if it be thy blessed will) through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Having ended his prayer he made the following speech:

"Mr. Sheriff and gentlemen; The most glorious sight that ever was seen in the world was our Lord Jesus Christ upon the cross; and the most glorious sight next to that is to see any poor creature suffer for him in his cause. I desire to speak a few words briefly, to let you understand what a glorious work the Lord hath been pleased to accomplish upon my spirit. I bless the Lord, I have ransacked into every corner of my heart, and I have searched into all my sins actual and original, secret and open, known and unknown, so far as the Lord hath discovered them to me; and I have confessed them all with a penitential bleeding heart, and contrite spirit; blessed be his name, he hath been pleased to come in an abundant manner, and hath been pleased to shew me that the only remedy is the blood of Christ; and I have, blessed be the Lord, applied that precious blood to my poor soul, and have laid hold upon Christ, by a true and lively faith; and there is a sweet calm and serenity in my soul and conscience, blessed be thy name. I desire to glorify God, and to give him the glory of all, and to take shame unto myself for any sins that I have ever committed, that I know to be sin; and therefore, I desire to rejoice in the God of my salvation; as Isa. lxi. 10. 'I will greatly rejoice in the Lord, my soul shall be joyful in my God, for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation: he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments: And as a bride adorneth herself with jewels, even so the Lord delighteth in me. And as the earth bringeth forth her buds, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth, so the Lord will cause righteousness and praise to spring forth before all nations.' And Isaiah xliii. 9, 10. 'Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord.' I do desire to bear a testimony unto God and to Jesus Christ, for justice and truth and righteousness and holiness.

"The Lord knows I have no malice upon my heart against any man or woman living upon the face of the earth; neither against jury that found me guilty, nor Court that passed sentence; I desire freely to forgive every one from the bottom of my heart. And as concerning this great dispensation, you may (it may be) desire to hear something of it. Truly I say, as to the king's majesty, I have not any hard thoughts concerning him: my prayer shall be for him that his throne may be upheld by truth, and by mercy; for by mercy, as Prov. 23, the throne is upheld. But I must needs say, that poor we have been bought and sold by our brethren, as Joseph was.

"Brother hath betrayed brother to death; and that Scripture is in a great measure fulfilled, Mat. x. 21. "The father against the son, and the son against the father; and brother shall deliver up brother to death." I desire for my own part to kiss the rod; and I do desire (if it may please the king's majesty) that no more blood may be shed after mine: it may be the Lord will put it into his own breast. Here is a poor brother coming, I am afraid that he is not fit to die at this time; I could wish that his majesty might shew some mercy.

The Sheriff interrupted in words to this effect: Let that alone, for the king's majesty hath clemency enough for all but his father's murderers.

Mr. Cook replied, "Then I shall proceed to speak something concerning my profession and faith, which I bless the Lord, is founded upon the rock Christ Jesus. I do not expect salvation for any thing I have ever done, but only lay hold upon Christ as a naked Christ, and there to bottom my soul. I can say, to the praise and glory of God, that I have endeavoured in my place, and to my power, to do that which might be to God's glory, according to the best of my understanding. I have stood for a gospel magistracy and ministry, and that many delays in the law might be removed (and that thing I have much suffered for): I say it is good both for king and people, that many delays in matter of justice should be removed, and that public justice might be speedily and cheaply administered.

"And as for my profession, I am of the congregational way; I desire to own it, and am for liberty of conscience, and all that walk humbly and holily before the Lord, and desire to walk in the fear of the Lord; and I believe it is a truth, and there can be nothing said against it. I do confess I am not convinced of any thing I have done amiss; as to that I have been charged with, I am not indeed; neither did I understand the plea of the Court, that if the lords and commons had brought the king to the bar, and had set him over them again, their bringing him to the bar had been treason. I desire never to repent of any thing therein I have done; but I desire to own the cause of God and Christ; and am here to bear witness to it, and so far as I know any thing of myself, I can freely confess it.

Here the Sheriff interrupted him again, desiring him to forbear any such expressions.

Mr. Cook replied, "It hath not been the manner of Englishmen to insult over a dying man, nor in other countries among Turks or Galliasces. The Lord bless every one of us, and help us, that we may look more to the honour and glory of God than the concerns of our own lives: for alas, what is a poor miserable life to us, but that therein we might give honour and glory to the God of all our mercies? And if there be any here of that congregation to which I was related in the time that I lived here, I would commend to them that Scripture, Phil. ii. 17, 18. "Yea, and if I be offered up upon the sacrifice and service of the faith, I joy and rejoice with you all, for the same cause also do you joy and rejoice with me." And Deut. xviii. 11. "The Lord God of your fathers make you a thousand times more than you are, and bless you as he hath promised." The Lord be pleased to speak comfort to them, and to all them that fear the Lord. The Lord keep England from popery, and from superstition, and keep it from prophaneness, and that there may not be an inundation of Anti-christ in the land. And that is all the harm I wish unto it. The Lord hath forgiven me many thousand talents, and therefore I may well forgive those few pence that are owing unto me. I bless the Lord I have nothing lying upon my conscience, but I can unbosom myself to every one, and to the throne of free grace, in the simplicity of my spirit; I have endeavoured to do nothing but with a good conscience, and through the integrity of my heart, though accompanied with many frailties. I desire to bless the Lord, my lot was rather in Ireland than here, here I have been more known where I have given the offence."

The Sheriff again interrupted him.

Mr. Cook replies, "Sir, I pray take notice of it, I think I am the first man that ever was hanged for demanding of justice, therefore I hope you will not interrupt me. I suppose you were there, and do bear me witness in your conscience, that there was not any thing then, that I did not communicate to the Court, that I now speak upon the ladder.

"If you will believe the words of a dying man, I say, as I must give an account, I have nothing lieth upon my conscience. We must all meet together at the great day of the Lord, to give an account of all our actions, (and then it will appear) the Lord grant we may meet with joy and comfort.

"I have a poor wife and child, and some friends left, I desire you that come along with me, to commend to them Isai. liv. 4, 5, and 10 ver. I hope the king and parliament will consider our poor friends as to their estates; you know that those lords that formerly suffered under the parliament, did not lose all their estates; I hope there will be some consideration as to justice, (lest that our small estates prove a poison amongst their great deal) and my poor wife and relations suffer. The Lord grant that mercy may be shewed, that mercy and righteousness may magnify and exalt itself above justice. I shall not hold you long; I shall desire, in the fear of the Lord, to give myself (as in Rom. xii. 1.) "A living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God, which is but a reasonable service." And so I do intreat that I may have a little time to call upon the Lord, unless there be any thing more desired, or any one that would ask me a question.

"Truly I forgive all from my heart, I have nothing upon my heart to accuse any of them withal. I bless the Lord I have a clear conscience, I say it in the integrity and simplicity of my heart, (I do now appeal to the great God, to whom I must give an account of what I have done) knowing that all my guilt is washed away in the blood of Jesus Christ, (and before him I hope to appear) and have nothing else to plead any thing at all for me.

"And so I hope that I have declared myself with simplicity and integrity, in a few words, that you may understand my mind.

"I shall speak a few words to the Lord in prayer, and shall not trouble you further:—

Mr. Cook's Prayer.

"Most Glorious Majesty, I beseech thee so to warm my heart, and fill it so full of the love of Jesus Christ, that it may never be cool any more; Oh that the Lord would now appear graciously to shew himself a wonder-working God, in bearing up the heart and spirit of thy poor creature, it is no matter how bitter the cup is, if the Lord give strength to drink it, and no matter how heavy the burden be, if the Lord be at one end, and uphold the other, and bear the burden himself, or lay no more upon his poor children, than they are able to bear; the Lord give strength to all that are to bear this burden; the Lord be with all that are yet to suffer in this cause, and double and treble seven-fold of thy spirit upon us, let us not stand it out against our reasons and judgments and consciences. If any did pursue power and interest, and did not look after the good of God's poor people, and the good of the nations, the Lord forgive them. The Lord knows the simplicity of the hearts of his poor servants that are gone before, and of those that are to come after; I desire that all thine may have hearts willing to suffer for thee, to make confession of faith in Christ Jesus, I know is nothing, I know it is not enough only to confess in words, to confess in doctrinal evangelical truths, and to confess by a holy life and conversation; and if the Lord call any of his poor children to seal the truth with their blood, yea their precious blood, it is their duty also: if the Lord Jesus had come down from the cross and had not shed his most precious blood, and had not by that blood gone to heaven, our salvation had not been. Lord let it be well with England, the Lord hear me for my poor friends and relations, for my poor wife and child; unto thee Lord I commend the cause of God, and of Jesus Christ, and remember poor Ireland wherein I had a lot and interest, the Lord remember them all, and help thy poor children to continue faithful unto death, that so we may receive a crown of life, for the sake of our Lord Jesus Christ: and so I come Lord Jesus, Oh receive my soul! Send down a guard of angels to convey my soul into Abraham's bosom; receive my soul, O Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit. And I desire to appeal to thee O Lord, thou art the great God of heaven and earth before whom all controversies must come.

"I believe there is not a man in the world whatever he be, but hath some reverential fear of death; but for any sinful vicious fear, I bless the Lord I have not the hundredth part of a dram upon my conscience; if it were my wedding day I could not more rejoice in the Lord, because it is a consummation of that marriage that my Lord Jesus hath made up with me. Blessed be thy name, methinks I do see with Stephen, even by the eye of faith, heaven open, and the Lord Jesus ready to receive my poor soul. And oh that I may with Ezekiel see the glory of God; and see, with Isaiah, the Lord sitting on his throne of glory. And oh that the love of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Spirit may warm my heart, and carry me up from the beginning of this passage to the end and close of it. Lord Jesus come and receive my spirit, and sweeten this cup, and let me say, The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink of it? And I leave all into the hands of the Lord, that if it be the Lord's will every one that belongs to the election of grace may meet with comfort at the great day, and that we may shake hands together, where no office of love shall be unrewarded, nor any unkindness shewed to the people of God.

"But within a few hours I shall be in the harbour; I am just now entering into it, I would not go back again for all the world.

"Blessed be the Lord I despise the shame, and am willing to endure the cross, for Christ's sake: because the Lord Jesus, who is the author and finisher of my salvation, did it for me. The Lord pity those that follow, and bear up their hearts.

"The Lord help his poor people that find any thing upon their soul: that they should stand fast unto the truths of Jesus. Alas, we shall be but a few days here, and heaven will make amends for all, and we shall glorify God in eternity, where we shall enter into a sinless, timeless, and temptationless estate, and never meet with sorrow or troubles any more; but the Lord will receive us to himself, and then the innocency of thy poor servants shall be vindicated, and we shall be ever with the Lord, blessing and praising his holy name.

"When Elijah was taken away, the spirit of Elijah rested on Elisha, who stood up in his stead. And when John the Baptist was cut off, the Lord had his apostles to supply that office. The Lord will have profit in the death of his children. I believe that an army of martyrs would willingly come from heaven, to suffer in such a cause as this that I come here to suffer for.

"I desire to bewail that I have not had so much love to the glory of God therein as I ought. But as to the thing I come to suffer for, I have not had any thing or act come to my mind with less regret, and greater comfort than this.

"And as for those that brought me hither, I do forgive them, I have not one hard thought concerning them, the blessing of the Father, Son, and Spirit be with them.

"Oh that the Lord would grant that no more might suffer: and so dear and blessed Father I come into the bosom of thy love, and desire (to enter into that glory which is endless and boundless) through Jesus Christ."

After which he was turned off.

A little before his death he had wrote the following Letters:

A Letter written from the Tower to a Christian Friend, by Mr. Justice Cook.

"Sir; Now in answer to your loving enquiry how it fares with my better part, I bless God I never found so much internal spiritual solace and unmixed joy and comfort, as I have experimented in these five months endurance, 2 Cor. i. 3, 4, 5. Let never any Christian fear a prison, it being the only place, where (wanting other books) a man may best study the book of the knowledge of himself, having a long vacation from all business; but praying unto, and praising God in Christ, by the spirit's assistance. I cannot take Martha's part, for none must come to me; nor Mary's part to wait upon the ordinances, which my soul thirsts after; therefore my chamber is like the sanctum sanctorum, where wittingly none may enter but the high-priest of our profession the Lord Jesus. I did not think that there had been so much ignorance, impotence, impatience, ingratitude, pride, inordinate affection to creature comforts, revenge, diffidence of God, self-love, and iniquity of all sorts in me, as I find there is; who am not only a poor sinner, but sin itself, a very mass of sin. I find it very hard to rely nakedly on God's goodness, not to feel the heat of persecution, not to be careful when all is taken away, Jer. vii. 17. Lo, so this darkness and filthiness of spirit is only discovered by the light of Christ, by whose lowliness in washing the apostle's feet, I see my loftiness and want of condescension when I had power; by his patience my many passions and heart-risings against instruments; by his obedience to the death, my reluctancies; by his faithfulness my former back-slidings; by his fruitfulness, and doing good, Acts x. 38, my barrenness and the little good I did when I had opportunity; and by his liberality, my penuriousness; whereby I adore and acknowledge his justice, that he hath most righteously deprived me of my liberty and estate? all which drives me nearer to Christ, and makes me take faster hold of his righteousness. I now understand (through grace) how precious he is; 1 Pet. 2, 7, if it were not for Christ what a miserable condition were I now in? that might suddenly be sent to contend with the wrath of God in everlasting burnings; and this makes me love Christ the more, having forgiven me more than others: and having had ten thousand talents forgiven me, I would forgive any wrong doers, and this keeps me humble and from censoriousness. I bless God I have ransacked into every corner of my soul, I have with David, Job, Esay, and Paul, bewailed my hereditary disease and heart-corruption. I feel it as a rotten tooth that aches, would fain be rid of it, have condemned myself for it, cried out against it, as the ravished damsel, Deut. xxii. 26. The like for sins done in my inclination, which by preventing grace are secret and only known to God; and I have mourned over my secret sins, only known to God and myself; over the sins of my youth, which were committed faster than can be named; for those which I did not know to be sin, and those that I have forgotten; and especially for my actually known sins, committed against love and light promises and covenants. I have confessed them all with a heavy, bleeding, broken and contrite spirit, and O that I had all sin, as sin, in a greater execration; my grief is for having offended so gracious a Father, that will not damn me for it; if there were no hell nor judge I would rather die than willingly offend him any more, and I cannot satisfy divine justice for one vain thought, therefore I fly to Christ, and close with him upon a free promise as a poor penitent sinner; no merits but the merits of my Saviour; I take in whole Christ, and not one drop of my puddled water shall be mingled with the ocean of his pure and perfect righteousness; and I give up myself wholly to him, as by a deed of gift, to be at his dispose; and I know he hath received me, "I am my beloved's. and my beloved is mine," and all is mine, 1 Cor. iii. 22, death itself; I have a sweet certificate from heaven of the pardon of sin, justification, reconciliation, and adoption. I know God's heart and his eyes are upon me perpetually, 2 Chron. ii. 15, that no tender father or mother can have so special a care of any sick imprisoned child, as he hath of me. I believe that God who hath given a property to the needle to keep fixed, though the ship overturn, will keep me faithful to the death, and that I shall receive the crown of life, and stand with as much confidence at the great day, as if I had never sinned; and herein I am confirmed by the testimony of the Spirit, and Scripture evidences.

"Blessed be God I do love the saints, every one that suffers in this cause is as dear to me as my own soul, my sighs have been many, and my heart faint, since I came hither, not for my own condition (for it is happy) but for the afflictions of Joseph; scarce a poor saint permitted to breathe in Irish air: those that will not swear and be drunk, or have prayer in their families, are counted fanatics, Esa. l. 15. I have a dear respect to all God's commandments, spiritual joy is no stranger to me; I love the word and ordinances more than my appointed food. I desire that all my thoughts, words, and actions may please God, and that all that he does may please me: and I do freely forgive my adversaries, the Lord herein increase my faith, Luke xvii. 5, and I bless God I have a quiet conscience as to the world, and which is good also for being justified by Christ, apprehended by faith. I have peace with God, Rom. v. 1, and so I descend to the cause for which I am in bonds, which is as good as ever it was; and I believe there is not a saint that hath engaged with us, but will wish at the last day that he had sealed to the truth of it with his blood, if thereunto called: for I am satisfied that it is the most noble and glorious cause that has been agitated for God and Christ since the Apostolical times; being for truth, holiness, and righteousness, for our liberties as men and as Christians, for removing of all yokes and oppressions, for a gospel magistracy and ministry, and not only for the priestly and prophetic offices of Christ Jesus, but for his kingly also: the peculiar light and work of this generation being to discover and oppose the civil and ecclesiastical tyrannies intended upon the nations, by the pope's legerdemain, to exalt Christ as lord and king over mens' consciences, to magnify and make the law of God honourable, and authentic every where, and to give justice and mercy the upper hand. As I hear nothing what they intend to do with me, so I am not much solicitous about it; I do freely trust God to make what bargain for me he pleases. I believe they are as angry with me as any man in the nations, because littera scripta manet, but their cause requires rather silence than eloquence; as for that against monarchy unaccountable they will be ashamed to oppose it, that which teaches thence, is the stating the case, for which I had vouchers, and warrants for every word, but now they plough with our leifers; yet great is the truth and that will prevail, as for petitioning there is not any. I cannot confess any guilt, it is such a cause that the martyrs would gladly come again from heaven to suffer for, if they might, though too many object against me, 1 Pet. iv. 15. 'Let none of you suffer as a murderer;' I look upon it as the most noblest and highest act of justice that our story can parallel; and so far as I had a hand in it never any one action in all my life comes to my mind with less regret, or trouble of conscience than that does; for the blood must lie upon him, or the parliament; and I am sure I had no more malice in my heart, than when I was in my cradle; all that I can be sorry for, is, that I had not such pure and unbiassed aims at the glory of God and exaltation of Christ therein, as I should have had; I neither did any thing dubitante, or reluctante conscientia, I was so far from a gain-saying conscience in any thing I acted, that I never scrupled in the least, and the generality of the people have since owned it: I was in mercy a poor advocate for Christ, and the people of England, and if by my blood their cause may be watered, I say (as Phil. ii. 17, 18.) to you and the rest of the church of Christ, if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, let us rejoice together: it has been counted shameful for soldiers to run from their colours, or desert their masters, and principles, but it is more odious for a counsellor to prevaricate and betray his client's cause: I am persuaded that all those that have had a chief hand and are now giving judgment against themselves, and all good people, in all those points which they formerly contended for, against the king; as the lawfulness of the war, which was granted both here and at Edinburgh. The militia, negative voice, power to dissolve parliaments, conferring great offices (as king James said, 'So long as I make bishops and judges, I will have what religion and laws I please.') As they are most abominable prevaricators of the honest interest, for they will wish at the last day, that they had been Jews, Turks, or Indians, for the greater light, the greater is their apostasy and ingratitude, 2 Pet. ii. 21. and sure they will have a peculiar judgment by themselves; for they do openly proclaim the cause of Barabbas before the cause of Jesus. Peter denied Christ, and Judas betrayed him, but it was before his passion and ascension, they never saw the wonderful works which our eyes have beheld; but what shall we say, if the treachery of Judas help forward the work of our salvation, why may we not hope, that God is whetting his tools, and gone back to fetch a greater blow against his oppressors, Isaac must not die though the knife be at his throat, Gen. xii. 14, our case seems to be like theirs, under proud Haman the gallows was erected, but the royal seed preserved, Esth. vi. 13, Numb. 23, the story of Balaam is much upon my heart, the shout of king Jesus to reign in holiness and righteousness is among his people, I hope as much as ever; and there is no enchantment against Jacob, therefore he must not be afraid; I am persuaded we shall fare the better for the thousand curses we had between Chester and London, 2 Sam. xvi. 12.

"Now having endeavoured to satisfy you that the great work is over as to my eternal salvation, and my opinion of the goodness of our cause; I shall further entreat your patience to tell you that I am fully convinced, that next to that unspeakable gift of Christ, the greatest grace and mercy that God can bestow upon any of us, is to call for and enable us to lay down our lives upon this account; suffering for Christ being a strong argument of his electing love, Acts ix. 15, 16, and a greater matter of rejoicing, Acts xxiii. 11, be of good cheer, Paul; therefore he forbids tears for him upon that score, Acts xxi. 13, and I have charged my poor lamb not to wear any black for me (if she have wherewith to buy it;) for I shall be in white, Rev. vi. 11. the apostle rejoiced to be counted worthy to suffer shame for Christ, and would not but speak what they saw with the eyes of faith, and heard with the ears of the spirit, Acts iv. 20. and the v. 41, and Paul gloried in the tribulation, rejoicing in hope of the glory of God, Rom. v. 23, and took pleasure in reproaches, necessity and persecutions.

for Christ, 2 Cor. xii. 10, so Moses, Heb. xi. 26; for the recompence of reward which is God himself, Gen. xv. 1, and the times cannot be so full of terror and discouragement as the Scriptures are full of comfort and incitations in this particular, to us the Lord's prisoners, Mat. v. 10, 12, why are we sorrowful when Christ bids us to be joyful, Mat. x. 25, 27. there is no safety but to be on Christ's side, for the Son of Man shall come in his glory and the saints also, Mark viii. 33, 38, they are not the words of a child but of Christ, not spoken to affright us, but for our animadversion; Oh this perfidious generation! how will that word be made good to the amazement of our timorous professors, John xvi. 21. The axe or a halter will be less pain than the pangs of child-birth, John xv. 18, 21. we are in nothing to be terrified, 1 Phil. xxviii. 29, constancy in suffering for good principles is matter of glory in the churches, and tribulation will be the portion of our troubles, 2 Thes. i. 4, to the end is very precious, 1 Thes. iii. 8, we live if we stand fast in the Lord: I know you, and my dear brethren and sisters are of Paul's mind, if I die in my bed being a church member, you will by the rule of charity judge me happy; I cannot do you more service than to bear my witness in this cause of Christ wherein you are so much concerned, I find our text appropriate to our condition, Job xii. 23 to 27, Christ's death was like sowing of corn, which seemed lost, but was our life; so he that counts not his life dear for Christ, though the world count him miserable, yet he hath two special promises to be where Christ is, and that the Father will honour him, it is a following of Christ in dying for him, actively or in affection as appears, John xiii. 36. xxi. 19. by a conformity to his death, Phil. iii. 10. Rev. xiv. 3, some read which died for the Lord, as Rev. xx. 4, and xix. 10. which now is counted as bad as treason, Heb. xii. has an ineffable sweetness in it, ch. xi. is the little Book of Martyrs, xii. 1, the spirit says follow your leaders, he is a coward that will not follow such free examples; Christ and the saints behold you, and ye are witnesses for Christ as they were, but must forsake all sin, especially your Dalilahs, Herodias, and Rimmons, and strive against it; and ye have need of patience, but ye will faint and be weary unless ye look unto Jesus and fear not, for he is as well the finisher of your faith as the Father of it, he despised the shame, what need you care if they say behold the head, or the heart of a traitor, when your better part is in heaven, and reproves us for being too parsimonious of our blood; we must be prepared for suffering 'creore sanctorum rigatur ecclesia.' Luther was troubled that he carried his blood to his grave, he loved the Christ's cross more than the 24 letters, and loved not half Christians, that were only for doing and not for suffering; and though our sin deserve death as from the Lord, yet our enemies mind them not, they punish us for being judges, advocates, and soldiers for our Lord Jesus, Psal. xxxviii. 20.

"And as the spiritual man overcomes the animal, so I am reasoning myself against sense into a willingness to die, for either the times will be better or worse; is there not in probability a great flood of oppression and persecution, coming upon the godly; will not the righteous soul of a just Lot, be vexed with the horrible prophaneness, malignity, and contempt of Christ's pure ordinances that abounds every where; we have heard justice and tyranny, truth and falsehood, the form and power of godliness pleading together, and judgment was given for God, and his people, but all seems to be reversed, and what was but an injury or nesciente before, is now a formal and material contempt, and despatch to God and Christ, and the spirit of grace in whomsoever breathing; and what comfort is there in a son, if the ark be taken, 1 Sam. iv, 20, 21. she regarded it not, the blessing is to see our children with peace upon Israel, Psal. cxxviii. 5, 6, it is a mercy to be taken away from the evil to come, Esay vii. 1, bestowed upon Josiah as a favour, being tender hearted, 2 Kings xxiii. 19, it is a rich mercy to get into our heavenly house, and harbour before the storm come. 2 Cor. 5, how much more blessed to give our polluted blood for his sake who shed his most precious blood for us; and if the times prove good, for civil or sacred liberties: Moses envied not those that were to go into Canaan, because he was invested with a better possession, a heavenly country, Heb. xi. 16, if there be such glorious times to be expected upon earth as you and I have discoursed of, I am sure there is no less joy in heaven; and we that are there shall have no cause to envy our militant brothers; besides as for myself I can expect to do little for God, I am three parts dead, 70 being divided into four, the shadows of the evening are upon me, and aches and pains are inseparable companions, if now Christ should graciously accept of my poor crazy body, and bring me to an honourable and easy death for him, blessed be his name for ever, 1 Chr. xxix, 10, to 16. The heathen could say 'Dolce est pro patria mori, pro Christo mori dulcissimum.' How did the Romans glory to die for their liberties, and after for their Cæsars? And how glad are the poor Spaniards and Muscovites that they have a life, a wife, or a son, for their king: and how glad are the city that their feasting will be received. A popish friar told me lately, that if he were of my opinion for assurance of salvation, he would not willingly live an hour longer for all Ireland: yet Saints too much fear this grim porter death, though when executed we go from the cross to the crown, Jam. i. 12. indeed it is below the profession that we have made, to be now troubled; in prosperity I would be a worm, but now the Lord makes us bold as lions, that being called to suffer after so blessed an example, we may think it an honour to pledge our master in his own cup, and commit the keeping of our souls to him in well-doing as unto a faithful Creator, 1 Pet. ii, 21, and 4, 19, for he will never leave nor forsake us, but will give us shoulders to bear what he lays upon us, 1 Cor. x. 13, let us therefore who are the children of Zion be joyful in our king, as others, who one day will appear to be fanatics indeed, rejoice in them, for these present sufferings are not worthy to be compared with our future glory, Rom. viii. 18.

Sir, I bless God I have an invincible peace and a secret joy surpassing my expression; and I press towards the mark, Phil. iii. 14, yet divine cordials are not constant, but often some fainting fits, and despondencies; the spirit bloweth where it listeth; where it is not comforting it is supporting, Esay ix. 29 and lxi. 10, if I were not very feeble, how could God's power appear in my weakness. I bless his name that his arrows are not within me, nor do the terrors of death take hold upon me, as Job vi. 4, for I never was better as to the frame and temper of mind and body, than since my restraint; without him. My cousin Harrison is very full of spiritual comfort, as the gentleman jailor tells me, and bids me cheer up, and indeed it will be a mercy if those who are called forth to testify for Christ prove courageous, as Jos. i. 9, but truly as for my part, it does not lie on that side, I fear least I may be too much exalted with the honour of it though I know the Lord can soon withdraw; we live by faith and not by sight, our happiness is in our union rather than in communion and sensible gusts; and I rather fear a lingering death with severity, some for banishment, Ezek. vii. 16, &c. but let the Lord do with me as he pleaseth, as Job said, 1 Chr. xix. 13, 'Omnia co-operantur in bonam,' Rom. viii. 28. So having unbosomed my heart unto you, that you and such whom you judge faithful and secret may the better spread my condition before the Lord, I would intreat you to beg for me more particularly. 1. That God would set home upon my heart, and fulfil in me with power your sweet Scripture, for which I heartily thank you, 2 Tim. i. 7, 8, 9, 12, that I may not be afraid of their terrors, nor troubled, but may sanctify the Lord at that time, and be able to answer all opposers, that they may be ashamed when we suffer for well-doing, 1 Pet. iii. 14 to 18. 2. That I and the rest of our brethren and companions in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ, for the word of God and his testimony may be strengthened with all might according to Christ's glorious power, unto all patience and long suffering with joyfulness, as Paul prayed for the Colossians, Col. i. 9 to 14, being filled with knowledge, wisdom, and spiritual understanding, and feeling those grounds of joy as an inheritance of light, and deliverance from the power of darkness: that we may be 'testes' and 'contestes' to agree in our testimonies, and not disparage so good a cause. 3. That we may be ready not only to be bound but to die for Christ, and the vindication and justification of his evangelical doctrine; we have made high profession and confession of the everlasting gospel, and it is a blessed thing to believe with the heart, and confess with our mouths, and in our lives and by active martyrdom, as Brooke, Ireton, Hampden, Pickering, and others have worthily done, who are safely arrived, expecting us, and we are yet upon the waves; but the most excellent, honourable, rich and fruitful, confession of Christ, whereby we can make the most efficacious demonstration of our election and faith in Christ, and love in his glorious person with most supreme illustration of God's glory, is to lay down our lives as the martyrs did to seal and confirm the truth of our professions with our blood, for the cause of Christ, and safety of your brethren, Rom. xvi. 4. 1 John iii. 16, as our blessed master, after he had confessed and preached the glory of God, and our salvation, confirmed and approved all by miracles, and his most holy life made a good confession under Pontius Pilate, 1 Tim. vi. 13, without which all had been ineffectual: So I have often thought for the discovery of hypocrites, cementing of the saints in more concord-ing affections, trial of faith, exercising of patience, and love to Christ, and for many other glorious ends, God would call for some of his childrens blood, which will be the greater favour to them whom he shall count worthy of it, because I think this will rather be a Julian than a Neronian persecution, always provided that we be found in the doctrine of the covenant of grace, that God does not love us because we live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world, and are willing to forsake all, and lose our lives for him.

But because he loves us, and has singled us out from the world, therefore he enables us so to live, and to do singular things for his honour and glory, and willingly to follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, Rev. xiv. 4, for the love of Christ constraineth us, 2 Cor. v. 14. O that we had more enlarged hearts for our king Jesus. 4. (That you may fully hit my condition) I have some trouble upon me concerning the loss of my temporal estate, especially for my poor, tender loving wife and child: I was a purchaser, and had a stock of cattle, and being wrongfully made prisoner two months before any speech of a king, I was surprized and could save nothing, nor get 20*l.* of my estate since Michaelmas last. They promised to bear my charges to London, but at Chester I was forced to borrow money, or must have come a foot: therefore pray be earnest with the Lord that we may take the spoiling of our goods more joyfully, knowing that we have in heaven better and an enduring substance, Heb. x. 34, and that we may not faint at these momentary afflictions, which work so well for us (wherein riches and honours are not so) according to that passage, 2 Cor. iv. 3 last verses, and be affected with eternal joys. It is said that I shall be put down into the hole for non-payment of great fees: my comfort is that God will be with me, there they cannot shut out God's spirit from me, which is an everlasting spring and Jubilee; nor will that be so bad as Jeremiah's dungeon, nor as Joseph's irons which entered into his soul, though indeed we are sold by our brethren as Joseph was, that the Scripture may be fulfilled, 'The ‘brother shall deliver up the brother to death,’ Matth. x. 21.

I know not how to conclude, not knowing when I may have another opportunity to converse with you, I am overjoyed to think they cannot reach my soul, and that our cause is invincible, and it will be a happiness if God see it good that none might suffer death, but such whose souls are out of danger but being upon the account of civil liberties as well as spiritual, our only wise Father will order all for his own glory, and this only silences all murmurings, and master save thyself, that what he pleases must needs be best for us; he being infinite, wisdom, love, power and goodness. Had the king made his way by the sword, we might expect his sorest strokes; but for the men of Keilah to deliver us up for the parliament to sacrifice us, these men that sit by a Commonwealth Writ, for whose privileges we adventured our all, and who cannot condemn us but must give up the cause, and give judgment against themselves, and all the good people in the nation; let the Indians judge of it, if any of the elect think hardly of us, that we do not cry peccavi, and make our recantation, it will not last long, and it is no matter what others say, for they must receive their judgment at the bar of Christ, and we shall judge our judges; therefore let us not entertain damps of despondencies. My rejoicing is in a good God, a good cause, a good conscience, I have the justice of heaven on my side, and God’s loving-kindness which is better than life, if we find injustice and cruelty here, men’s law at Westminster will be adjudged treason in heaven, it will not be long before all tears shall be wiped from our eyes, and if our innocencies be not vindicated, and cleared up in this life, as Job’s, Mordeca’s, Joseph’s, and Daniel’s and Susanna’s were, yet at the Revelation of the righteous judgment of God, it will appear before men and angels, that we are not Traitors, nor Murderers, nor Phanatics, but true Christians, and good Commonwealth-men, fixt and constant to the principles of sanctity, truth, justice, and mercy, which the parliament and army declared and engaged for; and to that noble principle of preferring the universality, before a particularity, that we sought the public good, and would have enfranchised the people, and secured the welfare of the whole groaning creation, if the nation had not more delighted in servitude, than in freedom. And if we now suffer a Martyrdom of body, we shall be some of the souls under the altar, crying, ‘How long, O Lord, holy and true,’ and though we can patiently digest their tortures, and leave all vengeance to whom it belongs, yet who knows but that our blood may be their poison; but then after all unjust sentences of men how sweet and honourable will the judgment of Christ be, Matth. xxv. (‘Euge bone serve’) of entering into our master’s joy, when the kings of the earth and the chief captains and dukes of Edom shall wish the mountains and rocks to fall upon them, Rev. v. 16. I bless God my poor wife does much encourage me, to be faithful to the death, and she is a meet helper indeed who helps her husband so to heaven, as in a fiery chariot; she is one who bears an unfeigned love to Christ and all the Saints; I intreat your tender care of her and my child, ‘providebit Deus,’ Jer. xlix. 11. I shall leave her that Scripture, and Esa. liv. 5 to 8, while they cannot take away by confiscation; when we were in the storm we took our leaves each of the other, and though we have not paid our vows at Bethel, yet I trust (as was then promised) we shall be willing to go to Christ if he call through a sea of blood. But, O the infinite wisdom and love of God, and the unsearchable riches of his grace, that if I had been drowned the malignants would have said, though he escaped by land, yet divine vengeance overtook him at sea; that now he should vouchsafe me (poor me as Gideon said, Judges vi. 15, one of the meanest lawyers in Westminster-Hall) the honour of bonds and an effectual if not effectual Martyrdom for being an advocate for my blessed advocate and the good people of England.

I have been the larger not knowing what use this may be of, if my mouth should be stopped; if you hear any report of me contrary hereunto believe it not, so you have my heart; and I had rather be buried alive, than my tongue or hand should differ from it. O pray much for me, and pray again and mend your prayers, as I have great need to do, if you know what pitiful poor short and confused prayers I make in a day; yet ‘Father into thy hands I commend my spirit’ is a prayer, no period better than prayer, therefore now unto him that is able to keep you (and me) from falling, and to present you (and me) faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy: To the only wise God our Saviour be glory and majesty, dominion and power now and for ever, Amen.

Yours for ever in our Dear Redeemer,
JOHN COOK.

A Letter written by Mr. Justice Cook from the Tower to his Wife.

My dear lamb, blessed be God for Jesus Christ, and for a prison, where I find much of his comforting presence; tell sister Jones that she keeps but two or three Sabbaths in a week, but in prison every day is a Christian Sabbath, not only to cease from sin, but to praise God, singing Hosannas and Hallelujahs. I can but smile to think that they cannot hinder me from preaching, for I preach twice every day to myself, and yesterday, blessed be the Comforter, my heart was brimful of joy and consolation, from Psal. lxxiii. 25, 26, wherein I observed three points or doctrinal conclusions.

1. That a saint should love and esteem nothing but God, and for God; all discourse is vain but what aims and tends to God’s glory, 1 Cor. x. 31, a husband, wife, child, friends, and all creature comforts are to be loved so far as we see God in them; as the creatures do not serve us but God sustains us in them, and by them, so our affections and desires must not be fixed upon them, but terminate in God; as the waters in the river never rest till they return to the sea, so our loves must only pass by the creature, and settle in God; and the more we see the image of God in any one, there our love is to be most in the Lord, and for his sake this love is the greatest weight of our souls, and transforms into the nature of the thing beloved, let us endeavour to put out more acts of love to God in Christ, Cant. i. 16.

2. From those words, my flesh and my heart faileth me, but God is the strength of my heart, the chief residence of the soul being in the heart, I observe, That there is something more dear to a saint than his own soul, which is the soul of his soul, and the life of his life, and that is Jesus Christ, who dwelleth in our souls by his spirit, Rom. viii. 10, 11, for as the body is dead when the soul leaves it, so the soul is dead without Christ, which may teach us two lessons. 1. To love Christ more than our own lives or relations, because he is the soul of our souls; this did Moses, Exod. xxxii. 32, and Paul, Rom. ix. 3, they preferred the glory of God in the salvation of their brethren before their own souls, if it could have been, which is a Christian duty; though very hard; and if divine justice should say to us at the great day, the soul that sins must die: we may say, why then did God punish our Lord Jesus who is the soul of our souls, more dear to us than our souls, and if God had seen it good we had rather have suffered in our own persons to have saved him; but we not being able to undergo the wrath of God, that innocent and immaculate lamb was put to death, who is the heart of our hearts, the soul of our souls, and the spirit of our spirits; for justice is more than abundantly satisfied, much more than if our wills, souls, and bodies had suffered, and the debt was all paid together which had always been paying if we had gone to hell, for as to Christ our salvation is all peace, strict justice, who felt nothing but extremity, the Father would not spare him, Rom. viii. 32, but as to us it is all mercy that his satisfaction should be accepted for us, and that thee and me, and dear daughter too; and sweet love I trust should be vessels of that mercy and free grace, O blessed be his glorious name for ever.

3. My meditations were principally carried out from the joys of heaven and from those words, Whom have I in heaven but thee? and thou art my portion for ever, I was ravished with this consideration, that the joys of heaven are eternal: or thus, The saints pleasures have a beginning, but no ending. No doubt but this is infinite matter of joy to Abraham, and all the saints in heaven, to think that they shall continue in their joy and glory, not 100 or 10,000 millions of years only, but for ever, that when they have been there 100,000 millions of millions of years, as to what remains it will not be a minute, but then we begin our felicity, therefore Christ calls it a life eternal, Matt. xxv. 46. Therefore if a man could live here 1,000,000 millions of years, enjoy his heart's desire, and all the variety of pleasures which this world can afford, and afterwards be deprived of Paradise, or be damned, what a sad bargain would that be; for the saints are all that while in heaven, and shall be there for ever, and if a man might be always younger and live here for ever if such a thing were possible, yet could not that content him, because he is capable of good; and if it were put to the choice of an illuminate Christian whether to live here 1,000 years in health, wealth, and all that soul and body can desire, or to be in heaven but one day, he ought to choose the latter: Ps. cxviii. so one minute's being in heaven is to be preferred before a perpetuity of all worldly pleasures, for to be absent from the Lord is more grievous than all human delights can be comfortable, if it were but a pretty good condition, if men were sure always so to continue it would be comfortable: therefore to think of an everlasting crown of glory, is a soul-melting consideration.

If then this life be not a minute in comparison of the perpetual life of the blessed souls in heaven; how greatly are they to be blamed that for a little vain honour, flattering pleasure, or the momentary sinful delights of this evil world, squander away their precious souls. 2. As the joys of heaven are eternal, so they are exceeding great: If the men of the world which have their portion here, Ps. cxviii. 14, have such stately houses and pleasant palaces and delights, shall we not think that God hath provided inestimable treasures and pleasures in the world to come for his children: for whom do earthly parents treasure up, but for their children; but if we could but apprehend what they are, they are not the joys of heaven, for no heart can conceive what God has prepared for them that love him, 1 Cor. ii. 9, the eye hath seen much, and the ear heard more, and the heart may conceive much more, but eternal pleasures are inconceivable, yet the spiritual eye hath some glimpse of it: a poor saint finds more solid zeal and joy in a crucified Christ, poor and naked and despised in the world, than all the dukes of Edom; their rich and glorious pomp and magnificence; but all the saints living here have not so much joy and splendour as the least saint hath in heaven; the scripture mentions three heavens, where the fowls are, the starry heaven, and the heaven of heavens, 1 Kings viii. 27, the sun is conceived to be 300 times bigger than the earth, and every star bigger than this lower world, and that all the earth is but as a mote and not so big as a fly in comparison of the Imperial celestial heavens, where the souls of the saints are with God and Christ; and by the largeness of the place we may guess at the greatness of the joys and pleasures, that the Elect are but few in comparison of those who shall be turned into hell, Ps. ix. 17, as it were thrust into a hole together, Matth. xxv. 23, our Lord's joy can be no little joy, and it is too big to enter into it. Next I consider wherein the substance and essence of heavenly joys does properly consist by 1 Cor. xiii. 12, it seems much to be in sight and knowledge.

1. For sight, to see God face to face, to see the beautiful person of our dear Lord Jesus, to see all the blessed saints and angels, and to be one of them, how joyful is the thought of it; for if the damned (between whom and the saints there is a great gulph fixed, Luk. xvi. 26.) shall see Abraham and the prophets in the kingdom of God, Luke xiii. 28, when themselves are thrust out (poor saint-haters that now persecute the heirs of glory, and scorn their companies, would then feign crowd into heaven with them) much more the elect themselves; but the difficulty is, how we can see spirits with bodily eyes, and bodies with spiritual eyes, I rather think that Job xix. 25, 27, is to be understood of Jesus Christ, whom Job shall see with the eyes of his body, and by the eyes of our souls we shall see God the Father and the blessed spirits; and our comfort is that we shall for ever be with the Lord. But here the scripture hath no tongue to speak, we must not too curiously inquire for knowledge, it is a wonderful expression, we shall know even as we are known, God knows us perfectly and what shall be our last thoughts, Psal. cxxxix. 1, 2. All the saints upon earth do not know so much as one saint in heaven, where faith is turned into vision, and hope into fruition; then shall we know the love of Christ which passeth all knowledge here below, Ephes. iii. 19, how all the love that ever God vouchsafed to the world, is but as a spark to the oven, red hot in comparison of giving Christ; but I believe we shall never know God comprehensively (but apprehensively) that is so much of his glory as we shall never know more, for there will be new springs and fresh discoveries of his infinite grace, glory, goodness and perfections streaming forth continually to us, that will be as everlasting fountains of joy and glorious rejoicing to our souls and bodies; as one at sea sees a great way, but not to the end or bottom of the sea, for we shall know as much of God as our heads can hold, and love God as much as our hearts can contain; and no doubt but there are different degrees of glory in heaven, as the saints know more or less of God, whereas when vessels of several sizes are cast into the sea, they are all full, but some hold more than others, 2 Cor. v. 4. God works upon our hearts as engravers upon gold or marble, and the more of his image he stamps upon us in this life, the liker shall we be to him in glory, but every saint shall have his own fulness of knowledge.

3. I think that heavenly joy does much consist in the will, in the transformation, of our wills into the will of God; for as we heard an excellent sermon from 1 Cor. vi. 17, at Northampton, he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit; for I believe that mystical oneness which our dear Lord so sweetly prayed for Joh. xvii. 11, 21, 24, is meant of oneness in will and affections, when the soul shall have all that it can desire and nothing but what it does desire, and shall will nothing but what God wills, and not only to be satisfied with the will of God, but to taste a sweet complacency and delight in it, that it is infinitely best to be there.

4. This transforming of the will proceeds from the apprehension of divine love, where the soul finds that God has loved it from all eternity, that his eye and his heart are perpetually upon it for good, and knows that it is a free, pure, unchangeable and eternal love, this causes an eternity of joy; and a love is the sweetest grace in the heart (the very sugar of the soul) that makes a heaven upon earth, where it is without dissimulation and spiritual, so heavenly joy will consist much in love, which must needs flow from sight and knowledge, for as Paul says, 1 Cor. ii. 8, it is only ignorance of God that makes so many to oppose the way of truth and holiness; so the sight of divine glorious beauty and the knowledge of infinite wisdom, power, love, and goodness in Christ, causes the soul to love God, and Christ, and the spirit, much better than itself: for if the spouse be sick of love here, Cant. v. 8, and if the fire of love constrain militant saints not to live to themselves, 2 Cor. v. 14, ingenuity being the great principle of the gospel not to work for life, but from life, and to do all from a spirit of love, much more the saints triumphant: but the more I think of this blessed state of glorification, the more I am at a loss in it, Psal. xvi. 11, in God's presence there is fulness of joy, and at his right hand there are pleasures for evermore; and David says, Psal. cxliii. that they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars for ever and ever; but one star differeth from another in glory; and Matth. xiii. 43, the righteous shall shine as the Son in the kingdom of their Father. And our Lord says, in my Father's house are many mansions, and Paul calls it, a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, 2 Cor. iv. 17, and a building of God, a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens, where we shall be so soon as the soul parts from the body, 2 Cor. v. 1, 8, and that it is an inheritance in light all light and no darkness, 1 Coloss. xii. and that the saints shall judge the world, and when Christ shall appear we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is, 1 John iii. 2, in the new Jerusalem there shall be no sorrow, no crying, no pain, Rev. xxi. 4, and the gates of the city are pearls, and the street is pure gold, ver. 21, the glory of God lightens it, and the Lamb is the light thereof, ver. 22, in it there is a pure river of water of life, and a tree of life, which bears fruit every month, Rev. xxii. 1, 2, and there shall be no curses, there, and there shall be no night, and we shall reign for ever and ever, ver. 5. All these are soul-ravishing considerations, and I have sucked much comfort from Psal. xvii. 15. I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness; and 1 Thess. v. 10, who died for us, that whether we wake or sleep we should live together with him; therefore let us comfort ourselves and edify one another with these words, and Mr. Burton's text, Heb.

xii. 22, 23; it is sweet also to consider of the glory of the body, 1 Cor. xv. 42, 43, it shall be an incorruptible, glorious, powerful, spiritual body, there will be charity, agility, penetrability, impassibility, no hunger, no cold, it shall be fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body, Phil. iii. 20. What a comfort is it to thee and me that have such crazy bodies; ulcerous Lazarus shall be as sound as a fish, and we shall have an everlasting spring of health and strength which shall never decay.

"Use. Let this teach us more to mind eternity, to study the joys of heaven, that we may receive a full reward, 2 Ephes. 10 & 8, as Mr. Whitfield once exhorted Oliver in every thing to mind and eye eternity; for they are the brave men and women that will be so at that day, the pleasures of this world are so far from satisfying the understanding and will, which are capable of God, that they cannot satisfy any one sense; never any music so sweet, but a man will desire to hear better, no object so beautiful, no meat so pleasant, but a man will covet to see that which is more lovely and tastes sweeter, Eccles. i. 8, study that book and Canticles well, that the spirit may convince us of the vanity and vexation of all creature-delight, and of the fulness and excellency that is Jesus Christ, the best condition in this life is but a bitter sweetening, all our comforts are impure mixt with wormwood, no rose without thorn, and the bitter is more than the sweet, but in heaven all our delights are pure and unmixt, there is perfect joy without any grief, solid comforts and no afflictive misery, no envy, no emulation which abounds here; for every Saint has what his heart can desire, it is a sinless, sorrowless, temptationless, oppressionless, sickless, timeless and endless estate, where being once arrived we shall never fear parting any more, therefore (my dear sweetening) let us wait patiently and cheerfully for that blessed translation from earth to heaven; we must begin our heaven here, the more prepared to die, the fitter we are to live, so let us live, so let us die, that we may live eternally. If thee liketh such poor breathings and broken meditations, thee mayest command more of them, I leave thee and me and my dear child and our Christian relations with thee in his arms who is in heaven at the right-hand of the Father, therefore we need not fear what man can do unto us, Isa. 51, 12. To him I am, thine for ever. Thy loving husband during this life,

JOHN COOK.

Another Letter from Mr. Cook to a friend after Condemnation.

Dear brother, beloved in the Lord, 'condemnatu sum ad vitam,' and this is my cordial farewell to you and all Saints, from my Jeremiah's prison; to morrow I shall be in eternal glory, in the bosom of Christ, where our father Abraham is, and a guard of angels will convey my soul thither. Never let God's people fear a prison any more, for the Lord's supporting or comforting spirit hath not been absent from me since my Indictment. I write a letter to you formerly, acquainting you with my spiritual condition, to which I refer you; and fearing lest wrong may be done to the cause when I am in heaven, I think fit to leave a few words with my dearest love to all Christian friends.

1. Upon my trial it came to this, that the judges said, that all have been treason since 1642, so that the lords and commons are not to meddle with the king. I said, that I acted obedientially by order from the house of commons, and the commons being the representatives of the people cannot commit treason, for there can be no trial of all the people. And as for any force upon the house in 1648, they were the only judges of it, and no inferior Court can judge of the lawfulness or unlawfulness of their acts or orders. But they said, all our acts and orders are treason. So that now it is brought to that it was in 1648.

2. I intend by God's assistance upon the ladder to bear my testimony for Jesus Christ to all his offices, and for a gospel magistracy and ministry, and to speak something so far as God shall enable, and will be permitted, for the good old Cause, or righteousness and holiness. I can at present only leave my dear love and respects for you and my dear sister, beseeching God, and not doubting but that we shall shortly meet in eternal glory. Company so spends me that I can write no more: I shall suddenly enter into the joy of the Lord, O blessed be his name, blessed be the Comforter, my soul is full of consolation. Farewell, farewell, Renede in Paradiso. Yours for ever,
For my dear brother F. JOHN COOK.

Some Particulars of the Behaviour and of the Execution of THOMAS SCOT, the 17th Day of October, 1660, at the same place.

When he was in the Tower, a relation sent to know how he did; to which he returned this answer, that he had been very ill all night, and had some apprehensions that it might be unto death. But, said he, I was not at all displeased; for if it be the will of God, that I may not live his servant, I would die his sacrifice.

The first day that he came to Newgate, some friends came to see him, and asked him how it was with him; he told them, he was well; but he waited and much longed for a word of peace from God: but (said he) I bless God (though it is somewhat dark with me at present, and I know I have a very naughty heart) yet I have not one temptation to desert that good Cause, which God hath so signally (many a time) owned.

The next day, which was the day maj. gen. Harrison was condemned, some of his relations came to him, and told him, they supposed he had heard what dismal sentence was passed on him; and, O Sir, said one of them, my heart fails me to think how you will bear it. Why, said he, flesh and blood will recoil; but, blessed be God, I am not troubled at that; a fit of an ague would cost a man more, I believe.

The day after he was condemned himself, his wife and other relations and friends came to him; O Sir, said some, how is it now? Why, said he, blessed, O blessed chains! I would not be without these chains. Indeed, it was a very dark, dismal, cloudy morning, I was brought to be content to perish. Truly, I thought I could not plead at all, my soul was so sad, because God hid his face: but I was resolved, said he; if I could have said no more, to tell the Court, That the cause was the Lord's; and the fault was not in the Lord, but my great personal unworthiness, that I could not assert it; and that though I did sink into the bottomless pit immediately, yet I durst not, no not for a world, but own that cause, which God had often honoured. But, said he, the Lord for your sakes did help me to say somewhat; but, truly it was but pitiful. I thought if I might have been suffered, (although I have not slept, to speak of; these two nights) I could have spoken three or four hours longer. And now, said he, as dark as it was in the morning, it is so bright, so quiet and calm, that truly I think, if I were to be executed to morrow, I could sleep all night as well as ever. But (lifting up his eyes) Lord, said he, I would not be too confident: O pardon thy servant. But, being in a very chearful frame, his friends and relations left him at that time, and, because of illness, could not visit him next day.

But on the next first-day of the week, being with him, he told them he found an increased strength. That day about noon, the warrant for execution was signed; at which time, he was desirous to have a reprieve gained, if possible: not (said he) that I expect life; but methinks my wedding garment is not quite ready: a little more time, that I may, as a bride, be ready trimmed. That evening it was told him, that sir O. B. would speak with him the next morning; and some told him, it may be that would prove an hour of temptation. Truly (said he) I bless God, I am at a point, I cannot, no, I cannot, desert the cause.

The next morning they two were together, the matter of their discourse I know not, but I remember when his wife desired to go to O. B. that evening, to see if he would be her dear husband's (or rather her) mediator to his majesty for his life. It may be (said he) sir O. B. may say, that I should confess guilt, and do the king some service. Prithce tell him, I would engage to live quietly; but for owning guilt, that I cannot do: for to this day I am not convinced of any, as to the death of the king, and that I went but too far, in asking the benefit of the Proclamation; and I cannot go any further, no not to save a thousand lives.

That evening came in two ministers: one, or both of them, (after they had talked with him a good while) I heard them ask, whether he did acknowledge his guilt? for they believed his owning of that, would be the most likely

(if not a most certain) means, to prolong his life. To which he answered, that although he had often, and that with many tears (and he thought with some brokenness of heart) sought the Lord to convince him of it, if he had any guilt in him, as to that particular action, (for which he was then in chains, and under condemnation) for, said he, I would not for a world die with one sin unrepented of: but, said he, really, to this day I have no such conviction. But, said the Doctor, Sir, if any such do come in, will you tell us? Yes, said he, I profess I will, if it come in at the last moment, even at the gibbet, I will tell the world of it. And it is observable, that some of his last words were, that God had engaged him in a cause, not to be repented of, I say, not to be repeated of.

The night before execution when he was in the dungeon, he was (as he had been that day) somewhat sadder than at other times; and one asked him, if any particular thing lay on him? he said, No; but the Lord was pleased to suspend his comforting presence: But, said he, (with an humble boldness, I would speak it) The Lord shall not put me off with any thing besides himself. After having spent some hours in prayer, as at other times, about midnight we left him, and his fellows, that they might get a little rest, for the support of their natural spirits; and in three or four hours his wife, children, and many other friends returned. When we came, we found them praying: As soon as col. Scroop had ended, Mr. Scot turned about, and opening his arms, he embraced his wife, and one of his daughters: Ah, said he, my dear ones, God is good, he is come, he is come! I am full, I am full, O bless the Lord for me, and with me! O my soul, and all that is within me, magnify the Lord! By and by he went to prayer himself; and one would have thought he had been (as it were) in heaven, his soul was so enlarged in blessing, praising and magnifying the God of his salvation. O! said he to his wife, I would not change this dark room for the best Star Chamber under heaven. He desired his friends and relations would not be solicitous for his body; but let them do what they pleased, and exercise what cruelty they would; saying, it will meet it should be so: And that the dead bodies of the witnesses must be unburied, that the Scriptures might be fulfilled.

Some part of his prayer was, to bless the Lord, that, as the Psalmist said, though he came in there weeping, and fearing that he had not yet been bearing precious seed, yet now they were returning rejoicing and triumphing, and carrying their sheaves with them. Call us not, said he, Marahs, (as she once said) but call us Naamies; for we came in hither (some of us) empty, but we are going out full: The Lord hath not writ bitter things, but good of us; for this is glorious grace, That we are counted worthy to suffer for God and his Cause. Oh! What shall we render to the Lord? We will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord. Oh our souls, bless the Lord! and we do with our souls bless thee, that we have an eternity to bless thee in; for no less will satisfy our souls. And now, O blessed and glorious God! shall we be among thy Worthies? [meaning Harrison, Carew, and Cook.] If possible, let us attain to the first three; but if we attain not to so glorious a testimony as that, yet, O Lord! let us be among thy Worthies. We desire to glorify thy great and blessed name, that thou hast in any measure enabled us to encourage our hearts in the Lord our God, at such a time as this, when eighty are, as it were, in the flames: and the people spake of worse than stoming us. When some spake of the reproaches of the people, he said, he accounted that his honour. Being upon the ladder, he addressed himself to the spectators in the following manner:

"Gentlemen, I stand here a spectacle to God, to angels, and men. To God and angels, to whom I hope I am shortly a-going. And now, to you I owe it; to God, and the nation, and myself, to say something concerning each. For myself, I think it may become me to tell you how, and why I came hither: and something in the general, concerning my capacity. In the beginning of these troubles I was, as many others were, unsatisfied. I saw liberties and religion in the nation in great danger, to my best apprehension: I saw the approaches of Popery in a great measure coming in upon us: I saw—"

Upon which the Sheriff interrupted him in these words: If you will betake yourself to prayer, you may.

Mr. Scot replied, I shall not speak to reproach any—

The Sheriff interrupted him again, saying, You have but a little time, Mr. Scot, therefore betake that little time to prayer.

Mr. Scot replied, I shall speak—

The Sheriff interrupted him again, saying, I beseech you, Sir, betake yourself to prayer.

Mr. Scot said, It may become me to give an account of myself, because—

The Sheriff interrupted him again, saying, It doth not become you to speak any such thing here, therefore I beseech you betake yourself to prayer; it is but a little time you have to live: You know, Mr. Scot, that is the most needful thing.

Mr. Scot replied, 'Tis so—

The Sheriff interrupted him again, saying, Sir, but when you came upon the stage, you deprived yourself very much.

Then said Mr. Scot, I thought to tell you how I came hither—

Here the Sheriff interrupted him again, and spake to this effect, Every body knows that—

Mr. Scot said, Sir, 'tis hard that an Englishman hath not liberty to speak—

The Sheriff interrupted again, saying, I cannot suffer you to speak any such thing.

Mr. Scot said, I shall say no more but this, That it is a very mean and bad cause that will not bear the words of a dying man; it is not ordinarily denied to people in this condition—

The Sheriff interrupted again, saying, Sir, you had a fair trial, and you were found Guilty.

Mr. Scot replied, 'Tis according to my mind to speak what may be said—

Here the Under-Sheriff interrupted, saying, It hath been denied unto your predecessors, and will be denied unto you.

Then he prayed as followeth:

"Holy Lord God, the great and glorious God of Heaven and Earth; King of Nations, and King of Saints: in both which capacities, thy poor and unworthy creature comes now to bear his witness in this great spectacle, before Thee, angels and men, O Lord, were it not for sin, none of these things had befallen this nation, nor my unworthy self: We have all transgressed and gone astray from thee by a perpetual backsliding; even all, of all sorts, conditions, ranks and orders of men: And among them none, none more than thy poor unworthy creature, who acknowledgeth the same here before thee in the face of heaven, and in thy presence, to which he is very shortly a going. That glorious grace, which thou hast been pleased to afford unto his soul in it. Thou art gone to the highest extent of mercy that ever was shewed to any of the sons of men. Thy poor servant doth acknowledge himself to be the greatest of transgressors. And thy glorious grace is magnified above all thy name, in what thou hast done for thy poor creature. But Lord, so it is, because such is thy good pleasure, such was thy design from eternity; through or in the great transactions that was between thee, and Christ thy blessed Son, and our blessed Saviour; that thou shouldest in thy dispensation, in the governing of thy church in the world. That thou shouldest glorify thy free-grace in pardoning of the sins, and in the salvation of some of lost mankind, which was the great master-piece of thy love, that thou shouldest chuse out of poor lost mankind one or other, it is of admirable and incomprehensible mercy: And that thou shouldest chuse thy poor creature as one in the number, is matter of adoration, admiration, is matter of eternal extacy, and is matter of thanksgiving for ever: And this is the comfort of his poor soul, that he shall have an eternity with thyself; thou hast so assured him, that he shall be blessing, honouring and magnifying of thee among a company of saints and angels, and the souls of just men made perfect. O blessed Lord, thou hast called him forth as a public spectacle to some, in a condition of shame and reproach; to others, of comfort; and to thy blessed self, as one that is a witness for thee, that hath served thee with all faithfulness in his trust and public capacity and employment. O Lord, thy dispensation to thy poor creature hath been wonderfully gracious, and merciful; and he must say to the praise of thy free grace—"

Here the Hangman stooping down to take drink, which was reached up to him upon the ladder, interrupted him: Upon which Mr. Scot said, 'Prythee let me alone, I have not done;' then proceeded in prayer as followeth:

—"That this very condition to which he is now brought, he acknowledgeth, is the answer of his prayer before his going out of England. Thou knowest Lord, he did many times in prayers and tears seek thy blessed majesty, for counsel and for advice: whether it were his duty to stay and suffer, or to shelter himself abroad: And if it were thy will to take more honour to thyself, by his suffering than his living; thou wouldest be pleased to remand him back again, and bring him hither. And he hath observed thy providence checking of his way, and in preserving him all along until he came to this. O blessed Lord, thy poor creature doth acknowledge, that thy ways to his poor soul, have been of wonderful grace and mercy. It was a great mercy to him, that having had (by reason of many sinful temptations, and many incumbrances: and many incessant businesses in the world, whereof he hath been a perpetual drudge) many years past; and he hath not had the conveniency, though his duty: The Lord knows he had not the conveniency, nor the heart, so to improve and keep his own vineyard, while he had been looking after, or keeping other's vineyards: Thou didst therefore all along (while he was abroad) give sweet opportunities, and precious seasons, (while he was abroad) of seeking thy face, and studying his soul's good concerning eternity, and the eternal pleasure by thy holy will: and he blesseth thy name, that thou hast been pleased to open to him, both the scripture and his understanding; and so to answer the one by the other, as that he is (through the grace of God) comfortably persuaded, that his eternal estate is out of hazard. But, O Lord, thou hast been pleased, all the while that his condition hath been doubtful, to make his comforts to his poor soul doubtful also; sometimes fear, and sometimes hope, have been mixed: Again, and again wanting those consolations that might support his soul to such an issue. But blessed be thy glorious name, the great God of heaven and earth, he hath been pleased to bear him witness to himself, to angels, and to all that hear me this day, this very day; thy poor servant that now stands to suffer, had joy and much consolation from God, and from his cause, more than ever he had before: I say again, to the praise of the free-grace of God, I bless his name, he hath engaged me in a cause not to be repented of; I say in a cause not to be repented of—

Here the Sheriff interrupted him, saying, Is this your prayers, Mr. Scot? desiring him to forbear those kind of expressions. Others also told him, that he contradicted himself, and spoke blasphemy.

Then Mr. Scot said, "I shall say no more but this; The Lord I do acknowledge, that this very morning in the Dark Chamber, I had very much of the presence of God; and from thence I take consolation to myself, that his spirit is with me, and that he hath sealed unto my soul the decrees of heaven, at least persuaded my soul, that it will be well with me, and that I am out of all danger as to my eternal condition; and that I shall live and reign with him there, where all sin shall be done away, which is the growing glory of my soul, and all tears wiped away also; in the meantime I pray thee, O Lord, that thou wouldest remember England, and remember thy cause in England: and remember me with the joys of thy salvation in the instant of my departure; O Lord, it is a narrow entrance, it is a strait passage, it is an entrance into eternity. O Lord thou hast once to day shewed me something beyond it, something of the glory of God; I pray thee forsake me not while I am here and sensible, or afterwards in the passage of my soul; to thee I leave it, and to thy providence, and do acknowledge thy goodness to my soul, in fitting me to receive that good which thou in thy infinite pleasure, dost think fit for me; And therefore, O Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit. Lord, I desire to have some more testimony of thy love, if it be thy blessed will: It is enough that I live upon what I had to day; but if it be agreeable to thy holy will, I would honour and eternally bless thee, if thou wouldest be pleased to shine upon me, with some more particular immediate discoveries of thy presence; but not my will but thy will be done. The Lord be pleased to settle the nation in peace, and in the power and purity of religion, and thy ordinances in purity: And, Lord, for thy son, that is the darling of thy soul; Be thou pleased to give him a glorious entertainment in the world; and let the kingdoms of the world, become the kingdoms of Jesus Christ. Lord, thou hast a cause in the world, dear unto thee, I pray thee own it; though it may not be owned in all places, and by all persons, yet religion is the interest of them all. O Lord remember the price of blood, that hath been shed for the purchasing of the Civil and Christian liberties. And remember thy enemies, that are not incorrigible enemies to thy truth and holiness; and give them understanding to see their error, and to turn to thee; a heart broken, and with humiliation, that they may seek God with their whole heart; that they may be a holy or Immanuel nation, a chosen generation, a peculiar people, zealous of good works, careful to shew forth the virtue of him that hath called them from death to life. The Lord call in all that belong to the election of grace speedily, into that number; Let no weapon formed against thy church prosper; But Lord remember Zion, if it be thy good pleasure, and repair the walls of thy Jerusalem. O Lord, thy cause lies near the hearts of thy people; And I bear thee witness, that I have this income from thee, as the return of their prayers; And that we are supported to bear witness for thee very cheerfully and with satisfaction. I desire to be found of thee in Jesus Christ: I do now abhor all my sins, and renounce my services; and do account them all as dung. Lord thou knowest, I have desired to live, that I might serve thee better, and love thee more; but that I may be with thyself, Oh it is infinitely better: and to confirm that testimony that is concerning thy glorious will; And thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven, by me and all thine; from henceforth, and for evermore," Amen.

His Prayer being ended, he was turned off.

Some NOTES taken of a SERMON preached by Mr. HUGH PETERS,* the 14th of October, 1660, (after his condemnation) in the prison of Newgate, wherein he was much interrupted, by the coming in, and going forth, of strangers that came to see him, and the other prisoners, in the room with him, and so was constrained to break off the sooner; and though they are but brief heads, yet it is thought convenient here to insert them, for the better satisfaction of any, touching the frame of Mr. Hugh Peters at that time. This discourse was from,

PSALM xlii. ver. 11.

"Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance and my God."

After analysing the Psalm, he observed this Doctrine.

Doctrine, That the best of God's people are apt to be desponding.

This was the man's case in the whole 88th Psalm.

Also David's case, when he complained of the breaking of his bones, &c.

This was Christ's case himself, when he cried out "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me."

The reasons why the best of God's people, are apt to despondencies, are,

First, When something falls out from God more than ordinary, when God puts weight in sorrow and affliction, that makes it sinking; although that afflictions are heavy of themselves many times, yet it is the weight that God puts in sorrow, that makes it sink us.

Secondly, Over-valuing our comforts, putting too much upon wife, children, estate, or life itself, a man is apt to be cast down when he thinks of parting with them.

Thirdly, Our unpreparedness for sufferings, and afflictions that makes us despond. Alas I thought not of it say some, it is come unexpectedly upon me.

* When Peters, on the 27th of Jan. preceding, preached before his accomplice Monk, who was then on his slow and cautious march from Scotland to London, about the journey of the Israelites from Egypt to Canaan, and the crinkledum crankledum ways of the Lord, he little suspected in how short a time he was to receive this treatment at the hand of the general.

Fourthly, We are apt to despond when our afflictions are many, when they are multitudes, when all is struck at together, name, estate, relations, and life itself.

Fifthly, When afflictions are of long continuance, a man can bear that burthen awhile, that he cannot stand under long.

Sixthly, When afflictions fall upon the noblest part of man, which is his soul; then are despondencies apt to come in.

Seventhly, When we have more sense than Faith.

Now it should not be so, God's people ought not to despond.

1. Because it discovers impatience.

2. Because it discovers want of Faith, they lean not upon the rock that will not fail them.

3. It discovers want of Wisdom, &c.

4. We should not be thus, because it gratifies the enemy, who in such a case is ready to upbraid us, and say where is now their God? what is become of their God?

Now what cure and remedies are there for desponding.

This eleventh verse gives you two.

First, Hope in God, "Hope thou in God."

Secondly, Faith is set on work, I shall yet praise him, &c.

But more particularly take these directions.

1. Be careful of exercising faith, for no condition of man supersedes his faith, do all in faith, pray in faith, and hear in faith, &c. Now what is the exercise of faith but rolling upon Christ, and staying on him, here I will stick, if I perish I perish.

The miscarriages of Christians, is either because they have no faith, or else, because, if they have faith, they give it not food to live upon; Faith must go to Christ, as the liver vein, and fetch blood and life thence. We quarrel that we have not love, and patience, and meekness, &c. but the defect lies in our faith, if we had more faith, we should have more of all other graces.

Now what is the food of faith?

Ans. Faith will not feed upon every dish, not on a stalled ox or fatted calf; prosperity is not faith's food. But it will eat a word, live upon promises, these nourish faith, 'I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee, all things shall work together for good,' and the like promises.

2. Be marvellously careful of things below, measure things not by sense, or by a day, but by faith, and eternity; we are troubled at the loss of this and the other creature, and comfort, but what is the value of them, the over-valuing things is our mischief.

3. Go and tell the Lord Christ, I have a defiled conscience, and if thou dost not wash me I am undone for ever. See the necessity and worth of Christ; there must be something better to look at than what we lose for the present, something above estate, and life, and relations, and name. See the worth of Christ's blood, it is worth all the world, because what the blood of bulls and goats could not do, his blood doth cleanse from all sin.

4. Keep close to the use of Ordinances much of our mischief hath come from neglects of this kind; the safety of a Christian lies in the enjoyment of Church-Communion, Psal. xxvii. 4. 5, and 6 verses. One thing I have desired of the Lord, and that will I seek after, that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, &c. for in the time of trouble he shall hide me in his pavillion, in the secret of his tabernacle, shall he hide me, he shall set me upon a rock; and now shall my head be lifted up above mine enemies round about me, &c. The greatest fears are dispelled there—you shall find before troubles pass over (for you expect some) it will be a hard matter to break churches, they are so fast chained together, and yet there hath been marvellous miscarriages amongst Saints in their church relations.—Finis.

He also during his imprisonment in the Tower, wrote some sheets of paper to his daughter, leaving them with her as his last legacy, containing in it very much sound and wholesome advice as to her soul's health. It carries with it such a savour as denotes it proceeds from a spirit that hath learned experience in Christ's school, and hath been acquainted sometimes with sun-shine as well as foul weather, it is too long here to be inserted, but if it be made public by itself, doubtless the experienced reader will be no loser by perusing this legacy.

Some memorable PASSAGES of Mr. HUGH PETERS, in his Imprisonment at Newgate, and at the time of his Execution at Charing-cross, October 16, 1660.

Mr. Peters, as is well known, was well exercised under a great conflict in his own spirit, during the time of his imprisonment, fearing (as he would often say) that he should not go through his sufferings with courage and comfort, and said to friends, that he was somewhat unprepared for death, and therefore unwilling to die; something he said he had committed, and other things omitted, which troubled him, but though it was a cloudy and dark day with him for a season, yet the light of God's grace and favour would break forth at last.

And surely the favour of God did at the last appear, for a little before he went forth to execution (as many can testify) he was well composed in his spirit, and cheerfully said, I thank God now I can die, I can look death in the face and not be afraid.

As for that slanderous report which was too much received by good people as well as bad, to wit, that he was guilty of uncleanness. A friend coming to him in prison, put that question seriously and soberly to his soul, to which he replied, that he blessed the Lord, he was wholly clear in that matter, and that he never knew any woman but his own wife.

A night or two before he suffered, two of the episcopal clergy, who as some report were the king's chaplains, came to give him a visit; they endeavoured to make advantage of the present temptations wherewith he was then assaulted, and to persuade him to a repentance and recantation of his former activity in the parliament cause, which they endeavoured to enforce upon him by a promise of pardon from the king, in case he would therein hearken to them. But though he was then much afflicted in his spirit, yet the Lord did help him to bear up with much courage against the insinuations of that sort of men, and told them he had no cause in the least to repent of his adhering to that interest; but rather, that he had in the prosecution thereof done no more for God and his people, in these nations, and with civility dismissing those visitants, he applied himself to some other ministers then present, whom he judged more able to speak a word in season to him under these great trials, wherewith the Lord was then pleased to exercise him.

Being carried upon the sledge to execution, and made to sit therein within the rails at Charing-cross, to behold the execution of Mr. Cook, one comes to him, and upbraided him with the death of the king, bidding him (with opprobrious language) to repent: he replied, friend, you do not well to trample upon a dying man, you are greatly mistaken, I had nothing to do in the death of the king.

When Mr. Cook was cut down, and brought to be quartered, one they called col. Turner, called to the sheriff's men, to bring Mr. Peters near, that he might see it, and by and by the hangman came to him, all besmeared in blood, and rubbing his bloody hands together, he tauntingly asked, 'Come, how do you like this, Mr. Peters, how do you like this work?' To whom he replied, 'I am not, I thank God, terrified at it, you may do your worst.'

When he was going to his execution, he looked about and espied a man, to whom he gave a piece of gold (having bowed it first) and desired him to go to the place where his daughter

* "Peters had not the fruits of his prayer," (See p. 1133, ante, and the note) "for he neither departed so soon as he wished, nor in peace. He became himself a sacrifice to the triumph which he led as pontiff. They dealt at the Restoration perhaps too hardly with this poor good man." Burke's Reflections on the Revolution in France.

Burnet says, "It was, indeed, remarkable that Peters, a sort of an enthusiastical buffoon preacher, though a very vicious man, who had been of great use to Cromwell, and had been outrageous in pressing the king's death with the cruelty and rudeness of an Inquisitor, was the man of them all that was the most sunk in his spirit, and could not in any sort bear his punishment. He had neither the honesty to repent of it, nor the strength of mind to suffer for it as the rest of them did. He was observed all the while to be drinking some cordial liquors to keep him from fainting."

ledged, and to carry that to her as a token from him, and to let her know, That his heart was as full of comfort as it could be; and that before that piece should come to her hands, he should be with God in glory.

Being upon the ladder, he spake to the sheriff, saying, Sir, you have here slain one of the servants of God before mine eyes, and have made me to behold it, on purpose to terrify and discourage me, but God hath made it an ordinance to me for my strengthening and encouragement.

When he was going to die, he said, What flesh, art thou unwilling to go to God through the fire and jaws of death? Oh (said he) this is a good day, he is come that I have long looked for, and I shall be with him in glory, and so smiled when he went away.

What Mr. Peters said further at his execution, either in his speech or prayer, it could not be taken, in regard his voice was low at that time, and the people uncivil.

The EXECUTION of GREGORY CLEMENTS, the 17th of October, 1660, at the same place.

Mr. Clements was very silent both in the time of his imprisonment at Newgate, and at the time and place of his execution at Charing-cross, only it is said, that he expressed his trouble (to some friends in the prison) for yielding so far to the importunity of his relations, as to plead Guilty to the Indictment: and though he spoke little at the place of execution, yet (so far as could be judged by some discerning persons that were near him) he departed this life in peace.

Some Particulars of the BEHAVIOUR, and of the EXECUTION of Col. JOHN JONES, the 17th of October, 1660, at the same place.

The Copy of a Letter sent from Col. John Jones, when prisoner in the Tower of London, to a Relation.

I am very much grieved, to find (by the note I received from you) such dark and sad apprehensions upon your spirits concerning me: We are in the hands of the Lord, and what he hath appointed for us, will be our portion, and no man can frustrate his holy purpose concerning us; which I question not will be found to be in love, whatever appearance it may have to men. My advice is to you and all that love me, That (in case I be removed from you) you do not, neither in reality, nor outward garb, mourn for me; but rather rejoice, that my portion is in heaven; and that my dissolution or removal out of this earthly Tabernacle, is but in order to my cloathing with immortality, and possessing my eternal mansion; and to my being for ever with Christ, to behold his glory; and therefore that you do not behave yourself, as those that have no hopes but of this life.

Secondly, That you take off your mind from me, and fix it unmoveably upon your eternal relation, the Lord Jesus Christ, in whose glorious and blessed presence, we shall meet ere long, to our eternal rejoicing; It is the goodness of the Lord to us, to remove all creature comforts from us, that our souls might have no resting-place to delight in, or to promise them safety; until we return to the ark of his testimony, the bosom of his love manifested and exhibited for us in our blessed Lord Jesus Christ. I write in haste, therefore excuse my abruptness. Thine in sincere love, Tower, Sept. 19, 1660. JOHN JONES.

Let the first and last verses of Psalm 27, be constantly fixed upon thy mind.

Ver. 1. The Lord is my light and my salvation, whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid?

Ver. 14. Wait on the Lord, be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thy heart? wait I say on the Lord.

Some few living Sentences, that fell from a dying man, Col. John Jones, when he was in his chains in Newgate.

Observing one of col. Scroop's children weeping, he takes her by the hand, saying to her, You are weeping for your father, but suppose your father were to morrow to be king of France, and you were to tarry a little behind, would you weep so? Why he is going to reign with the King of kings, in everlasting glory.

Speaking to a friend, that was to have accompanied him into Ireland, Ah! dear heart (says he) thee and I were in that storm together, going to Ireland, and if we had gone this journey then, we had been in heaven to have welcomed honest Harrison and Carew; but we will be content to go after them, we will go after.

Speaking of those that were gone beyond the seas, (O dear hearts, says he) in what a sad condition are our dear friends beyond sea, where they may be hunted from place to place, and never be in safety, nor hear the voice of the turtle; how much have we gotten the start of them, for we are at a point, and are now going to heaven?

Speaking of the sledge in which he was to be carried to execution; it is (said he) like Elijah's fiery chariot, only it goes through Fleet-street.

The time of his departure being come, this aged gentleman was drawn in one sledge, with his aged companion colonel Scroop, whose grave and graceful countenances, accompanied with courage and cheerfulness, caused great admiration and compassion in the spectators, as they passed along the streets to Charing-cross, the place of their execution: And after the executioner had done his part upon three others that day, he was so drunk with blood, that like one surfeited, he grew sick at stomach; and not being able himself, he set his boy to finish the tragedy upon colonel Jones; who coming up the ladder with the like cheerfulness as his brethren did before him; and being placed fit for execution, he proceeded to speak as followeth:

Colonel John Jones's Speech upon the Ladder.

There are two things that are necessary now I am going through this narrow gate or passage to the eternal majesty; I say, two things are necessary as to the occasion of my coming hither to receive my Father's good pleasure.

1st, Peace with God. 2ndly, peace with man.

I shall speak something to each of these; and, in the first place, speak something of the Court wherein I received the sentence: it hath been reported, as I was told, that I confessed this fact, and confessed that I was guilty of murder, as under those several expressions that are in the Indictment, viz.

I desire to clear myself before the Lord, and before the world, in that particular; for should I grant that I was guilty in reality and truth of murder and malice, I should belye my own conscience, and draw upon me a greater weight than I could bear. But thus far I do confess, I was willing to make the work as short as I could; and because I would not stand so long, I told them I would take the first jury that came; and when a jury was called, then I did confess so much as I was convinced of, as to the matter of fact; I desire you will judge charitably of this that I speak at this time, as in the presence of the Lord, that it is not so really (viz. that I acknowledged myself guilty of murder), I had no such thing in my heart.

I must confess I very freely quit his majesty, considering what he doth in this case is the part of a loving son to a father, especially the judges telling him that it is, the law; and I conceive that the Court did nothing but what they, to their best understandings, judged right as to law; therefore I freely acquit the Court, though there was not enough said to satisfy such a poor creature as I am, in so great and deep a point as that was: as for all others, I do not know any man on the earth, to whom I do bear any malice, but I am in perfect charity with all men, and I hope the Lord is in charity with me: and therefore, as I desire to have forgiveness myself from all those I have offended, even so I do freely forgive all those that have in any measure offended me.

The next thing is towards God, and it is that which should be last upon my heart: it is not expected that I should give an account here of my state and condition, for that is betwixt God and my own soul; and I do, through the grace and goodness of God, firmly believe that my redemption is wrought, and my pardon is sealed, and that I shall be immediately in my father's arms, and that I shall be translated and brought to behold the Lord Jesus Christ in glory, with comfort and fulness of joy.

Then he betook himself to his prayers.

Col. Jones's Prayer.

"Blessed Lord God, thou art the great opener, open unto my soul the Lord Jesus Christ, who will lead me into the ways of truth and life; O God save me, make good all the pledges of thy love unto my soul; oh make all the promises which I have believed all the days of my life, make them now good unto my soul, giving me the full enjoyment of thyself: I desire to bless and praise thy name for this hour that thou hast brought me to, oh, what am I poor worm, that thou shouldst give me this opportunity to suffer for thy name, and to acknowledge thy mercies before so great a congregation at this place. Holy Father, Holy Father, oh that thou wouldest now rain down blessings from heaven upon thy poor creatures, that do hear and behold this action, this day; oh that thou wouldest sanctify this thing to them, and let poor England be a land of truth and happiness, O Lord let England flourish: and oh that thou wouldest make thy angel of light to go before thy people: good God we pray thee keep off those great judgments that hang over the heads of these nations, because they have sinned against thee: through thy name sanctify us, let not thy name be reproached. Dear Father, receive my soul, I am ready to come unto thee: blessed Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit: thou hast redeemed me, blessed be thy name, in that thou hast opened the treasures of thy love unto my poor soul. Thou hast given me this hope, whereof I need not be ashamed. Blessed be thy name, my spirit is full of joy. Oh Holy Father, holy Father, I pray thee let thy blessing come down upon thy poor people. Look upon me, Holy Father: stretch out thine arms to carry me over this brook. I pray thee stand by me, dear Father, I cast myself into thy hand, I commit my soul unto thee.

His prayers being ended, he said, Mr. Sheriff, I must needs return you many thanks for your civility.

Sher. Repl. I am glad to hear such an ingenuous confession, and that you make such an end, and that you have not gone into any reviling language, as some others have done before.

Some more Passages of Colonel John Jones in Prison.

Col. Jones, the night before he suffered, told a friend he had no other temptation upon him but this, lest he should be too much transported, and carried out to neglect and slight his life, so greatly was he satisfied to die in that cause.

The day he suffered, he grasped a friend in his arms, and said to him with some expressions of endearment, Farewell: I could wish thee in the same condition with myself, that thou mightest share with me in my joys.

After this he committed his soul to God, and was turned off.

Some Particulars of the BEHAVIOUR and of the EXECUTION of Colonel DANIEL AXTELL, and Col. FRANCIS HACKER, the 19th day of October, 1660, at Tyburn.

Being asked by some friends how he found himself fitted to encounter with death?

He answered, I can say nothing until I come to die, I dare not boast till I put off my armour, but desire your prayers until there be no more need of them.

Returning from his trial at the Court to his prison with a chearful countenance, and his wife coming to him full of trouble, he said, Not a tear, wife, what hurt have they done me, to send me sooner to heaven; and I bless the Lord I could have freely gone from the bar to the gibbet. They had nothing against me neither by God's law nor their own law to condemn me; was it ever known that a man should die for such words, and further said, though men had judged, yet God had not condemned.

Some taking notice of his coarse lodging, he said, what matter is it to have a little dirty way, when we have a fair house to come into.

Then looking upon friends about him, said, if the sight of so few of God's people be so comfortable, what will it be to enjoy all the saints in heaven together?

Towards the close of that evening he went to prayer, (divers being present who admired the blessed frame of spirit that he was in) admiring God in all his appearances for his poor people, he laid all his comfort in the blood of a crucified Christ, and upon the covenant of free grace; he did heartily desire pardon for all his judges, jury, and those witnesses that had sworn falsely against him.

Returning again from the Court when he had received his sentence, he came into the prison very chearfully with a bible in his hand, saying, I shall have the use of this book two days more, and then enjoy the fulness of the gospel to all eternity.

His daughter coming in to him, he said, Where hast thou been all this while, I thought thou hadst been ashamed of my chains; but they that will not bear the cross, shall not wear the crown.

A gentleman coming to visit him, said, shall I petition for your life? col. Axtell replied, Sir, you offer me to my loss.

The gentleman told him he was going for Ireland, col. Axtell said, Sir, pray remember my love to all Christian friends there, and tell them, said he, shaking of his chains rejoicingly, that you saw me in my chains, and I reckon all these links as so many pearls to adorn me, and I am sure they are so in Christ's account; and tell them that for that Good Old Cause which we were engaged in, under the parliament; I am now going to be their martyr; And as for the king, I wish him as well as my own soul. But they have merely murdered me, and they might as well have done it at the Tower, as have brought me hither to make this bustle; I wish my blood do not cry to the third and fourth generation. But I shall do them more hurt in my death, than I could do in my life. They had nothing in God's law nor their own to condemn me, the Court condemned me, but it was enough my name was Axtell. I wish that I may see them all in heaven.

A friend going into Gloucestershire, said to him, Sir, what message will you now send to the good people in the country?

Col. Axtell answered, remember my dear love to them all, and tell them that their prayers are answered. Bid them keep close to Christ, and let them not touch with surplis or Common Prayer Book; and bid them, whatever they do, love the image of Christ wherever they see it, in presbyterian, independent, baptized, or other; and take heed of striking in with any thing, that will strike out any of the offices of Jesus Christ.

Four of his fellow prisoners passed by his chamber door, as they were going forth to execution, and being denied sight of them, he called them by their names, and with a mighty fervent spirit, said, the Lord go with you, the angel of his presence stand by you, and then turning about to his friends, said, Oh! they are gone to heaven before me, but we will give them up to the Lord, and so went to prayer; and presently after he went to prayer again, saying, God hath said that he will make us joyful in the house of prayer: and many observed that he did perform the duty of prayer five times that day himself, wherein he laid himself very low before the Lord, acknowledging himself the worst of all the prisoners, and that he should have the least to say for God, and would say to his friends, say nothing of me till you see me on the uppermost round of the ladder.

His daughter coming in, he told her, that he had left Jesus Christ an executor in trust for her.

Having given an account to some persons for their satisfaction about his proceedings against the rebels in Ireland, said, I can say in humility, that God did use me as an instrument in my place, for the suppressing of that bloody enemy, and when I considered their bloody cruelty in murdering so many thousands of Protestants and innocent souls; that word was much upon my heart, Give her blood to drink, for she is worthy; and sometimes we neither gave nor took quarter, though self preservation would have said, give that which you may expect to have.

One coming in told him, that his fellow prisoners died nobly and chearfully, (Well, said he, but how do they stand?) Answer was made, upon a ladder. Blessed be God, said he, it is a Jacob's ladder.

The sun shining into the room, he said, if it be so glorious to behold the sun, what will it be to behold the son of glory.

Laying his hand upon (his fellow prisoner) col. Hacker, he said, Come brother, be not so sad, by this time to-morrow we shall be with our Father in glory, and what hurt will they do us to bring us through the cross to the crown. Well, our God is the God of Newgate.

Then the officer coming to carry them down into the dungeon, he took his leave of many of his friends then present, saying, Love the Lord Jesus, love the Lord, and weep not for me, for God hath wiped away all tears.

And coming to the door of the dungeon, said, I am now going to my bed of roses, my last bed.

Many friends being with him, there was an eminent godly minister of the Presbyterian way; and col. Axtell taking him by the hand, said, I have one word to speak to you, it is much upon my heart, that one great cause why the Lord contends thus with his people, is for want of their love towards them that were not of their minds; to which the minister replied, Truly, sir, I think so too, the Lord help us, that wherein we see we have done amiss, we may do so no more. Then said

Col. Axtell, I bless God I have not much to charge myself with in this matter.

Col. Hacker then said, but I have much to complain of in that matter.

Col. Axtell, afterwards sitting on his bed-side clapping his hands, said, if I had a thousand lives, I could lay them all down for the Cause.

Whereupon another godly minister then present, asked him, What he meant by the Cause?

Col. Axtell replied, Sir, I tell you, I mean that Cause which we were encouraged to, and engaged in under the parliament, which was for common right and freedom, and against the Surplice and Common-Prayer Book: and I tell you, that Surplice and Common-Prayer Book shall not stand long in England, for it is not of God.

And afterwards, thinking that he should not die that day, desired some retirement; but news coming that he must die within an hour, (though it was not so) he quickly made himself ready to go, and looking upon his gloves, said, These are my wedding gloves, my mortal must marry immortality.

Some friends going to see him the night before he was executed, found him at supper very cheerful, and many being present, he said, Take heed of temporizing, &c. for that hath been the occasion of great evil. Then speaking to an officer there present, that had continued till of late in the army, said, Brother, thou hast been greatly guilty herein, the Lord forgive thee, thou hast a great hand in this.

To which the person replied, I confess I have been so too much.

Col. Axtell answered, There is yet mercy for thee, if the Lord give thee repentance.

Moreover said, The Lord forgive that poor wretch, lieut. col. Huncks, for he hath sworn falsely in his evidence; and now is that word made good, that "Brother shall betray brother to death."

And speaking of col. Tomlinson, said, Ah! he hath appeared five pound lighter in twenty than I thought him to be.

And for col. Huncks, he was the uncivillest of all about the late king, and yet he comes in a witness against Hacker and me.

That evening many friends being with him, he prayed with them, and in that duty the Lord by his Spirit filled him with excellent expressions, to the great refreshing of those about him. And bewailing the great divisions amongst God's people, he said, Lord, if they will not live together in love, thou wilt make them lie together in sufferings. Then minding their present condition, said, Lord, death is the king of terrors to nature, but it is a believer's choice friend, it is thy highway to lead us into glory.

After prayer, taking notice of his daughter, he said to her, Get an interest in Christ, and keep close to him, he will be a better father to thee than I, and so took his leave of her.

The day of their Execution being come, several Godly Ministers spent some time in prayer with col. Axtell and col. Hacker; and many friends coming in to pay their last respects, col. Axtell seeing one of his familiar friends and companions, said, My dear brother, thou art better than I am, and yet I must go to heaven before thee for all that.

He very cheerfully said to divers then with him, Dear friends, rejoice, I am going where ye shall be also, yea, where we shall be for ever with the Lord, and never part, and be without any more change; I beseech you follow the Lamb wherever he goeth; though he may lead you in a harsh, dismal and difficult way, yet at last he will bring you into a pleasant path, and cause you to lie down in green pastures, in the land of rest; "Oh be faithful unto the death, and he will give you a crown of life," as he hath given to your suffering brethren.

Oh! all that we have, or do suffer, is but to make Christ and heaven more sweet, dear and glorious to us; all the sad steps we shall tread on this ladder, are but to mount us to heaven, for at the top are angels ready to receive us, as were on Jacob's ladder. All the things I meet with move me not, I bless my God, for I am sure to fight a good fight, and finish my course with joy.

Afterwards taking his leave of his son, embracing him in his arms, he said, My dear son, fare thee well, I must leave thee, get an interest in Christ, and love him, nothing else will stand thee in stead but an interest in him.

Then calling for his Bible, he hugged it, saying, This hath the whole Cause in it, and I may carry this without offence. And calling to a friend, he desired him to remember his love to the congregation, where he was a member; and after took his leave of all his friends, exhorting them with much cheerfulness to love the Lord Jesus Christ, and keep close to him, and so with great joy addressed himself to go to his next work.

Col. Francis Hacker was a man of few words, and had not the gift of oratory to deliver himself as others could, yet was very sweetly borne up under his sufferings, and had a very comfortable assurance that God had pardoned and accepted him in the blood of Christ; he had been a professor of religion many years in the Presbyterian way, and a great lover of Godly ministers; a man of just and honest conversation amongst men, and one that desired to walk blameless in the sight of God; his fellow-prisoner did say, he did believe that col. Hacker had an interest in Jesus Christ.

Col. Hacker declared to several of his own friends, a little before he suffered, that the greatest trouble he had upon his spirit was, That he had formerly borne too great a prejudice in his heart towards the good people of God that differed from him in judgment. And then broke forth into this admiration, O what am I, poor vile worm, that God should count me worthy to suffer with such precious souls as these are, against whom I have been formerly so much prejudiced!

And thus these two gracious persons having finished their course, and the time of their departure being at hand, were both brought forth out of prison. The sledge being ready for them, they took their leave of some friends that stood at the door, and col. Axtell desired them to be at the place of Execution; and both entering the sledge, they cast up their eyes towards that God to whom they were coming; then with a chearful countenance, setting themselves down, they were drawn to Tyburn, the place of Execution, where a cart was set ready, into which they both ascended, their countenance not at all changed, though now the king of terrors stared them in the face; the ropes being then put about their necks, and burning fire kindled before their face; and being ready to receive that sentence which nature would have sunk under, if grace had not supported: First col. Axtell applies himself to the Sheriff in these following words:

Mr. Sheriff, I am now, as you see, come to the place of Execution, according to my sentence, I desire your leave that I may speak freely, and without interruption; first to this people, and then to God, for it is the last that I shall speak in this world, and I hope it will redound to your account.

Mr. Sheriff's reply. Sir, you know what the Court prohibited you to speak, and what was spoken at the bar of the Court was there decided, therefore it is needless to repeat it here. I hope you will keep to the present business that concerns you, and not go out into impertinencies; and because you have but a little time, spend it to your best advantage, and the good of the people, and then you shall not be interrupted; [or to the same effect].

Col. Axtell begins. I say, the very cause for which I have engaged is contained in this Book of God, [having the Bible in his hand.] both in the civil and religious rights of it, which I leave to you, [giving the book to Mr. Knowles].

You see a dead man living, and yet I hope I shall live to all eternity, through the mediation of Jesus Christ, the mediator of the covenant of free grace.

I must truly tell you, that before these late wars, it pleased the Lord to call me by his grace, through the work of the ministry; and afterwards keeping a day of humiliation in fasting and prayer, with Mr. Simeon Ash, Mr. Love, Mr. Woodcocke, and other ministers in Lanrence-lane, they did so clearly state the cause of the parliament, that I was fully convinced in my own conscience of the justness of the war, and thereupon engaged in the parliament-service, which (as I did and do believe) was the cause of the Lord; I ventured my life freely for it, and now die for it.

Then Mr. Sheriff said to this purpose, Sir, remember yourself.

Colonel Axtell proceeds; After the work of the Lord was done in England, my lot cast me in the service of Ireland, and I thank the Lord I was serviceable to the English nation in that country, and have discharged my duty fully, according to the trust committed to me there.

As for the fact for which I now suffer, it is for words, only for words, and but for words, and the sentence is already reversed in my own conscience, and it will be reversed by Jesus Christ by and by; I pray God from the very bottom of my soul, to forgive all that have had any hand in my death, both witnesses and jury, and the Court that passed sentence; for considering the doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ, as he hath laid it down, Mat. v. 44. 'It hath been said of old time, love your neighbours, and hate your enemies; but I say unto you, love your enemies, and pray for them that hate and despitefully use you, that you may be the children of your Father which is in heaven.'

I desire, according to this doctrine, from the bottom of my heart, that God would give them true repentance, and not lay their sin to their charge, nor my blood, which by God's law and man's (I think) could not justly have been brought here to suffer: But I bless God I have some comfortable assurance that I shall be embraced in the arms of Christ, and have cause to hope that his spirit shall carry my soul into the Father's hands. And if the glory of this sunshine be so great (the Sun then shining bright) how much more is the glory of the Son of God, who is the Sun of Righteousness?

I think it convenient to give you some account of my faith. I believe all things written in the Old and New Testament, as the principles and doctrine of a believer's faith; I believe the blessed ordinances of Christ, that it is our duty to hear the word preached, to seek unto God in prayer, and to perform family duties, and to walk in the Communion of Saints; and for my own part, I am a member of a congregation, which I judge to be the way of Christ, (and were it for that only I were to die, I could witness to it) which is a company of men born again by his grace, that walk in the ways of Christ blameless and harmless. I believe Jesus Christ died for poor sinners, of whom I am chief, as the Apostle Paul saith, 'This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief.' And if the Apostle might say so, much more may I.

My friends and countrymen, I have reason to bewail my own unprofitable life, having been very unfruitful to the people of the Lord, the Lord knows I have much fault upon my heart; were it not for the blood of Christ that cleanseth and washeth me, according to his promise, saying, 'I loved you, and washed away your sins in my own blood.' For there is no remission of sins without the blood of Christ. I desire you all to lothe and cast off sin, it were better to suffer than to sin; it is better to die than to sin; nothing could grieve our Saviour but sin, and therefore have a care of that: You and I must meet one day at the bar of Christ, and the Son of God shall be our judge, for God hath committed all judgment to the Son, 'that all men should honour the Son as they honour the Father.' This day is a resemblance of that day, therefore be serious; I beg as much grace to your immortal souls as I expect to enjoy by and by. I beseech you beg of God that he would save your souls, and omit no opportunity through the strength of the Lord to believe, and put your trust in the Lord Jesus Christ; be sure to labour after assurance of your interest in him, or else you will be of all men most miserable; for I of all men were most miserable, if I had not believed to see the goodness of the Lord in the Land of the Living.

Blessed be the Lord that brings me into this state, let the way or means be what it will; it is God's sovereignty, who made these creatures so, to dispose of them how he pleaseth, and God hath ordained this death for me from all eternity. The Lord Christ often prayed, 'Thy will be done;' this is the Lord's will. He hath numbered my days, and my times are in his hand. Many seek the Ruler's favour, but every one's judgment is from the Lord. When Pilate said unto Christ, 'Knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee?' Christ answered him, 'Thou couldest have no power against me, except it were given thee from above.' Therefore I acknowledge the righteous hand of God; he is righteous, but I am sinful; 'Therefore will I bear God's indignation, because I have sinned against him.'

It is said of Jesus Christ, 'That for the joy set before him he endured the cross, and despised the shame, and is set down at the right hand of God,' where I hope to see him by and by in glory and majesty, and to see his angels and believers worshipping of him, and therefore I despise the shame. Our Saviour died upon the cross without sin, I am a sinful creature, a wretched sinner, and shall I expect better than he that was my master? He who was holy, and never had a sinful thought in all his life; and died not for himself, but for us, that we might live through his death; that through his poverty we might be made rich. And Christ having done this for his people, it should not be in their eyes thought a despicable thing that we should suffer for him, having been engaged in the work of God. But Christ must prevail in righteousness, and he will prevail.

Now, Mr. Sheriff, I thank you for your civility, and for this leave.

After this colonel Hacker spoke something privately to him, whereupon colonel Axtell said, Mr. Sheriff, must we both die together?

Mr. Sheriff answered, Yes.

Then colonel Hacker read a paper which he had in his hand, a copy whereof followeth:

"Friends and countrymen, all that have known me in my best estate, have not known me to be a man of oratory, and that God hath not given me the gift of utterance, as to others; therefore I have only this briefly to say unto you that are spectators: As the parliament stated the war, I did out of judgment and conscience join with them in the common cause, and have through grace been faithful to it according to my measure. And as for that which now I am condemned for, I do freely forgive both Judges, Jury, and Witnesses, and all others; and I thank the Lord, to whom I am now going, at whose tribunal I must render an account, I have nothing lies upon my conscience as guilt whereof I am now condemned, and do not doubt but to have the sentence reversed. I do now apply myself unto God by prayer, and do desire the hearty prayers of all that fear God, that I may have a sweet passage from this mortal life to that immortal life, which God hath prepared for all that are in Christ Jesus.

FRANCIS HACKER."

After the reading of this, he desired that col. Axtell would be both their mouths to God in prayer.

And then col. Axtell said, I desire all that fear the Lord to hear with patience, and to lift up their hearts to seek the Lord with me, that we may have his strength, and the presence of his spirit from this world to everlasting life.

The Prayer followeth:

Oh! blessed Lord, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who art the great God of Heaven and earth; Heaven is thy throne, and the earth thy footstool; thou upholdest all things with and by the word of thy power. The issues of life and death are in thy hand, O God. Blessed Lord, we pray thee let us have communion with thyself, and the glory of thy face, let the shining rays of Christ shine continually upon our souls. Lord, let there be no interposition between the brightness of thy glory and our souls, till we come into the fulness of the possession of it. Blessed Lord, we desire to take shame before thee and this multitude, for all our iniquities and transgressions: we were born and came great sinners into the world; the root of bitterness was in us, that flowed from that bitter fountain Adam: but thou, O Lord, hast been pleased to send the second Adam, that, as by the sin of one man death entered into the world, so by the obedience and righteousness of one, Jesus Christ, many should be made righteous. Blessed Lord, thou knowest all our original guilt, all upon our hearts, and upon our consciences, all our personal defilements and transgressions: we pray thee, Lord, wash them all away in the blood of Jesus Christ. Lord, we have nothing of our own to rely upon, but a Christ; for all our goodness and righteousness is but as polluted rags, and monstrous clothes. Therefore, O Lord, thou hast said, by the works of the law no man shall be justified, but by the righteousness of Christ Jesus. Therefore, O Lord, hold out the covenant of grace to poor believers, and make Jesus Christ the mediator of the covenant, to perform God's part to us, and our part towards God. Oh Lord, in thee are all our springs: thou art the fountain of all grace; let us have mercy and pardon from thee. Lord, it is by grace that any here are saved. Thou shouldest be a righteous God if thou shouldest not only suffer us to lie under the condemnation of man, but to exclude us from heaven and glory for ever.

But, Lord, if thou shouldest be strict to mark iniquity, who should stand in thy presence? But there is mercy with thee that thou mayest be feared. Lord, thou hast said, who is a God like unto thee? Pardoning iniquity, and passing by the transgressions of the remnant of thy people, for thy own name's sake. Lord, it is thy covenant, that thou wilt put thy spirit into our hearts, and write the law in our inward parts, and our sins and transgressions thou wilt remember no more. Blessed be the Lord for the Lord Jesus Christ; for had it not been for a Christ, we were undone for ever. Blessed be our Lord, that hath written our names in heaven, and given us a portion in Christ, in whom we have believed and trusted. We humbly beg of thee the pardon of all our personal and family guilt; the sins of our public employments, which thou knowest we have not willingly committed, though it may be through infirmity and temptation, and the sins of our nature. Lord, we humbly pray thee, let us see ourselves justified in the blood of our Lord Jesus, that we may say with the apostle, Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth us, it is Christ that died; yea, rather that is risen again for our justification. He is risen that he might be our advocate, intercessor, and mediator. He is filled with all the fulness of the Godhead, to distribute to us according to our need. Thou hast promised by the apostle, that God shall supply all our wants according to the riches of his own grace. Lord, thou wilt have the passover eaten with sour herbs, and Lord we are contented: but, Lord, thou hast provided sweet wine for us; and hast thou not kept the best wine, and the best of thy divine comforts until now? Till now? To carry us over this bridge, and passage from earth to heaven? Sanctify this our passage; for it is best to have the cross with the crown; they go together, and are inseparable: therefore saith our Lord, They that suffer with me, shall also reign with me.

Dear Lord, we pray thee give us a full evidence, and let thy Holy Spirit witness to our souls that we are the children of God, and reconciled to thee in the covenant; and that we shall through thy Son be glorified with thee. Strengthen our faith, that we may lay hold upon a naked Christ, that by his blood we may be purged, washed and cleansed; and for our justification, sanctification, and acceptation with the Father.

Glorious Lord, we desire to leave our requests with thee on the behalf of this poor people, as the last request we have to beg of thee on this side Heaven: If there be any here not belonging to Christ, and not friends to him, Lord convert them, and shew them their own undone and miserable estate, and give them the pardon of a dying Saviour, (thy poor servants would not part with a Christ for ten thousand lives.) Lord, make Christ precious to their immortal souls: Lord, convince them of the evil of their sins, and the evil of their own ways, and break them off from them, and cause them to close with Jesus Christ. Thou hast promised that those that come unto him, thou wilt not cast off. Remember all thy people, and help them to persevere in thy grace and love, and make them able to hold fast the truth till thou come; and to quit themselves like men, to stand fast in the faith.

Blessed Lord, we humbly pray thee to have mercy upon that great city, the place from whence we came. When thou resolvedst to destroy Sodom, thy servant Abraham expostulated with thee, and thou saidst, 'If there were but ten righteous thou wouldest save it:' but, Lord, there are many tens of righteous ones in that city. It hath been a place where thou hast been glorified, and where many godly ministers have been encouraged: O Lord, let it go well therefore with that great city, and let thy Gospel have free passage in the public worship of it. Bless the government and governors thereof, and make them instruments to thy glorious praise. We pray thee have respect to the chief magistrates that are come here by command to see execution done: Oh Lord, we beg mercy for their souls: Oh that Christ would evidence himself more to their souls, and that we might meet in heaven together, and be embraced in the arms of our Lord Jesus Christ. And him that shall be the executioner, and must now wash his hands in our blood, do thou wash his soul in the blood of Jesus Christ: O Lord, we pray thee that thou wouldest have pity upon his poor soul, and remember him in his low estate; and let him know what it is to be washed in the blood of Christ, that fountain set open for sin and for uncleanness.

Blessed Lord, help us thy poor creatures with strength, for we have no strength of our own. Thy word saith, that death is the king of terrors; but blessed be thy name, thou hast taken the sting out of it, and the poison from it; and therefore, as saith the Apostle, Oh death then, where is thy sting? Oh grave, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God, through Jesus Christ, that hath given us the victory. Thou hast said by the Apostle, We have the sentence of death in ourselves, and therefore should not trust in ourselves, but believe in Christ that raiseth the dead. Lord, we will not trust in ourselves, but in the living God——Oh my God, that art the God of Abraham, and Isaac, and of Jacob, strengthen and support our poor souls, Stephen when he was stoned to death, saw the heavens opened, and the glory of the Father and of his throne; shall we but see the face of Jesus Christ, bearing up our hearts under all, and we shall go through. Thou hast promised that thou wilt never, never, never leave us nor forsake us. Thou hast said, 'Who can separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus?' Can life? can death? or what can separate a believer from Jesus Christ? Let thy angels come down: we are persuaded that the angels are ready to receive our souls, and to carry them into thy bosom, and into the company of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and of the blessed Apostles and Martyrs and Witnesses of Jesus Christ, and just men made perfect in thy kingdom. Blessed Lord, thou art our support and comfort; support us with the cordials of thy love, O thou Father of mercies, and God of all consolations?

Blessed Lord, before we make an end of praying, we beg one request for the chief magistrate of this nation, That thou wouldest give him a glorious Christ into his poor soul, and magnify thy grace towards him, that he may become a friend unto Christ, and a friend to the people of Christ; and reign in righteousness; and may be a terror to evil-doers, and a praise to them that do well; that he may cast away iniquity with his eyes, and rule for God, before whom he and all others must render an account in the day of judgment. Lord hear us for him. And blessed Lord do the like for all that had any uncharitableness towards us; we would have none towards them, but we beg their souls might live in thy presence; make them to see their sins, and let them receive their pardon, that we might embrace one another through the grace of God, in Jesus Christ one day in heaven. Dear Father, we pray thee for them as we would beg for ourselves.

We now desire to resign up ourselves into thy bosom as it is thy command; thou hast said, 'Ye are bought with a price, not with silver or gold, but with the precious blood of Jesus Christ:' and we offer up our bodies and souls unto Christ, which is but a reasonable service, that thou shouldest have all when thou callest for them, our estates and lives themselves. The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof, and we are all his works: It is God's sovereignty to command whatsoever he pleaseth. Blessed Lord, we desire with our Lord Jesus, when he offered up himself upon the cross, he said unto thee, 'O Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit; and with Stephen when he was put to death, Lord Jesus receive my spirit.'

So say we, Lord Jesus receive our spirits: pity us, love us, and accept us, in thy Son, upon whom we rest for life and salvation. Lord, let us know that death is a passage into glory; it is appointed for all men once to die, and after death to judgment. This is a decree and statute-law of heaven, That all must die; and this is some comfort in our death, that from this time forward, we shall sin no more, grieve Christ no more, dishonour God no more, nor offend any else more; set thy love upon our souls, and let our prayers be dissolved into praises, where we may embrace thee, and thou embrace us.

We humbly intreat thee do more abundantly for us and all them we have prayed for, than we are able to ask or think, in the name, and for the sake, of our Lord Jesus, who is the intercessor with the Father, who hath promised that he will pray the Father for us; he is the mediator of the new covenant, betwixt God and us; our fullness, our strength, our comfort, and our support, our all: in his name we ask all our requests; to whom with thyself and thy holy spirit, we desire to give all honour, and glory, and praise, for evermore. Amen.

After he had ended his prayer, he gave the Sheriff thanks again for his civility; and then turning to colonel Hacker, they saluted and embraced each other in their arms, and said, The Lord sweeten our passage, and give us a happy meeting with himself in glory.

Then pulling his cap over his eyes, expecting, as is supposed, that the cart should be drawn away; with his hands lifted up, he uttered these words with a loud and audible voice, 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit.' But the cart staying a little longer, he lift up his hands the second time, and with the like audible and loud voice, said, 'Into thy hands, O Father! I commend my spirit.' And yet in regard there was no man found to put forward the horse to draw away the cart, until the common hangman came down out of the cart himself to do it; the carman, as many witnesses affirm, saying, he would lose his cart and horse before he would have a hand in hanging such a man; by this means he had opportunity to lift up his hands, and utter the like words the third time also.

One thing more is very remarkable. that when colonel Axtell and colonel Hacker were taken out of the sledge into the cart, the spectators being in great numbers there, behaved themselves very civilly, only two persons among them, as soon as the ropes were put about their necks, cried out very earnestly, Hang them, hang them, rogues, traitors, murderers; hangman, draw away the cart: whereupon a man that stood by them desired them to be civil, and said, Gentlemen, this is not civil, for the sheriff knoweth what he hath to do; and thereupon they were silent, and gave attention to colonel Axtell's speech and prayer; but before he had done, those very persons were so affected, that they could not refrain from pouring out many tears upon the place, went aside to a place a little more retired to weep; and that man that before desired them to be civil, went after them and beheld them, to his great admiration, as himself hath narrated.

Some Particulars of the BEHAVIOUR, and of the EXECUTION of Colonel ADRIAN SCROOP, October 17, 1660, at Charing Cross.

After his condemnation, one of his children hanging upon him, and weeping over him, he said, Peace child, peace, be still, not a word; thou hast a blessed portion; who would be troubled to die? for can any one have greater honour, than to have his soul carried up to heaven, upon the wings of the prayers of so many saints?

When the jailor called him, and Mr. Scot, Mr. Jones, and Mr. Clement, to go to the dungeon, saying, gentlemen, you must go to the room where Mr. Harrison was. Says colonel Scroop, must we all go? He replied, Yes. At which, laying his hand on his breast, and elevating his eyes, with a serious countenance, said, Blessed be God that we are not parted.

As he sat at dinner he spoke to a minister that was with them, saying, I would speak it for the glory of God's free grace, and the comfort of you all, that my sins are all pardoned; not one unpardoned: and God hath loved me with an everlasting love; and in the strength of this, will I go to heaven.

Speaking to some friends that came to visit him, said, I desire all the people of God, to look at the Lord's hand in this dispensation, and own his sovereignty; speak well of him, whatever he doth; lie at his feet with your mouths in the dust; and live more in love and unity one with another.

A tall gentleman coming into the dungeon to see col. Scroop, the night before he died, said to him, Uncle, I am sorry to see you in this condition, and would desire you to repent of the fact, for which you are brought hither, and stand to the king's mercy; and more words to the same effect. Whereupon col. Scroop put forth his hand, and thrust him from him, using these words, Avoid Satan.

When the time approached for his execution, Mr. Scot and Mr. Clement were first carried away in the sleds, and the same sleds was afterwards to come and carry col. Scroop, and col. Jones: during that time, says col. Scroop, Well, brother Jones, do you spend your time as the Lord shall direct you, I intend to take a little sleep, for I slept not well the last night; and my countenance is not so fresh as I would have it. Thereupon he laid him down, and slept so soundly, that he snored very loud, and so continued until the sled came for him: whereupon, being awakened, he riseth up; and a friend taking him in his arms asked him how he did? he answers, Very well, I thank God, never better in all my life.

And now, saith he, will I wash mine hands in innocency, so will I compass thine altar, O Lord: and so with great cheerfulness went to execution.

Colonel Adrian Scroop, and colonel John Jones (two comely ancient gentlemen) were both drawn upon that sled which carried Mr. Scot; and being come to Charing-cross, the place of execution, col. Scroop was first brought up to the ladder, where he spake as followeth:

Col. Scroop's Speech at Execution, October 17, 1660.

You see an object here, that hath been in a better place; but howsoever the Lord Jesus Christ hath sent me to this place, that in this place I should die. I have no animosity nor malice against any man, nor ever had I; neither have I any evil will to those that brought me hither, nor to the jury that found me guilty, nor judges that passed sentence; nor to him through whose means I was brought here to suffer. I say, once more, the Lord forgive him, I shall not name him; for I come not hither to reflect upon any man's person.

I will not tell you what my breeding hath been, because it is not good for any man (especially at such a time as this) to boast of his lineage nor breeding; but this I shall say, that I was born and bred a gentleman.

As for my carriage, it may be some that looks upon me here, knows what it hath been: Howsoever the Lord knows all, and the Lord God is Judge of all, and he will judge; I shall submit myself to his judgment, which is a righteous judgment. The judgment of men may go wrong, but God's judgment is right, I shall submit to his way. The Lord is the rock of ages, and my support under this great weight that is now upon me: I look up to him alone, the Lord Jesus Christ is my Saviour and my Redeemer; I am going into his arms, blessed be his name, I follow him, he is gone before me the same way: Therefore it is no reproach or shame to follow the Lord Jesus Christ, to die in his cause; for that is it which I judge I am now going to do.

That which I do desire of you (here are a great many spectators both on the right hand and on the left) is, That this day may represent to you, the general day of the judgment of Christ, where you must appear, and there every man must receive according to their works: And at that time it will be known; I say, at that time it will be known and seen; whose works are righteous, and whose are not; Therefore I would wish you, and desire you, to judge charitably of me.

Some more Passages of Col. Scroop.

Colonel Scroop, when a friend asked him at parting, the same day, how he did, answered him, Better and better, I thank God, every moment, my life doubles upon me, and multiplies.

He also heard him say, when mention was made, that there was some endeavours for his pardon, That only would prove a snare to him, but he was fully satisfied what to do, and should not to save his life, do any thing to prejudice his conscience.

He also heard him when one was discoursing to him the happiness of heaven, and telling him it consisted in three things, viz. A perfect communion with God; A perfect conformity to God; And a perfect enjoyment of God. He made this reply, Those three things you mention are but one, we are entering into it, and can tell. And that friend asking him further about it, he said, That God was but one pure act, and in whom there was no succession nor distinction of acts; and that souls led forth in his spirit, were in a manner made like to him: for their enjoying was their conformity and communion, and one was all: In which he seemed to be swallowed up, and even then got so far into heaven, that all seemed to be but one act with him.

Some friends being present, heard both him and col. Jones say; You can say, God is better than all the world, and say it truly; but you cannot say it with so much feeling and experience, as we now can: we find he is so indeed.

Col. Scroop having given a brief account of himself to the people, his last work was, to give up himself to God in prayer, as followeth:

"O Lord, thou art my Father, a present help in trouble; Thou art my Father, I believe in thee: I come unto thee, Lord Jesus, that went unto thy Father, and my Father, thy God and my God; and this is that which doth support my spirit, and enable me to undergo this death with cheerfulness and readiness. Lord, thou knowest my heart and affections, and my desires, Oh deal not with me according to my sins, I am a miserable wretched sinner; If thou enter into judgment, who is able to stand before thee? but there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared. O Lord let it be known and seen, that there hath not been any heart in me, to do any thing with malice or revenge, or that might shew any revenge: if there be any revenge on the other side, the Lord lay it not to their charge. The Lord bless those in authority, the Lord bless his majesty that he may reign prosperously, and that he may receive a blessing from the hand of the Lord. O Lord, thou seest my failings, my infirmities and weaknesses: O Lord, I beseech thee that thou wouldst bear with me, thou art a tender-hearted Father; Thou art my strength: When my heart and my strength faileth, then thou art the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever, O Lord be with me in this hour of temptation, and carry me through it; for thou art my God and my Father, into whose hands I commend my spirit, for thou hast redeemed me."

After which he was turned off.

The Trials, Behaviour, and Dying Speeches of Colonel OKEY, Col. BARKSTEAD, and MILES CORBET, esq. April, 1662.* [Published by their Friends.]

COLONEL OKEY, colonel Barkstead, and Miles Corbet, esquire, being involved in one and the same danger, did, since the king's coming in, ship themselves for Holland, after many great difficulties and hazards. Two of them, viz. col. Barkstead, and col. Okey, after a short stay in Holland, travelled up higher into the country, and at length settled themselves at a town call-

* Ludlow's account is as follows:

"Colonel John Barkstead and colonel Okey, with colonel Walton and colonel Dixwel, who had been commissioners in the high court of justice at the trial of the late king, having made their escape from England into Germany, were received into protection at Hanau, and made burgesses of the town. Of these, colonel Barkstead and colonel Okey took a journey to Holland, to meet some relations who were contented to banish themselves with them, and to conduct them to the place which they had chosen for their residence. But one Mr. George Downing, who was agent for the king in Holland, and had formerly been a preacher, and chaplain to colonel Okey's regiment, having received information that such persons were in that country, obtained an order from the States-General for their seizure; by virtue of which they were taken, together with Mr. Miles Corbet, one of the king's judges also, sent into England in a ship of war, and committed prisoners to the Tower. Two things seemed especially remarkable in this action; the treachery of Downing, after he had given assurance to a person sent to him by colonel Okey to that end, that he had no orders to look after him; but chiefly the barbarous part acted by the States in this conjuncture; who, though they had themselves shaken off the yoke of tyranny, and to that time had made it a fundamental maxim, to receive and protect all those who should come among them; yet contrary to the principles of their government, and the interest of their commonwealth, to say nothing of the laws of God, nature and nations, without any previous engagement to the court of England, contributed as much as in them lay to the destruction of these gentlemen. But a treaty was to be made with England, and their trade secured at any rate, though the foundations should be laid in blood.

"Mr. Miles Corbet was a gentleman of an ancient family in the county of Norfolk. He had applied himself with diligence to the study of the laws of England in the society of Lincoln's-inn; and, for the space of thirty-seven years, had been chosen to serve his country in the several parliaments that were called. Being appointed one of the high court of justice for the trial of the late king, he appeared not among the judges, by reason of some scruples he had entertained, till the day that sentence was pronounced. But, upon more mature deed Hana, in High Germany, where by their good carriage and obliging conversation, they obtained the favour and privilege to be enrolled free burghers of the said town. They continued there for many months, in good esteem with the inhabitants, and with great endearment of affections to each other. Some urgent occasions inviting col. Barkstead to return for Holland, col. Okey, out of mere kindness and respect to his friend, resolves to accompany him, and so both of them took their first conveniency for Holland; having before received encouragement to undertake the voyage, from a friend, whom they had employed to solicit the States General, that they might abide for a short time within their jurisdiction, unmolested, to which, as their friend informed them, they did most freely and willingly condescend. Another also was more particularly engaged by col. Okey, to acquaint sir George Downing (the king's resident now in Holland,) with their intentions of coming speedily into that country in case they might, for a few days, remain there in safety, liberation, finding them to be of no weight, he durst no longer absent himself; coming early on that day into the court, that he might give a public testimony of his satisfaction and concurrence with their proceedings. He was afterwards by the parliament made one of their commissioners for the civil government of Ireland; in which employment he manifested such integrity, that though he was continued for many years in that station, yet he impaired his own estate for the public service, whilst he was the greatest husband of the treasure of the commonwealth. The day before his death, he assured his friends, that he was so thoroughly convinced of the justice and necessity of that action for which he was to die, that if the things had been yet entire, and to do, he could not refuse to act as he had done, without affronting his reason, and opposing himself to the dictates of his conscience; adding, that the immoralities, lewdness, and corruptions of all sorts, which had been introduced and encouraged since the late revolution, were no inconsiderable justification of those proceedings.

“Colonel John Barkstead was a citizen and goldsmith of London, who, being sensible of the invasions that had been made upon the liberties of the nation, took arms among the first for their defence, in the quality of captain to a foot company in the regiment of colonel Venn. He had not been long in this employment, before his merit advanced him to the degree of a major; in which station he was made governor of Reading: and afterwards being preferred to the command of a regiment, he was constituted by the parliament, in consideration of his services, Lieutenant of the Tower of London. When he was brought to confirm with the testimony of his blood that cause for which he had fought, he performed that part with cheerfulness and courage, no way derogating from the character of a soldier and a true Englishman.

and that he had no order from the king his master to seize them: Sir George did assure that gentleman, that he had no order from the king to apprehend or molest them, but that they might be as free and safe there as himself. Upon this last encouragement they did very much depend, col. Okey especially being confident that sir George Downing had a particular kindness for him, who gave him his first bread in England. This generous and plain-hearted colonel (who took a measure of all men by himself,) did, without the least hesitation, repose a great deal of trust and confidence in one whom he had been instrumental to raise from the dust. They had not been long in Holland before their occasions called them to Delft, whereof the forementioned knight had timely notice by one of his spies employed for that purpose, and having in readiness a warrant from the States General for the seizing of them, the knight, and his ruffianly crew, without the least sense of humanity or honour, having certain knowledge of their arrival at Delft, did, the “Col. — Okey was also a citizen of London, and one of those who appeared early in the service of the parliament. He had been first a captain of foot, then a captain of horse, and afterwards major in the regiment of sir Arthur Haslerig. In the year 1645, at the time when the army was new modelled, he was made colonel of a regiment of dragoons, which was afterwards converted into a regiment of horse. In these employments he distinguished himself by his courage, conduct, and fidelity; and, during the usurpation of Oliver Cromwell, was dismissed from his command in the army, on account of his affection to the commonwealth. He was chosen by the county of Bedford to represent and serve them in the convention that was called by Richard; and, after the restitution of the great parliament, they restored him to his command in the army. Being ready to suffer for that cause which he had strenuously defended, he said in the presence of many witnesses, that if he had as many lives as he had hairs on his head, he would willingly hazard them all on the same account. The sentence against these three gentlemen having been executed on the 19th of April 1662, the king bestowed the body of colonel Okey upon his wife, to dispose as she thought fit. Upon which she ordered him to be interred at Stepney, where his first wife lay in a vault that he had purchased for himself and family. But the report of this funeral being spread among the people, several thousands of them assembled themselves in and about Newgate market, where the body lay, resolving to attend it to the grave. And though they behaved themselves with decency and modesty; yet the king, upon notice of this appearance, was so alarmed, that he revoked his grant to the colonel's wife, dispatched orders to the sheriff to disperse the company, and commanded the body to be interred in the Tower.” 3 Ludlow, 82.

very same night, proceed upon their design, and took them at their lodging, together with Mr. Corbet, who, upon notice had that they were in town, went only to give them a visit, and it being late, was even ready to take his leave of them. When they were all three thus seized, immediately they were hurried to prison, and by the procurement of sir George Downing, were most barbarously used, having shackles and fetters put upon them, and so cast into a nasty, moist, and dark dungeon, having nothing else but the damp earth to repose upon, and there continued all night, till two of the clock the next day, in a very sad condition; but afterwards, being treated a little more like men, some of the States came to them into the prison, bringing one of their chief ministers with them, and between examining of them, and discoursing with them concerning the fact for which they were seized, and the cause in which they were formerly engaged in England, where-in col. Barkstead especially gave them such satisfaction, that all of them, and particularly the minister, when they took their leaves of them, seemed to have a better opinion both of their persons and their cause, than they had before; and did withal give them assurance, that they should not be delivered up, to be sent for England, until they had had a more public hearing of what they could say in their own defence. But by the extreme officiousness of sir George Downing, and his continued solicitations, accompanied (as is reported) with strange menaces, these persons were soon after, (not only contrary to the particular engagements of the lords before-mentioned; but also against the very laws of nations, and of all human society and commerce, yea, against their own former practice, in the case of Ravillac, who murdered the king of France,) by order from the States General, at two of the clock in the morning, taken out of prison, and being manacled with wrist irons, chains, and locks, were thrust into a vessel lying at Delft, and from thence conveyed into one of the king of England's frigates, provided for the purpose, and so in a few days were brought for England. When they arrived at the Tower of London, they were forthwith disposed of, by order of the Lieutenant, to their several prison lodgings, and there continued until the 16th of April, 1662, upon which day they were carried up by water to the King's-Bench bar, to receive judgment, having been already, by act of parliament, attainted of High Treason, for compassing the death of the late king Charles the First. After a very short dispute, whether the prisoners at the bar were the persons named in the fore-mentioned act of attainder, yea or no? Witnesses being produced, who made full proof in the affirmative, and the prisoners themselves confessing it, the Jury, without going from the bar, gave in their verdict; that they were the persons named in the said act, whereupon Judgment was given against them accordingly. After Sentence was given, they were remanded back to the Tower.

Colonel Barkstead's Behaviour.

The morning of his Execution being far spent in discoursing with his friends, the sledge, about eight o'clock, came into the Tower, which making a great noise upon the stones, he ran to the window with a smiling countenance to view them, and said, Oh! our chariots are now come! A little while after the sledge came, the gentleman porter, or some other officer in the Tower, came to acquaint him with it, desiring him to prepare for his departure: to which he rejoicingly answered, That blessed be God, it was not then to do; and so, with much cheerfulness, he committed his wife into the hands of the Lord God Almighty, resting upon his promise, That he will be a father to the fatherless, and a husband to the widow. A little before his departure, he desired his wife to button on his cloak, which accordingly she did, and presently the gentleman-jailor, and a file of soldiers came, by the Lieutenant's order, and received him; at which time he parted with his wife and relations, as himself professed, with as much joy as ever he received them. Now being brought by the jailor to the Lieutenant's door, that being the place appointed for the sledge to receive them; and although it was the place and house in which he lived in plenty and honour, yet he had so much estranged himself unto it, that he did not so much as cast his eye upon it; and no wonder, if his treasure were in heaven, that his heart was there also. He was appointed the first that should enter the sledge, and so to be drawn the foremost of the three through the city. Having thus entered the sledge, he sat down, and looking about him with a cheerful countenance, and speaking comfortable words to such friends as were near him, after a-while, the sledges were ordered to be drawn away, which accordingly was performed; and coming down the Church-Hill, opposite to his prison, (alias his palace), his wife, with some other friends, standing at the window, took her handkerchief out of her pocket, and shook it at him, which he perceiving, took off his hat, and several times shaking it over his head, cried out with an astonishing cheerfulness, To heaven, to heaven, to heaven, my love, and leave you in the storm! Thus passing along, he came to the Tower-Gate, where some reviled him in words and carriages, not only his enemies, but his former intimate friends, which he rather smiled than was troubled at. Near Holborn there came a young woman to him, being very earnest to speak to him, which the officers permitted; all that she told him she had to say to him was this, That whatsoever he did, she begged of him to go on cheerfully in so glorious a cause. Several spoke to him in the same manner: And though he met with some revilers in the way, yet the number of his friends, and of such as blessed him, and the rest in the name of the Lord, far exceeded them. As he passed along, several times, a friend that accompanied him, asked him how he did? Who told him, He was never better in all his life, and that he grew stronger and stronger every moment. And going up Holborn, being in discourse with the same friend, he, with a smiling countenance, told him, That he evidently saw Jesus Christ coming down the hill to receive and embrace him; and that this hour's difficulty, that he was now to go through, was not to be mentioned with that glory he was to enjoy. When he came near the place of Execution, the multitude of people increasing, they could not bring the sledge near the gallows, so the Sheriff ordered that he should be brought on foot, which accordingly was performed; and a cart standing ready under the gallows, he cheerfully got into it; before which, some of his friends took their leave of him, he leaving this word of counsel with them, To trust in that God, that hath promised never to leave nor forsake those that trust in him.

Being entered the cart, the Executioner tied his hands with black ribbons, taking off his periwig, and putting on his cap. The Sheriff told him, that he would permit him to say any thing between God and himself, but nothing in justification of the act: but he refused to say any thing till col. Okey came, which was immediately after.

Several reviled him at the place of Execution; amongst the rest, the lord ———, bidding him (in a scoffing way) Good-bay, Barkstead, Good-bay! To which, with a smile, he returned this answer, Sir, you are no gentleman, to triumph over a dying man.

Another thing observable was, that a courser, by way of derision, told him, O Barkstead! you have got the comforter! (meaning a little strong-water bottle that he had in his hand) To which he replied, That blessed be God, he had a better comforter than that, or else he should not be able to stand there so cheerfully as he did.

To conclude, all his carriages and actions were exceeding cheerful, going through those difficulties he met with, with an undaunted resolution, to the admiration and astonishment of his enemies, and the great rejoicing of his friends, who had before earnestly besought the Lord to vouchsafe his comforting and assisting presence to him.

Colonel John Okey's Behaviour.

On Wednesday the 16th of April, 1662, being the day that col. Barkstead, col. Okey, and Mr. Corbet had sentence passed upon them at the King's-Bench bar, after which a friend went to visit col. Okey, and found him in a sweet and blessed frame of spirit, and very cheerful, not in the least under any discouragement, but acquainted the said friend, that they had been up at Westminster, and that sentence was given against them; and declared he was not in the least disquieted at it, but thankfully owned the Providence of God, in bringing them from the place where they were beyond sea, to their present condition, wherein he professed himself to be much satisfied, and declared, he had rather lay down his life here, than to have been buried in another nation; and expressed further, That for what he was charged withal and condemned, he had not the least trouble upon his spirit. He also told this friend, That he desired to bless God for the prayers of the Lord's people, for he found the benefit and advantage of them in this time of his trial. And with much cheerfulness of spirit, afterwards he did bless the Lord for his goodness to him, declaring he had got more benefit and advantage in the time of these his troubles, than in many years before; and one day especially, since his coming into the Tower, he said, He was reading some verses in the xvth chapter of John, and the Lord did so set home upon his spirit, ver. 26, 27, especially that word, "The Father himself loveth you," that he was so much refreshed in his soul, that for an hour together he was, as it were, ravished with the joy of the Lord; the sight of which was much comfort to his dear wife, and did much refresh and cheer her spirit.

And upon Friday, the day before his suffering, several friends went unto him about one o'clock, and were with him some hours; he several times spake to them, saying, Well, friends, I shall now get to heaven before you, and shall go out of a sinful, evil world, into that place where I shall sin no more, nor sorrow any more; I bless the Lord, he is good to me in all his dispensations, and I could not have been without any of these afflictions. Then he mentioned divers choice places of Scripture, as 2 Cor. iv. 8, 9, and the 19th verse, explaining the words to sweet advantage: As for afflictions, said he, they are but slight and momentary, and that they work to glory, yea, an exceeding, yea, a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory: And much strengthening himself with the promises of God, Isaiah xlii. 1, 2, upon which Scripture he did thus descant: Though Jacob was but a worm, and so trodden upon by every one, yet the Lord would be with him, and so with all his saints and people in their sufferings. He insisted also upon that Scripture, Heb. xiii. 5, 6, together with many others, which were proper to his condition, and the Lord was pleased to make every one of them a strengthening cordial to him.

The day of execution, several friends went to col. Okey, by six of the clock in the morning, where they found him ready dressed, and with a sweet, cheerful spirit bid them welcome. They asked how he did; he said, never better in his life, and had found the benefit of prayers, and it had been a sweet night unto him, being sweetly refreshed, which also did much appear by his cheerful and fresh countenance; for it was observed, that he never looked better in all his days. He declared he had much quietness in his spirit; and said, as for the loss of his estate, it did not in the least trouble him: Then a friend hinted to him, the parting with his wife and relations; he answered, she had been a very tender wife to him, and had expressed her abundant love and tenderness in this his distress ; but he was not in the least troubled at their parting, being assured the Lord would be better to her than he could be ; and also said, that though his wife had lost much since she knew him, as to outwards, yet she had gained much, as to the better concerns, (for so his wife had declared unto him) which doubtless, well considered, will out-weigh all other losses. Some of these friends spent some time in prayer with him ; also the colonel himself went to prayer, and the Lord appeared very much in carrying forth his spirit to own his hand, and to see his goodness in all his dispensations, and to implore further assistance : And between the times of prayer, they had much sweet conference with him, in all which he manifested a very gracious and holy frame of spirit, and often declared, with great cheerfulness, that he was ready to be offered up. He was heard often to ask, whether his chariot was yet come, or no ? And some friends told him, Well, now the time draws nigh ; who answered, I am ready, I am ready. Then came the order for his going to the sledge ; upon which he went with all cheerfulness, and so went forward with undaunted courage, to meet death in the face, like a Christian soldier, indeed ; who, through the Lord's assistance, presently obtained more than a conquest over all his enemies.

As he was in the sledge, and drew near to the place of execution, a friend came to him, and said, Sir, I have a great desire to know how it is with you, and how the Lord is pleased to manifest himself unto you, in the condition you are now in. The colonel replied, friend, I thank you, I bless the Lord I have great cause to praise and magnify his great and glorious name, for his unspeakable goodness towards me, especially in this present dispensation ; for I can truly say, and that by experience, that the goodness of the Lord endures for ever : and praised be God for this present trial ! The same friend further replied, and said, I pray, sir, are you not at all dejected in your spirits ? Are you not cast down in your mind ? Have you not hard thoughts of God for this his strange providence towards you ? The colonel replied, friend, I shall endeavour to satisfy you as well as I can in this matter ; and I let you know, that I have not the least trouble upon my heart, nor the least burden upon my spirit, upon the account of my suffering ; neither have I any hard thoughts of God, but, on the contrary, can speak to the praise of his grace, that his goodness hath carried me forth above the fear of all these things. And, my friend, let me tell you further, that I have had more experience of God, and more acquaintance with God, within these three or four days, than ever I had in all my life ; and at this present, I am so far from being dejected, or cast down in my spirits, as that I am so much elevated and lifted up in my soul that I am not able to tell you how it is with me.

And when he was ready to rise out of the sledge, another friend came to him, and asked him how he did ? To whom he answered, I bless the Lord, I am very well, and do no more value what I am now going about, than this straw : (taking a piece of straw in his hand.) I have, says he, made many a charge in my time, but now I have but one charge more to make, and then I shall be at rest.

Mr. Corbet's Account of the Proceedings against him at Westminster.

Thursday, April 17, some of his near relations and friends came to visit him, and having heard some malicious reports to his prejudice, as that he had denied his name, and not owned himself to be the person that was mentioned in the act, when he was at Westminster, at the King's Bench bar ; earnestly desired him to let them know the truth of things from his own mouth : To which he readily answered, that he was much misunderstood, and wrongfully represented, if any said so of him : and moreover said that, he blessed God, he was neither ashamed of his name, nor of his cause, nor of his master, and hoped never should ; and then related as followeth.

That his brethren, col. Barkstead, col. Okey, and himself, being brought before their judges, were there called all by their names, to which they made answer, and, as they were bid, held up their hands. Then the question being put, what they had to say for themselves concerning the fact which they stood there arraigned for, and which they were charged with in the act of parliament, at that time read before them ? Mr. Corbet answered, He did not take himself to be the person named in the said act, for that he did never maliciously, wickedly, and traitorously imagine, contrive, or endeavour to murder the late king, as was there charged upon him in the said act, and therefore desired them to prove it. What ! (said some on the bench) will you deny your names now ? Did you not answer to, and hold up your hands at those names ? To which col. Okey made answer (not understanding Mr. Corbet's drift, which was to have a proof made, that they were guilty, in manner and form as the act expresseth it), he would never deny his name for the matter : no more will I, saith Mr. Corbet, neither do I ; but may there not be more men of my name, saith Mr. Corbet, that perhaps may have been guilty of malice against the king ? though for my own part I never was. Then col. Okey began to perceive his mistake, and col. Barkstead also ; who being thus rectified, Mr. Corbet proceeded and told the judge, it was true, they were called by their right names, and did accordingly own them ; yet, saith he, it doth not judicially appear to this Court, that we are the persons meant in the act (putting an emphasis on the word 'judicially'). No, saith one, the parliament hath adjudged it, and you are the man ; yet however, said some, let a jury be empannelled : and then the Attorney-General saying, that he was ready for a trial, a jury was called, against which no exceptions being made, evidences were taken, and they found guilty.* The judge then asked again, what they had now to say, why Sentence should not pass? Mr. Corbet replied, he humbly conceived the proceedings of the Court were not regular, nor agreeable to former precedents; for according to law, there ought first to be an Indictment, an Information, and Scire Facias, (as was in the case of sir Walter Raleigh) all which were pre-requisite to an issue in law, as their lordships well knew; so that here was a conclusion without premises: yet if it should please the judges to over-rule it, he was contented (carrying himself with much reverence

* The King v. Okey, Barkstead and Corbet.

"They having been attainted by act of parliament, for the murder of king Charles the first, being three of his Judges, which sate in the High Court of Justice, as they called it, and having escaped, and being retaken and brought to the bar, and demanded whether they were the same persons in the Act mentioned? They said, they were of the same names, but there might be divers persons of the same names: but they (further) said, that the Court ought not to proceed against them, without having a Record of their Attainder here in Court, as was done in sir Walter Raleigh's Case, where the Indictment, though long before was (made) a Record of this Court, and produced; and thereupon the Record of the Act of their Attainder being removed by a Certiorari, into Chancery, and thence sent hither by a Mittimus, was read unto them; whereupon they pleaded, that they were not the same persons; and issue was taken thereon, and a Jury returned immediately to try it, which was done, and they were not permitted to challenge peremptorily; for they were not now to be tried for the treasons, but (only) of the identity of persons, and the Jury found them the same persons; and thereupon Sentence of Execution was immediately given, and three or four days afterward they were executed at Tyburn." Levinz's Reports, vol. 1, p. 61.

Keling's Reports, p. 13. "Memorandum, that in Easter Term, 14 Car. 2. John Barkstead, John Okey, and Miles Corbet, three of those persons who presumed to judge the late king to death, were apprehended, they then being outlawed upon the former Indictment; and they were brought to the King's-Bench bar, and demanded severally, what they could say, why Execution should not be awarded against them (after the Indictment was first read to them)? And they pleaded, they were not the same persons; and thereupon, the same day, a Jury was presently returned, the Court sitting, and they found they were the same persons, and so Execution awarded, which was after done accordingly."

Note, So is the Report in the Manuscript, but the Record is of an Attainder by Act of Parliament; but there might be an Outlawry also.

and respect unto the Court). To which either the Attorney-General, or some other, replied, That Mr. Corbet said truth, as to ordinary proceedings, but here it was extraordinary, viz. by act of parliament in a Bill of Attainder; and then cited a book case of one Stafford, who was thus proceeded against, sentenced and executed in Henry the 7th's time. To which Mr. Corbet replied again, he had nothing to say to that, but what the authority of the nation had made law, he must submit to; and did acknowledge, as things stood, they did proceed according to the rules given them, and in that respect did what was just, according to the present law. But did you not confess the fact, saith one, by your own flight? It being a known maxim, 'Qui fugam facit fatetur facinus.' To which col. Barkstead answered, that he, for his part, fled for fear of an arrest, threatened against him for 20,000*l.* for pretended false imprisonment. Mr. Corbet said, that he, for his part, did not fly for twelve years together after the fact done, and that any body who had a mind to it, might easily have seized him, it being well known where he was all that time; and when he did fly, it was not prohibited, nor any way unlawful, as conceived, for himself, or others, so to do; and now that he was returned again, he knew not that he was an out-lawed person, and, if occasion had been, could have been ready to have traversed any suit commenced against him. And as for what he had done in this business, that there he stood accused for, he said, he was engaged in it by the then supreme public authority of the nation, the lawfulness of which authority, he said, at that time, was every where acknowledged and reputed so to be; and had he not this to plead for himself, he should then have thought, that what was done by himself and others, had been very wicked and abominable: but the authority being, since that time, changed, and new laws made, by which, both the fact, and the power itself too, by virtue of which it was done, are both said to have been invalid, (though the law-makers, at that time, did not think so,) he had nothing further to add.

This is a true relation of this matter, as near as possibly can be, taken from his own mouth; if any mistake be in a word ignorantly related, or sentence misplaced, the reader is desired to pardon it.

This Mr. Corbet having been heretofore bred at Lincoln's-Inn, and known to be a good lawyer, and late Lord Chief Baron in Ireland, and also much acquainted, by long experience, with affairs of state, as having been a member in all the parliaments that have sat since the beginning of the late king's reign; and being also further known to have been an ancient and long-experienced, sound Christian, a man of a very tender conscience, and of an holy life and conversation, and that as well in his greatest prosperity, as in his adversity; it was the earnest desire of many, even of all parties that knew him, fully and clearly to understand from his own mouth (especially now in this time of his affliction) what inward peace, quiet, and satisfaction he had in his own conscience, touching that act which he was condemned, and very shortly to die for, and which passed under so many dreadful names, of the most horrid, heinous, wicked, and unwarrantable act that was ever done, of the vilest murder, most execrable regicide, detestable and bloody crime, that men ever were guilty of, and like unto which none hath been said to have been ever perpetrated in this world before, except the putting of Christ himself to death.

His answer to this question was the more desired, because he being taken for so good a Christian, and so able and experienced a lawyer and statesman, as is before described, his opinion therein would be the more considerable, and his words be of the greater weight, which side soever they should fall, whether to the justification or the condemnation of the fact.

Now to this question (which he said he had long before examined thoroughly, and very well digested), he said he would make this true, faithful and ingenuous answer, and hoped he should stand to it, and maintain it to his last breath. And although he did find (he said) some near relations were not of his mind in it, yet for his own part he remained steady and unmoveable therein; and before several witnesses (which he had now left surviving) that heard him, declared as followeth:

1. He said, when he was named and appointed by the parliament to be one of the judges, he was not present in the house, nor did he at any time give his own personal consent thereto, or approbation of it, but rather fully resolved never to engage in that business.

2. When the bill came into the house, he spake against it, and gave his reasons; nor could he be drawn by any arguments to appear in the High Court of Justice, or allow of their proceedings.

Yet, 3. The state of affairs being as then they were, and the consequence on both sides (either of owning, or not owning and joining in that act), being with much prayer and consideration well weighed by him, he at last came to a fixed settlement in his mind about these ensuing particulars,

1. That the supreme authority of the nation, as then it stood (notwithstanding the alterations made in it) being generally accepted and submitted to at home, and owned by foreign states abroad, without any question made it from the body and bulk of the people (though here and there some scrupled it whose interest lay contrary), was lawful and sufficient to warrant all that was or should be done in reference to the late king.

2. That the solemn appeals made to God on both sides, both by the king on his side, and by the parliament on their side, all the time of the war, and answered so distinctly and fully from heaven, on behalf of the parliament (as all men then seemed to judge) did further confirm him in the warrantableness of their undertakings, and righteousness of the whole cause.

3. That the foresight of such miserable changes, as by return of the hierarchy, and the concomitants and effects thereof (which he saw was aimed at, and did believe was intended by the late king, at least after some time) did greatly induce him to look into, and fully inform himself about the matter of the charge against the said late king.

4. That upon mature and long debates of parliament, and such as were authorized to search into the charge aforesaid, he found things fully proved; and moreover said, That the matters objected were of a very unusual and high nature; but that which principally swayed him to do what he did, was the blood of Ireland, and the levying war against the parliament, who were thereupon forced for their own defence and the safety of the people (by whom they were trusted, and whom they did represent), to take up arms, and so against their wills to maintain a most costly, dangerous, and unnatural war.

5. That though he was now fully satisfied in his own mind of the lawfulness of the fact, as well as of the power by which it was done, and that it was his duty no longer to stand out, but to join with his brethren as an actor in it, or else he might become guilty of unfaithfulness to the cause of God and his country; yet such was his base and timorous spirit, that he kept back and would not appear in it; the rather, because he was much set upon by his nephew, Sir Thomas Corbet (who then lived in the house with him) not to meddle at all, or have any hand in it. Now this Sir Thomas Corbet having a very considerable estate, to which himself was next heir, and which (in case he should go cross to his mind in this business) he had power (by cutting off the entail) to give away from him and his children, he was loath to displease: for he saw apparently which way his said nephew was bent. Yet,

6. Notwithstanding this, conscience wrought much with him, and would not suffer him (he said) to be quiet night nor day; for while on one hand, these carnal fears and disturbed thoughts pulled him from his duty (so he called it), yet, on the other hand, it pleased God more strongly to draw him to it, by often bringing and setting home upon his heart that scripture in Rev. xxi. 8. 'The fearful and unbelieving—' shall have their part in the lake that burneth 'with fire and brimstone.' This text did so work and work in his mind, and so powerfully prevail with him, that though he had deferred to appear at the High-Court of Justice till the very last day of the trial, yet then he durst stay no longer, but made haste to come in and sit among them, come what would of it in this world, lest the aforesaid punishment of the fearful should hereafter for ever befall him. And what he now did (he said) he did it with a free and resolved mind, and he blessed God that had conquered his cowardly spirit, and enabled him at last (though late) to come in and do his part, and in some measure to prove himself faithful and obedient to God's as well as the nation's call herein. And further said, that upon the grounds before alledged, if all that hath been done were to be acted over again, he would do as he had done, and would not abate an inch of it; which words he spake with great soberness and settledness of mind but the very day before his execution.

Lastly, As to the whole business, he said he could and did appeal to God, the righteous Judge of all things, that what he did (as far as he could discern himself) was not out of any ill spirit towards the late king's person, nor out of any the least malice or disaffection to him, nor yet out of any unworthy end or design of his own; for as to the said king's lands or goods, or other public title, he never desired nor endeavoured to get any of them, but always by good providence kept himself free, that neither himself, nor any of his might grow rich, or make the least advantage that way. And as for that necessary and public act of justice (as he called it), he did never repent at all that he had a hand in it, nor, after all the searchings of heart about it, did see cause so to do, when at any time he had the most serious and calm reflections upon it; though he did confess, as to the circumstances of that act (the substance whereof he said he must always own), he had been compassed about with many sinful weaknesses and infirmities in the managing of it, as he had before in part hinted, which he hoped and believed were all washed away in the blood of Christ.

Mr. Corbet's Behaviour.

On the day of his execution, when he was finishing his prayer, there was a noise at the door, occasioned by some that hasted to come in (not knowing what he was about), to tell him that he must prepare for the sledge, but that he should be called for the last of the three.

In the meanwhile he fitted himself for his journey; and first bethought himself of his cap, saying, Must I not carry a cap to the gallows? and so looked out the best he had. Truly (said he) I had almost forgot it; but it may be well excused, for I have not been used to these things.

Then he took his Bible (which he promised to send back and give to his keeper when he should have done with it) and put it into his pocket, to carry with him as his best and surest friend and companion both in the sledge and at the gallows. Next, he put a little bottle of cordial into his pocket for his use by the way, if occasion should be; But I hope (saith he) I shall find a better cordial, else I know I shall faint, for all this. This done, and his clean linnen got on, viz. band and cuffs, with his cloak clean brushed and fitted about him, and also a new pair of gloves put on, which his wife had provided for him, and which he called his wedding gloves, he was now in readiness whenever he should be sent for; which a friend taking notice of, put him in mind of a speech which fell from him the night before, saying, Sir, you said last night, the bridegroom was ready, and the marriage-supper was ready, and the robes and crown were ready, but that you were not ready; methinks you are ready now! and a very trim and handsome bride! To which he smilingly replied, Am I so? The Lord make me so; blessed be God, I can say I am willing to it, as I have good reason, for I am sure it is the best bridegroom that ever was that I am going to. And you need not be ashamed to go, saith his friend, considering what garments you are cloathed with, and how you are decked (aluding to those words in Isa. lxi. 10.) To which he replied, Whatever we have of that kind, it is all of our bridegroom's own cost: He is not like other bridegrooms, for he purchaseth his bride, he cloaths her, and he adorns her; whatever beauty she hath upon her person, or love in her heart towards the bridegroom, it is he only, that put it in her.

Some of the wardens at the door asking if he would please to go? Doth the gentleman jailor call for me? saith he. No, said they. Then, said he, I have not my warrant yet to go. I must stay for that first; till that come, my duty is to be passive; it being with me as it was with Peter, who was to be carried whither he would not; yet when I am called, I hope then I shall go without further bidding. Then he reminded us of being in the way of our duty, and in that to trust God; but take heed, (saith he) of neglect of duty, take heed of sinful compliances, of apostatizing from God; take heed of Superstition, Popery, Idolatry; keep close to God and his truth; Oh! trust God, trust in him, and then he will never leave you.

And now a messenger was indeed come, to tell him that the sheriffs were ready for him: And I for them, saith he; and so presently hastened away, without taking leave of his wife; which one perceiving, said to him, will you not speak to your wife before you go? O yes, said he; and then turning back, saluted her; and committing and commending her to the Lord, bid her farewell: But she clinging to him, cried out, Oh, my dear husband! my precious husband! what an husband shall I now lose! whom I have not prized, whom I have not improved, as I ought and might have done! Oh, saith she, what will become of me! At which carriage of his wife, though some tears were ready to start from his eyes, yet he conquered himself, and taking his wife by the hand, said, O my dear wife, shall we part in a shower? (which words he had used on occasion once before) he contented, said he, God will be an husband and a father to thee and thine; with other such like good words; and so kissing her, turned to his son Miles, whom he took by the hand, and blessed him also; and then hastened to the sledge, desiring a friend to stay with his wife and his son, to comfort them.

When he was bound in the sledge, and ready to be drawn away, one that had shewed him some kindness in the time of his imprisonment, took him by the hand, and asked him how he did? Methinks, saith he, I begin to see the Lord appearing, looking up to the skies; which at that time (saith he that he spoke to) were as clear and bright as he had ever seen them: To this friend Mr. Corbet said, Farewell; and the Lord requite you for all the civilities that I have received from you.

As he rid along, he carried his Bible in his hand, with his eyes much fixed upon the world over him that he was now going to; and being naturally a very black, swarthy, melancholy man, and aged also, his countenance seemed sad and dejected at a distance, which caused such people as knew him not to think his heart within too was like his face without; but they were much mistaken; for though he abounded not, nor was lifted up with ravishing joys, as some have been, yet he had an inward, firm, solid, well-settled peace and comfort, which was not now new to him, but which he had enjoyed and lived upon many years, as is evident by many passages which came from him even in the sledge; take two for instance, 'till more come.

When one asked how it was with him, after he had been drawn a good part of his way; he gave this chearful answer, I am well now (saith he), but I shall be better anon, when I am gotten yonder, above that place, pointing to the heavens before him.

Not long before he got to the end of his journey, one came from a friend to the sledge-side, to tell him, that endeavours were used to get his body for burial. What care I (saith he) what becomes of my body when I am dead? Let them do what they will with it; I bless God my soul is safe.

The Several SPEECHES of Colonel JOHN OKEY, Colonel JOHN BARKSTEAD, and MILES CORBET, Esq. at the place of Execution, April 19, 1662.

Upon April 19, 1662, being the day appointed for the execution of col. John Barkstead, col. John Okey, and Miles Corbet, esq. who were drawn on three several hurdles from the Tower to Tyburn, * col. Barkstead was first brought to the place of execution, and then col. Okey and then Mr. Corbet; who at a good distance of time, one after another, mounted

* "In one thing the temper of the nation appeared to be contrary to severe proceedings. For, though the Regicides were at that time odious beyond all expression, and the trials and executions of the first that suffered were run to by vast crouds, and all people seemed pleased with the sight, yet the odiousness of the crime grew at last to be so much flattened by the frequent executions, and most of those who suffered dying with such firmness and shew of piety, justifying all they had done, not without a seeming joy for their suffering on that account, that the king was advised not to proceed farther, at least not to have the scene so near the Court as Charing-cross." Burnet.

a cart, which was prepared for them to stand in whilst they spake to the people.

Colonel John Barkstead was the first that ascended the cart; and as soon as he was in, he lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, Blessed be God!—And then immediately one, supposed to be of the Life-guard, cried out very loud, He is almost dead; if he be not quickly hanged, he will be dead before; therefore hang him, hang him, before he be quite dead: See how he looks.

But, being much spent, he waved speaking to that; and after he was tied up, finding the rope very strait, he would sit on the side of the cart to rest himself, but could not till the rope was somewhat loosened. After resting himself, it was expected he would say something before the other prisoners came, which was at least half an hour's distance. The Sheriff, therefore, spake to him to this effect:

Sheriff. You must not speak any thing in justification of such an horrid offence, for which you came hither to suffer.

To which col. Barkstead replied, I cannot speak much, by reason of the weakness of my body; I desire to get as much refreshment as I can before I speak.

Then the Sheriff spake to Mr. Hastings, who was Under-Sheriff of the county of Middlesex, Will not you dispatch one first of all?

To which the Under-Sheriff answered, We use to hang all together.

Col. Barkstead then lifted up his eyes and hands to heaven.

Then replied the Sheriff, Let it be according as it used to be.

Then said the executioner to col. Barkstead, You may be going on in your own prayers, and lose no time.

Barkstead. I shall be but short. And taking something out of a silver box, putting it into his mouth, and lifting up his eyes, said, I bless God, I have a better comforter than this.

Then being asked by some person of quality, Whether he were not sorry for what he had done? He answered, sir, I shall be sorry for whatever the Lord convinceth me to be a sin: When the Lord sets home that upon my soul, I shall express it unto God and man; and truly that must be from him alone.

Then Mr. Thomas Porter spake to him, I am sorry to see you there; but you will be a happy man within this half hour.

Barkstead. I have, I bless God, an assurance, through Jesus Christ, that I shall be so. But feeling the cart stir under him, as he did several times before, and thereby the rope pinching him, he desired it might be eased.

Then col. Okey was brought towards the cart; and when col. Barkstead saw him, he lifted up his eyes and hands.

Some of the Sheriff's officers, when Okey came to the cart, said of him, That he was a lusty, stout, brave man, as ever fought in England.

Then said the Sheriff to col. Okey, I hope I need not give you this caution, That you make no justification of this horrid offence, not to justify that offence for which you are brought hither this day.

To which col. Okey made this reply: Sir, I must not lye for God, much less for you; I hope you will give me leave to speak what lies upon my conscience, whether I am guilty or not guilty: We will speak something of what lies upon us.

Then Mr. Corbet being at the cart ready to come up, col. Okey stooping down to help him up, said, Come, brother Corbet, how do you? And clapping his hand upon his breast, said, I thank God, I have it here. Then speaking to the Sheriff, he said, May I have my hat on, or stand bare?

Which you please, said the Sheriff, you have your liberty for that.

Then col. Okey addressed himself to speak to the people as followeth:

Colonel Okey's Speech.

Gentlemen: The Providence of God hath brought me to this place, to pay that which every man oweth. I shall not trouble you with what is superfluous, which is, to tell you of my family, which of all the families in Israel was the least, and I was the least of that family. It is not unknown to most here, what troubles have been in this nation, and how eminently the hand of God did appear therein. Among many others that were called forth to serve the king and Parliament, (as then the cause was stated) I was one, which I did faithfully, according to the best of my power and knowledge. I here do bless God, that I was called to that work; for I am persuaded in my heart, that it was for the glory of God, and the good of his people, however it was turned at last; and if I had as many lives as I have hairs in my head, I should have ventured them all in that cause. I have nothing upon me as to that; and I thank God, I am fully satisfied as to that cause: but I shall say no more to that, but only this in general, that as the parents of him that was born blind, being asked by the Pharisees how he came to his sight, answered, he is of age, let him speak for himself; and so the cause is sufficiently able to speak for itself. But as to that which I have been adjudged for, and am come hither to give my life for, viz. the death of the late king, I shall only say thus much, that I think most of you know, that I was none of the counsel within nor without, neither did I know any thing of the trial of the king, or who were the judges, till I saw my name inserted in a paper; and I did sit there but once or twice: but for any malice to him, I had no more than to my own soul, but prayed for him to the last hour of his life, as I did for myself; and so I have done for this king also, which is my duty to do. I have many hundred times, since I went out of England, this two years last past, and before also, begged with tears of the Lord, if there were any iniquity or malice, or any thing of that nature, in what I did, that God would show it to me; yea, the like I did this very morning, beseeching the Lord, that if I had any guilt of his majesty's blood upon me, or any hatred against him, he would reveal it to me, that I might here confess it before you all. But I have nothing upon my spirit as to that. And whatever other men did, I shall say nothing to that; as for myself, I can say again, that I got not any thing by it, but remained in the same condition; I was a colonel before, and was no more since: I thank the Lord, I am clear in that. (Then making a stop, he said, there is such a noise, I cannot speak.) And, Sir, I shall tell you now what is upon my spirit: I take what hath befallen me as righteous and just from the Lord, for my unworthy walking, for being no more zealous for God and his people, no more fruitful in my generation, and no more thankful; but as for that thing, I thank the Lord, I have no guilt upon my spirit. And as for all my other sins, I confess they are many and great; but I thank the Lord, he hath given my soul the pardon of them all, through the blood of Christ, for his name's sake, and through the riches of his grace, and his abundant mercy towards me. And now I will only speak a word to our friends here. You all know we have had many troubles, and much blood hath been shed, and there hath been a vacancy as to a single person: but the nation did earnestly desire him that now reigns; and I wish from my soul he may reign gloriously and righteously, and reign here so, that he may reign for ever. And now they have the great mercy they did desire, I wish that they would make a right improvement of it, and that they would walk in some measure answerable to that mercy that they have so much desired. I shall beg this, as a dying man, that as they have received a mercy, which they account so exceeding great, that they would walk answerable to it, that God might have the glory, and the nation might yet flourish in peace and righteousness. I shall beg of these gentlemen, (some of the guard) and all others that have a great affection to their king, that they would pray more for him, and love him more, and that they would swear less, and drink less; for if you were beyond sea, to hear what I have heard of this nation, it would make your hair stand on end, and your ears to tingle. They say certainly, that notwithstanding the great answer they have had of their desires, yet if they go on in the way of wickedness and blasphemy, which they report do abound in England, (for my part I have been a close prisoner, and have spoken with nobody almost since I came) that this nation cannot stand three years together: therefore I shall make it my humble request, that as this nation hath flourished and gone beyond other nations in piety and religion, it might flourish ten times more than it hath done these many years upon the same account. It hath been a nation that hath professed the gospel, which indeed hath flourished here more than in any other kingdom, and so it hath had more glory and honour than other nations; and I desire it may continue, that you may have peace within your palaces, and plenty within your dwellings. Oh that every man would study in his place to fear God, and honour the king, and to give glory to God, and walk in some measure answerable to those many mercies they have and do enjoy! And, that as they have what they so much desired, every man would now beg, that the gospel may flourish, and that righteousness and truth may be in the midst of you! There is something that I shall speak more; I would be loath to speak, so as to offend you in any thing (then replied the Sheriff, I am glad to hear these expressions from you). Sir, let me tell you, because it is a very great matter, and looks like a black thing that is charged upon us in the indictment, I should have abhorred it, had there not been a face of authority, an authority that then was owned; had it not been so, I should have abhorred to have done any thing in that business, as much as any gentleman here: therefore, I thank God, I have peace as to that, and peace as to all my iniquities whatsoever, thro' rich grace and mercy. And truly as to the cause, I am as confident even as I am of my resurrection, that that cause, which we first took up the sword for, which was for righteousness, and for justice, and for the advancement of a godly magistracy, and a good ministry (however some men turned about for their own ends), shall yet revive again. I am confident, I say, that cause for which so much blood hath been shed, will have another resurrection; that is, you will have a blessed fruit of those many thousands that have been killed in the late war. But I would leave this to all my brethren and friends, that they would keep their places, wait upon God, stand still and see the salvation of God; and rather suffer than do any thing to deliver themselves by any indirect or unjust ways. If his majesty had been pleased to have given me my life, or if I had come over, or heard (for I had a warrant for my return into England from the house Commons; but I fell short two days, and so was fain to go back) time enough of the proclamation, I would, through the blessing of God, have lived quietly and rather have suffered, than have done any thing against the law of the land; and I would say this to all good men and others, rather to suffer than take any indirect means to deliver themselves, but to wait upon God, keep their way, stand still, and see the salvation of God. And God, when it shall make most for his own glory, and the good of his people, will deliver, and that in such a way that himself shall have glory in, and the gospel shall have no reproach by. But because some think we are enemies to magistracy and ministry, I shall only say this, that I always (I thank the Lord) did pray both for magistracy and ministry, and that you might have righteous laws established; that so judgment may run down like a stream, and righteousness like a mighty river; and that shall be my prayer now, that God would give you peace and truth, and scatter them that delight in blood and war.

Mr. Corbet's Speech.

We are now dying men, and upon dying ground, and we are now in the presence of the great God, to whom we are now going: Truly, I desire to speak in his fear, touching that which we are here come to suffer for. I will only say this, (Mr. Sheriff) both the levying of the war, and that act that we are now accused and condemned for, if they had been done without authority, they had been abominable; and to justify that authority, I do not come here to do it. The parliament, the wisdom of the nation, that now is, hath decried it down, and said 'tis void; and the court of justice, where we have been in pursuance of their judgment, hath given judgment against us. Truly so long as that act of parliament stands on foot, judges must give judgment accordingly; but there have been many appeals about that authority, and the nation hath been governed by it, and the nations about us have owned it, and we are now going to God who is the righteous judge, and that word is upon my heart, Isa. xxxiii. 22. Truly men may judge, and they may make laws; and it is our duty to submit to the laws of the nation, or leave it if we think them too hard. But whatsoever laws are made, God is our judge, and he will judge this cause, and God is our lawgiver: It is a Scripture phrase, "God is our lawgiver; and he is also our king, and he will save us: He will judge the cause of his people." And I hope that the minds of sober men will wait for that judgment. Truly, Mr. Sheriff, as concerning that common aspersion laid upon us, That we should be against magistrates and ministers; the Lord knows it is my principle, and I desire there may be a standing, settled government, a Godly magistracy, and likewise a Godly ministry in this nation: And I pray God grant that this people may be blessed under them. And truly, for the magistrate that now is, the hand of God hath brought him into the throne: While I have been in other nations, I have blessed God, and desired the Lord that he may rule for God, and be a terror to evil-doers, and countenance the true professors of the true protestant religion, that he may defend both religion itself, and the professors of it. Truly there have been many (as they call them) sects and heresies, that have sprung up in these later times; but blessed be God, there have been also great appearances of God, and much light is broken out, more in this nation than I could ever hear of or see in the nations round about, though they profess the same religion. I have been among many whom they call reformed-protestants; but of true protestants, such as hold their profession in their lives, there are more in this nation than elsewhere, and they are not to be compared for number, blessed be God, and the Lord en-crease them and multiply them daily; for the glory of the nation is not in a multitude of people only, but of such as fear the Lord, and worship God, and lift up his name: And truly my desire and prayer is, That the gospel, the true and glorious gospel of God, the gospel of Jesus Christ, may have a free course in this nation, and may be glorified in the lives of men, as well as in their words.

As for the particular way of worship that I am of, I shall only say, That in my judgment and conscience I have, and do understand that which is called the congregational way to be nearest to the word of God; and I do freely bear my testimony to the confession of it, that is extant, which was made at the Savoy: But with this, that also of the assembly of divines that was made in the time of the Long Parliament, and the declaration they made concerning religion, saving only as to the discipline-part: As to the other, I do fully subscribe unto it; for I think that the said confessions are the most clear of any protestant confessions (whereof I have seen divers) that are extant; and in foreign parts they will confess as much.

Mr. Sheriff, as to what I shall desire for the nation (for truly we are taking our leaves of it, and we shall see your faces no more), that which I upon the knees of my soul do beg for this nation, is, That as they are protestants in name, and take that upon them in profession, so their lives may be answerable. Truly nothing doth more dread my spirit, and cause me to fear the wrath of God to come upon this nation, than when I hear that amongst those which bear the names of protestants, there is such profaneness, drunkenness, swearing, and such abominations that are not to be named, no not among moral men. The Lord stop the course of them, as also the growth of popery and superstition, and that the truth of God may break forth, and that men may love it; for truly the gospel is worth the loving, the truths of God are worth loving: And if we love them, then truly God will love us, and bless us.

Mr. Sheriff, for my own part, if there were any here that I knew I had wronged, I would ask them pardon and forgiveness, if I knew them. I must confess, I have been in many public actions; I have been of all the parliaments since the late king's reign; and in the beginning of this parliament, I must confess, I being called to it, did think it was my duty to act according to the ability God gave me, and to deny myself. I thank God for it, I came with an estate to the parliament; and I bless God for it, I spent it while I sat in the parliament: And truly, I thank God, they cannot find any estate that I have forfeited; for I have none to forfeit. This business, that we are here for, I was very far from being a contriver of. When the bill came into the house, I must confess, I being a member of the parliament, did somewhat wonder at it, and I did speak against it; but when it was passed, and I was named to be a Commissioner, truly, it being done by that that was then called the authority of the nation, I did think I was bound to obey in that respect. I will say no more. I never sat but once in that they called the High Court of Justice; but for that I'll say no more. I do not come to condemn that authority and power; neither will I now (because the parliament, and the nation, and the spirits of men are against it) justify it. [And being a little interrupted, he said,] I will not speak to offend any man. Truly, I thank God, I never got any thing, either of king's lands, nor bishops', nor dean and chapters' lands; I never knew what belonged to the trade of buying or selling lands, I thought I was in a better way, looking to that station which God had called me to. And as my brother said, Let men hold to their stations, and to what God hath called them; and so serve God and their country, and let them not be afraid. And I think it is the honour of good Christians, and of good people, to be obedient to the government they are under, and to uphold it to the uttermost. I have not much more to say. If any man hath done me any wrong (as I perceived when we came along some people's tongues were against us), I pray God forgive them. I desire not to open my mouth against any of those reproaches we met with. Some I perceived did express their love, and their love to my soul; and I hope God will bear their prayers. And while we are in the land of the living, I shall desire to do as we have done since his majesty came to the government. When we were in Holland, we did pray for the king and the government, and desired of the Lord that they might settle peace in the nation; which, if we love our country, we ought to rejoice in, and our private interests must give way to it. And truly, I shall desire even from my very soul, that if any man here or elsewhere hath wronged me, that the Lord would forgive them. And truly the Court of Justice that passed their judgment upon us, as the law stands, I think, did according to their places. And if we may have liberty in a few words to commend ourselves to God, I shall trouble you no further; and I thank you for your civility.

Then colonel Okey spake a few words, as followeth:

Colonel Okey's Speech.

Mr. Sheriff, I will not trouble you with any thing that he hath said, only something which I thought to speak, as to my own judgment. But this I would leave among you that live in the land of the living. I have been in most reformed places where they call themselves Protestants; but I must tell you, there is a great deal of difference between their ministers and the ministers that be in England; and so of their professors. And therefore, as God hath given you such ministers as scarce any other nation hath besides, so that you would honour and respect them; as also those that are professors and godly people; not such as have a shew only, but those that are really such, that you would countenance them, and honour them; for as for ministers and people that live according to the word, I think there are not such again in the world as are to be found in these nations. I shall add one word further.

I was, as near as I can reckon, a major and colonel sixteen years in the army (I only speak that, because I have a word to say to another thing), I do not know whose ox or whose ass I took away in that sixteen years time; and if I have done any man any wrong, I hope and desire they will forgive me, as one that had many failings. And whoever hath proceeded against my life, either in England or Holland, for there was one (who formerly was my chaplain) that did pursue me to the very death, where I remained but two nights, and was going back again (for I had done my business), but both him and all others upon the earth I forgive as freely as I desire the Lord to forgive me. I have no malice either to judge or jury, but desire that the Lord would forgive them; as also those in Holland that sent us over, contrary to what they did engage to my friends: we will say nothing of them, but pray God that our blood may not be laid to their charge, nor to the charge of any in England.

Then colonel Barkstead addressed himself to speak, as followeth:

Colonel Barkstead's Speech.

Mr. Sheriff; I shall, as near as I can, observe your order, and not willingly do any thing that shall give offence. I must confess the weakness of my body is such, which hath not been of a day, but of a long time, that it will not give me liberty to speak much; and I have had this advantage, that my brethren have spoken before me; and were I to speak at large, I must speak over the same things which they have spoken already, and I am unwilling to trouble you with that, because you said your time was overslipped, and therefore I shall only speak to the cause as it was at first stated (and, I hope, without offence, we may say something to that, so far as the acts of parliament have sealed it up, or rather left it open). Truly therein I did engage very freely at the beginning of the war for king and parliament, and in the place to which I was chosen, I bless the Lord he made me faithful to those I served: As to what hath been since that, I shall forbear to speak to, only in the general say, That before and since I came into this late trouble, I have begged of the Lord to give me a sight of all my sins, and shew me a pardon in the blood of Jesus Christ; which, through free grace and mercy, I can say the Lord hath done. I could not have stood with so much comfort as I do now at this time, if he had not given me an assurance of the pardon of all my sins; and where he hath spoken peace, there is none can speak war or trouble. I conceive it not proper to give you here an account of my faith; for if I should, I should go very little aside from my brethren that have spoken before me: That which hath been my judgment and my practice, hath been the congregational way; I must own that, and do. I should much rejoice to see a spirit answering that great mercy that the Lord hath given to this nation; I mean that great mercy that he hath bestowed in giving them the Gospel, and that in such a manner, as truly we, though we have been some hundreds and thousands of miles among the Protestants abroad, yet I do not know it to be so pure as it is in this isle, blessed be the Lord; and I hope to the nation of England the Lord will give hearts to walk accordingly.

And as to the business of the government of this nation, as it now stands. I have prayed for it, and can pray for it, and shall, as long as I have breath, pray for it; and do, from my soul, desire that the Lord would bless the king, and give him a heart to rule for him, and his glory, and then I am sure the Lord will prosper him.

Indeed, as to those that fear the Lord in the nation, I could wish that the Lord would settle them, and make them of one mind; but that is the work of the Lord, and it must lie there; and truly he will do it in his time. I must confess, I speak the rather to that, because there hath formerly been something acted by me towards persons that were not of my judgment, which I have seen since was very hard; and I bless God I have seen it, and have been sorry for it: and therefore I do desire, that all that fear the Lord, would make it their work and their business to study to love God, and to love one another, and to love the nation wherein they live, and to give no disturbance to it: for certainly, sir, I should leave this, as that which the Lord hath settled upon my heart; their work is to sit still, yea, their strength is to sit still, for the Lord will do his work in his own time; and when he comes to do the work, there is none shall hinder. I think you have had all experience of it in the late works which the Lord hath done; for I must own it his.

Indeed, sir, I am sorry that my weakness of body doth prevent me from speaking more to you; yet I do bless God that I have this opportunity. All I shall say further is, that there is a truth, and I hope I may speak it without offence, that is much upon my spirit, and I am confident I shall speak it without any offence at all. I think we are all here Christians, and there is none here, I think, but saith the Lord's prayer, and says, Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth, as it is in Heaven, &c. and I hope they go through the prayer, and say why they do pray that prayer; and also say, For thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen. God hath given the kingdoms of the earth to Jesus Christ, he shall reign; and happy and blessed is that king and nation that hath him for their king. And certainly, for his majesty that now is, to reign under Jesus Christ, is no dishonour at all to him: For Christ doth, and shall rule over all the kings, princes, and nations in the world. And therefore, indeed, this is that kingdom that is most certain, and that we do desire, and all pray that it may come; and I do wish that all persons would have a tenderness, and not be at enmity with, nor hate, nor, as much as they can, cut the throats of those that own that kingdom, and the coming of that kingdom.

As to other things, there hath been so much said, that I shall forbear speaking; only this, as to the business of the king, I bless God I can say it, I was no actor or contriver, either within or without. I was many miles from this place when that was doing: I was put in by the authority that then sat, and I was called and chosen to that work; and truly, what I did, I did without, any malice, without any contrivement in the least; and did, even to the very last, pray for him: and since his majesty, that now is, came to the throne, I have, as I have prayed for my own soul, prayed for him, and that he may reign in peace and righteousness, to the glory of God, and the good of all the people of the nation, I shall not trouble you with more, because I see your time is past, and my weakness is such, that I am necessitated to break off.

Then col. Okey spake further, as followeth:

Mr. Sheriff; It is not only our judgments now, but it was our practice when we were beyond the seas, we did shun any disputes, nay we avoided occasions of seeing our own countrymen, because we would have nothing to do with the affairs in England, but to pray for them, and to persuade to be quiet, and to sit still; so that we may say, as Paul did in another case, They neither found us in the Temple disputing, or wrangling, or stirring up the people; only our work was to pray for them.

Then Mr. Corbet said, "Now we have done speaking to men, we may now speak unto our God; truly, he must help us, and give us his own spirit: men may say prayers, and read them, but to pray in the spirit, and to pray so, as to be accepted with God, requireth much strength and assistance from him." Then Mr. Corbet addressed himself to prayer.

Mr. Corbet's Prayer.

O Lord our God, our dear and heavenly Father, thou that art the great and mighty God, the God of glory; all the nations of the world are unto thee, as the drop of the bucket, and as the dust of the balance. O Lord, what are we then, that are dust and ashes, sinful dust and ashes? O look upon us, look upon us in our Lord Jesus Christ, that great mediator. O we desire to come to thee in the name of that blessed mediator, we pray thee let us have acceptance through him: O that we might come unto the throne of grace through him, and obtain mercy at thy merciful hand, and find grace and help now in this time of need. Truly, Lord, it is a day, a day of need for thy poor worms, that stand in thy presence, that are despised of men, that are condemned of men, as not worthy to live in the world. O our God, thou mayest also justly destroy us, and thou mayest justly condemn us, and then woe be to us. Oh! Forgiveness belongs unto thee, mercies belong unto thee. O Lord, we acknowledge our iniquities here in thy presence, and in the face of this great people. O Lord, against thee, against thee only have we sinned, our iniquities are gone over our heads, they are a mighty burthen, too heavy for us. O Lord, we desire especially to bewail our gospel-sins, our walking unworthy of the gospel, our barrenness under all the means of grace that we have enjoyed, our unthankfulness for those glorious appearances of our God in these days, in these nations. O we have withheld thy truth in unrighteousness. O we desire to bewail our sins against love, and our sins against light, and our sins against thy mercies; though we have professed the gospel, and the truths of Jesus Christ, yet, O Lord, where is that love, and that fruitfulness that should have been found among us? O how much dishonour hath thy holy majesty had from us in all our stations! O we desire also to be humbled for our family sins and the sins we committed in our stations, that thou our God didst call us to. O Lord, we desire to acknowledge that thou art just and righteous in all thy chastisements, thy great chastisements that have been upon the nation, and upon us, and our families: we desire, Lord, to humble ourselves before thee, and to cover our faces with shame, here in thy presence, and in the presence of this great assembly. Woe unto us, for we have sinned against thee! But, Lord, are there not mercies with thee, are there not tender mercies, multitudes of tender mercies, that thou mayest be feared? Truly, such poor wretches as we are, coming in unto thee, have mercy from thee through Jesus Christ. O these sins of ours, and of every one of us, and those multitude of sins that thy poor worm that now speaks, is guilty of in thy sight, our Lord Jesus Christ he hath borne, he was made sin for us. Now, Lord, where sin is, there is shame, and grief, and curse, and wrath, and death. O Lord, hath not he borne our sins, and so likewise our shame, and carried our sorrows? O Lord, what shame was cast upon him, as thy poor worms are at this day, and at this time, a shame in the eyes of many present! O Lord, he was despised and rejected of men. O did not he suffer death, did not that righteous one, that holy one, suffer death? O he died for those sins of ours; he was cut off from the land of the living; he poured out his soul unto death. Nay Lord, blessed Father, it pleased thee to put him to grief, and he hath borne our sins; and, O Lord, the chastisement of our peace was laid on him; he was made sin for us. Blessed Lord, we will lay all our sins upon the head of the scape-goat, upon our Lord Jesus Christ; him thou hast given to be a propitiation. O dear Lord, in him, and through his blood, thou hast found out a way of atonement for sin; and by that one oblation that he once offered, he is able to save to the uttermost, all that come unto thee through him. Lord, we come in the blood of that mediation, we desire to lay hold on the atonement and propitiation that he hath offered up unto thee : O he hath satisfied thy justice ; he that knew no sin, he was made sin, and thou didst lay our sins upon him, and thou hast accepted of that satisfaction that he hath made, and thou hast raised him from the dead, and set him at thy right hand ; and though he died but once, yet, by that one oblation, he hath satisfied for all our sins. O here is the blood of God, the Lord Jesus Christ, which was God and man. O that righteous one, he loved us, and died for us, that we might live ; he bare thy wrath, that we might be reconciled, that we might find mercy, yea, and through him thou art merciful. Thou God of mercy, shew mercy to our souls, and to the souls of all those in this great assembly that is met here ; and, dear Father, accept us in his mediation. O it is our comfort, though he died but once, having satisfied thy justice, thereby he doth ever live to make intercession for sinners : Lord, here is comfort for poor wretched sinners ; the great Mediator, that is so pleasant in thy sight, whom thou hearest always ; O he doth continually live to make intercession for us ; we pray thee, in and through him, accept these poor prayers of ours, these poor petitions and requests of ours, which we make known to thee : O it is pardoning love we seek, O reconciliation with thee, before we go hence, and be seen no more. O Lord, we do believe that thou hast sealed our pardon, that thou art reconciled to us, and that there is peace betwixt thee and our poor souls, through that great peace-maker, else it would go ill with us, now we are going out of this world. O come and sprinkle every one of our souls with that precious blood. O that we, that are in ourselves vile wretches, may yet stand righteous before thee in his righteousness. O the same righteousness of Christ, which thou hast appointed ; for thou hast made him to be righteousness for us, and sanctification and redemption, and he is the Lord our righteousness. O put that robe upon us, that glorious robe of his righteousness, that we may be presented now, not having our own righteousness, for that is like a vile filthy rag, a menstruous cloth ; but cloath us with that righteousness, that we may be presented before thee, in and through him, without spot, and without wrinkle, before thy presence, through him, with exceeding joy. O thou hast made him our king ; O that he would now undertake our cause, the cause of our poor souls. Come, Lord Jesus, thou king of saints, come, tread our enemies under our feet, especially that great enemy. O Lord, he hath conquered Satan, he hath borne our sins, and hath condemned sin. O he took the likeness of sinful flesh, and in his flesh condemned sin in the flesh ; O that now, through his righteousness, we might fulfil thy holy law ; he is our righteousness, his obedience we now fly to. O dear Lord, thou hast set before us, as a refuge to fly unto, that blessed hope, even those glorious things the gospel holds out. O the hope of eternal life, which thou that art the faithful God that canst not lye, hast promised unto us. O thou hast set this hope of perfect justification and perfect sanctification before us ; O thou hast held it forth, this same hope of righteousness, thou hast set it before us, and now we fly unto it in this day of our distress, to lay hold upon it. O thou art pleased, Lord, that we might have strong consolation, thou art pleased to confirm this thy covenant with an oath, that by two immutable things, the covenant of God, and the oath of God, we might have strong consolation. Now we fly to this covenant through Jesus Christ. O be a God in covenant with us ; Father, say to us every one, that we are thine, that thou art in covenant with us ; and then say, fear not, worms. Else, ah Lord God, now were we to encounter with death, that king of terrors, what would become of us ? But, O Lord, speak peace to us, speak comfort to us, thou God of comfort ; O comfort our hearts ; O Lord, it must be done by our dear Lord Jesus Christ himself. Our Father hath given us everlasting consolation ; come and comfort our hearts, O comfort us with thy love, O Lord ; O set thy banner of love over us. Thou dost not despise the affliction of the afflicted, blessed be thy name. We have found thee, Lord, we bear witness to thee before this great assembly. O thou hast not despised the affliction of the afflicted, thou hast seen us in our low estate, and been very good to us. We have had a banner of love over us, and we bless thy name for this very affliction that thou hast laid upon us. O that we could bear witness to thee in the face of this great city, and before this great assembly, of thy goodness and faithfulness, and of thy mercy, which endures for ever. O we have tasted of thy love, and it's good to cleave unto thee. Father, thou art a refuge to the poor, and strength to the poor and needy : Come, and be a refuge to us in this great storm ; truly we are to go through a great storm before we come unto thee ; O that we may find death a sweet in-let and a passage into thy blessed arms, through Jesus Christ. When our poor souls shall be coming to thee, we pray thee give thy angels charge over us, and strengthen us against the fears and terrors of death. O let fresh strength come from Jesus Christ at this present ; it is not all the graces we have had, will now do us any good, unless we have fresh supplies. Our fresh springs are in thee, arise, O spring. O the fountain of life, now let it come flowing upon our poor souls, that we may be presented before thee with exceeding joy. Lord, let us hear that same joyful sound, Come ye blessed of my Father. O though we be despised of men, and some they reproach us ; O but Lord forgive them, and the Lord pardon them ; whosoever hath done us any wrong, the Lord pardon them, through Jesus Christ we beg it. And, blessed Father, we pray thee let us hear this joyful sound, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you ;

O there is a crown of life laid up for them that love the Lord. Thou knowest thy poor worms desire to love thee; O dear Lord, shed abroad thy love in our hearts; and though we be now dying, yet we desire to love thy name; though thou art now correcting us, yet we have cause to love thee, and bless thee; O shed abroad thy love in our poor souls. O Lord, we pray thee come and accept us, and let our cry come and pierce the heavens. O Lord, let us now be looking for, and hastening to the glorious appearing of that blessed hope, our Lord Jesus Christ. He that shall come, will come, and will not tarry; come quickly, Lord. O that thy servants could see thee, as thy servant Stephen, (in much what such a condition as we are in) he saw Jesus Christ standing at thy right hand. Though we cannot look upon thee with our bodily eyes, yet we desire to see thee with the eye of faith. O we pray thee look down upon us, and, Lord, strengthen our faith, and that our faith may not fail; O let us obtain the end of our faith, the salvation of our souls. And O that thou wouldst strengthen us according to thy glorious power, with all patience in this hour. O Lord, though our hearts would faint, and flesh faint, O Lord, thou art the God of our strength; come lay hold upon us, lead us by thy righteousness, and let thy everlasting arms be under us. O dear Lord, let us taste of love in this bitter cup; O we pray thee let us see thee in mercy; do not correct us in thy wrath. O we bow our knees to thee, let not this affliction be in thy wrath. We are under the wrath of men; but Lord, do thou forgive, and let us be under thy love; and lay no more upon thy poor worms, than the strength that thou shalt now give us through Jesus Christ, will enable us to bear; and come and take us into those mansions that our Lord Jesus Christ hath prepared. Is it not thy promise to go and provide mansions for us? Our fore-runner is gone to appear for us in heaven, now before the throne of grace; O hear us now in him, and dismiss us now with a blessing. And the Lord bless this nation, the Lord bless the government, Lord continue thy truth, keep the Gospel still in this nation, which hath been the glory of it: O let thy poor people glorify the Gospel in their lives, it is that we beg of thee for the Lord's sake; and do thou prevent those heavy judgments that hang over our heads. Lord, pardon those great abominations that thine eyes do see, that profanation of the sabbath. O the spirit of profaneness is broken out among us! O we desire to be humbled, and mourn for it. Lord, turn from thy wrath, and, dear Father, continue thy Gospel in the purity of it. O the Lord forgive the sins of those that bear thy name. Thy wrath is kindled against us, and therefore it is that thou dost rebuke us; but we pray thee give thy people a spirit of returning to thee; and do thou heal our back-slidings, and give us a spirit of love to thee, and to thy truths, and one to another, and take away the envy betwixt Ephraim and Judah. Thou seest these bitter contests; we pray thee put a stop to them; and let thy people be of one heart and one mind, and let them mind the great things of Jesus Christ, and those truths that are after godliness; let those be more and more enquired after, and embraced by the people of these nations, and the Lord grant that those superstitions and idolatries that are a provocation in thy sight, may not be brought into the nation; for thou art a jealous God, and if we go that way, thy wrath will be kindled once more; but Lord, shew mercy to England, and do not take away the Gospel, nor remove thy golden candle-stick from the midst of us. And the Lord bless the government, and the king thou hast set over us; that which we beg of thee for him, is, that he may rule righteously; and let him hate whom thou hatest, and love those whom thou lovest. And bless the ministers of the word; them that are faithful to thee, Lord, continue them in their liberties, and let not our teachers be removed into corners; bless them that are faithful to thee, and make them more faithful.—(Being interrupted, after a while he proceeded as followeth.)

O Father, we have many suits to put up unto thee; but we now commit ourselves unto thee; here we are, Lord, we will roll our souls upon thee, and rest and wait for thy salvation. We pray thee accept of us; forgive the sins of this duty; O sprinkle the blood of the Lord Jesus upon us, and take us into thy arms. Father of mercy, that comfortest us in all our tribulations, come and comfort us in this hour, and do thou accept of us in Christ, for through him we offer up ourselves, our souls a sacrifice. Father, accept of us and our sacrifice, &c. (The conclusion was omitted, because of a bustling among the horses.)

Then col. Okey made another long prayer, much to the same purpose as Corbet's, which being so like, is purposely here omitted.

Next, colonel Barkstead addressed himself to prayer, having first spoken to the Sheriffs these few words following.

Mr. Sheriff, I do see your time is spent, and we are drawn up into a very narrow compass; and I hope you will take my word now as before, I shall only speak a word or two unto the Lord, and no more.

Colonel Barkstead's Prayer.

O Eternal and ever-blessed Lord God; thou who sittest upon the highest heavens, who hast the highest heavens for thy throne, and the earth for thy foot-stool; we poor creatures are here, by thy providence, brought at this day, to this place, at this time, and by thee it is that we are in the condition we are now in; for which, O Lord, we bless thee, and for which we can bless thy name. Blessed be thy name, O Lord, that thou wert pleased, before thou broughtest us hither, to speak peace unto our poor souls, in the blood of Jesus Christ; and blessed for ever be thy name, that thou givest us assurance of peace, pardon, and reconciliation to our souls at this very minute, blessed be thy name. Dear Father, for the Lord's sake, to continue it; and, oh! draw forth the hearts of thy poor creatures, even while one blast of breath is in us, to bless thy holy name. Father, we pray thee, remember the nation in which we live; the king, whom thou hast set over the nation; Lord, make him thine, and cause him to rule for thee in righteousness, and for thy glory, that so, Lord, he may rule to the comfort of all that fear thy name. O dear Father, look in mercy upon all that fear thy name in the nation, make them all of one heart and mind, to advance thy name and glory, to live in unity one with another, and to make it their business to seek peace, and pursue it, that so they may thereby truly advance the kingdom and sceptre of Jesus Christ, who is coming, and will come. O dear Father, carry forth the spirits of thy people to love thee, and one another, and to walk closely, and humbly, and holily before thee all their days. Remember the relations of thy poor creatures here before thee; Lord, do good to them that we leave behind us, we commit them into thy arms. Lord, take them into thine arms: O Lord, thou hast said in thy word, 'Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive, and let thy widows trust in me.' Lord, it is thy word, and this is thy command, that we should leave them with thee; therefore we leave them in thy arms. Dear Father, we desire, from the bottom of our hearts, freely and fully to forgive all that we any ways think have done us wrong in any kind whatsoever, (freely and fully) either in England or elsewhere; and we pray thee shew kindness to those that any ways have shewed kindness to us; for the Lord Jesus sake reward all their labour of love a thousand fold into their bosoms. Look in mercy upon the chief magistrates that are here at this time; dear Father, pardon their sins, and reconcile them unto thyself in the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ, in which we pray thee wash their souls. And, O Lord, as for the person that is now appointed to take away our lives, and to destroy our bodies, dear Father, do not thou destroy his soul, but wash his soul in the blood of Jesus Christ: Even that person that is to wash his hands in our blood, O pardon him, and let not any of his sins be remembered before thee. We leave ourselves with thee, and blessed be thy name: Thou hast been good unto us, and thy presence is with us: and there is nothing that gives trouble to us at this moment. Father, continue this thy loving-kindness to us. O Lord, thou hast not (blessed be thy name) caused death to be terrible to us; no, Lord, thy poor creature can say with freeness and comfort, that there hath not been any thing of trouble or terror that hath passed thy servant since he came into this place, either for what he is to suffer, or the manner of his sufferings; but here he is before thee, and begs farther help and strength from thee, being willing to surrender up his soul to thee, in and through the Lord Jesus Christ.

Then col. Okey speaks as followeth:

"I did break off duty, because you desired it, and I would not be troublesome to you."

Then he very earnestly expressed himself further, as followeth:

"O love the Lord, and hate all things that are evil. I have found by experience, more evil in the least sin, than good in any thing this world can afford; therefore I beg it of all that are here, to love God, and to hate that that is evil. The Lord give you peace and truth! I hope our relations shall not fare the worse for us, but that you will shew them kindness. And as to what my brother said, I thank the Lord, I have the assurance of his love, and the pardon of my sins through the riches of his grace, and free love in Jesus Christ."

After this, col. Barkstead called a young man, who was known to him, and taking a silver box out of his pocket, he charged him to give it to his daughter.

Their speeches and prayers being ended, the executioner cleared the cart of the rest of the people who were gotten in, and then pulled down their several caps over their eyes, and upon the lifting up their hands, the cart was drawn away; at which time, col. Barkstead especially was heard to say, Lord Jesus, receive our souls! And after he had hanged for a little space, he lifted up his hand.

That which many did especially take notice of, was, that there was not so much as the least attempt made by any to raise a triumphant shout upon the drawing away of the cart; but there rather appeared the symptoms of an universal face of sadness in that vast and generally tumultuous assembly, who were the spectators of their several deaths.

They all hung near about a quarter of an hour: The first that was cut down was col. Barkstead, who was quartered according to the sentence; the other two hanging all the while. The next cut down was col. Okey, Mr. Corbet hanging still, who, after col. Okey was quartered, had the execution done upon him also, according to the sentence. Their several quarters were brought back to Newgate, about five of the clock in the afternoon, to be boiled.

A brief Account of Col. Okey's Funeral.

When col. Okey's body was quartered, it pleased the king to send a warrant to the sheriff of London, to deliver the macerated body to be buried where his wife should think meet; which thing being granted, without petition or application from her, or his relations; and the rumour of his funeral suddenly flying about the city, and the place appointed at Stepney, (where his first wife lieth in a fair vault, which he purchased formerly for a burying-place for him and his family,) there was a numerous concourse of sober, substantial people assembled to Christ-church, to attend the corpse, and some thousands more were coming thither to that purpose; so that there were in view about twenty thousand people attending that solemnity at and coming to the place aforesaid, who in a solemn and peaceable manner behaved themselves, as that affair required: Yet it so pleased the king to revoke his first grant to Mrs. Okey, and by the sheriff of London to disappoint and send home again the company attending the funeral; which the sheriff with much harshness, and many bitter words, did his work. The people, though much troubled at the disappointment, yet, so soon as they understood the king's pleasure, departed, and left the mangled limbs to the disposal of them that had devoted them to the gibbet and ax: the company left many a thousand sighs to attend him to his then unknown grave.

That night the body was carried to the Tower of London, and there, by Mr. Glendon, parson of Barkin, was buried with the service-book, afresh wounding his bleeding limbs thereby; but rapes are imputed only to the ravisher. Mr. Glendon could not but say, that his body was laid there, in sure and certain hope of a joyful resurrection. His testimony was true, though a poet of their own. And now there he lies, and the Tower of London is his tomb. His epitaph he partly writ in the hearts of thousands at the place of execution.

The others who were convicted, having surrendered themselves upon the Proclamation in pursuance of 12 Car. 2. cap. 11. § 36, could not be executed without consent of parliament; which never being asked, they suffered only imprisonment, and confiscation of their estates.

Besides these Trials, other proceedings were had against others of the King's Judges: By Stat. 12 Car. 2, c. 30, Oliver Cromwell, Isaac Ewer, John Alured, Richard Dean, Thomas Horton, Philip Skippon, John Bradshaw, Tho. Hammond, Thomas Pride, sir John D'Anvers, sir Thomas Maleverer, sir William Constable, sir John Bouchier, sir Gregory Norton, John Blackstone, Francis Allen, Pergrine Pelham, John Venn, Tho. Andrews, Anthony Stapely, and John Fry, who all were dead, were attainted: And not content with this, the Houses of Lords and Commons (notwithstanding Johnson tells us that "English vengeance wars not with the dead") Resolved, "That the carcasses of Oliver Cromwell, Henry Ireton, John Bradshaw, and Thomas Pride, (whether buried in Westminster-Abbey, or elsewhere) be, with all expedition, taken up, and drawn upon a hurdle to Tyburn, and there hanged up in their coffins for some time; and, after that, buried under the said gallows: and that James Norfolk, esq. serjeant at arms, do take care that this Order be put in effectual execution by the common executioner for the county of Middlesex; and all such others, to whom it shall respectively appertain, who are required, in their several places, to conform to, and observe, this Order, with effect; and the sheriff of Middlesex is to give his assistance herein, as there shall be occasion; and the dean of Westminster is desired to give directions to his officers of the Abbey to be assistant in the execution of this Order." *

* This Order was not executed till January 30, after the dissolution of this parliament, when a Chronological Historian of these times gives us this account of it: "This day, Jan. 30, 1660-1, the odious carcasses of Oliver Cromwell, Henry Ireton, and John Bradshaw, were taken out of their graves, drawn upon sledges to Tyburn, and being pulled out of their coffins, there hanged at the several angles of the triple tree, till sun-set; then taken down, beheaded, and their loathsome trunks thrown into a deep hole under the gallows. Their heads were afterwards set upon poles on the top of Westminster-hall." Gesta Britannorum: or a succinct Chronology, &c. By sir George Wharton. London, 1667.

Arnot, in his Collection and Abridgment of Celebrated Criminal Trials, &c. p. 65, gives us the following Case of Posthumous Vengeance in Scotland:

"A royal warrant was directed to sir Wm. Hart, and the other Judges of the Court of Justiciary, setting forth, in the usual bombast stile of treasonable indictments, that the deceased had been guilty of most high, horrible, and detestable points of treason: That the same was verified by two or three witnesses; but that the deceased obstinately persisted to deny the charge: That he attempted to make his escape from Edinburgh Castle, which rendered his guilt the more manifest; and that, in the attempt, he had brought about his own miserable and shameful death. The warrant, therefore, required the Court to pronounce sentence on the deceased 'Francis Mowbray, now presented on pannel' (i. e. produced at the bar) to be dismembered as a traitor; his body to be hanged on a gibbet, and afterwards quartered; his head and limbs stuck up on conspicuous places in the city of Edinburgh; and his whole estate to be forfeited. The warrant is dated at Holyroodhouse, 31st January, 1603, and is subscribed James Rex, Montrose Cancellar, Marr, Herreis, Halyrudhouse. Doom was pronounced accordingly."

"This, perhaps," says Arnot, "exceeds every act of king James's tyranny. For, 1st, this sentence of forfeiture, pronounced after death, was not adjudged by parliament, but by the Court of Justiciary, in consequence of a royal edict. 2d. No summons of treason was executed against the heirs of the deceased, nor any defender cited, unless the corpse, which was produced at the bar, can be called a defender. 3d. No specific charge was exhibited against the deceased; nor any thing but a general accusation of treason and lèse-majesty, which in those days, was so far from conveying any precise and definite idea, that it might have been any thing which occurred to the whim of the king's advocate, or that of his royal master. 4th. No proof was adduced in court, no jury called, nor verdict returned, Nevertheless there is reason to doubt whether the Order could be executed as the two Houses proposed. In a Note to the second volume of Kennett's History of England, page 229, 2nd edit. which has been copied into an anonymous Life of Cromwell, published in the year 1724, it is said, "One gentleman gave me this Note in writing: 'Soon after the Restoration, the then serjeant of the House of Commons, was ordered by the house to go with his officers to St. Peter's, Westminster, and demand the body of Oliver Cromwell, buried there, to be taken up in order to be disposed of in the manner the house should adjudge fitting. Whereupon the said Serjeant went, and in the middle isle of Henry the 7th's chapel, at the East-end, upon the taking up the pavement, in a vault found his corpse, in the inside of whose coffin, and upon the breast of the corpse was laid a copper-plate, finely gilt, inclosed in a thin case of lead, on the one side whereof were engraved the arms establishing the charge upon which the sentence of forfeiture was pronounced."

"Towards the latter end of this year," says Neal, "the court and bishops, not content with their triumphs over the living Presbyterians, descended into the grave, and dug up the bodies of those that had been buried in Westminster-Abbey in the late times, lest their dust should one time or other mix with the loyalists; for, besides the bodies of Cromwell, and others already mentioned, his majesty's warrant to the Dean and Chapter of Westminster was now obtained, to take up the bodies of such persons who had been unwarrantably buried in the chapel of king Henry 7, and in other chapels and places within the collegiate church of Westminster since the year 1641, and to bury them in the church-yard adjacent; by which warrant they might have taken up all the bodies that had been buried there for 20 years past. Pursuant to these orders, on the 12th and 14th of September they went to work, and took about 20, among whom were,

"The body of Elizabeth Cromwell, mother of Oliver, daughter of sir Richard Stewart, who died Nov. 18, 1654, and was buried in Henry the 7th's chapel.

"The body of Elizabeth Claypole, daughter of Oliver, who died Aug. 7, 1658, and was buried in a vault made for her in Henry the 7th's chapel.

"The body of Robert Blake, the famous English admiral, who after his victorious fight at Santa Cruz, died in Plymouth Sound, Aug. 7, 1657, and was buried in Henry the 7th's chapel; a man, whose great services to the English nation deserved a monument as lasting as time itself.

"The body of the famous Mr. John Pym, a Cornish gentleman, and member of the long parliament, who was buried in the year 1643, and attended to his grave by most of the lords and commons in parliament.

of England, impaled with the arms of Oliver, and on the reverse the following Legendæ :

"Oliverius Protector Republicæ Angliæ, Scotiæ, et Hiberniæ, Natus 25 Aprilis, 1599, Inauguratus 16 Dec. 1653, Mortuus Stia Sept. A. D. 1658, Hic situs est.

"The said Serjeant believing the plate to be gold, took it pretendedly as his fee, and Mr. Gifford, of Colchester, who married the Serjeant's daughter, has now the plate, which his said father-in-law told him, he came by in the manner above related.

"Yet another Account is given, as averred and ready to be deposed (if occasion required) by Mr. Barkstead, son to Barkstead the Regicide, who was executed as such soon after the Restoration, the son being at the time of Cromwell's death about the age of 15 years. That the said Regicide Barkstead being Lieutenant of the Tower of London, and a great confidant of the Usurper, did among other

"The body of sir William Constable, one of the king's judges, governor of Gloucester, and colonel of a regiment of foot, who died 1655.

"The body of colonel Edward Popham, one of the admirals of the fleet, who died 1651.

"The body of William Stroud, esq. one of the five members of parliament demanded by king Charles I.

"The body of col. Humphrey Mackworth, one of O. Cromwell's colonels, buried in Henry the 7th's chapel, 1654.

"The body of colonel John Meldrum, a Scots man, who died in the wars.

"The body of colonel Boscawen, a Cornish man.

"The body of Mr. Stephen Marshall, buried in the South isle, Nov. 23, 1655.

"The body of Mr. William Strong, preacher in the abbey church, and buried there July 4, 1654. These, with some others of lesser note, both men and women, were thrown together into one pit in St. Margaret's church-yard, near the back-door of one of the prebendaries: but the work was so indecent, and carried with it such a popular odium, that a stop was put to any further proceedings." 4 Neal's History of the Puritans, 290.

such confidants, in the time of the Usurper's sickness, desire to know, where he would be buried; to which he answered, Where he obtained the greatest victory and glory, and as nigh the spot as could be guessed, where the heat of the action was, viz. in the field at Naseby, Com. Northampton; which accordingly was thus performed: At midnight (soon after his death) being first embalmed in a leaden coffin, the body was in a hearse conveyed to the said field, the said Mr. Barkstead by order of his father, attending close to the hearse, and being come to the field, they found about the midst of it a grave dug about nine feet deep, with the green sod carefully laid on one side, and the mould on the other, in which the coffin being soon put, the grave was instantly filled up, and the green sod laid exactly flat upon it, care being taken that the surplus mould was clean taken away. Soon after like care was taken, that the said field was entirely ploughed up, and sown three or four years successively with corn. Several other material circumstances the said Mr. Barkstead (who now frequents Richard's coffee-house within Temple Bar) relates (too long to be here inserted) and particularly after the Restoration his conference with the late witty duke of Buckingham."

And in the 2d volume of the Harleian Miscellany, p. 369 (edition of 1744), the following account is given:

An Account of the Burial of King CHARLES the FIRST, and of OLIVER CROMWELL: In which it appears, how Oliver's Friends contrived to secure his Body from future disgrace, and to expose the Corpse of King Charles to be substituted in the punishment and ignominy designed for the Usurper's Body. MS.

"Amongst other Papers, the following MS. was carefully preserved by my lord Oxford. It contains an extract from the Journal of the House of Commons; which honourable house, resolving to disgrace the name of the late usurper Oliver Cromwell, as far as lay in their power, ordered his body to be taken up, and to be first hanged on the gallows at Tyburn, and then to be burnt.

"This order was pursued by the Serjeant of that honourable house so far, as to find a coffin with Oliver's name, and usurped titles, at the east-end of the middle isle of Henry the Seventh's chapel, in Westminster-abbey.

"This, with an account where the said inscription is, or was, within a few years ago, to be seen, is written in a very fair hand.

"Then in two different hands, there follows the most remarkable account of a counter-interment of the arch-traitor, as well as the reason and contrivance to secure his body from that expected ignominy, and to continue the revenge of king Charles's enemies, even to the disgrace of substituting the body of the be-headed king, in the punishment intended by a justly enraged people, upon the dead body of the usurper.

"Soon after the Restoration, the then Serjeant of the House of Commons, was ordered, by the house, to go with his officers to St. Peter's, Westminster, and demand the body of Oliver Cromwell, buried there, to be taken up, in order to be disposed in the manner the house should adjudge fitting.—Whereupon the said Serjeant went, and, in the middle isle of Henry the Seventh's Chapel, at the east-end, upon taking up the pavement, in a vault, was found his corpse; in the inside of whose coffin, and upon the breast of the corpse, was laid a copper-plate, finely gilt, enclosed in a thin case of lead, on the one side whereof, were engraved the arms of England, impaled with the arms of Oliver; and, on the reverse, the following legend, viz.

"Oliverius Protector Reipublicæ Angliæ, Scotiæ, et Hiberniæ, Natus 25 April, 1599, Inauguratus 16 Dec. 1653, Mortuus 3 Sept. anno 1658, hic situs est."

"The said Serjeant, believing the plate to be gold, took it pretendedly as his fee; and Mr. Gifford, of Colchester, who married the Serjeant's daughter, has now the plate, which, his father-in-law told him, he came by in the manner above related.

"A Counter-Interment of the aforesaid Arch-Traitor, as averred, and ready to be deposited, if occasion required, by Mr. ——— Barkstead, who daily frequents Richard's Coffee-house, within Temple Bar, being son to Barkstead, the Regicide, that was executed as such, soon after the Restoration, the son being, at the time of the said Arch-Traitor's death, about the age of 15.

"That the said Regicide Barkstead, being Lieutenant of the Tower of London, and a great confidant of the Usurper, did, among other such confidants, in the time of the Usurper's sickness, desire to know where he would be buried: To which he answered, Where he had obtained the greatest victory and glory, and as nigh the spot as could be guessed, where the heat of the action was, viz. in the field at Naseby, county Northampton; which accordingly was thus performed: At midnight (soon after his death) being first embalmed, and wrapped in a leaden coffin, he was, in a hearse, conveyed to the said field, the said Mr. Barkstead, by order of his father, attending close to the hearse; and, being come to the field, there found, about the midst of it, a grave, dug about nine feet deep, with the green sod carefully laid on one side, and the mould on the other; in which, the coffin being soon put, the grave was instantly filled up, and the green sod laid exactly flat upon it, care being taken, that the surplus mould was clean taken away.

"Soon after, like care was taken, that the said field was intirely ploughed up, and sown three or four years successively with wheat.

"Several other material circumstances, relate-ing to the said interment, the said Mr. Barkstead relates (too long to be here inserted) and, particularly, after the Restoration, his conference with the late (witty) duke of Buckingham, &c.

"Talking over this account of Barkstead's, with the Reverend Mr. Sm——, of Q——, whose father had long resided in Florence, as a merchant, and afterwards as minister from king Charles the Second, and had been well acquainted with the fugitives after the Restoration; he assured me, he had often heard the said account by other hands: Those miscreants always boasting, that they had wrecked their revenge against the father, as far as human foresight could carry it, by beheading him, whilst living, and making his best friends the executors of the utmost ignominies upon him, when dead. Asking him the particular meaning of the last sentence, he said, that Oliver, and his friends, apprehending the Restoration of the Stuart family, and that all imaginable disgrace, on that turn, would be put upon his body, as well as memory; he contrived his own burial, as averred by Barkstead, having all the theatrical honours of a pompous funeral paid to an empty coffin, into which, afterwards, was removed the corpse of the martyr (which, by lord Clarendon's own account, had never truly, or certainly, been interred; and, after the Restoration, when most diligently sought after, by the earls of Southampton and Lindsey, at the command of king Charles the Second, in order to a solemn removal, could no where, in the church where he was said to have been buried, be found) that, if any sentence should be pronounced, as upon his body, it might effectually fall upon that of the king. That, on that order of the Commons, in king Charles the Second's time, the tomb was broken down, and the body taken out of a coffin so inscribed, as mentioned in the Serjeant's report, was from thence conveyed to Tyburn, and, to the utmost joy and triumph of that crew of miscreants, hung publicly on the gallows, amidst an infinite croud of spectators, almost infected with the noisomeness of the stench. The secret being only amongst that abandoned few, there was no doubt in the rest of the people, but the bodies so exposed, were the bodies they were said to be; had not some, whose curiosity had brought them nearer to the tree, observed, with horror, the remains of a countenance they little had expected there; and that, on tying the cord, there was a strong seam about the neck, by which the head had been, as was supposed, immediately after the decollation, fastened again to the body. This being whispered about, and the numbers that came to the dismal sight hourly increasing, notice was immediately given of the suspicion to the attending officer, who dispatched a messenger to court, to acquaint them with the rumour, and the ill consequences the spreading or examining into it further, might have. On which the bodies were immediately ordered down, to be buried again, to prevent any infection. Certain is it, they were not burnt, as in prudence, for that pretended reason, might have been expected; as well as in justice, to have shewn the utmost detestation for their crimes, and the most lasting mark of infamy they could inflict upon them. This was the account he gave. What truth there is in it, is not so certain. Many circumstances make the surmise not altogether improbable: As all those enthusiasts, to the last moment of their lives, ever gloried in the truth of it."

It must be confessed that what lord Clarendon says concerning the corpse of Charles the 1st, gives some countenance to these stories. Lord Clarendon's account is as follows:

"His body was immediately carried into a room at Whitehall; where he was exposed for many days to the public view, that all men might know that he was not alive. And he was then embalmed, and put into a coffin, and so carried to St. James's, where he likewise remained several days. They who were qualified to order his funeral, declared, 'that he should be buried at Windsor in a decent manner, provided that the whole expence should not exceed 500*l*.' The duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hertford, the earls of Southampton and Lindsey, who had been of his bed-chamber, and always very faithful to him, desired those that governed, 'that they might have leave to perform the last duty to their dead master, and to wait upon him to his grave;' which, after some pauses, they were permitted to do, with this, 'that they should not attend the corpse out of the town; since they resolved it should be privately carried to Windsor without pomp or noise, and then they should have timely notice, that if they pleased, they might be at his interment.' And accordingly it was committed to four of those servants who had been by them appointed to wait upon him during his imprisonment, that they should convey the body to Windsor, which they did. And it was, that night, placed in that chamber which had usually been his bed-chamber: the next morning, it was carried into the great hall; where it remained till the lords came; who arrived there in the afternoon, and immediately went to colonel Whitchcot, the governor of the castle, and shewed the order they had from the parliament to be present at the burial; which he admitted; but when they desired that his majesty might be buried according to the form of the Common Prayer book, the bishop of London being present with them to officiate, he positively and roughly refused to consent to it; and said, 'it was not lawful; that the Common-Prayer book was put down, and he would not suffer it to be used in that garrison where he commanded;' nor could all the reasons, persuasions, and intreaties, prevail with him to suffer it. Then they went into the church to make choice of a place for burial. But when they entered into it, which they had been so well acquainted with, they found it so altered and transformed, all inscriptions, and those laud-marks pulled down, by which all men knew every particular place in that church, and such a dismal mutation over the whole, that they knew not where they were; nor was there one old officer that had belonged to it, or knew where our princes had used to be interred. At last there was a fellow of the town who undertook to tell them the place, where he said, 'there was a vault, in which king Henry the 8th and queen Jane Seymour were interred.' As near that place as could conveniently be, they caused the grave to be made. There the king's body was laid without any words, or other ceremonies than the tears and sighs of the few beholders. Upon the coffin was a plate of silver fixt with these words only, 'King Charles 1648.' When the coffin was put in, the black velvet pall that had covered it was thrown over it, and then the earth thrown in; which the governor stayed to see perfectly done, and then took the keys of the church.

"I have been the longer, and the more particular in this relation, that I may from thence take occasion to mention what fell out long after, and which administered a subject of much discourse; in which, according to the several humours and fancies of men, they who were in nearest credit and trust about the king, underwent many very severe censures and reproaches, not without reflection upon the king himself. Upon the return of king Charles the 2d with so much congratulation, and universal joy of the people, above ten years after the murder of his father, it was generally expected that the body should be removed from that obscure burial, and, with such ceremony as should be thought fit, should be solemnly deposited with his royal ancestors in king Henry the 7th's chapel in the collegiate church of Westminster. And the king himself intended nothing more, and spoke often of it, as if it were only deferred till some circumstances and ceremonies in the doing it might be adjusted. But, by degrees, the discourse of it was diminished, as if it were totally laid aside upon some reasons of state, the ground whereof several men guessed at according to their fancies, and thereupon cast those reproaches upon the statesmen as they thought reasonable, when the reasons which were suggested by their own imaginations, did not satisfy their understanding. For the satisfaction and information of all men, I choose in this place to explain that matter; which it may be is not known to many: and at that time was not, for many reasons, thought fit to be published. The duke of Richmond was dead before the king returned; the marquis of Hertford died in a short time after, and was seldom out of his lodging after his majesty came to Whitehall: the earl of Southampton and the earl of Lindsey went to Windsor, and took with them such of their own servants as had attended them in that service, and as many others as they remembered had been then present, and were still alive; who all amounted to a small number; there being, at the time of the interment, great strictness used in admitting any to be present whose names were not included in the order which the lords had brought. In a word, the confusion they had at that time observed to be in that church, and the small alterations which were begun to be made towards decency, so totally perplexed their memories that they could not satisfy themselves in what place, or part of the church the royal body was interred: Yet, where any concurred upon this, or that place, they caused the ground to be opened at a good distance, and, upon such enquiries, found no cause to believe that they were near the place: and, upon their giving this account to the king, the thought of that remove was laid aside, and the reason communicated to very few, for the better discountenancing further enquiry."

Upon this passage Kennett observes: "It has been made a question and a wonder by some persons, why a monument was not erected for him after the restoration of his son, when the commons were well inclined to have given a sum of money for that grateful purpose. We are afraid, the true reason was, that the royal body could not be found; those who murdered it had disturbed it in the very grave, and had carried it away, and God alone knows whether they gave it any second interment."

Milton, in his "Defensio Secunda pro Populo Anglicano," has left a masterly representation of Bradshaw; and lord Clarendon says something of him. The contrast, with respect to facts as well as sentiments, between the two accounts, gives additional interest to the dignified and splendid eloquence of Milton. Lord Clarendon, speaking of the constitution of the High Court of Justice for the Trial of King Charles the First, says, "They were to make choice of a Speaker or Prolocutor, who should be called Lord President of that High Court, who must manage and govern all the proceedings there, ask the witnesses all proper questions, and answer what the prisoner should propose. And to that office one Bradshaw was chosen, a lawyer of Grays-Inn, not much known in Westminster-hall, though of good practice in his chamber, and much employed by the factious. He was a gentleman of an ancient family in Cheshire and Lancashire, but of a fortune of his own making. He was not without parts, and of great insolence and ambition. When he was first nominated, he seemed much surprised, and very resolute to refuse it; which he did in such a manner, and so much enlarging upon his own want of abilities to undergo so important a charge, that it was very evident he had expected to be put to that apology. And when he was pressed with more importunity than could have been used by chance, he required 'time to consider of it;' and said, 'he would then give his final answer;' which he did the next day; and with great humility accepted the office, which he administered with all the pride, impudence, and superciliousness imaginable. He was presently invested in great state, and many officers, and a guard assigned for the security of his person, and the dean's house at Westminster given to him for ever for his residence and habitation, and a good sum of money, about 5,000*l.* was appointed to be presently paid to him, to put himself in such an equipage and way of living, as the dignity of the office which he held would require. And now, the Lord President of the High Court of Justice, seemed to be the greatest magistrate in England. And though it was not thought seasonable to make any such declaration, yet some of those whose opinions grew quickly into ordinances, upon several occasions, declared, 'That they believed that office was 'not to be looked upon as necessary pro hac 'vice only, but for a continuance; and that he 'who executed it, deserved to have an ample 'and a liberal estate conferred upon him for 'ever:' which sudden mutation and exaltation of fortune, could not but make a great impression upon a vulgar spirit, accustomed to no excesses, and acquainted only with a very moderate fortune."

The Poet writes thus: "*Est Joannes Bradscianus (quod nomen libertas ipsa, quâcûnque gentium colitur, memoriæ sempiternæ celebrandum commendavit) nobili familiâ, ut satis notum est, ortus; unde patriis legibus addiscendis primam omnem ætatem sedulè impendit: dein consultiſſimus causarum et disertissimus patronus, libertatis et populi vindex acerrimus, et magnis reipublicæ negotiis est adhibitus, et incorrupti judicis munere aliquoties perfunctus. Whitelocke, as we have seen, ante, vol. 4, p. 1128, pithily denominates Bradshaw "No friend to Monarchy." On the same occasion he says of him, that "he was a stout man, and learned in his profession." In another place, under date March 20th 1649, Whitelocke speaks of him as spending in the Council of State much time in urging "long arguments, which are inconvenient in state matters, his part being only to gather the sense of the Council, and to state the question, not to deliver his own opinion." Ludlow records some instances of Bradshaw's stoutness, one of which may be seen in a note to Streater's Case, ante, p. 366.

"Sir John Bourchier, who had been one of the king's judges, and had rendered himself within the time limited by the proclamation, being of a great age, and very infirm, was permitted to lodge at a private house belonging to one of his daughters. In this place he was seized with so dangerous a fit of illness, that those about him, who were his nearest relations, despairing of his recovery, and presuming, that an acknowledgment from him of his sorrow for the part he had in the condemnation of the king, might tend to procure some favour to them from those in power, they earnestly pressed him to give them that satisfaction. But he being highly displeased with their request, rose suddenly from his chair, which for some days he had not been able to do without assistance; and, receiving fresh vigour from the memory of that action, said, 'I tell you, it was a just 'act. God, and all good men, will own it.' And, having thus expressed himself, he sat down again, and soon after quietly ended his life." 3 Ludlow, 88.

1 Kings ii 36, 37. And the King sat and caused Shimei, and said unto him, Build thee a house in Jerusalem, and go forth from thence any whither: for thou shalt be on that day, when thou shalt go out, and passest over the Brook Kidron, thou shalt know for certain, thou shalt surely die; thy blood shall be upon thine own head.

Pr. ii 28. Mercy and Truth preserves the King, and his Throne is established by Mercy.

Just. Spectandum, an in conventionem fidem Medorum elegit.

"Honoured Sir; At your return into the country, I received yours of the 10th instant, which signified your serious debates, and union in Parliament, in the matters which concern this Church and State. For this I thank you, and in this I rejoice with you.

"In your letter you are pleased to put on me a task, which you, knowing me so well, cannot but know, must needs be unpleasant to me, viz. To consider the Case of the Condemned Traitors now in the Tower, waiting for Execution; and impartially to communicate to you my thoughts, concerning the Security as to their Lives, which they challenge, and some on their behalfs plead; the Question you have thus stated:

"Whether the Condemned Traitors, who rendered themselves according to the Proclamation of his Majesty, and on trial stand Condemned, may with Justice and Honour to the King and Kingdom, be Executed upon a Bill or Act of Parliament to be past for that purpose?"

"Sir, I do not a little wonder you should charge this work on me, who indeed am yours to my power, but at such enmity with all agents in that barbarous murder of our late king of glorious memory, that I could with Tertullus accuse them, better than with Gamaliel make the least apology, though never so rational for the security of any one of them; how often have I imprecated God's vengeance on them? and attended the healths drunk to their confusion; triumphed in their conviction and condemnation; and trotted at the reprieves of their execution? Must I now by your command be constrained to appear advocate for their blood, which spilt many years since might have prevented the spilling much gallant, noble, English blood? yea, and what is ten thousand times more precious, the royal blood of the only protestant king and prince.

"And really Sir, I should adventure a denial of your demands, your desire being so contrary to my judgment, were I not awed into a compliance, by the transcendent splendour of his majesty's clemency, conjuring down the spirit of revenge, and all vindictive thoughts raised by the late rebellion; but, presuming your enquiry to spring from the same principle, I dare not but endeavour your resolution.

"Sir, I must in this undertaking enquire, in what sense you understand the term Justice. If strictly and properly as opposed to Wrong. Who knows not that a parliament, which may dispose of all our lives at pleasure, may justly execute those, whom the law, by a judicial and regular process, hath condemned? But just as much as common just, warranted by our laws may seem, Jure Civili, to be summum jus. as it was in the case of the renowned Thos. Cromwell, concerning whose attainer by parliament, a judicious lawyer [lord Coke] hath asserted, oblivio est potest, non est compunctio conscientium legat, I must conceive by justice to mean equity, the bridle of summum jus, or truth opposed unto breach of faith; your constant honour is my conduct to this interpretation, and your query is,

"Whether the Condemned Prisoners, who rendered themselves upon the Proclamation of his Majesty, published by the authority of his Parliament, being on Trial Convicted and Condemned, may with Equity, Truth and Honour in King and Parliament be Executed, on a Bill passed for that purpose?"

"Sir, the resolve (my judgment on deliberate thoughts doth compel me to give) to this query is negative, so repugnant to my former sentiments, and expressed desire, that I am reduced to the strait of the lord Digby in the Case of the late unhappy earl of Strafford, and must express in his words, 'I am still the same in mine opinions and affections to the Earl; I confidently believe him (them) the most dangerous minister of state, the most unsupportable to free subjects that can be characterized; I believe his (their) practices in themselves as high as ever subject ventured on; I believe him (them) the grand apostate to the Commonwealth, who must not expect to be pardoned it, in this, till dispatched into another world; And yet let me tell you, Sir, my hand must not be to that dispatch; I protest as my conscience stands informed, I had rather it were off'."

"Verily Sir, though these men's crime is more obvious and notorious, I humbly conceive, the reasons which supersede their execution, are more weighty than were or could be by any pleaded in the case of that honourable person, whose quality and singularity, with the popular out-cry, might, had his conviction been just and clear, have necessitated his execution, who had no security for his life save his prince's favour; whilst our condemned prisoners cling close to the faith and honour of their sovereign, to keep them from the gallows; which, Sir, I must, in sobriety and plainness tell you, if right reason must direct their execution, will prevent their being turned off the ladder, though they were tied up to the tree; and cause them to be led back to prison, to be otherwise disposed at his majesty's pleasure. But to come to the pinch of the case, and crisis of the query.

* See 2 Colb. Parl. Hist. 749.

"I read, Sir, in Justin's History, the Medes (the empire not yet obtained) made certain cities tributary, and conceded to them immunities and liberties, larger than the empire would allow; which once possessed, it was disputed, 'Whether in Justice and Honour the former indulged Privileges must be maintained? To resolve which, this rule was dictated, 'Spec-tandum est, an in Conventione fidei Medo-rum elegissent.' It is to be considered, Whether they chose, confided in the faith of the Medes.

"Sir, the public faith of any people and nation is the most sacred and inviolable security that can be given; as the only bond of human society, in so much that the chosen, confided in sense thereof, beyond the intent of the persons plighting or the strict constructions of the words, must be maintained and oblige; as is evident in the case of the Gibeonites, on which a late prelate of our church doth comment; 'Joshua might have taken advantage of their own words, and have said, you are come from a far country, these cities are near, these are not therefore the people to whom we are engaged; Israel had put in a direct caveat against vicinity; Joshua's heart was far from making a league with a Canaanite.' Bishop Hall's Contemplations, p. 918. Grotius de Jure Belli et Pacis. lib. 2, cap. 13, p. 290. Yet were these Gibeonites, condemned in the directions given by God concerning the Canaanites, secured as to their lives; though not other concerns, and their execution 300 years after by the authority of king Saul, judged a perfidious murder, avenged by the Lord, and only expiated by the blood of the executioner's posterity.

"If, Sir, these have on any probable ground chosen, confided in the faith and honour of our king and kingdom; yet, whatsoever I have said in the heat of revenge, I cannot but, in cool blood, commend the deliberation of his majesty and the parliament, in the weighty matters of mens' lives, and confess, 'Secundæ cogitationes sunt meliores.' For, Sir, being put, by your command, to consider these Traitors' claim, I am constrained to conclude for, and not against their lives; of which they must needs be judged unworthy. The ground of these mens' claim as to the security of their lives, is the Proclamation of his majesty the 6th of June, 1660, by advice of the lords and commons then in parliament assembled, the tenor whereof is thus:

"Whereas Owen Roe, Augustine Garland, Robert Tichbourne, &c. being deeply guilty of that most detestable and bloody treason, in sitting upon, and giving judgment against the life of our royal father; and out of a sense of their own guilt, have lately fled and obscured themselves, whereby they cannot be apprehended and brought to a personal trial for their said treasons, according to law. We do therefore by the advice of our lords and commons in parliament assembled, command, publish and declare, by this our Proclamation,

'That all and every the persons before named, shall within fourteen days next after the publishing of this our royal Proclamation, personally appear, and render themselves to our Speaker, &c. Under pain of being excepted from any pardon or indemnity, both for their respective lives and estates.'

"To this Proclamation these men have conformed, and within the time limited, according to the directions given, they rendered themselves to trial; confiding in the faith and honour of the king on the advice of his lords and commons assembled in parliament, as their security to escape the penalty, so as not to be excepted from all pardon; but that their estates being taken, their lives (being the all left them, and liable to execution) they doubt not, the grace of this Proclamation intended to preserve, to run out their course in nature.

"It must, Sir, be granted, this proclamation containeth no positive express terms, which might fully speak the intention of his majesty, and his parliament, towards the lives of these miscreants, and give an absolute indisputable security for them; nor indeed is this the question; for this granted, voideth not their claim; which is only this, 'Fidem Anglorum in conventione elegimus,' we chose, confided in England's faith, in the proclamation of the king on advice of parliament.

"Sir, all civilians determine, the words of any covenant to bind in that sense which they understand and believe who are in them concerned, and to whom the security is by them engaged; otherwise ambiguous terms would fallaciously void all covenants; and truly all human security, this (as I have before noted) was the case of the Gibeonites, beyond the intention and seeming expressions of Joshua and his princes.

"Sir, resolving myself into their condition, to give a faithful and impartial judgment (without passion or prejudice) on these men's claim; I humbly conceive there are many considerable things, which concur and constitute this royal Proclamation a full moral security for their lives, viz.

"First, the Proclamation is penned in a stile of clemency, and the words bear to these men a most favourable aspect, being varied from the expressions usual in a mere summons to judgment. For

"1. It complains they were fled, obscured themselves, whereby they could not be apprehended and brought to a personal and legal trial; (not that they had escaped from justice, the proper plaint of a mere summons) as if their conviction and condemnation were all intended, whereupon they are required to appear and render themselves to trial (not to justice) for this Proclamation can expect no answer beyond what it chargeth.

"2. The Proclamation is sub poena, under pain of being excepted from pardon, saith the title any pardon both for life and estate, saith the body of it, with terms of discrimination, implying the one being accepted, the other might be which was admitted; and so far declared by sir Orlando Bridgman lord chief justice in that commission; that the spectators (most fit and proper expositors in all judicial proceedings, which hath ever caused courts of judicature to be open) did understand, and conclude, though these men were condemned, yet their lives were secured unto them.

"If sir, these eight considerations being put together, do not spell this octo-syllabon, Public-faith-securing-their-lives, as a thing legible to them and all sober men resolved into their case, to be rationally chosen, concluded and confided in, I must go again to school to learn my A. B. C. and will advise Baxter, Goffe, Whaley and others not trusting to the Proclamation, but securing their own lives, to write over every gate, under every quarter of these men, when executed, 'credulous fools:' and Dixwell and his fellow petitioners to write over the door of the house of commons, who admitted not their surrendering themselves, 'blessed severity:' the condition of these men by confidence of grace being tendered worse than theirs that fled from it.

"But some zealous and royal hearts, grudging the least grace to such regicides, will object (that with which I have this long time passionately deceived myself and others) and say, sir, you discourse of the nature of a covenant, and plead for these miscreants lives, as if his majesty and the parliament had passed with them a formal and positive contract; whereas the Proclamation is a bare summons for such (who in conscience of their guilt) were fled, and obscured, that they appear and abide the trial of the law, which was their duty, without being directed by this Proclamation. To such I crave leave to answer. I grant the Proclamation is a summons, to what was duty without it, nor can they deny it is sub-pena which must necessarily imply a condition whereby the pain may be voided, otherwise it is in vain expressed.

"Sir, Civilians tell us of a 'Pactum vetans' a covenant of prohibition used in human society, and declare 'pactum vetans magis vincit jubentem, quam positive jubens?' it more strongly obligeth the superior, than a positive precept; All summons is a covenant of this nature, and therefore most sacred and inviolable; so as that a cessation from the thing forbidden, must necessarily void the penalty. Nature teacheth the mother, with a rod in her hand, to call in the wild wanton child, on pain of being whipt, if overtaken and fetched in; the child confiding in her words, returneth with speed and escapeth the correction; the general to summon a garrison to be yielded within 24 hours, on pain of burning to the town, and slaughter to every man; they yield to the summons, and are saved: our law directs a Proclamation on pain of an out-law, the defendant appeareth and hath liberty of plea. His late majesty (as do all princes in like case) summoned such as followed the earl of Essex to lay down their arms, and repair to their houses within six days, on pain of being judged Rebels and Traitors; some accordingly returned and avoided the penalty; in these and the like cases the penalty could not be inflicted without barbarous breach of faith and high dishonour.

"The nature, usage, and obligation of a 'pactum vetans,' is commended by many examples in Holy Writ, as Joab's summons of the city of Abell to render rebellious Sheba to justice, on pain of being sacked: And Solomon's confinement of Abiathar to his city Anathoth, and Shimei to his house on pain of death; Abell did escape by the head of Sheba, nor had Shimei died had he kept within his bounds as did Abiathar.

"This Proclamation is a summons of duty but sub-pena; and so a covenant though 'vetans,' to the future latency of these men; the nature of the pain is their advantage: had it been (what is usual in cases of this nature) a summons to appear on pain of being concluded guilty, and to suffer without mercy; their appearance had secured to them a due and fair trial, in which to plead for their lives; but the pain of being excepted from pardon both for life and estate must needs secure them the one; otherwise what is the pain to be avoided by obedience to the prohibition?

"This 'pactum vetans' is so natural to men, so suitable to sovereign majesty, a security so sacred and inviolably obliging in human society, that God himself maketh it his first transaction with his creature man; In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt die the death, was the form and tenor of the first covenant; will any man deny the same to assure life on the condition of the prescribed abstinence from the forbidden fruit?

"Civilians render three, I shall make them four, reasons why a 'pactum vetans,' a covenant of prohibition, should more firmly oblige the prescriber, than a positive precept, and more express covenant; every of these reasons concur, in our Traitors' case, to corroborate their claim:

"1. The matter thereby prohibited is special, not general, [obscure not yourselves from a legal trial,] and their rule is, 'peculiare et quod ad rem propius accedit, magis obligat quam generale,' what is special, and cometh nearest the matter, doth more bind, than what is general and more remote.

"2. The time in such covenants is limited, which being slipt, they may sit down and sing that Cyrene song, 'Fronte capillata post est occasio calva,' Oh that we had known in that our day the things which concerned our peace, but are now hid from our eyes. [Appear and render yourselves within fourteen days.] Hence Dixwell and his fellow petitioners, could not procure one day, to the grace exhibited in the proclamation; the rule is 'quod faciendum est certo tempore, magis obligat quam quod quovis tempore fieri potest;' what is to be done in a certain time, bindeth more, than what is to be done at any time.

"3. This kind of covenant usually passeth sub pœna; implying immunity and escape; [on pain of being excepted from any pardon both for life and estate] the rule is ('quod pœnam adjunctam habet, magis obligat quam quod pœna vacat,' a prohibition with penalty binds more than that without; they could be but drawn out of their dens to Tyburn, if they had not appeared according to the Proclamation.

"4. The condition of the 'pactum vetans' is prescribed, not capitulated, imposed by majesty and authority, condescending to mitigate severity, and release rigour; leaving the 'liberum arbitrium' of the men concerned, to this bare choice, come and appear within fourteen days, or be excepted from any pardon both for life and estate: (more than which cannot befall those that are fled, and refused to appear) and this rule cannot be denied 'authoritate præscripta, magis obligant quam capitulata;' terms imposed by authority do more strictly bind, than terms capitulated upon a fair and equal treaty.

"Sir, on the serious consideration of these men's claim, I see not how it can be denied, they have the public faith of the kingdom engaged for their lives; the violation whereof must be greatly dishonourable to the king and parliament; yea, though by a bill to be passed for their execution; which I humbly conceive is below a parliament; who may, with more justice and honour, by their legislative power, on politic and prudent grounds, take away the life of one whom the law cannot convict and condemn, than direct the execution of them over whom the law had full power, until barred by the force of public faith, rationally claimed to supersede this last act.

To pretend they were not a parliament, who give this security, according to the strictness of our law, and nation's constitution, will not make an objection of any strength: For

"1. The question is not about an ordinary process in our law; but a transaction purely determinable by the civil law; the rules of common justice and honour among men.

"2. They were a full and free convention, and collective body of the kingdom, capable to represent the nation, and engage the faith thereof, though convened by a defective erroneous writ, through the necessity of the times, and estate of the kingdom.

"3. They were the first free parliament, the fruit of all the convulsions and commotions occasioned by our desired liberty, and we were to be ruled, and in all cases resolved by our own reasons, declared by representatives of our own choice.

"4. They were his majesty's parliament, convened for his sake, to his happy and honourable return; (by which our land hath been revived) legitimated by his adoption, animated by his presence, and corroborated by his concurrence; pardon being the eminent and indisputable prerogative of his imperial crown: whose royal faith hereby engaged, inviolably secureth some grace to these poor wretches.

"These things do evidence that parliament to have been sufficiently capacitated to give an assurance by public faith; which cannot be avoided by defect of a punctilio, or circumstance peculiar to our law; but doth so strengthen these prisoners gates and bars, that I cannot but profess, I see not how they can ever be drawn to execution, without drawing the guilt and disgrace of cruelty, revenge and perfidy on a faith-keeping prince and parliament, though by a bill to be passed for that purpose.

"Honoured Sir, did these traitors want this claim, or their claim want reason, yet common prudence, and the honour of his majesty's clemency now seemeth to me to be a considerable supersedeas to the execution of them: For, Sir,

"1. The splendor of his majesty's clemency (the và esse say the Græcians, the honour of a just man say the Romans) being much clouded by the universality of the object, many singulars thinking they needed no act of grace, and some resolved against an act of oblivion; doth sparkle with such orient brightness, by the superseding the execution of these defamed, convicted, condemned individuals: it hereby existing in its full proportion and very formality, (which Favorinus thus defines, as Grotius doth thus translate, "ea quæ dicitur clementia apud homines est tempestiva relaxatio summi juris," and I must English, clemency is to save the life of a malefactor tied up to the gallows) that I cannot desire to see it darkened by such an act as revenge may justly provoke, but the vulgar judging by sense will not discern.

"2. The quality of these persons, and their present estate, doth abate the fury conceived against them, they seem to be so weak in their naturals, that their being parliament men (which lead them into temptation) may be almost judged their greatest crime; they appear too simple to have been first imaginers of that horrid regicide, or agitators of that High Court (or to use his majesty's phrase) chief authors of that murder: And then, Sir, they are not the intended objects of the declared expectation from his royal grace and pardon; I cannot without smiling, remember how the poor men's consciences were troubled at the terms, traitorously, maliciously, in their Indictment, (on which the solicitor did acutely gloss; My lord, they think they might sentence the king to death, meekly, innocently, charitably and honestly) which certainly did so far bespeak their simplicity, that had our law allowed accessaries in treason, judge and jury would have saved them by their clergy: How tremblingly did they beg to wave their plea, (as if run into a premunire, by pleading not guilty) that they might confess and be hanged without this grace interposed? No doubt the court was well pleased with their profound apologies; one pleading, I was young, in infancy, eating sour grapes, not knowing they would set mine, much less my children's teeth on edge, another I withstood, gainsaid that wicked sentence, yet was simply drawn in to sign and seal the same: a third, I looked but over the hedge, I appeared once and again among, and as a member of that wicked pack with an intent to prevent their mischief, against which I got an assembly man to pray with me. Yet, Sir, are these weak men condemned, attainted in blood, their estate confiscated, and by spending their miserable lives in prison, as it were hanged in chains, as mere living monuments, of God and the king's justice (which hath already swallowed up the capital offenders) and were lasting spectacles of dread to future regicides, than their withering quarters are capable of; being a lively comment on Psal. lix. ver. 11. 'Slay 'not them, lest my people forget it.' For my part I think justice is not more orient by that restraint of clemency, sparing to those men that little which is dearest to them: than by the merciful reserve of such dreadful spectacles for men to behold and consider; insomuch that I could almost envy their very nature, and death itself, which ere long will remove them from a piece of pity, so prudently severe.

3. "The end of punishment must be caution, not revenge; excellent is the saying of Plato, which the serious Seneca thus rendereth, "nemo prudens punit quia peccatum est sed ne peccatur; revocari enim præterit a non posset, futura prohibentur," and again, "ne homini quidem nocebimus quia peccavit, sed ne peccet, nec unquam ad præteritum, sed ad futurum referetur pœna; non enim irascitur sed cavet." The God of justice hath prescribed punishment, that others might hear and fear and do no more so wickedly; so far as the execution of the same looketh back, it is revenge, and only punishment by looking forward, at this end it must be leveled, and accordingly squared; 'pœna ad paucos, metus ad omnes,' is a rule directing all executions; justice is ordinarily satisfied by the execution of a few chief offenders: the cutting off the multitude under the same guilt, is over sanguinary and revengeful; martial law alloweth equal mutiners in an army, the chance of a dice on a drum head, for the single example of their mutiny. Prudent princes ever proclaimed their justice by the execution of a few of the many condemned malefactors; Sheba's head was judged a sufficient sacrifice for the many rebels he had seduced. Our king Henry the 7th made his justice triumph more in Lambert Symnells, turning his spit: and Perkin Warbeck looking through the iron grates; than by the turning the one or the other over the ladder, though both were counterfeit pretenders to the crown, unto bloody and dangerous rebellions: his late martyred majesty charged his son should not revenge (whilst he could not but punish) his death; and his majesty as obedient to the charge, declared to except from all pardon, some few chief authors of that murder, which the commons first computed to be seven, as a sufficient number.

"Sir, These things considered, were not the faith and honour of this kingdom engaged to secure the lives of those condemned persons; I could not but adore his majesty's clemency in their thus long reprieve, which I now desire may continue; being convinced that such who shall provoke our David to cut off these Shimei's (most wisely confined to their proper places) will be found Abishais, sons of Zeruiab, too hard, for him, and adversaries to him; who hereby maketh all the world to know he is king of England; graciously holding the sword of justice which justly hangs over, from falling on the neck of these regicides.

"Sir, pardon my plainness and prolixity in this rude discourse, for which if I be called to the bar of the house, for intermeddling with the 'arcana imperii,' I must plead your command as my commission; and expect your defence of Your most humble and obliged servant, August 20, 1661. PHILOPATER PHILOROT."

"There was one instance," lord Clarendon tells us, "that perplexed the king, which was the case of colonel Ingoldsby; who was in the number of the late king's judges, and whose name was in the warrant for his murder. He, from the deposal of Richard, had declared, that he would serve the king, and told Mr. Mordaunt, 'that he would perform all services 'he could, without making any conditions; 'and would be well content, that his majesty, 'when he came home, should take his head off, 'if he thought fit; only he desired that the 'king might know the truth of his case;' which was this: He was a gentleman of a good extraction, and near allied to Cromwell, who had drawn him into the army before, or about the time when he came first to age, where he grew to be a colonel of horse, and to have the reputation of great courage against the enemy, and of equal civility to all men. It is very true, he was named amongst those who were appointed to be judges of the king; and it is as true, that he was never once present with them, always abhorring the action in his heart, and having no other passion in any part of the quarrel, but his personal kindness to Cromwell. The next day after the horrid sentence was pronounced, he had an occasion to speak with an officer, who, he was told, was in the Painted Chamber; where, when he came thither, he saw Cromwell, and the rest of those who had sat upon the king, and were then, as he found afterwards, assembled to sign the warrant for the king's death. As soon as Cromwell's eyes were upon him, he run to him, and taking him by the hand, drew him by force to the table; and said, 'though he had escaped him all the while 'before, he should now sign that paper as well 'as they;' which he, seeing what it was, refused with great passion, saying, 'he knew 'nothing of the business;' and offered to go away. But Cromwell, and others, held him by violence; and Cromwell, with a loud laughter, taking his hand in his, and putting the pen between his fingers, with his own hand wrote 'Richard Ingoldsby,' he making all the resistance he could: and he said, 'if his name there were compared with what he had ever wrote himself, it could never be looked upon as his own hand.'—Though his majesty had within himself compassion for him, he would never send him any assurance of his pardon; presuming that, if all these allegations were true, there would be a season when a distinction would be made, without his majesty's declaring himself, between him and those other of that bloody list, which he resolved never to pardon. Nor was Ingoldsby at all disheartened with this, but pursued his former resolutions, and first surprised the castle of Windsor (where there was a great magazine of arms and ammunition) and put out that governor whom the Rump had put in; and afterwards took Lambert prisoner, as is before remembered."

Some things about the Regicides are to be found in Noble's Memoirs of Cromwell's Family, and his Lives of the Regicides, neither of which works however is very satisfactory. Ludlow, with some others, retired to Switzerland, where he died in 1698, in his seventy-third year. In his Memoirs he relates the repeated attempts which were made by the family of Charles to assassinate him and his associates there, and other curious parts of their history. Upon the Revolution he came to England with an expectation of being employed by King William in Ireland; but he was soon compelled to return in consequence of an Address of the Commons, (See 5 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 412) which was presented to the king by sir Edward Seymour, to whom had been granted Ludlow's forfeited estate in Wiltshire.

Whaley, Goffe and Dixwell fled to America. Hutchinson, in his History of Massachusetts Bay, gives the following curious account of them:

"In the ship which arrived from London, the 27th of July 1660, there came passengers col. Whaley and col. Goffe, two of the late king's judges. Col. Goffe brought testimonials from Mr. John Rowe and Mr. Seth Wood, two ministers of a church in Westminster. Col. Whaley had been a member of Mr. Thomas Goodwin's church. Goffe kept a journal or diary from the day he left Westminster, May 4, until the year 1667, which together with several other papers belonging to him I have in my possession. Almost the whole is in characters of short hand, not very difficult to decypher. The story of these persons has never yet been published to the world. It has never been known in New-England. Their papers after their death were collected, and have remained near a hundred years in a library in Boston. It must give some entertainment to the curious. They left London before the king was proclaimed. It does not appear that they were among the most obnoxious of the judges, but as it was expected vengeance would be taken of some of them, and a great many had fled, they did not think it safe to remain. They did not attempt to conceal their persons or characters when they arrived at Boston, but immediately went to the governor, Mr. Endicott, who received them very courteously. They were visited by the principal persons of the town, and among others they take notice of col. Crown's coming to see them. He was a noted royalist. Although they did not disguise themselves, yet they chose to reside at Cambridge, a village about four miles distant from the town, where they went the first day they arrived. They went publicly to meetings on the Lord's days, and to occasional lectures, fasts, and thanksgivings, and were admitted to the sacrament, and attended private meetings for devotion, visited many of the principal towns, and were frequently at Boston, and once, when insulted there, the person insulting them was bound to his good behaviour. They appeared grave, serious and devout, and the rank they had sustained commanded respect. Whaley had been one of Cromwell's lieutenant generals, and Goffe a major-general. It is not strange that they should meet with this favourable reception, nor was this reception any contempt of the authority in England. They were known to have been two of the king's judges, but king Charles the second was not proclaimed when the ship that brought them left London. They had the news of it in the channel. The reports afterwards by way of Barbadoes were that all the judges would be pardoned but seven. The act of indemnity was not brought over until the last of November. When it appeared that they were not excepted, some of the principal persons in the government were alarmed, pity and compassion prevailed with others. They had assurances from some that belonged to the general court that they would stand by them, but were advised by others to think of removing. The 22d of February the governor summoned a court of assistants to consult about securing them, but the court did not agree to it. Finding it unsafe to remain any longer, they left Cambridge the 26th following and arrived at New-Haven the 7th of March. One capt. Breckan, who had seen them at Boston, gave information thereof upon his arrival in England. A few days after their removal, an hue and cry, as they term it in their diary, was brought by the way of Barbadoes, and thereupon a warrant to secure them issued, the 8th of March, from the governor and assistants, which was sent to Springfield and the other towns in the western parts of the colony, but they were beyond the reach of it."

* "They were well treated at New-Haven by the ministers and some of the magistrates, and for some days seemed to apprehend themselves out of danger. But the news of the king's proclamation being brought to New-Haven, they were obliged to abscond. The 27th of March they removed to Milford, and appeared there in the day time and made themselves known, but at night returned privately to New-Haven, and lay concealed in Mr. Davenport the minister's house until the 30th of April. About that time, news came to Boston that ten of the judges were executed, and the governor received a royal mandate dated March 5, 1660, to cause Whaley and Goffe to be secured. This greatly alarmed the country, and there was no doubt that the court were now in earnest in their endeavours to apprehend them; and to avoid all suspicion they gave commission and instructions to two young merchants from England, Thomas Kellond and Thomas Kirk, zealous royalists, to go through the colonies as far as Manhados in search of them. They had friends who informed them what was doing, and they removed from Mr. Davenport's to the house of one Jones, where they lay hid until the 11th of May, and then removed to a mill, and from thence on the 13th into the woods where they met Jones and two of his companions, Sperry and Burrill, who first conducted them to a place called Hatchet-harbour, where they lay two nights, until a cave or hole in the side of a hill was prepared to conceal them. This hill they called Providence hill, and there they continued from the 15th of May to the 11th of June, sometimes in the cave, and in very tempestuous weather in a house near to it. During this time the messengers went through New-Haven to the Dutch settlement, from whence they returned to Boston by water. They made diligent search and had full proof that the regicides had been seen at Mr. Davenport's, and offered great rewards to English and Indians who should give information that they might be taken, but by the fidelity of their three friends they remained undiscovered. Mr. Davenport was threatened with being called to an account for concealing and comforting traitors, and might well be alarmed. They had engaged to surrender rather than the country or any particular persons should suffer upon their account, and upon intimation of Mr. Davenport's danger, they generously resolved to go to New-Haven and deliver themselves up to the authority there. The miseries they had suffered and were still exposed to, and the little chance they had of finally escaping in a country where every stranger is immediately known to be such, would not have been sufficient to have induced them. They let the deputy governor Mr. Leete know where they were, but he took no measures to secure them, and the next day some persons came to them to advise them not to surrender. Having publicly shewn themselves at New-Haven, they had cleared Mr. Davenport from the suspicion of still concealing them, and the 24th of June went into the woods again to their cave. They continued there, sometimes venturing to a house near the cave, until the 19th of August, when the search for them being pretty well over, they ventured to the house of one Tomkins near Milford, where they remained two years, without so much as going into the orchard. After that, they took a little more liberty and made themselves known to several persons in whom they could confide, and each of them frequently prayed and also exercised, as they term it, or preached at private meetings in their chamber. In 1664 the commissioners from king Charles arrived at Boston. Upon the news of it they retired to their cave, where they tarried 8 or 10 days. Soon after, some Indians in their hunting discovered the cave with the bed, &c. and the report being spread abroad, it was not safe to remain near it. On the 13th of October 1664 they removed to Hadley, near an hundred miles distant, travelling only by night, where Mr. Russell, the minister of the place, had previously agreed to receive them. Here they remained concealed fifteen or sixteen years, very few persons in the colony being privy to it. The last account of Goffe is from a letter dated Ebenezer, the name they gave their several places of abode, April 2d, 1679. Whaley had been dead some time before. The tradition at Hadley is, that two persons unknown were buried in the minister's cellar. The minister was no sufferer by his boarders. They received more or less remittances every year, for many years together, from their wives in England. Those few persons who knew where they were, made them frequent presents. Richard Saltonstall, esq. who was in the secret, when he left the country and went to England 1672, made them a present of fifty pounds at his departure, and they take notice of donations from several other friends. They were in constant terror, though they had reason to hope, after some years, that the enquiry for them was over. They read with pleasure the news of their being killed with other judges in Switzerland. Their diary for six or seven years contains every little occurrent in the town, church, and particular families in the neighbourhood. These were small affairs. They had indeed for a few years of their lives been among the principal actors in the great affairs of the nation, Goffe especially, who turned the members of the little parliament out of the house, and who was attached to Oliver and to Richard to the last; but they were both of low birth and education. They had very constant and exact intelligence of every thing which passed in England, and were unwilling to give up all hopes of deliverance. Their greatest expectations were from the fulfilment of the prophecies. They had no doubt that the execution of the judges was the slaying of the witnesses. They were much disappointed when the year 1666 had passed without any remarkable event, but flattered themselves that the Christian era might be erroneous. Their lives were miserable and constant burdens. They complain of being banished from all human society. A letter from Goffe's wife, who was Whaley's daughter, I think worth preserving. (Appendix.) After the second year Goffe writes by the name of Walter Goldsmith, and she of Frances Goldsmith, and the corresponthrough the blessing of God upon their endeavours, and the incomparable grace and goodness of his majesty's royal condescensions, have proved the happy instruments of repairing the breaches of this kingdom, restoring the antient foundations, and passing many good and wholesome laws for the safety and quiet of the people, and are daily preparing such others as may yet seem to be wanting.

"Nevertheless the said William Drake, in contempt of his majesty's crown and dignity, and of the laws and government of this kingdom, and out of a wicked and malicious intention to scandalize and subvert the authority and being of this present parliament,* and to raise and stir up sedition and division in this kingdom, and against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, hath lately, that is to say, upon or before the 18th day of November last at Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, written, printed, and published, in the name of one Thomas Phillips, gentleman, a certain false, wicked, malicious, and seditious Pamphlet, intituled, 'The Long Parliament revived; or An Act for continuation, and the not dissolving the Long Parliament, called by king Charles the First, in the year 1640, but by an act of parliament, with undeniable Reasons deduced from the said Act, to prove, that That Parliament is not yet dissolved. Also, Mr. William Pryne's five Arguments fully answered, whereby he endeavours to prove it to be dissolved by the King's Death, &c. By Thomas Phillips, Gentleman, a sincere Lover of the King and Country.' In which said scandalous and seditious Pamphlet the said Drake, amongst many other wicked expressions, clauses, and assertions therein contained, doth falsely, maliciously, and seditiously affirm and declare,

* "This Parliament was summoned, by writs issued under the direction of an ordinance, passed on the 16th of March, 1659, by the remainder of that house of commons that had been called by Charles the First, on the 3rd of November, 1640.—The ordinance was entitled, 'A Bill for dissolving the Parliament begun and holden at Westminster, on the 3rd of November, 1640, and for the calling and holding a Parliament at Westminster, on the 25th day of April, 1660.' It was however thought advisable, afterwards, when the legal government was re-established, to pass an act of parliament to remove all disputes concerning the assembling and sitting of this Parliament; and it was accordingly declared and enacted, 'That the Parliament begun and holden at Westminster, on the 3rd of November, 1640, is fully dissolved and determined, and that the Lords and Commons now sitting at Westminster, in this present parliament, are the two houses of parliament, to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever, notwithstanding any want of the king's writ of summons, or any other defect.' This bill received the royal assent on the 1st of June, 1660, immediately after the restoration." 2 Hatsell, 280,

1. That all other Parliaments have no legal capacity, till this (meaning the Long Parliament, called in the year 1640) be legally dissolved. 2. The Act (meaning the Act of Parliament to which the title of the Pamphlet refers) is herein express. That by no other way or means, but by an act of parliament, it shall be dissolved; which, as it cannot be done by the dead king, but may be done by the successor, it ought to be so dissolved; or else it must and doth by virtue of this act, still remain legally in full being and authority. 3. How much it were to be wished, that the legislative authority might revert into that channel (meaning the Long Parliament aforesaid) by which the peace and settlement of the nation, through his majesty's most gracious influence, might durably, and without question, be provided for and preserved. 4. If that be a lawful parliament, (speaking of the Long Parliament aforesaid, which he elsewhere affirmed to be in being) then this can be none, nor no other, till this be legally dissolved.

"All which practices for stirring up of sedition, the Commons are ready to prove, not only by the general scope of the said Book, but likewise by several clauses therein contained, besides these before-mentioned, and such other proofs as the cause, according to the course of parliament, shall require. And do pray, that the said William Drake may be put to answer all and every of the premises; and that such proceeding, examination, trial, judgment, and exemplary punishment, may be thereupon had and executed as is agreeable to law and justice."

The lords ordered this Impeachment to be read, after which they made another Order, That the said William Drake should be apprehended as a Delinquent, by the serjeant at arms, and brought before them the next morning, to answer to his charge; which being done, and he confessing his fault, the Lords, in consideration of the shortness of time for proceeding further in this business, left him to be prosecuted in the King's Bench by the Attorney General; where what further was done with him we know not.

"It appears, that though that Long Parliament had been dissolved by an Ordinance issued from the Rump Parliament, yet that it was thought necessary, after the Restoration, by an Act of Parliament, to declare, 'That that Parliament, begun and holden at Westminster on the 3rd of November, 1640, was fully dissolved and determined.' The royal assent had been given to this bill by king Charles 2, on the 1st of June, 1660; notwithstanding which, it appears, that, at the time Drake published this pamphlet, very considerable and legal doubts were still entertained upon this question; insomuch that, on the 24th of May, 1661, (subsequent to this Impeachment) the house of lords thought proper to call upon the judges to deliver their opinion upon it; and on the 6th of June, they order the Attorney General, to prepare a third bill upon this subject; which he does accordingly. So that the house of lords (by giving orders to the Attorney General, on the 19th of December, 1660, to prosecute Drake in the Court of King's Bench) acted prudently, in availing themselves of any excuse, however trifling, for removing the trial of this supposed offence from themselves to a court of law."

"What further steps were taken in this matter does not appear; probably no prosecution whatever was had; because, on the 31st of May, and 6th of June, 1661, the Lords themselves so far countenanced the doctrine contained in Drake's book, as to put a question to the Judges, 'Whether the Parliament, begun 'on the 3rd of November, 1640, is now determined?' and, though the Judges give an unanimous opinion in the affirmative, the Lords still think proper to order the Attorney General to prepare a declaratory bill upon this subject. I do not find any progress made in this bill (the third upon this subject) it certainly did not pass." 4 Hatsell, 135, 174.

207. Proceedings in Scotland against ARCHIBALD Marquis of ARGYLE, for High Treason: 12 & 13 CHARLES II. A. D. 1661.*

ON January 23, 1661, there was exhibited to the Parliament of Scotland, a Charge of High-Treason, &c. against Archibald Marquis of Argyle, which was as follows:

"Charles, by the grace of God, king of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, To heralds, pursuivants, and messengers of arms, respectively, conjunctly and severally, specially constituted, greeting. Forsomuch as it is humbly meant and complained to us, by our trusty and well-beloved counsellor, sir John

* "When the king was restored, on the promise of an amnesty to his English subjects, no indemnity was promised or proposed for Scotland; and it was deemed expedient that the nation should still remain at the mercy of the crown. Argyle, encouraged by some equivocal expressions of Charles, had repaired privately to court, but the royalists, who grasped at his possessions, were apprehensive of a crafty, insinuating statesman, whose former credit with the king might revive. On demanding admittance to the royal presence, he was committed to the Tower, and accused of a secret participation in the murder of the late king. His trial was transferred to Scotland, where he was produced and arraigned in parliament on separate indictments of oppression and treason. The severities inflicted on the royalists during the civil wars, and the cruelties retaliated on the adherents of Montrose, were accumulated in his indictments. He was accused as the author of every national act from the commencement of the wars; as an accessory to the surrender and execution of the king; and an actor under the late usurpation, in opposition to those who appeared for the crown. His defence was vigorous and plausible at least, if not always just. He affirmed that the atrocities imputed to his clan were partly fictitious, partly exaggerated; committed during his absence in England, from the violence of the times; and that a cruel revenge was to be expected from his people, whose country had been twice wasted with fire, and devoted to the sword. His transactions during the war were conducted under the authority of the legislature, to whom the surrender of the king must be ascribed; but his public transactions were protected from inquiry, by the act of oblivion, passed in consequence of the treaty of Rippon, and by the indemnity granted by Charles in the parliament at Stirling, of which the records were lost, but the memory was still recent in the minds of men. His compliance with the late usurpation was necessary for his preservation, or excusable from the contagious example of the times. While resistance was practicable he was the last to submit; but his solitary resistance, after the nation had submitted to a conqueror, would neither have secured himself, nor restored the king. From his peculiar situation in life, more than a passive compliance was required for his preservation; and if to mitigate the oppression of his country, he was returned a member to Richard's parliament, the recognition of a power de facto, and without his assistance in possession of the government, never implied an acknowledgment of its original title; much less a treasonable opposition to the rightful heir, while excluded from the throne. 'What could I think,' he exclaimed, 'or how suppose, that these unhappy compliances were criminal, at the time when a man so learned as his majesty's advocate, received the same oaths to the 'commonwealth with myself?' Sir John Fletcher, lord advocate, interrupted and reviled him in the most opprobrious terms, but he calmly replied, That he had learned in his afflictions to endure reproach; and perceiving his ruin predetermined, demanded, but was denied permission to submit implicitly to the mercy of the king.

"During this important trial, the most solemn which the nation had ever witnessed, lord Lorn was employed to solicit favour for his father at court. He procured a royal mandate, not to prosecute any public offences previous to the indemnity granted at Stirling, nor to pronounce a sentence, till the whole trial was submitted to the king. The first part of the order was imperfectly obeyed; the last, as expressive of a mistrust in parliament, was recalled. The commissioner, anxious that Argyle should suffer as a regicide, to prevent the restitution of his family to his estate and honours, undertook the management of the debate in person, which he conducted as if forgetful of his own dignity, or the decency requisite in a public character. From the secret consultations held with Cromwell, when invited to Scotland to suppress the engagement, he concluded that the interruption of the treaty at Newport, and the execution of the late king, had been concerted with Argyle. An attainder founded on such weak and remote presumptions, was abhorred by many, and was opposed by president Gilmour, with a force of argument that compelled the reluctant parliament to exculpate Argyle from all participation in the death of the king. Nothing but his compliance with the usurpation remained. While his condemnation was still uncertain, Monk, with his accustomed baseness, transmitted to parliament some confidential letters from Argyle, expressive of a cordial attachment to the Protector's government. They arrived after the evidence was finished, but were read by Middleton in the midst of the debate. The perfidious friendship of Monk, and the violation of every judicial form, excited general indignation; but the unexpected appearance of Argyle's correspondence silenced his friends, who withdrew from an unavailing opposition to his fate. Sentence of treason was immediately pronounced. He was condemned to be beheaded within two days, and his head to be affixed to the public prison, to replace that of Montrose, for whose remains a splendid funeral was appointed. He requested in vain a respite of ten days, till his sentence should be communicated to the king, and complained in the spirit of enthusiasm, 'I have placed the crown upon his head, and this is my reward! but he hastens me to a better crown than his own; nor can you deprive me of that eternal indemnity which you may require yourselves.'

Fletcher knight, our advocate for our interest, in the action under-written; and by sir James

"The interval between his sentence and execution was spent with the clergy, in religious exercises, and he prepared for death with a fortitude not expected from the natural timidity of his character. On the morning of his execution, he wrote a letter to the king, to vindicate his own memory and to implore protection for his son. He dined with his friends at noon, before ascending the scaffold, and was accompanied by several of the nobility to the place of execution. His appearance on the scaffold was solemn but intrepid. He spoke in vindication of his own innocence, deplored the times that were likely to ensue, and exhorted the people to suffer rather than to offend against their conscience, or to abandon the covenant. After an interval of devotion, he submitted his neck to the block, and his head was separated from his body by the descent of the maiden." 4 Laing, p. 11.

It is scarcely possible to omit an expression

Lamond of Inneryne knt. for himself and in the behalf of his kindred, friends, vassals, tenants and servants, parties grieved and damnified in manner after specified, upon Archibald marquis of Argyle;* George Campbell, his justice and sheriff deputy; James Campbell of Ardkinglas, officer under the said marquis's command; Colin Campbell of Straquhir, Duncan Campbell of Ellangreg, officer under the command of the said marquis; John Campbell fiare of Dunstafneich, officer also under the said marquis's command; Dougal Campbell alias Mackconnachie of Innerraw, officer under the said marquis's command; Duncan Campbell, uncle to the laird of Lochnell, officer under the said marquis's command; Robert Campbell of Auchinwilling, John Campbell of Ardtariche, Hew Campbell his son; Colin Campbell of Otter, Patrick Campbell his brother; ——— Campbell of Derburgh, Charles Campbell of Ballachyll, Ewer Campbell of Kilbryd his brother; Duncan Glassel alias Campbell in Glendarowell, John Ger Campbell, there; John Mackeroes, officer to the said George Campbell, Donald Mackeroes of Glenselloch, Andrew Macklauchlane, uncle to Archibald Macklauchlane of Lethimoore, Angus Mackehoernock son to Ewer Mackewernock of Obb, James Campbell of Ormsay; Dowgald Mackleriche of Bralychane, Duncan Macknileishe in Escog, Archibald Campbell in Evinnochane, son-in-law to the said laird of Otter, Mr. Colin Macklawchlane, minister at Lochgaylisheid: All or the most part of them, being the said marquis of Argyle's friends, followers, or complices under his command, and such as he might have stopt or let.

"That where notwithstanding by the 129 Act of the eighth Parliament of our dearest grandfather, king James the 6th of blessed memory, his majesty and his three estates then assembled in Parliament, ratified and approved the royal power and authority, over all estates, as well spiritual as temporal, within this realm, in the person of his majesty, his heirs and successors; and did statute and ordinance, that his highness and his successors by themselves, and their councils, were and should be judges competent to all persons, his highness's subjects, of whatsoever degree, function, estate, or condition they should be of, in all matters wherein they, or any of them, should be apprehended, summoned or charged to answer: And that none should presume, nor take upon hand, to decline the judgment of his highness, his heirs and successors, or their council, in the premises, under the pain of treason: And sick-like, by the first act of the eighth Parliament of our said dearest grand-of regret, that any page of Mr. Laing's valuable work should be disfigured by any semblance of the unnatural, unsatisfactory, innuendo, style of Gibbon.

father, king James the 6th, his majesty's sovereign authority, princely power, royal prerogative and privilege of his crown, over all estates, persons, and causes whatsoever. And the whole estates then convened in parliament for them, and their successors, faithfully promised, perpetually to acknowledge, obey, maintain, defend and advance the life, honour, safety, dignity, sovereign authority and prerogative royal of our said dearest grandfather, his heirs and successors, and privilege of the crown, with their lives, lands and goods; and to withstand all persons, powers and estates, who shall presume any ways to impugn, or prejudge the same. Which Act is ratified by the third act, by the first Parliament of king Charles the first, of blessed memory, our dearest father.

"Likeas, by the third and fourth acts of king James the first, his first Parliament, and by the 37 act of the second parliament of king James the first, and several other acts, it is statute, that none rebel against the king's person or authority; or if they do in the contrary, or make war against his lieges, or reset any such traitors, or supply them in red or council, or do favours to rebels, or any ways assist them, or do not rise at his majesty's command, being required; they being convicted thereof, are punishable as traitors. Likeas by the 134 act Parl. 8. the 10 act of the 10 Parl. of king James the 6th, all depravers of his majesty's laws, and meddlers in his majesty's affairs, or misconstruers of his proceedings, whereby any mistake may be moved between his majesty and his loving subjects, are punishable by death. Likeas by 1 act of king James the 5th, his third parliament, and by the 51 act of the 11 Parl. of king James the sixth, all burners of folks in their houses, all burners of houses and corns, and wilful fire-raising; as also all murder or slaughter of his majesty's lieges, where the party slain is under trust, credit, assurance and power of the slayer, the same is declared treason and lese-majesty. Likeas by the 75 act of queen Mary's parliament 9, and divers other acts, it is statute, that no manner of person or persons, of whatsoever quality, estate, condition or degree they be, lieges of this realm, attempt to raise any bands of men of war, on horse or foot, without special license in writ had and obtained of the queen's majesty for the time, and her successors, under the pain of death, to be executed upon the raisers and risers in arms. As also, by the 50 act of the 11 parliament of king James the sixth, it is statute and ordained, that in case it shall happen, any landed man to be convicted of the crime of common theft, resort of theft, or stealth, reist in time coming, they shall incur the crime and pain of treason; that is to say, rissell and forfeiture of life, lands, and goods. Likeas, by the common law and practice of this nation, all committers of murder, manslaughter, robbery, rapine, or reif, is punishable by death; and who are art or part of any such crimes. As also by the same laws, all private prisoners, keepers of private prisons, and false prisoners, and all oppression whatsoever, are punishable in the like manner.

"Nevertheless the persons above-named complained upon having laid aside all fear of God, loyalty and obedience to their sovereign lord and king, natural affection and reciprocal duty to their countrymen and fellow subjects, have most traitorously, treacherously, perfidiously and cruelly committed the crimes of high-treason, and other crimes, murders, oppressions, robberies, misdeed and malversations under-written, contrary to our said laws and acts of parliament; and thereby have incurred the respective pains and punishments therein contained. In so far as the said persons above written, defendants, particularly the said marquis of Argyle, George Campbell his servant, and justice, and sheriff-deputy; James Campbell of Ardkinglas, Colin Campbell of Strathgair, Robert Campbell of Auchinwillrig, John Campbell of Ardtariche, Master Colin Macklauchlane, Duncan Campbell of Elangreg, John Campbell fiare of Dunstafniche, Dougall Campbell, alias Mackconnochie of Innerraw; having from the beginning of the insurrections and troubles in the year of God 1639, 1640, 1641, and 1642, both secretly and avowedly appeared in constant opposition to our dearest father, his royal councils and commands: and after his majesty's most gracious condescendencies to all the desires of his lieges, how unreasonable soever; he having departed to his kingdom of England, a contented prince from a contented people: Nevertheless the aforesaid persons continuing in their treasonable malice against their own sovereign, did in the months of January, February, March, April, May, June, July, August, September, October, November, December, or one or other of them, in the year of God 1643, most traitorously without their sovereign's authority of licence, and expressly against his will, pleasure, and service, at their own hand and by their own power, caused call and convocate a pretended committee and convocation of his majesty's lieges; wherein they themselves, or one or other of them, did personally convene and meet; and in the said treasonable and unlawful convocation did act and appoint treasonable levies of his majesty's own subjects, in opposition to his majesty's person, authority and express command. And thereafter did actually invade and enter within his majesty's kingdom of England in open hostility, taking his majesty's towns, killing his subjects, wasting and destroying their estates and fortunes, joining with his rebellious subjects in England and an army of sectaries there, for destruction of his majesty's person, royal family, authority and government of these nations, so far as in them lay. And thereafter in the months above-written, or one or other of them, in anno 1646, the said Archibald marquis of Argyle, and the remnant persons above-named defendants, or one or other of them, in an unheard-of way of treachery and treason, delivered his majesty's sacred person into the hands of the said rebels, who thereafter most treacherously murdered him. For eschewing and preventing whereof, the whole estates of this nation finding it necessary and incumbent to them, for the relief of their sovereign lord from his captivity, to raise an army for that effect: The said persons complained upon, or one or other of them, not only by subtle and clandestine means, by declamations and familiar conferences, and openly by declarations and public speeches in face of parliament, opened the same; but also the same being past into an act in the month of 1648 years, publicly entered their Disassent or Protestation against the same, most treasonably and treacherously against the authority of the king, our dearest father, and the estates of parliament. And yet their malice not resting satisfied, they did by themselves, their friends and adherents, in October 1648 years, or thereby, convocate or raise in arms great numbers of his majesty's lieges, without any warrant from king or parliament; and did in open hostility march to his majesty's burghs royal of Edinburgh and Sterling, prosecuting his said army, killing his majesty's good subjects, wasting and destroying their lands and houses: And thereafter most basely and traitorously invited the late tyrant and usurper, Oliver Cromwell, to enter his majesty's kingdom of Scotland, with an army of strangers, traitors and sectaries; sustained him and his treasonable army with all sorts of provision, feasting and countenancing himself and prime officers in the metropolitan city of our kingdom, and within his majesty's fort and strength thereof, the castle of Edinburgh, where the most considerable strength of the kingdom was for the time: By these means casting the secresies of his majesty's kingdom and forts thereof open to the view of those strangers and traitors: Which, by the laws of this and all nations, is high treason; and in all probability was the kingdom's bane and ruin, and was the act immediately preceding the cruel regicide and murder of their sacred sovereign our royal father. At least they, or one or other of them, were either aiders, abettors, assistants, promoters, devisers, or art and part, and particularly the said marquis of Argyle, of the aforesaid treasonable crimes and others above libelled.

"Secondly, The aforesaid persons, and particularly the said Archibald marquis of Argyle, not having yet satisfied his malice, treasonable attempts and purposes, not considering the duty either he owed to God, his prince, country, nobility of his family, nor his own honour or reputation, after multiplicity of honours and offices graciously conferred upon him by our sacred father, and the dignity vouchsafed to him by our self, in allowing him the trust and honour of setting our imperial crown upon our head, upon the day of our coronation in Scotland, which was the 1st of January 1651 years, in presence of our whole nobility and estates of our said ancient kingdom, putting the crown upon our head, with bowed-down knees, and up-lifted hands, in presence of God, angels and men, swore as follows, 'By the eternal God, who liveth and reigneth for ever, I shall support thee to my uttermost: And I swear to be a loyal and true subject, and faithful to the crown.' And thereafter also kneeling, and holding his hands betwixt our hands, did swear these words, 'By the eternal and almighty God, who liveth and reigneth for ever, I become your liege, and truth and faith shall bear to you, and live and die with you, against all manner of folk whatsoever in your service.' Notwithstanding of all which, after the said Archibald marquis of Argyle had disloyally and basely deserted our person and army at Sterling, when we were on our march to England, in the year 1651, did in the months above-written, or one or other of them, anno 1652, at the desire of gen. Dean and col. Overton, our known and public enemies, they having come to Innerary with a regiment of soldiers, and there the said marquis had conference and consultation with them, and did swear, at least subscribed and acknowledged the government of our dominions, as it was then established by the said wicked tyrant and usurper Oliver Cromwell, and his said adherents in a commonwealth, without king, or house of lords: and obliged himself to live under it, and be obedient thereto. And conform thereto most perjuredly and infamously the said Archibald marquis of Argyle, after the said army of rebels and sectaries under the command of the said general, major Dean, and Overton, were drawn to such a strait in their return from Innerary, they being in the power of certain of the said marquis his friends, and divers others of his majesty's loyal subjects then in arms, standing in opposition against them; and they having taken in all passes, the said marquis being then our justiciary in these bounds, and sheriff of Argyle, most traitorously and infamously against his said oath and duty, did interpose himself in favour of the enemy, commanding and counselling our said faithful subjects, who stood in opposition to the said enemy, did suffer them safely to pass without opposition: And by the said marquis his insinuation, there was a safe pass given to the said enemy from the foresaid danger. Like as further to evince the said marquis his treasonable compliance and affection to the said wicked tyrant and usurper Oliver Cromwell, in all his wicked and treasonable courses and attempts, he in the month of 165 years, upon a pretended call from the said tyrant and usurper, to convene a pretended parliament, without any co-action or necessity, did engyre himself in favour of some shires, and dealt with them to elect him for their commissioner; at least being elected, he voluntarily accepted thereof: and upon their said pretended commission, he went to the said pretended parliament at Westminster, and there most perfidiously and perjuredly, treacherously, treasonably, and unworthily, contrary to his own dignity and degree, sate, and acted by voting, and otherwise, in the said pretended parliament, as a member of the house of commons, for establishing the said tyrant in his usurped authority, and abolishing of us and our royal race from our just right and title to our crowns of Scotland, England, and Ireland. And also the said Marquis, in further prosecution of his treasonable, rebellious course and designs, in the months above-written, or one or other of them, in the year 1653 or 1654, or either of them, sold and delivered several musquets and other ammunition to the said rebels, to the number of seventeen cannon, and seven hundred musquets, or thereabouts.

“Thirdly, in the year 1654, several of our loyal subjects having, for vindication of our authority, and revenge of our royal father of blessed memory, his murder, taken arms under the command of our trusty and right well-beloved cousins and counsellors William earl of Glencairne, and John earl of Middleton, then our commissioners for that effect: against whom, and our forces under their command, the said enemies being about to transport 800 men to the north, under the command of col. Cobbet, and being driven to the isle of Mule, and ship-broken in their way, and so ready to perish, the said Archibald marquis of Argyle, and the remanent persons above complained upon, or one or other of them, in the months above-written or one or other of them, in the year 1654, or 1655, did gather together all their own boats, and others, and therein did safely transport them to Dunbarton, from the said isle of Mule, and to other safe places. At least the said Archibald marquis of Argyle, and remanent persons above complained upon, or one or other of them, were authors, aiders, abettors, assisters, advisers, or art and part, of the fore-said treasons, and other crimes and misdeeds above libelled.

“Fourthly, The said Marquis, and remanent persons above complained upon, or one or other of them, in the months above-written, or one or other of them, in the year 1654, or 1655, most perfidiously, treacherously, and traitorously, went into the said English Rebels, without any coercion or necessity, to the highlands in Lochaber, and several other places; and joined with the said Rebels, for suppressing of the said earls of Glencairne and Middleton, then our commissioners, and our forces under their command; and countenanced, counselled, and conveyed the said Rebels through divers places in the Highlands, in their expedition against our forces. At least the said persons defendants, and particularly the said Archibald marquis of Argyle, were authors, actors, aiders, abettors, assisters, and countenancers of the said treasonable crimes, and others above specified.

“Fifthly, When the said Arch-Traitor and Regicide died, Richard Cromwell, his son, was by order of his father's traitorous Council, sitting at London, proclaimed Protector of our three kingdoms, at the Market-Cross of Edinburgh; which was done accordingly by a pretended Council sitting at Edinburgh, for the time. At the doing whereof, the said Archibald marquis of Argyle, most traitorously, treacherously, and perfidiously, in the months of 165 years, went up to the said cross of Edinburgh, at the time of the said proclamation, and did countenance and assist the same; by which our authority was altogether abolished. And moreover, to further evidence the said marquis of Argyle his willingness to serve the said usurper in the accomplishing of all his treasonable designs, and to extirpate us from our royal authority and government, he endeavoured by all means possible, when the foresaid tyrant and usurper had commanded Commissioners from shires of Scotland to appear at London, in his pretended parliament, for establishing his usurped authority, and abolishing of us and our royal race from our just right and title to our crowns of Scotland, England, and Ireland; and for suppressing of the privileges, laws and liberties of this our antient kingdom of Scotland; the said marquis did, in obedience of the said traitorous command, obtain himself to be elected commissioner for the sherrifdom of Bams; and thereafter went up to England, and there sat as a member of that traitorous convention and meeting at London, wherein declaration was made against us and our successors, debarring us for ever from our just and lawful right and title to the crowns of these our three kingdoms. Like as thereafter the said Marquis did embrace the office of sherrif-ship of Argyle, from the enemy, and exercised the same under them for his own ends; and did several times swear, at least subscribe, in their favours against us, our successors, crown, government and sovereignty; and to be obedient and live peaceably under their government of our kingdoms in form of a Commonwealth, as it was then established by the said traitor and usurper. Of the which treasonable deeds and acts, and others aforesaid, the said Defenders, and particularly the said Archibald marquis of Argyle, or one or other of them, were authors, aiders, abettors, assisters, contrivers, promoters and countenancers.

“Sixthly, To further manifest the said marquis of Argyle his treasonable deeds, acts and intentions against us, contrary to his oath and duty, the same evidently appears by his treasonable speeches following; in so far as he being present in a provincial assembly at Inverary in the month of or one or other of the months above-written, in the year 1652, or 1653, or one or other of them, some ministers being then present, praying for his majesty's happiness and welfare, the said Marquis did openly say and declare before them, ‘That they were but fools to pray for that wicked, false, malignant king, whom God had casten off, and would never restore again;’ and certain other words to this purpose and meaning; the said Marquis having uttered the like treasonable speeches at London, and elsewhere.

And also in one or other of the said two years above-written, in the month of or one or other of the said months, the said Marquis being within a chamber of his mansion-house at Loch-head in Kentyre, stamping with his foot, did vaunt himself, saying, 'That he was the 'only man that plotted the rising of the forces 'in the west,' terming the same the Whigrode, which proved the main cause of our ruin. Moreover his correspondence, joining, acting and consulting with the enemy for our ruin is more manifest, in so far as he did receive precepts from the said tyrant and usurper, Oliver Cromwell, directed to his Council at Edinburgh, for payment of the sum of twelve thousand pounds sterling, for good and thankful service done by the said Marquis. Like as he did keep correspondence with the usurper Richard Cromwell, and Charles Fleetwood in the year 1658, and 1659, by missive letters and other ways. As also with sir Archibald Johnston of Wariston, his fellow-traitor, in the said year 1659, when he sate in that traitorous meeting or Council of the Rebels at London, called the Committee of Safety, wherein the said Wariston sate as President; and did of new emit declarations for abolishing of us and our successors, from our just right and title to the crowns of these our said kingdoms. Of all which treasonable acts and deeds aforesaid, intended or committed in one or other of the months of the respective years above-written, contrary to our said laws and acts of parliament, and several other laws, the said Defendants, and particularly the said Archibald marquis of Argyle, at least they, or one or other of them, were authors, aiders, abettors, assisters, promoters, countenancers, contrivers, or art and part.

"Seventhly, Our said deceased sovereign lord and dearest father, having granted commission upon the day of March, 1643 years, under his said majesty's hand, authorising and giving express order to the said Sir James Lamond to prosecute a war, and levy forces in his majesty's name, against those in rebellion, and particularly against the said marquis of Argyle, and to invade his bounds and lands, as he was the principal promoter of these odious and rebellious practices against his majesty's authority, as the said commission by way of a missive letter directed to the said Sir James at more length bears. In obedience whereunto the said Sir James, according to his allegiance and bound duty, levied all his friends and followers, and accordingly acted as became a good subject in his majesty's service, for promoting whereof, until the year 1646. That after his majesty's coming to Newcastle, and casting himself upon the trust of his army lying there, the said Sir James did then lay down arms, and with his friends retreating in a peaceable manner to his own houses of Towart and Escog, there being no other houses for the shelter of his friends, the country having been formerly wasted and burnt. After which, in the month or thereabout, in the same year, the said defendants, or one or other of them, being commanded by the said James Campbell of Ardkinglas, Dougall Campbell of Innerraw, and others their officers, and others under the said Marquis his command, did in a hostile manner lay siege to the said two houses, using all manner of violence. And the said Sir James, after all legal means used for his own defence, did bring them to a treaty wherein by articles of capitulation they did grant to him, and his said friends and followers, indemnity in their persons and fortunes, with power to pass freely where they pleased: as the said articles, subscribed by the hands of the said James Campbell of Ardkinglas, Colin Campbell of Straquhir, John Campbell fiare of Dunstaffneich, Duncan Campbell of Ellangreg, Dougall Campbell of Innerraw, Duncan Campbell uncle to the laird of Lochinell, and John Macklauchlane fiare of Craigintareiff, of the date the 3rd day of June, at more length bear; Nevertheless the aforesaid persons complained upon, or one or other of them, did most perfidiously, treacherously, and treasonably, shortly after the said capitulation, plunder the said houses of their whole furniture and goods therein; and did rob and take away from the persons within the same, their whole money and cloaths, did drive their whole cattle of all sorts, which together with the wastations formerly done by them, to the said Sir James, his friends, vassals and tenants, did exceed the sum of 50,000*l.* sterling. And in a most cruel and barbarous way, whilst some of his poor friends were rescuing their own goods, they barbarously murdered and massacred a number of innocent women, as namely, Marie Gilaspie, Marione Mackleish, a young maid, Calcoch Breedmachfoyne, Margaret Crawford, and certain others; and inhumanly left their bodies, as a prey to ravenous beasts and fowls. At the least, the said persons, or one or other of them, and particularly the said marquis of Argyle, were authors, actors, aiders, abettors, assisters, contrivers, and art and part of the said cruel and bloody murders, robberies, oppressions, and other deeds and malversations above libelled.

"Eighthly, The said persons defendants, shortly after the said capitulation, and contrary to the same, or one or other of them, and especially the said James Campbell of Ardkinglas, Dougall Campbell of Innerraw, Colin Campbell, of Straquhir, Duncan Campbell of Ellangreg, Duncan Campbell uncle to the laird of Lochinell, John Campbell, fiare of Dunstaffneich, did most treacherously, perfidiously, and traitorously fetter and bind the hands of near two hundred persons of the said Sir James his friends and followers, who were comprehended within the said capitulation; detaining them prisoners with a guard, their hands being bound behind their backs like thieves, within the said Sir James's house and yards of Towart, for the space of several days, in grent torment and misery, they being his majesty's free lieges and people. Likas most traitorously and perfidiously, contrary to the said capitulation, they did carry the said Sir James Lamond prisoner to the said house and castle of Escog, and by that means and for fear of the said Sir James's life, the keepers of the said castle being the said Sir James's friends and vassals, they did surrender the said house, upon capitulation of life, fortune and goods; which capitulation was most traitorously and perfidiously broken. And in pursuance of their further villany, after plundering and robbing of all that was within and about the said house, they most barbarously, cruelly and inhumanly murdered several, young and old, yea suckling children, some of them not one month old. And further, the said defendants, or one or other of them, and particularly the aforesaid subscribers, of the said capitulations, in the month of 1646 years, did most traitorously and perfidiously carry the whole people that was within the said house of Escog prisoners, with a guard, to the said Sir James's house of Towart; and shortly after their removal from the said house of Escog, the said defendants, or one or other of them, caused burn the same, destroying the whole orchards and plantings about the said house of Escog. And not being content with their former cruelties, they shortly thereafter carried all the said persons who were prisoners in both the said houses of Escog and Towart, bound prisoners (being his majesty's free lieges) to several boats, sending the said Sir James Lamond, his two brethren, Robert Lamond of Escog, Patrick Lamond his only son, Duncan Lamond his brother, and John Lamond of Auchingyille, prisoners to the said George Campbell sheriff-deputy to the said marquis's house of Innerarey, at which time the said persons, or one or other of them, most villainously contrary to the said capitulation, laws, and acts of parliament aforesaid, burnt the said Sir James Lamond's mansion-house of Towart: Of the which cruel crimes of treason, murders, fire-raising, burnings, oppressions, robberies, and other crimes above mentioned, committed contrary to our said laws and acts of parliament, and the capitulation above-written, the said defendants, and particularly the said marquis of Argyle, at least one or other of them, were aiders, abettors, assisters, countenancers, contrivers, promoters and counsellors of the same.

"Ninthly, the said persons defendants, or one or other of them, contrary to the aforesaid capitulations, our laws and acts of parliament, upon the day of June, 1646, most traitorously and perfidiously did carry the whole people, who were in the said houses of Escog and Towart, in the said boats, to the village of Denoon, and there most cruelly, traitorously, and perfidiously cause hang upon one tree near the number of thirty-six persons, most of them being special gentlemen of the name of Lamond, and vassals to the said sir James, viz. Neill Macpartrick alias Lamond, Archibald Lamond son to baron Macpatrick of Cowstoun, Robert Lamond his brother, Duncan Lamond brother to the said Robert and Hugh Lamond their other brother, Duncan

Ger Lamond in Kilmarnock, Gocie and John Lamonds his sons, Ewen Lamond in Midtewart, Gilbert Lamond, Duncan Lamond, John Mackquein alias Lamond, Archibald Mackquein alias Lamond his brother, Donald Mackquein alias Lamond, Duncan and John Lamonds sons to Walter Lamond brother german to the laird of Escog, Hugh Lamond in Corro of the Carrie, Robert Lamond in the Carrie, Duncan Lamond there, Angus Lamond there, Donald Lamond there, Walter Lamond there, Duncan Lamond called Mackwalter there, Alexander Lamond, in Ardyne of Nethercowall, William Lamond, John Mackquein younger alias Lamond, Patrick Boigle son to the deceased Mr. John Boigle minister at Rothesay, Dougall Harper alias Mackalaster, servant to the said sir James Lamond, John Lamond son to Gilbert Lamond of Knockow, Gilbert Mackley in Glendarowall, James Lamond in Ardyne, Donald Lamond, James Mackquein alias Lamond in Neithercowall, James Lamond his son, and John Mackpatrick alias Lamond in Ardyne. And also the said persons defendants, or one or other of them, upon the aforesaid day of June 1646, most cruelly, barbarously, inhumanly and unchristianly murdered with durks, and cut down with swords and pistols the persons following, viz. John Lamond in Auchinsballech, who being about the age of fourscore years, having a flux upon him, and being also pined away with hunger and thirst, they most cruelly and barbarously stabbed him with durks and skanes at the ladder foot: and did also most barbarously murder, stab and cut down the persons following, viz. Thomas Brown, Neill Mackneill, Meldanich Mackmaw, John Mackmaw his brother, Archibald Hamilton, Meldanich Mackilmichael, Robert Michael, John Mackinlay, John Hendry, Alexander Hendry, Patrick Hendry, John Lamond, Angus Mackilmune, John Mackinnes, John Mackdougall, John Henry, William Mackwilliam alias Wilson, Hew Mackcrow, John Mackcrow his brother, John Mackperson, Donald Mackperson, Duncan Mackperson, Donald Mackilbreid Lamond, Duncan Lamond, Duncan Mackalaster, Thomas Menchryd, John Michaelson, John Moodie, and John Jamison, then provost of Rothesay, who being shot thrice through the body, finding some life in him, did thrust several durks and skanes in him, and at last did cut his throat with a long durk; the said John Jamison not only representing his majesty's authority, as a prime magistrate of his burgh royal, was so cruelly murdered in contempt thereof, and of the statutes made in that behalf. And to manifest their further cruelty, they did cast some of the aforesaid persons into holes made for them, who were spurning and wrestling, whilst they were suffocated with earth; having denied to them any time to recommend themselves to God; albeit earnestly desired and begged by the said murdered persons. Inasmuch that the Lord from heaven did declare his wrath and displeasure against the aforesaid inhuman cruelty, by striking the tree whereon they were hanged, in the said month of June, being a lively fresh growing ash-tree, at the Kirk-yard of Denoone, amongst many other fresh trees with leaves, the Lord struck the said tree immediately thereafter; so that the whole leaves fell from it, and the tree withered, never bearing leaf thereafter, remaining so for the space of two years: which being cut down, there sprang out of the very heart of the root thereof a spring like unto blood popling up, running in several streams, all over the root, and that for several years thereafter: until the said murderers or their favourers, perceiving that it was remarked by persons of all ranks (resorting there to see the miracle) they did cause bouck out the root, covering the whole with earth, which was full of the said matter like blood. Of the which cruel murders, the said persons, and especially the said marquis of Argyle, or one or other of them, were authors, actors, aiders, abettors, assisters, contrivers, countenancers and promoters, many of the said persons defendants being officers under the command of the said marquis of Argyle.*

"Tenthly, upon the month of 1646, the said sir James Lamond, his said brethren and friends, being detained prisoners at the said Marquis's house of Innerary, the said George Campbell sheriff and justice-deputy to the said Marquis, James Campbell of Ardkinglas, col. under the command of the said Marquis, Dougall Campbell alias Mackonnochie of Innerraw, major under the command of the said Marquis, and certain other persons being met in a kind of conventicle, who did enquire of the said sir James, whether he would submit his life and fortune to them, or not? Who answered, That he would not, pleading upon his majesty's commission, the capitulation given to him, and that he being the king's baron could not be judged by them, none of them being such. Whereunto the said George Campbell replied, that the said sir James was a false knave, and that he would judge him whether he would or not, and hang him as justice-deputy of the said marquis of Argyle; at which time the said George Campbell did rob and seize upon the sum of 1,000*l.* belonging to Archibald Lamond, brother to the said sir James; and having within a little time hereafter searched the said sir James for the said capitulation, finding that he had it not, and they considering the prejudice that might follow to them thereby, they caused the said sir James to subscribe a paper penned by the said George, declaring therein that his quarrel was unjust, and that he repented thereof, as also that he did pass from the capitulation; which paper with certain other articles therein was subscribed by the said sir James, he being compelled thereto for fear of death, having gotten notice at that very same time that his said friends and followers were cruelly murdered by them at Denoone, as is above-mentioned; after subscribing of the which paper, two days after the said sir James, his two brethren, and four friends aforesaid, were committed prisoners, in several houses, appertaining to the said marquis of Argyle, the said sir James remaining prisoner in the house of Dunstufnagh for the space of four years, thereafter being carried to the castle of Inchoneill, where he remained prisoner for the space of two years or thereabout, until he was carried from thence to Sterling, by virtue of an order from us and our estates of parliament, they having not time to take trial of the matter at that time, by reason of our marching into England, sending the said sir James up to the castle of Sterling, for fear of the said Marquis's cruelty; in regard he often threatened, that if ever the said sir James came in his power, the world should not save his life, and that he repented nothing more, than that he took not that bloody knave's life, whilst he had him in his power; saying likewise, that all was but one fault: the which cruel crimes of oppression and others above specified, the said defendants, particularly the marquis of Argyle, one or other of them, were actors, aiders, abettors, contrivers, countenancers or promoters.

"Eleventhly, The said persons defendants, their cruelty against the said sir James is manifest, in so far as the said month of 1651, Donald Campbell sent John Campbell of Ardtarich of the special causing, hounding out, and/or under their command or direction, came accompanied with 30 men, all armed with guns, swords, pistols, and other weapons, invasive to the coast side of the sheriffdoms of Aire and Renfrew, where they heard that the said sir James had his residence, and did search the house of Southanon belonging to my lord Sempell, and the house of Coraby belonging to the laird of Auchnaines, where the said persons did make search for the said sir James, two of them coming early in the morning to the said house of Auchnaines, the said Donald running up stairs with a drawn dirk and bended pistol in either hand, making search through the whole house and beds, to have murdered the said sir James, who by providence was in the wood, not knowing any thing of the intended murder. And the said persons being disappointed of their intentions, did retire to their boats, the said sir James flying at that time to the Isle of Arran to shelter himself under the protection of the now duchess of Hamilton, who did reside there for the time. Like as immediately thereafter the said marquis of Argyle and his accomplices, failing of their said intended murder, the said Marquis did desire a warrant from the committee of parliament, in the said year, 1651, for apprehending the said sir James Lamond, intending thereby to prosecute the aforesaid murder; which warrant was then refused to be granted to him : at least the said defendants, and particularly the said marquis of Argyle, or one or other of them, were authors, actors, aiders, abettors, assisters, contrivers, countenancers, of the aforesaid crimes of murder and oppression, and others aforesaid.

"Twelfthly, and further to evidence the aforesaid persons defendants, and particularly the said marquis of Argyle, their cruelty and oppression against the said sir James, the said Marquis in the month of 1647, or thereabouts, came to our house of Dunstaffneich, where the said sir James had been kept most unjustly and unwarrantably prisoner several years before, and sending to him the late deceased Archibald Campbell keeper of our said castle under the said Marquis, Colin Campbell of Lochmell, and Dowgall Campbell alias Mackconnachie of Innerraw, as commissioners, with certain proposals following, viz. First, that the said sir James should renounce and for ever overgive all right, title and interest he had to his own property, and his vassals superiority : and upon condition also, that the said sir James should under his own hand abjure Scotland, and never to be seen therein : Which being done, the said Marquis said he would give to sir James a considerable sum, threatening also that if the said Sir James would refuse the said offer, so long as the said Marquis had an house in the world, the said sir James should be prisoner therein, and should torment him with pain and misery, until the marrow should rot within his bones. The said Marquis declaring also, that he hath already possessed himself of the said sir James and his vassals estates, which he said he and his should possess, in despite of those who would or would not. Whereupon the said sir James considering with himself, within some few months thereafter, that what a prisoner did was null in law, and being most desirous of his liberty, from so miserable and so long imprisonment, professed to be willing to grant some of the former desires ; the said Marquis hearing thereof, caused carry the said sir James with a guard to the town of Innerarey, where the said sir James did write some few lines, the substance whereof contained the most part of the Marquis's desires. Notwithstanding whereof, and the said paper was delivered to the said Marquis, he persisting in his former cruelty and oppression, did send back the said sir James to prison, where he remained at our said house of Dunstaffneich, so that the said papers so subscribed and delivered to the said Marquis and George Campbell his justice and sheriff-deputy, for which they and their accomplices ought to be punished as oppressors and as actors and art and part of the aforesaid crimes, and all following upon the said writings and papers ought to be declared void and null.

"Thirteenthly, the said persons defendants, and particularly the said Archibald marquis of Argyle his friends and accomplices, persevering in their further oppression, in the month of 1649, years, caused the said deceased

Archibald Campbell, then keeper of our said castle of Dunstaffneich, under the command of the said Marquis, compel the said sir James to grant a band to the said Archibald, his heirs, executors, and assigns, for payment of the sum of 4,400 marks or thereabouts, for alledging four years entertainment in our said castle, where the said sir James Lamond was violently, traitorously, and illegally detained prisoner : Unto the which band the said Marquis be assigned, he did intend action thereupon before the English judges, and for that and certain other pretended debts, which were paid, the said Marquis took forth caption against the said sir James, intending thereby to prosecute his forethought cruelties and oppressions, and to incarcerate him, for obtaining his former designs. And so the said Marquis by acceptance of the said assignation, pursued thereupon his imprisonments, threatnings and others above and after specified.

"Fourteenthly, The said George Campbell justice under the said Marquis, still continuing in his former cruelties and oppression, in the month of 1647 years, or thereabouts, not only contrary to his said majesty's commission, but also contrary to the articles of capitulation, our laws and acts of parliament, having taken Patrick Lamond fiare of Escog, and John Lamond of Auchingylle out of the said castle of Escog, after they had rendered the said castle upon the capitulation above-mentioned, having detained them prisoners, the one in the castle of Carnick, and the other in the castle of Inchoneill, for the space of a year and three quarters, until the day of January, 1648 years. At the which time the said Marquis, and the said George his deputy, caused call a pretended court of justice at the said town of Innerrarey ; where having convened the said Patrick Lamond fiare of Escog, and John Lamond of Auchingylle, at the said town did call an assize, consisting of highland men, under power of the said Marquis, and his deputy their justiciary, being also their dependants and followers, and of the said George his making use of, for the most part, for murders and oppressions. Which assize having convicted the said Patrick Lamond fiare of Escog, and having absolved the said John Lamond, in respect to some favours done to them, the said George Campbell nevertheless caused the said pretended inquest thereafter to meet, contrary to the express law and act of parliament ; the said George saying, that it was not fit that one young man should die alone : Conform to the which unjust and illegal command and direction, the aforesaid persons of the assize did meet again, and did convict the said John Lamond also, who by virtue of the said George's unjust and unlawful sentence, the said two gentlemen were hanged to death at Innerrarey. Like as the said marquis of Argyle his concurrence countenancing and promoting of the said cruel murders and oppressions, the said Marquis by himself, James Campbell of Ardkinglas, and their complices, have still possessed the lands of Escog, and Auchingyle, belonging to the said two murdered gentlemen; whereof they are yet still in possession to this same very hour: The said John Lamond leaving two children behind him, the eldest of them not two years old, to whom the said Marquis refused to give any supply or entertainment; they living still as yet upon the charity of the people. Like as the said marquis of Argyle doth most violently, ill-gally and unjustly, possess the lands belonging to John Lamond of Auchinshelloch, who for age and infirmity, as said is, was cruelly murdered at the ladder-foot in manner above-written. At least the said persons defendants, and particularly the said marquis of Argyle, George Campbell his justice and sheriff-deputy, James Campbell of Ardkiuglas, or one or other of them, were authors, aiders, abettors, assisters, promoters, counsellors, contrivers and art and part of the said wicked murders, oppressions, burnings, robbery, and other deeds, and malvers actions above-written. And further, to manifest the said marquis of Argyle, George Campbell his said justice and sheriff-deputy, and their complices, their cruelty and oppression, they or one or other of them in the month of 1648 years, having at that time murdered the said Patrick Lamond younger of Escog as aforesaid, they caused immediately thereafter bring before them Duncan Lamond of Stronalbanoch his uncle, an old man, being then prisoner at castle Lauchlane, to the town of Inverrarey; threatening him, that if he would not renounce and dispose his right of the whole lands of Keames, which he held of the laird of Lamond, then they would cause hang him, as his nephew was immediately before. Likeas for safety of his life, the said Duncan Lamond did grant a disposition of his said lands of Keames to the said marquis of Argyle, and did deliver to him the whole writings thereof, conform whereunto the said Marquis remains still in possession.

“And in like manner the said marquis of Argyle, George Campbell his justice and sheriff-deputy, and their said complices, by their power and warrant have possest and do possess the lands belonging to the said James Lamond, viz. The lands called Archibald Roy-Stewart, the sixth-mark land of Ochrechewne, the lands of Craignifroche: on which lands of Craignifroche the said Marquis had his own bowmen and heards, keeping thereon a number of his own proper goods several years: The said Marquis possessing also several other lands both in property and superiority belonging to the said sir James, the Marquis having no right thereto, but possessing the same by mere opposition. Of the which crimes of oppression and others above specified, the said marquis of Argyle, George Campbell justice and sheriff-deputy to the said Marquis, James Campbell of Ardkiuglas, officer under the said Marquis's command, and remanent defendants, were authors, actors, aiders, abettors, assisters, contrivers, promoters, and art and part. And further, the said marquis of Argyle, George

Campbell his justice and sheriff-deputy, and their complices and remanent defendants above named, or one or other of them, in the month of 1648 years, or thereabout, did seize and apprehend the person of Dougall Mackdougall of Downach, after he had surrendered the house of Dounolick, upon a subscribed capitulation under the hands of lieutenant general David Lesley, for his life, liberty and estate. Notwithstanding whereof the said Marquis and his said servant, or either of them and their complices, caused incarcerate the said Dougall Mackdougall in the house of Inchboneill, laying irons upon him; who being in miserable torment for the space of a year and a half and above, was enforced at the said Marquis's desire, to be free of the woful imprisonment and torture, to grant to him a disposition and renunciation of the said Dougall's lands of Barninggar; whereof the said Marquis is still in possession since the said year 1648. Of the which cruel acts of oppression, particularly the said marquis of Argyle and George Campbell his servant, or one or other of them, were authors, aiders, abettors, assisters, countenancers, promoters, and art and part. And in like manner, Duncan Campbell of Ellangreg most treacherously, traitorously and perfidiously, after subscribing of the capitulation by him granted to the said sir James, his friends and followers, being a member of the conventicle and meeting at the aforesaid cruel and wicked murders committed at Denoon, was a main author, actor, abettor, assister, contriver and promoter of the said wicked murder committed there. Like as thereafter the said Duncan Campbell did take unlawful possession of Leymont Lamond of Cowston's lands of Stroan and Cowston, and also the lands of Trowstonne and Ardbeg, belonging to the said sir James and Leymount. And also the said Duncan Campbell with certain of his complices, in the month of March 1646 years, came from his own house to the said lands of Cowston and Stroan, and there murdered early in the morning of men and children to the number of forty persons, viz. Archibald Lamond in Auchinfour, John Lamond there, ———— Lamond son to Ewen Lamond there a child, Archibald Lamond of Rive, Coll Lamond his only son a child, Ewen Lamond in Midtown, Duncan Lamond his brother, Donald Mackneill servant to the said sir James Lamond, Donald Macklauchlane in Kilnichael, Finlay Mackilbreid, Donald Mackilbreid his brother, two of the name of Mackalasters sons to Archibald Mackalaster in Killennane; ———— Mackelland in Knockmillie, Robert Moodie in Castle Towart, John Mackiller servant to the said sir James, Harry Lamond, Archibald Mackperson, John Mitchelson, John Leith, Dougall Leith, and several others. As also the said Duncan Campbell most traitorously, treacherously and perfidiously, with the said defendants his complices, were main actors, abettors, assisters, and art and part of the burning of the said sir James his house of Towart, taking way the goods and plenishing therein, destroying of the said sir James his own men, tenants, vassals and servants; robbing and taking away of their goods the foresaid years 1645, and 1646, in one or other of the months thereof.

 Of the which treasonable deeds, murders, fireraisings, oppressions, robberies, and other cruel acts and malversations above-mentioned, the said persons defendants, and particularly the said marquis of Argyle, the said Duncan Campbell an officer under the said marquis's command, George Campbell sheriff and justice-clerk, or one of them, were authors, actors, aiders, abettors, assisters, contrivers and promoters of the same. And in like manner Robert Campbell of Auchinwilling, and remanent defendants aforesaid, or one or other of them, most basely and perfidiously, after the said capitulation, and contrary thereto, and our said laws and acts of parliament above-written, in the month of or one or other of the months above-specified, in the year of God, 1646, 7, 8, 9, 1650, 1, 2, 3, 4, or one or other of the said years, did violently reave and carry away several of the said sir James's household plenishing, and did destroy and cut down the whole plantings in and about the said sir James's house of Towart, orchards, parks and walks thereof; and did sell, use and dispo-ne thereupon, burning spales and branches of the said trees, so cutted upon the roots of the same, that they might never grow thereafter; demolishing the walls of the said house, taking away the great hewed stones thereof, and building therewith houses to himself. And also being present at the said bloody and cruel murders committed in Denoone, and a main actor, aider, abettor, assister, counsellor and promoter thereof; as also was a main actor, aider, abettor, assister, and art and part of the great burnings, hairships and ryffs, committed by the said defendants, or one or other of them, of the said sir James his own men, tenants, vassals and servants houses, in the year of God 1645 and 1646, in one or other of the months thereof. Of the which cruel crimes, deeds and malversations above-written, the said Robert Campbell of Auchinwilling, and the said defendants, or one or other of them, were main actors, aiders, &c. And also the said John Campbell of Ardtariche and remanent defendants above-written, or one or other of them, in the said month of June 1646 years, most vil-lainously, contrary to the said capitulation, was accessory to the burning of the said sir James's house of Towart, and in the said month was present at the meeting, and a main counsellor, aider, abettor or assister of the said cruel and bloody murders, committed at the village of Denoone. And to make the premises manifestly appear, the said John Campbell, by mere oppression having possessed the lands belonging to the deceased Duncan Lamond a murdered person, particularly the lands of Knock-naw, Innerchellane, the lands of Lettingall and Towart-fleeming; and in like manner having by oppression also possess himself of the lands of Gortamlesk, Kilmarnock and Brackleye, pertaining to the said sir James; taking away also, before the burning of his said house, several of the household-stuff and plenishing therein. Of the which deeds and other crimes above-written, the said John Campbell of Ardtariche, and remanent defendants aforesaid, or one or other of them, were authors, aiders, &c.

"And further Mr. Colin Macklauchlane, minister at Lochgolisheed, being present at the meeting in the said village of Denoone, in the said month of June 1646, most villainously and treacherously, contrary to the said capitulation, was a main counsellor, actor, author, aider, assister, abettor, promoter, and art and part of the foresaid cruel murders, committed at the said village of Denoone. And further the said James Campbell of Arkinglas officer under the said marquis's command, accompanied with his regiment in the low-lands, at the village of the Largis, in the month of 1645, adding to his former cruelties, one Lamond a beggar coming to the said James Campbell, and craving his charity, the said James caused apprehend the said beggar, and most cruelly caused murder and hang him, without any ground or warrant. Of the which cruel crime of murder the said James Campbell of Arkinglas, and the said Defendants, or one or other of them, were authors, actors, abettors, &c. And moreover the said James Campbell of Arkinglas, officer under the said Marquis's command, and remanent persons defendants aforesaid, intending never to put a period to their cruelty, so long as any of the name of Lamond and their friends and followers were left, in the month of 1646, the said James Campbell being accompanied with his said regiment in the lowlands, there being brought to him by Angus Mackilvernock, Der-mount Campbell, and the deceased Francis Campbell his brother, one John Machpatrick alias Lamond, the said James Campbell of Arkinglas, and remanent defendants aforesaid, or one or other of them, caused cruelly murder and hang the said John Machpatrick alias Lamond, and that without any ground or warrant.
 Of the which crime of murder, the said Defendants, or one or other of them, and particularly the said J. Campbell of Arkinglas, were authors, actors, aiders, abettors, assisters, or art or part.

"And also, Alexander Campbell of Penny-moir, with certain of his followers and complices, upon the month of 1645 years, did seize and apprehend, in the Isle of Co-meraw, one Robert Lamond merchant residen-ter in Ireland, from whence having come about his lawful occasions, to the said Isle of Come-raw, the said persons did most cruelly and vil-lainously murder and shoot the said Robert Lamond to death, at the said Isle: of the which cruel murder the said Defendants, or one or other of them, and particularly the said Alexander Campbell of Pennymoir, were authors, actors, aiders, abettors, assisters, or art and part. And likewise the said George Campbell, justice and sheriff-deputy to the said marquis of Argyle, still persisting in his wonted cruelties and murders, in the month of 1645 years, caused murder and hang one John Daw Maclauchlan of Ardnundanne, at the said town of Inverary, and that without any ground or warrant. Of the which cruel murder, the said defendants, or one or other of them, and particularly the said George Campbell, were authors, actors, aiders, abettors, assisters, or art and part.

“ And further the said Archibald marquis of Argyle, and George Campbell his justice and sheriff-deputy, likely never to make an end of their cruelty, in the month of 1647 years, or thereby, did most barbarously, cruelly, and unchristianly murder and cut off Hector Macallaster of and his two sons, at Lochhead in Kintyre, they being his majesty's free lieges, having received capitulation from the said lieutenant-general David Lesley, for life, lands, estate and goods; who according to the said capitulation did go home to their dwelling house, living peaceably; Notwithstanding whereof the said Archibald marquis of Argyle and the said George Campbell his said justice and sheriff-deputy, sending for the said Hector Macallaster and his said two sons, coming and fearing nothing, they most traitorously and villainously, contrary to the said capitulation, caused to murder and hang the said persons at Lochhead in Kintyre. Of the which cruel murders the said Defendants, or one or other of them, and particularly the said Archibald marquis of Argyle and George Campbell his justice and sheriff-deputy were authors, actors, aiders, abettors, contrivers, assisters and promoters, or art and part thereof. As also Archibald Campbell Evinnochan, son-in-law to the laird of Otter, in the month of or one or other of the months respective above-written, in the year 1646, was accessory, art and part, and aider, abettor, and assister of the aforesaid cruel and wicked murders, committed at the lands of Stronae, and at the foresaid village of Denoon, being accessory also to the robbing and taking away of the household-stuff and plenishing of the said sir James his said house of Towart, and of the burning of the same. Of the which cruel acts of murders, robberies, and fire-raising, the said Archibald Campbell was actor, author, abettor, assister, contriver, counsellor, promoter, and art and part thereof.

“ And likewise the said marquis of Argyle and George Campbell his justice and sheriff-deputy, or one or other of them, in the month of or one or other of the said months above-written, in the year of God 1639, or thereby, caused seize upon and apprehend col. Mac Gillespy, alias Mac Donald, he being then his majesty's free liege, incarcerate him in our said house of Dunstafneith, where he remained prisoner till the year 1645, at which time being exchanget after the battle of Inverlochie he was taken prisoner in Ila in the year 1647, being then in his majesty's service, and within few days or weeks thereafter, the said Marquis and the said George caused most cruelly hang the said col. Mac Gillespy, at our said house of Dunstafneith. And further, the said Archibald marquis of Argyle and George Campbell his sheriff and justice-deputy, or one or other of them, upon the month of or one or other of the months above-written, in the year 1647, or 1648, caused cruelly murder and hang Ronald Macdonald son to the said col. at Inverary.

“ And also the said marquis of Argyle and George Campbell his justice and sheriff-deputy, most treacherously, traitorously, and perfidiously caused cruelly murder and hang, in the month of or one or other of the months above-written, in the year of God 1647, Alexander Maccoll Vickronnald alias Mackallaster in Kilmichel of Largy, notwithstanding of a capitulation granted by the said marquis of Argyle and lieutenant-general Lesley, or one or other of them: Of the which three cruel murders immediately preceding, committed at Inverary and Dunstafneith, the said defendants, or one or other of them, and particularly the said Archibald marquis of Argyle, and George Campbell his justice and sheriff-deputy, were authors, actors, aiders, abettors, assisters, and advisers, countenancers, and promoters, or art and part.

“ Of the which treasonable crimes, murders, robberies, oppressions, and all other crimes, misdeeds, and malversations above-mentioned, or one or other of them, the forenamed persons above complained upon, and every one of them, at least one or other of them, were actors, authors, abettors, assisters, contrivers, devisers, consulters, advisers, or art and part. And thereby they and each one of them, at least one or other of them, have incurred the respective pains and punishments prescribed by our said laws, and acts of parliament, viz. The forfeiture of life, lands, dignity, estates, and goods, the benefit thereof to be applied to our use, or such use as we and our said estates of parliament, or those impowered by us for that effect, shall appoint; at the least have incurred such other censure and punishment, in their bodies, names, fames, estate, and goods, as we and our said estates of parliament, or those impowered or authorized by us for that effect, shall think fit, to be applied, as said is, according to the nature and quality of their several crimes, misdeeds and malversations, done and committed by them, which ought and should be inflicted upon them with all rigour, in example of others.

“ Our will is herefore, and we charge you that you lawfully summon, warn, and charge, the whole forenamed persons, defendants, abovenamed as followeth, viz. so many of them as are within this our realm of Scotland, personally, if they can be apprehended, and failing thereof, at their dwelling-places, and by open proclamation at the market-crosses of the head boroughs of our sheriffdoms, or other jurisdictions within the which they dwell; and so many of them as are without the same, by open proclamation at the market-cross of our burgh of Edinburgh, pier and shore of Leith, upon three-score days warning, to appear personally before us and our estates of parliament, or those impowered or authorized by us for that effect, at Edinburgh, or where it shall happen then to be for the time, the day of with continuation of days to answer at the instance of our said advocate, for our interest, and at the instance of the said sir James Lamont, for himself, and in name and behalf aforesaid, for his interest above-written. That is to say, the said defendants, to hear and see it found and declared, verified and proved, in presence of our said estates of parliament, or such as shall be authorized by us and them, that the said defendants, and every one of them, at least one or other of them, have committed, and are guilty of, the crimes of high-treason, and other crimes, murders, robberies, oppressions, misdeeds, and malversations respective above specified, or one or other of them; at least they, and every one of them, or one or other of them were authors, abettors, contrivers, devisers, or art and part thereof; and the same being so verified and proved, to hear and see it found and declared, by us and our said estates of parliament, or those impowered or authorized by us for that effect, that the forenamed persons, and every one of them, have thereby incurred the respective pains and punishments prescribed by our said laws and acts of parliament; and to hear and see the sentence and doom of forfeiture, pronounced against them for the same, viz. the forfeiture and loss of life, lands, dignities, estates and goods, and the benefit thereof to be applied to our use, or such as we or our said estates of parliament, or those authorized by us for that effect shall appoint; at least to hear and see themselves adjudged to be censured in their persons, names, fames, estates and goods, as we and our said estates of parliament, or those impowered or authorized by us for that effect, shall think fit, according to the nature and quality of their several crimes, misdeeds and malversations, committed and done by them; and to hear and see the foresaid pains and punishments decreed to be executed, and inflicted upon them, with all rigour, in example of others, at the arbitrement and determination of us and our said estate of parliament, or those impowered and authorized by us for that effect: With certification to the disobeyers, if they be contumacious and appear not, we and our said estates of parliament, or those impowered and authorized by us, for that effect, will then instantly proceed against the said defendants, and every one of them, who does not appear, as rebels and traitors, and guilty of high-treason against us and our crown, and the estates of this our ancient kingdom; to the forfeiting of their lives, lands, estates and goods, to be applied, as said is; and that their absence and contumacy shall be holden as a manifest probation of their guiltiness, without necessity of any further probation. But if they appear and remain present at the whole diets of the procedure, that then we and our said estates of parliament, or those impowered and authorized by us for that effect, will proceed against the said defenders upon lawful probation, to the forfeiting of their said lives, lands, estates, and goods, to be applied as said is, or otherwise by punishing and censuring of them, according to the nature and quality of their crimes, misdeeds, and malversations, in their persons, estates, goods, name and fame, or some other manner of way, as we and our said estates of parliament, or those impowered or authorized by us for that effect, shall think fit and appoint, conform to our sentence, decree, and determination to be given and pronounced by us against the said defenders therein, according to justice, to be called summarily without diet, table or continuation of other summons; because the aforesaid action is for crimes of high-treason, and other acts, misdeeds and malversations, committed and done by the forenamed persons against us, and the estates of this our ancient kingdom, and the public good and peace of the same; at least, whereof the forenamed persons defendants were aiders, abettors, assisters, consultants, devisers, advisers, or art and part. And therefore merits summary process, conform to daily practice, used in the like cases, and a deliverance granted by our committee of estates thereanent. Moreover, that you lawfully summon, warn, and charge to appear before us, and our estates of parliament, or those empowered or authorized by us for that effect, the said day and place, with continuation of days to bear leill and soothfast witnessing, in so far as they know, or shall be asked at them, in the said matter, under all highest pain and charge that after may follow: as you will answer to us thereupon. The which to do we commit to you, conjunctly and severally, our full power by these our letters, delivering them by you duly executed, and indorsed again to the bearer.—Given under our signet at Edinburgh, the twenty eighth day of December, and of our reign the twelfth year, 1660.—Ex deliberatione Commissionis Parliamenti sic subscribitur.—Jo. CUNYNGHAME.—Edinburgh, Jan. 23, 1661. Signed by warrant from the parliament. Sic subscribitur, W. SHARP."

To which CHARGE the Marquis put in the following ANSWER.

I. "This libel may appear to any to be framed merely out of malice, because it takes in all things (either alledged, spoken, or done) since the year of God 1638, notwithstanding his majesty's royal father's and his own acts of oblivion and approbation.

II. "Because it does not so much as alledge any reason or motive for any thing hath been done, nor any end why, or to which any did drive, and so making any man who was engaged more malicious than the devil, and more unreasonable than the brute beasts.

III. "It repeats all that hath been done by kirk or kingdom, to be the marquis of Argyle's with sir John Cheesly, were neither of my doing or writing.

2. "Being well known how active and influential the Defender was in every thing concerning his majesty's restitution to his rights and royal authority, this clause or article is purposely for soiling his faithful service, but his majesty both knows and hath acknowledged the contrary of this by word and deed. And for what concerns the marquis of Argyll's death, I neither consulted nor acted in the manner nor matter of it, though as done in parliament. The next point in this article is corresponding with Cromwell when his majesty came to Scotland, which is not false; the like was said and recanted by Milton, who was a spy, and so was hanged for it. —For any declaration to the Scots, I had no hand in it by word, writ nor message, but on the contrary I did deal with the ministers who came from the commission to the Kirk, to forbear pressing of his majesty: where some of his majesty's bed-chamber said that I might deal with his majesty to that effect, I told them I could not well press the king to a thing he said was so contrary to his conscience, seeing it reflected as he thought on his royal father; but to speak to the king I did not refuse, and if the king had done for his sire, I know no crime in it.

1. "There are some things in this note in former libel, as joining with col. Twisleton in his march up Lochlômunt; he knows, and I will not deny, that before I went with him, he told me that one Wakmshe was with him, whether from the earl of Glencairn himself, or from general Monk, concerning him, I do not remember; but he said the earl of Glencairn's business was as good as ended, except I went with him, I could not but go with general Monk, who had sent for me, who I went upon march, but that he was to meet with me, or hear certainly from him the day he was going; and all things did fall out accordingly, and being under a capitulation, I did not know why I might not be in their company, and was resolved never to join with them in any way.

As for having a company of foot under my pay, it is a mistake; the shire of Argyll lent me with a watch for the shire of Argyll, which is most ordinarily in all places of the Highlands, in broken times; I made it known to general Monk, the poor country not being yet well planted after the burning, could not be able to pay cess and entertain the soldiers; he was pleased to promise once help for a hundred men, but I hope his grace will say that ever he required any engagement from them as soldiers, nor ever employed them as such; but because they did not oppose my going, he would not continue his assistance to the shire any longer, and spoke against me what his grace pleased for my dissatisfaction to the shire.

And for exchanging prisoners, it is a mistake; two men, who had been in Rosneath, whereof I have charge, come from thence, shortly after my boat, in the twilight; going up Clyd to see general Monk, whom I had never seen before, I staid for them, thinking it had been some poor men flying from abuses, but coming aboard, they alleged they were men belonging to the earl of Glencairn, which I doubted; however, I chid them for coming that way, and for abusing the country where they came; I told them I would only leave them at Dumbarton until I returned from Kilsyth, where general Monk was, and in the mean time, that they might not suffer any thing, desired they might deliver any arms or monies they had to a servant of mine, and all should be safely returned, as it was done at my return; and that they might not go as by way of any exchange, I would not suffer them to be enrolled by captain Thompson, who was exchanging some prisoners at my return, but got them from him, and sent them back, without any capitulation or exchange, though some men, I have forgotten who it was, about that time, took out of Dumbarton some of my boatmen, and returned them to me, without any treaty or capitulation for that effect. Because it is said the earl of Glencairn and Middleton were commissioned by his majesty; I can say truly, I never knew it, neither did any of their honours so much as by word, writ, or message, intimate so much to me; if they had, I am confident I had satisfied them concerning my carriage; and because of this, though there was some hazard in it to me, I did desire to meet with his grace the earl of Middleton, in the hills, but I got no answer; whether the messenger dealt faithfully I know not, but I believe his grace knew so much, and the necessary reasons I gave for the unseasonableness of that stirring, all which I am ready yet to declare, which doubtless will satisfy any.

"As for my taking upon me to bring off any, it is certain a mistake, for the person mentioned, John Mac Dowgal of Downolkeith was not at all engaged in that service, when the earl of Glencairn and Middleton was in the fields."

A short ANSWER to the LIBEL and DITTAY given in upon the 28th day of January.

"Before I say any thing particularly, I must make difference all can be said against me, first in these heads, and that is before his majesty's going out of Scotland, 1651, and since that Cromwell killed and took possession, until his majesty's happy return, in A. D. 1660.

"These again, which were acted before his majesty left Scotland, in A. D. 1651, of public concernment. 2. Of private, relating to particular persons: Now for these things wherein I was an actor, in relation to the public concernment, I never acted without the approbation of parliament and general assemblies, ratified by his majesty's royal father and himself.

"And so the second, relating to particular persons, I never had access to any thing but what is warranted by act of parliament approved by his majesty and his royal predecessors, for my acting, after his majesty left Scotland, 1651, until his majesty's happy return, 1660. I was still a prisoner on demand, and had no agreement nor capitulation with the English, after his majesty went, until August 1652, being long after the deputies had taken the tender, and were gone to London, and all others in arms had capitulate, and that all the rest in Scotland were living peaceably at their own houses, except my kinsmen and vassals in Argyleshire, and the invaders in full possession of the power and government, and never did then capitulate but out of necessity.

In Answer to the particular ARTICLES of the LIBEL.

1. "The Commissioners for Conservation of the Peace, established by his majesty in the parliament, 1641, were to look to the keeping of the articles of the large treaty, whereof the endeavours to procure an uniformity in religion was one; and that Montross, and others, censured by parliament, should not have access to his majesty: And when these commissioners found these things slighted, and themselves unequal for such a burden, they met with the privy council, and they both, with the committee of common burdens, and all of them together, invited a convention of estates, and what they did sent their application to his majesty, and their desire of settling differences betwixt him and his people, and the league and covenant, is set down particularly in the ratification of parliament, 1644, which parliament was called and convened by his majesty's special authority, and which the said parliament was never disclaimed, but owned by his late royal majesty, and is the foundation of all that followed, even of the parliament 1649, which is not only approved by his majesty, but by it his majesty was called home and crowned, and from it the last committee which met (before this parliament) had then power; so all that was done in 1649, is fully ratified by his majesty in parliament.

2. "For this it was done in public parliament where all the same members who sat in 1648 were present, and it is likewise ratified by his majesty, and it was conceived inevitable and best for his majesty as matters stood for the time being, the least of two evils, and no man then imagined his majesty's person nor government in any hazard.

3. "No protestation 1648, against any act of parliament, the protestation itself will witness, and it was before the vote in parliament, the difference then may be mentioned, for it was not as it is reported commonly.

4. "The defender was pursuing no forces, but coming to meet with the committee 1648, after the defeat at Preston, being to consult what was best, fearing no harm (being at Sterling) was invaded by George Monro and others, and some of his friends who were with him were killed, and others taken prisoners.

5. "There was no invitation, so far as the defender knows, at all to Oliver Cromwell to come into Scotland, but on the contrary, an earnest endeavour was to keep him out by fairness, which could not be done by force, as the acts of committee and treaty at Sterling can shew: And for Cromwell's visiting of Edinburgh and Edinburgh castle, and of visiting of him in it, the defender was no keeper of the said castle.

6. "The defender acknowledges his oath, and he did not desert either his majesty or his army, but his stay behind his majesty in Sterling was by his majesty's own allowance, because of his wife's dangerous sickness.

7. "The defender's capitulation is not as libelled, for he agreed not to the government, though he agreed to live peaceably under the parliament of the commonwealth of England, and mention not without king and house of lords, which he particularly refused, as the paper which he was pressed to sign, yet extant, can shew; and never yielded to the same articles which he signed, while he was a prisoner in the hand, and at such a time when he could not make any escape, being heavily diseased, as Dr. Cunningham and many others know, who were with him the same time, it being, as in the Preface, in August 1652.

8. "He was hardly able to come out of his chamber when the forces went out of Argyleshire, so he was not present; but I think hardly could 200 or 300 men stop the passing of two strong regiments of foot, Overton and Read, and about 300 horse commanded by Blackmore, when that year all his hills and bogs were as passable as the best highways in that country; and though the defender had done it, it was but according to his articles, which he could not then alter; and sure no man can think it a crime.

9. "The defender did not accept any commission at that time, but refused to be in the parliament, and was resolved to forbear still, if necessity had not compelled him afterward.

10. "Did sell some cannon to Dean, when he told him he would not suffer him to keep them.

11. "There is a mistake, or call it what you will, in this article, for colonel Cobbet had ended his expedition when some of his ships were broken in Mull, one company went by land and was not so much as challenged; and if the defender had not given some way to go through the country, it would have been accounted a breach of articles; or if he had staid upon free quarter in the country, until he had sent to Air for new provision, it would have ruined that part of the country, for it was not so much want of shipping, as provision, made him go the land way; and if I had betrayed him, I know no man could like a traitor, howbeit they had liked the treachery, neither was Glencarn in the fields, nor the earl of Middleton in Scotland at that time, nor had any man commission from his majesty, for any thing he knows.

12. "It is a general only, so it cannot but have a general answer, that is, most false.

13. "This Article is mistaken, it was at proclaiming Oliver that I was as present, being occasionally in town, I was commanded by general Monk to wait on the council, before I knew any intention of such a proclamation.

14. "This Article is mistaken also, I was desired by Aberdeenshire, to go for them to London in Richard's time. I had refused likewise to go then, as I had in Oliver's time, if I had not been driven by necessity to it out of respect to religion, my native country, and to preserve myself from utter ruin, not without hopes but something might have been thought upon for his majesty, because of the freedom of elections in England, and as nothing was so much as mentioned at that time to his majesty's disadvantage; so the breach was there made, by which his majesty entered by the Lord's blessing thereafter; this I told to several was most probable when I came back to Scotland, my endeavour to stop the Act of Union, until three things were first or jointly done, shews my resolution for my religion and country; the three things were, that our laws and judicatories might stand until they should be altered by common consent. 2. That our religion in doctrine, worship, and discipline, might stand according to the covenant. 3. That the assess of Scotland might be made proportionable with England. I did to several declare, the Union could not be without these, and I was told likewise, that these would never be granted; my own necessity was to get off a most unjust decret of great sums laid upon me, by that called the exchequer in Scotland, which was impossible for me to pay, this I shall make clearly to appear: and beside all this, my going was not until the invaders had been past seven years in possession by consent, and that all the lawyers did plead their authority and ordinances as laws.

15. "It was well known I was hard prest to accept that, and did it never, until the poor people in whom I was nearly concerned, were in great difficulties for want of justice; and I would not then embrace it, but with a protestation, though it was long after the invaders possession, and that there was no other visible power nor authority.

16. "I can say nothing to this, but it is a most false calumny, say it who will, and I hope when it comes to be particular in the circumstances it will appear to be so, for ever when the English were at Inverary, the parish minister Mr. Alexander Gordon, my own chaplain, in his family prayed constantly for his majesty, and myself in company did always pray for such whom we were engaged to, by either natural, civil, or christian bonds.

17. "I can say to this as to the former, and that it cannot be true, because that brake out only upon the earl of Calender's marching to the west, whereof it is not said he was privy; and though it were true, all that business is approved in parliament, ratified by his majesty.

18. "This is a great mistake, I had no such precept, but I had by act of parliament of Scotland, the half of excise of wines and strong-waters in Scotland for payment to me, for a great sum laid out by me for the Irish army, and by my articles I was to enjoy my liberty, and these debts due to me; and when I craved performance of my articles, 1657, the Protector would not let me have the excise, but only so much yearly out of it, until I were satisfied, wherein I had not what I ought, so far was it from favour.

19. "I did never correspond with Richard Cromwell, nor Fleetwood, except in order to my own affairs, nor with sir Archibald Johnston, either to the prejudice of king or country, or to my memory at all after the committee of safety met.

20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25. "To all these answers Arch. Kinglas had his commission as colonel from the parliament, or committee, and not from him, and if he pursued Lamond, doubtless it was as a rebel at that time to the estate of the kingdom, according to act and declaration of parliament, approved of by his majesty, and his royal father, and predecessors; so what Arch. Kinglas or any other did to Lamond, let them answer for what they did unwarrantably, it cannot reflect on him, but he hopes they will clear themselves.

26. "The defender was in England when Lamond was brought out of his house, and knew nothing of the business, until he received letters shewing what had past, and that Lamond had refused to return Alexander Mac-Donald, according to his capitulation, chusing rather to remain a prisoner with the defender, the paper itself may be found if he deny, whereupon he was detained prisoner, having no security to give; and having so often sworn and promised, and after failed, which will be shewn under his hand, and having murdered so many people, men, women and children, several of them after quarter given, beside the burning of many gentlemen his neighbours houses, and destroying their goods and their lands, and going in to Alexander Mac-Donald, notwithstanding he was in service against him with the defender, not having fairly exonerated himself; this can be all clearly instructed, and if this was not cause to keep him a prisoner, let any judge.

27. "He knew not nor remembers not any such things, so it is but forged against him.

28. "He caused no such thing, it was a thing done for his own entertainment, and the defender being to secure Lamond for some just debts due to himself, the captain of Dunstaffage desired his bond likewise to be pursued in the defender's name, which the gentleman himself can shew.

29. "The Marquis is in possession of none of their lands to his knowledge; if he were, it is a legal civil process.

30. "He never knew any such thing.

31. 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41,

42, 43, 44." To all these let every man answer as he is concerned, as he hopes they will clear so; but this he must say for himself and his depute, that it cannot be said they murdered any of these men with their own hands, neither did they judge any man to die by the hand of justice, but such who were notoriously guilty according to standing law; and no man can justly say any man was ever processed before them who had received any articles, though it was never conceived by any judicatory in Scotland that any man taking a rebel could pardon him, except the person doer of it had particular warrant for that effect, otherwise the committee after Philliphauge had been much to blame for ordaining so many to be processed, at which committee were the sentencing of such who died at Glasgow shortly thereafter, at which the defender was not present.

The GRAND INDICTMENT OF HIGH TREASON, exhibited against the Marquis of ARGYLE, by his Majesty's Advocate, to the Parliament of Scotland.

"Archibald, marquis of Argyle, you are indicted and accused, and are to answer at the instance of sir John Fletcher, knight, his majesty's advocate for his majesty's interest, that whereas by the laws of God, expressed in holy writ, by the laws of nations, by the common law, and by the municipal laws and practice of this kingdom; especially by the third act of the fifth parliament of king James 1, and by the first act of king James 6, of blessed memory, and by several other acts of parliament, all good and loyal subjects of this kingdom are bound and obliged perpetually to acknowledge, obey, maintain, defend and advance the life, honour, safety, dignity, sovereign authority, and prerogative royal of their sovereign lord and king, their heirs and successors, and privilege of their crown, with their lives, lands and goods, to the utmost of their power, constantly and faithfully to withstand all, and whatsoever persons or estates, who shall presume, press, or intend any ways to impugn, prejudice, or impair the same; and shall no way intend, attempt, engage, act or do any thing to the violation, hurt, derogation, impairing or prejudice of his highness's sovereignty, prerogative, and privilege of his crown, or any point or part thereof: and whosoever doth the contrary, to be punished as traitors, and to forfeit their lives, lands and goods. Likewise by the 25th act of the 6th parliament of king James 2, and by the 75th act of the 9th parliament of queen Mary; all rising in fear of war against the king's person or majesty; all attempting to raise any band of men of war, horse or foot, in warlike posture, without special licence of the king's majesty, and all suppliers of them, in help, redress or counsel, are punishable as traitors. Likewise by the 43d act of the 3d parliament of king James 1, and by the 134th act of the 8th parliament; and by act the 10th, of the 10th parliament; and by the 205th act of the 14th parliament of king James 6, it is statute and ordained, that no subject, of whatsoever function, degree or quality, shall presume to take upon him publicly or privately to declaim, speak or write any purpose of reproach, slander, disdain or contempt of his majesty's person, estate or government, or tending to the dishonour, hurt or prejudice of his highness, his parents or progenitors; or to meddle in the affairs of his highness, and his estate present, by-gone, or in time coming; nor to deprave his laws and acts of parliaments, nor misconstrue his proceedings, whereby any misliking may be moved betwixt the king's majesty, his nobility and loving subjects, under the pain of losing their lives, lands and goods, and others therein contained. As also all hearers of any such leasings, slanderous speeches or words, and concealers thereof, without apprehending of the authors (if it lie in their power), and reveal not the same to his majesty, or some of his judges or officers, and are mentioned in the said acts, are liable to the like punishment, as the principal offenders.

"Likewise by the 130th act of the 8th parliament of king James 6, it is statute and ordained, that none of his majesty's lieges and subjects do presume or take upon him to impugn the dignity and authority of the estates of parliament; or to speak or procure the innovation or diminution of the power and authority of the same, under the pain of treason.

"Likewise by the last act of the 3d parliament of king James 5, and by the 33d act of the first parliament of king James 6, all burning of houses or corn, and wilful fire rising, is declared treason, and the committers thereof are to be punished.

"Likewise by the 51st act of the 11th parliament of king James 6, it is statute and ordained, that the murder and slaughter of whatsoever his majesty's lieges, where the party slain is under the trust, credit, assurance and power of the slayer, all such murder and slaughter shall be treason, and the persons found culpable shall forfeit life, lands and goods.

"Likewise by the 37th act of the 3d parliament of king James 1, and by the 144th act of the 12th parliament of king James 6, all receivers, suppliers, or intercommoners with any traitors, are punishable by forfeiture, as the traitors themselves.

"Likewise by common laws and practice of this kingdom, all concealers and not revealers of any malicious purpose, of putting any violent hands on the sacred person of your dread sovereign the king's majesty, or purpose of killing or putting him to death; and all advisers, counsellors, siders, abettors or havers of any accession thereto, are punishable as traitors.

Nevertheless, it is of verity, that you the

Said marquis of Argyle, having laid aside all fear of God, loyalty to his majesty, and to his royal Father, of ever blessed memory, natural duty and affection to your native country and country-men, and respect and obedience to the laws of all well-governed realms, the common-law, and the laws, statutes, acts of parliament and practices of this kingdom, and having traitorously intended and purposed the eradicating and subverting the fundamental government of this kingdom; at least the enervating, violating, derogating, or impairing the sovereign authority, royal prerogative of his majesty, and privilege of the crown: you, for carrying on of your said wicked purpose, having gathered and convoked together, in a hostile manner, a great many of your friends, servants, vassals, followers and other of his majesty's lieges, without any warrant, licence or command from his majesty; and therewith, under pretence of opposing such as by you were then nick-named Anti-Covenanters, and opposing the work of reformation (but who indeed were faithful assertors of his majesty's lawful authority), having marched to the ford of Lyon in Athol, in the month of 1640, there did in your tent, and in presence of a great many gentlemen and others publicly declare, that it was the opinion and judgment of many divines and lawyers, that a king may be deposed for desertions, venditions and invasions: and that howbeit that your words were in abstracto from any king, yet that the sense and meaning thereof might appear to be of the then king's majesty, your dread sovereign, you did subjoin and say to the late Mr. John Stuart, of Ladiwell; 'And, Mr. John, you understand Latin.'

"Likewise considering the condition of the kingdom, and the oppositions that a great many of the people were in to his majesty; particularly you the said marquis, and your three complices and followers; it is clear that the said words did not only treasonably reflect upon kingly government, as being subject to the people, who might in the cause aforesaid depose a king; but also it is clear, that your meaning also and intention thereby was, that the king's majesty, your dread sovereign, might be so destroyed: and the said treasonable speeches were so vented by you, of design to usher in your many treasonable actions and practices done by you unto his sacred person, dignity, and authority; which, doubtless, did occasion and was mainly instrumental both in his deposition and cruel murder, which wicked and treasonable speeches the said Mr. John having thereafter reported, you most cruelly and tyrannously did prosecute him to death, as a leasing-maker betwixt the king's majesty and his good subjects, howbeit you could not but be conscious of the truth of what he had reported.

"Secondly, In prosecution of your aforesaid wicked and treasonable purposes, you having marched with the said forces to the house of Airlie, belonging to his majesty's right trusty and well beloved cousin and chief counsellor James earl of Airlie, which was then kept for his majesty's service and authority; after you had forced the rendition of the said house, and destroyed the woods and plantings of the same, and wearied and destroyed the said Earl's friends and tenants, his majesty's good subjects, you did slight and demolish the said house; and to express your hatred to the said Earl, merely for his loyalty to his majesty, did seize, or by those under you did seize upon the house of Forth in Glenyla belonging also to the said Earl; and without any colour or pretence of offence did wilfully, most treasonably, and contrary to the aforesaid acts of parliament, raise fire in the said house, and thereby burnt and destroyed the same, and all furniture therein.

"Thirdly, In further prosecution of your treasonable plots and machinations against his majesty's person and authority, contrary to the aforesaid laws and acts of parliament in A. D. 1640; you in an hostile manner, did most treasonably lay siege to his majesty's fort and castle of Dunbarton, then fortified and kept for his majesty's service by col. Henderson, having his majesty's command and commission for that effect, and forced the said Colonel to render the said castle to you; out of which most treasonably you caused to be transported and carried away a great many of his majesty's cannon and other ammunition, appointed for defence and security of the said castle.

"Fourthly, Notwithstanding that his then majesty had in A. D. 1641 come himself in person to this kingdom, and most graciously condescended to all such acts as were required of him (how unjust soever) for securing and pleasing the people, and settling a peace; and that he had past one act of oblivion, to indemnify all such as had formerly been in opposition to his majesty within this kingdom, and that he had conferred upon you the title and dignity of marquis, as a mark of his royal favour, and put you in places of greatest trust in the kingdom; and that you had sworn and promised, in the abbey of Holyroodhouse, that in case any trouble or commotions should happen to be raised in England, by any of his discontented subjects against him, you would assist and defend him against all such, to the hazard of your life and fortunes: and that his majesty had parted from this his ancient kingdom, as was said and acknowledged by all, a contented prince from a contented people: yet nevertheless his majesty being forced and necessitated in anno 1642, to leave his parliament in England then sitting at Westminster, and his royal palace of Whitehall, and betake himself to defensive arms, for maintenance of his royal person, dignity and authority, and to protect the same against an army of sectaries, who maliciously, traitorously, cruelly and treasonably did invade the same; you, contrary to your allegiance, obligations and recent promise aforesaid, did by yourself and complices, to fortify and strengthen the said rebels and sectaries, and in direct opposition to his majesty's person and dignity, call, or cause to be called a pretended convention of estates in Anno 1643, without any shadow or colour of lawful authority; and you and they so convoked did take upon you the supreme authority of the kingdom, enter in league with his majesty's enemies, impose subsidies and excise upon the people, and raise an army of his majesty's own subjects, and therewith entered his majesty's kingdom of England, seized upon his majesty's towns and forts there; and killed, murdered, plundered and destroyed his good subjects, and in open and pitched fields fought for, with and in behalf of the said rebels, against his majesty's forces, which in effect was the rise and cause of all our subsequent ruins and disasters that befel his majesty or his loyal and good subjects thereafter.

Fifthly, In Anno 1645, after your return from England, to shew your implacable malice and hatred to all such as had any dependence upon, or affection to his majesty, you by yourself, and others under your command, or at your direction, did most treasonably raise wilful fire, and burn the house of Mrs. Lytvented, inhabited by the countess of Sterling, and in her possession, and all the moveables and furniture, they extending to a great value; notwithstanding that the said countess was an honourable aged woman; and who, and her dearest husband, the earl of Sterling, by all observances and dutiful respects obliged you, so far as in them lay; thereby adding to the said act of treason, the height of oppression and ingratitude.

Sixthly, In the year 1646, you by yourself, or those under your command, or for whom you were answerable, or whom you might have stopped or impeded, did take in the house of Taward, belonging to the laird of Salmond, and the house of Oscoge, belonging to Lamond of Oscoge, and after articles of capitulation drawn and subscribed by the laird of Ardkinglas, and other officers under your command, did most treasonably, in manner aforesaid, under trust and assurance, as is said, burn the said house of Oscoge, cruelly hang, kill and murder a great many of the said lairds of Salmond and Oscoge's friends and followers; as is more fully expressed in the summons raised at their instance and mine, for his majesty's interest against you, and which is repeated in a part of this article.

Seventhly, You having traitorously intended the utter ruin and extirpation of all faithful and loyal subjects, who had given testimony of their faithfulness to his majesty's dearest father, of ever-blessed memory; and having with an army of your accomplices, associates, vassals, servants, tenants and followers in Anno 1646, marched to Kentire, where a great many of his majesty's well-affected subjects of the name of Mac-Donald, Mac-Cow, and others, whose names are not particularly known, to the number of 3 or 400, had fortified themselves for their security, and against your oppression and violence, in the house of Lochthead and Donavertie; and you with the said forces having marched to the said house of Lochthead; the gentlemen and others therein, without making the least opposition, and declaring that they had refuged themselves to the said place for shelter and protection, did render up the said house and themselves, upon assurance, that they might really and quietly return and live at their own homes; according thereto, they were dismissed and sent home, where they remained in a peaceable manner by the space of days. Notwithstanding, thereafter, you and the forces aforesaid having besieged the castle of Donavertie, during the said siege, there were several rendezvous appointed for the said gentlemen to make their appearance; which frequently they did, and were still dismissed, until such time as those who were within the said house of Donavertie had rendered up the said house and themselves, to be disposed of at the mercy of the kingdom, or pretended committee of estates: And that notwithstanding thereof, you and your said complices had most perfidiously, treacherously and treasonably, and for which also you are here indicted, slaughtered and murdered, or caused to be slaughtered and murdered, the number of 260 of them or 300, they being under your trust, assurance, credit, or power; and did dispose of the rest of them at your own hand, without any lawful warrant, to captains William Hay, and Archibald Campbell, to serve in the French wars. Then and hereafter you caused and appointed a new rendezvous of the said gentlemen, who were in the house of Lochthead, and their followers; who having appeared in frequent manner, you caused to be singled out fifteen or sixteen of the said gentlemen, who were that night sent to the said house of Lochthead, and the next morning brought forth by you, or such as were under your command; and most perfidiously, cruelly and inhumanly, without any order of law, or form of process civil or military, hanged and murdered. And to aggravate the said cruel and barbarous crime, it is of verity, that one of the said persons being an old man, and having one son, of age not above sixteen or seventeen years; the father immediately before his death did depone, that his said son had never done any crimes offensive all his life-time, but that he had still been at school's; and that some few days before, he had come from Glasgow, the place of his education, to visit his parents; and therefore did earnestly supplicate, in regard of his innocency, his life might be spared: Notwithstanding you, and the bloody actors of your purposes, were so unmerciful, as not to hearken to the said so just desire of the said dying old man, but forthwith the said young innocent boy was cruelly also hanged to death. Likewise not content with the aforesaid unheard-of horrid acts of cruelty, you in the month of 1640, or one or other of the months thereof, by yourself and followers, or such whom you might have kept or left, caused to be transported from the Isle of Ila, to the Isle of Inwa, to the number of two hundred persons of all sexes and ages; where all means of livelihood and substance being withdrawn from them, they in a most miserable manner were pined and starved to death by famine, except some very few, who had out-lived the rest, and were relieved and carried out of the said Isle by boats accidentally coming by : Likewise the person of Macdonald, alias Coalmac Gillespy, or Coawkittoche, being in Anno 1643 ordained by the parliament, or committee of estates thereof, to have been brought from prison out of the house of Scots where he then was, and there had been kept by you and others in your time, many years before, to Edinburgh, that the causes for which he had been kept, and so detained in prison, might have been known ; and he having for that end been brought in a ship the length of the road of Leith ; you, for preventing such information of your cruelty and oppression exercised towards him, and many of his friends and relations, which he was able to have given and made out ; you in manifest contempt and scorn of that committee of parliament, under which you yourself acted, caused to take the person of the said Coawkittoche forth of the said ship, and after you had carried him to your own lands and bounds, cruelly caused to hang him to death.

Eighthly, Notwithstanding of the manifold acts of mercy and favour, dignity, honour and trust conferred upon you by your then dread sovereign, for reclaiming of you from your disloyal and treasonable practices, plots and machinations, against his sacred person, dignity and authority ; he being sore pressed and reduced to great straits and extremities by that army of sectaries before-mentioned, with whom you had formerly joined, as is said ; and having in that exigence and difficulty rather chosen, from an inuate principle of affection of his countrymen, to cast himself over in the hands of the army of his majesty's subjects of his ancient kingdom of Scotland, for shelter and preservation of his royal person ; nevertheless, you, the said Marquis, being the chief ring-leader of that factious party, who then swayed the estate and affairs both in council and armies in the said kingdom, did so contrive and complot, and by your influence so prevail, that after all fair offers made by his majesty, and his earnest desire to have come and lived in Scotland, until such time as all differences in both kingdoms had been settled : That a pretended act of parliament was made for abandoning and leaving his majesty in the disposal and mercy of the inveterate enemies of his majesty and government, the said army of sectaries. And that your acting in, and accessions to, the said affair might be the more evident and clear, and to aggravate your eminent and singular guilt therein, you yourself went to London, where you basely, under pretext of satisfaction for the arrears of the said army, raised by the pretended authority of the pretended convention of estates, in Anno 1643, as is said, treacherously and treasonably gave up, at least condescended to the upgiving of your dread sovereign and master, and that as being impowered so to do by the kingdom of Scotland ; and thereby did rub an indelible mark of reproach and infamy upon the whole nation to all generations, so far as in you lay. And further, to clear your aforesaid treasonable dealings, accessions to, and correspondency with that infamous party of the said army, who carried on the said abominable and detestable act, you being at the same time in a pretended joint committee of both kingdoms, while as the English therein did call in question whether the Scots army would sincerely concur with them in their said treason and treachery : you, after many arguments used in their favours, earnestly desired them to have patience for a little time, and it would appear by somewhat of the officers of the army, how far they intended to concur and go along with them. Likewise within a few days after there was a vindication and declaration emitted in name of the said armies, whereby it was held forth, that in case his majesty would not condescend to all the desires of both kingdoms, which was no less than the divesting of himself of all regal power, civil, ecclesiastical, or military in state, church, or armics, they would deliver him up ; which immediately after the payment of *200,000*l. basely and treasonably was done by you and them.

Ninthly. In anno 1648, his majesty's royal father being, contrary to all laws, divine and human, most unchristianly, barbarously and treasonably detained and kept prisoner within the Castle of Carisbrook, in the Isle of Wight, by a party of factious, disloyal and rebellious sectaries ; the estates of parliament then convened by his majesty's authority, having taken the said inhuman, treasonable and cruel usage into serious consideration, they found this kingdom engaged in honour and duty to resent so horrid and unheard-of cruelty and lese-majesty, and obliged to use their utmost endeavours to relieve him out of the hands of such wicked usurpers, and to restore him to the exercise of his royal authority in freedom, honour and safety ; for effecting thereof, after all other fair ways essayed, upon mature consultation had, they found that the only probable means was the raising of an army of his majesty's good subjects, which was accordingly statute and ordained by act of the said parliament. Against the carrying on of which, so just, laudable and necessary a duty, you did most violently and eminently oppose yourself, not only by arguing, voting against, and using all other means in your power to obstruct the same ; but also, after the same was past into an act of parliament, you did most contemptuously and treasonably publicly dissent from, and enter a Protestation against the same ; and not being therewith content, after the said army in pursuance of their duty and allegiance had marched into the said kingdom, you shortly after in the month of June in contempt of the aforesaid authority, and against the preservation of his majesty's person and authority, did most treasonably convocate an army of factious, seditious and rebellious subjects, in opposition to the said army, and therewith committed divers and sundry outrages, murders, slaughters, plunders and vastations upon the persons and estates of divers of his majesty's good subjects, and therewith invaded several of the cities and castles, seized thereupon, and upon the magazine with arms and ammunition therein: And at that time the said rebellious army of sectaries of England, being upon the borders, you fearing and apprehending that the force and power raised by you should not be able to withstand his majesty's good and loyal subjects who were then risen and ready to rise in arms for asserting and vindicating his majesty's just authority, you did most basely, treacherously and treasonably call in to your aid and assistance the said armies of sectaries. Likewise you yourself went in person to the house of Mordington, within a mile of the English borders, to the end aforesaid; and you did meet with the vile usurper Oliver Cromwell, commander of the said army, with whom you had several private meetings and consultations, and thereby persuaded, and so prevailed with the said Traitor, that he thereafter marched with the said army to Edinburgh and the places thereabout; and which march and in-coming of the said Oliver you might have undoubtedly hindered; in so far as it can be made appear by clear proof and testimonies of famous persons, That it having been complained upon to him at the said house of Mordington, that by reason of his being there with such a great number of soldiers, the lord Mordington's tenants would undoubtedly be ruined; he the said Oliver made answer, That he could not help the same, for his staying and going did depend upon you, and that he was ready, if you desired, to march back to England. At least, you did contrive, advise or consent to the raising and convocating of the said seditious, factious, and rebellious armies; at least was one of the number yourself, and with, and assisting to them in arms; at least, did vote, counsel or persuade the in-calling of the said army of sectaries: And they being so brought in, you did countenance, assist, concur and consult with them, or their commanders, or some of them, in public or in private at Edinburgh, and in the Canongate, in the house called Lady Home's Lodgings, and in divers other places. As also, you did most villainously and traitorously contrive, counsel or vote for the drawing up of a letter directed to the Traitor and abominable Usurper, wherein you and your complices did engage yourselves, in the name of the kingdom of Scotland, to employ your utmost endeavours, that none who have been active in, or consenting to the engagement against the said sectaries, or had been in arms at Stirling, or elsewhere, in maintenance or pursuance of that engagement, should be employed in any public place or trust within this kingdom whatsoever, without advice or consent of the kingdom of England; as the said letter, dated the 6th day of October, 1648, more fully bears. As also, you did draw up, at least did counsel, advise or vote, to the up-drawing of certain instructions given to sir John Chiesly, who was sent by you and your complices, as commissioner to the pretended house of parliament of England, dated October 17, the year aforesaid; wherein you desire, that the noblemen, gentlemen of quality, and considerable officers of the army, that went into England, under the command of duke Hamilton, and who were then prisoners, might be kept as pledges for the peace of that kingdom; by which not only have you endeavoured most unnaturally to enslave your fellow-subjects and countrymen to the power of strangers, but most treacherously and treasonably, as an unworthy, ungrate patriot, done what in you lay to destroy the life of your own dread sovereign, and the royal authority in him and his succession, and to subject the honour, liberty, power and government of this his majesty's ancient and free kingdom, to the command, lust and tyranny of foreign Traitors and Usurpers. As also, you, upon the 4th day of May thereafter, having taken upon you most treasonably the supreme authority of this kingdom, gave warrant under your hand for issuing out a Proclamation, declaring that the wives, children and families of James lord Ogilvy, lord Rea, Lewis marquis of Huntley therein designant, Lewis Gordon son to the marquis of Huntley, John now earl of Middleton, therein designant, John Middleton of some-time designant general-major, should be no longer under the protection of this kingdom, and that such course should be taken for transporting them out of their country to foreign parts, as the estates of parliament, or their committee, should think fit.

Tenthly, After his majesty's dearest and most royal father, of eternal and most blessed memory, had been most unchristianly, inhumanly, horridly and barbarously murdered, by the said abominable traitor and usurper Oliver Cromwell, and his wicked complices, the devilish and treasonable courses, plots, contrivings, and actings of yours did not yet terminate: For there being some motions for address to be made to his majesty, by some of his good subjects of this his ancient kingdom, as undoubted and rightful successor to his deceased royal father in the imperial crown thereof, that his majesty might come to his said ancient kingdom, for exercising his royal power and authority; the said motion and purpose being so just and lawful, you, notwithstanding of your great impudence and daring, always fearing, that a direct opposing thereof would prove altogether ineffectual; you, in a most indirect way, procured the application made for inviting his majesty, to be so clogged with limitations, restrictions and conditions, to have been condescended to by his majesty, before his admission to the exercise of his royal government, as were most destructive to his majesty's dignity and authority, and most derogatory to monarchical government; as are more fully expressed in the several commissions, instructions and addresses sent and made to his majesty to that effect, and public proclamation of his majesty at the mercat-cross of Edinburgh, by you and your complices, commissioners at Breda; all which are here repeated as a part of the libel, brevitatis causa. And his majesty, upon consideration, that the said unreasonable, unlawful and unreasonable conditions were exacted of his majesty by you, and a few number of factious subjects, who had, by the assistance of the usurper and tyrant Oliver Cromwell, thrust yourself into the government of his majesty's ancient kingdom; and trusting to the fidelity, the loyalty and good affection of his other good subjects, having, notwithstanding the said hard and unjust conditions, resolved to cast himself upon the loyalty and affections of his other good and faithful subjects; you, to obstruct his majesty's purpose and resolution, yea, and so far as in you lay, to fright and terrify him therefrom by you and your complices cruel execution upon the marquis of Montrose, his majesty's commissioner, and who represented his person in his said ancient kingdom; caused to be most horribly and inhumanly murdered the said Marquis, at the Mercat-cross, upon the 21st day of May, 1650, with all the circumstances of disgrace and dishonour: which so much reflected upon his majesty's person, dignity and authority, and upon the honour of all true nobility; and is so recent and fresh, with detestation, in the memories of all good subjects and generous spirits, at home and abroad, that it is not fit to be mentioned or repeated here. But his majesty still continuing in his former purpose and resolution, and after a most tedious and dangerous voyage at sea, having, by the providence of Almighty God, happily and safely arrived in his said ancient kingdom; shortly thereafter, the cruel bloody murderer and usurper Oliver Cromwell, in pursuance of his majesty, with a powerful army of sectaries, by sea and land, invaded his said majesty's ancient kingdom. For opposing of whom, an army being raised; while both the said armies were in the field, you most treacherously and treasonably kept correspondence, and had intelligence with the said usurper, by writing to, and receiving letters from him, without his majesty's private consent or warrant; at least, by sending to, and receiving messages from him by word of mouth. And further, to advance the designs of that abominable regicide, after you had by your indirect means, plots, advices or contrivances gotten his majesty removed from his army at Leith; you by your influence upon a few number of the commissioners of the General Assembly, yourself being one of the number then met at St. Cuthbert's church, commonly called the West-Kirk, prevailed so, that for the weakening of the hands of friends, and strengthening the enemies, there was in a most clandestine and surreptitious manner an act, as of the said commission of the Kirk, made, printed and published; wherein, besides many re-proachful and slanderous expressions of his majesty and his royal ancestors, more fully expressed in the said pretended act, bearing date August 13, 1650, it was declared, that you disclaimed, and would not own his majesty's interest, because of his refusal to subscribe and emit a declaration offered to him; and which declaration was contrived and drawn up by you, and contains many scandalous, seditious, imperious, reproachful and treasonable expressions, not only against his majesty's authority and government, but also against his royal father and mother, and others his royal progenitors, as is more at large expressed in the aforesaid act of the date above-written, and declaration bearing date the day the same year: of which declaration there needs no more be said, than that the circumstances by which his majesty was enforced to sign the same, are enough known to the world; and that the worthiest and greatest part of his majesty's ancient kingdom did even detest and abhor the evil usage of his majesty in that particular, when the same tyranny was exercised there by the power of you and a few evil men your complices, which at that time had spread itself over his majesty's kingdom of England; at least you and your complices did ratify and approve the said act of the West-Kirk, and consent thereto; and at least you did deal with, and press and force his majesty to sign and subscribe the declaration aforesaid; at least you were author or contriver, adviser or counsellor, persuader or voter, or assenter, assister, aider or abettor of the aforesaid restrictions, limitations and conditions, and of the aforesaid murder of his said majesty's commissioner, and manner thereof, and of the keeping of the said correspondence with the said invader and usurper, and of the said act and declarations, or any or other of them, or all or part thereof, or one or other of them.

“Eleventhly, After it had pleased God to suffer that monster of men and cruel regicide, Oliver Cromwell, so far to prevail against all his majesty's endeavours for recovering his just right and interest in this and in his other kingdoms, and over all the armies and forces raised by him for that end, so that he was necessitated to refugeate himself with foreign princes and estates: howbeit, at his majesty's coronation, you, in the presence of God, and a great many of the nobility of this kingdom, and others therein convened at Schoon, the 1st of January, 1651, did swear to be faithful to the crown, and true liege-men to his majesty: yet nevertheless, contrary to the said oath, and notwithstanding the many favours, honours, benefits, and acts of indemnity conferred upon you, and contrary to the laws and acts of parliament, as is expressed; you did most perfidiously, ungratefully and treasonably, in anno 1653, or 1654, not only according to your bounden duty, not rise in arms, and join with the earls of Glencairn and Middleton, who were commissioned from his majesty for hindering the further progress of the usurpers, and expelling them forth of this kingdom; but did in open hostility join with the said usurpers their forces; especially with the colonels Overton, Cobbet and Twisleton; at least with the said colonels Cobbet and Twisleton; at least with colonel Twisleton, when he was in the highlands in opposition to the said earl of Glencarn; at least joined with one or other of them in counsel; did take and relieve prisoners, did furnish several pieces of great cannon, to the number of fourteen, in anno 1653, or 1654, to colonel Aldred, then governor of Air: which cannon, or a great many of them, were taken out by you of his majesty's castle of Dunbarton, at the time and in the manner above expressed. And likewise you did take pay from the said usurpers for a company of foot under them and in their service, thereby openly and clearly making it appear what you did intend by all your more covered and private machinations, plottings and treasonable actings against his majesty's dearest father and himself. Likewise to make it appear what intimacy and power you had with the usurper, you not only did term and call the actings of his majesty's forces against you and the usurpers, rebellion, but also you in anno 1654, did take upon you power to bring off such as were in that service, and to give remissions therefore under your own hand; particularly to John Mac Dowgaw of Dunolick, as the same under your hand, the said John will verify.

Twelfthly, The said Oliver Cromwell, that monster of men, vilest of traitors, most cruel murderer, bloody tyrant and usurper, having reached, as he thought, the end of all his devilish plots and treasonable machinations, by usurping the dominion and authority of his majesty's three kingdoms, and settling the same, so far as in him lay, upon him and his family; you conceiving the same so fixed and riveted, that in human probability it was not possible to be removed or shaken; that you might avowedly reap the fruits of your former more covered, vile and damnable plottings, contrivings and actings for the said arch tyrant and traitor, you then pulled off and laid aside the mask of pretended loyalty and religion, under which you had all along formerly lurked, thereby having deceived and cheated a great many of his majesty's good subjects from their due allegiance and loyalty under hypocritical fair pretences of your affection and zeal for religion, prince, and country, to the utter ruin (if not of souls) of many of their bodies, estates and fortunes; and did openly, in face of the world, discover yourself in your own colours, appearing in a thing professedly and publicly in behalf of the said usurper against his majesty's person and authority: in so far as in the month of 1657, after the decease of the said usurper, the succeeding usurper, his son, being most treasonably and tyrannically proclaimed Chief Magistrate and sole Protector of all his majesty's dominions and territories thereto belonging, at the mercat-cross of his majesty's cities of Edinburgh and Dunbarton, you having apparently, for such like services done or to be done, received from the said usurper Oliver one precept due upon the Exchequer of Scotland, for payment to you of 12,000*l.* sterling, or thereabout, did with your personal presence countenance the said tyrannical and treasonable proclamation; thereby, so far as in you lay, divesting his majesty of his just and royal interest and right, and establishing the same on the persons and families of the said usurpers. Likewise not long after the said usurper, the more to establish himself in his usurped government, having called a pretended Parliament, consisting of a pretended new-coined house of peers, and certain persons of his majesty's three kingdoms as a house of commons to sit in Westminster; you did procure yourself elected commissioner for the shire of Aberdeen, at least did accept of a commission from them; albeit both by the nobility of your birth, and your non-residence within the said shire, you was in law incapable to be so elected; at least ought and might have refused to accept any commission. Nevertheless having voluntarily, and of your own accord, embraced the said charge and employment, you thereupon took journey, and went to London, and most basely, perfidiously and treasonably, sate, voted, and otherwise acted in the said usurper's pretended Parliament, by whom his majesty's right and interest was disclaimed and abjured, and the same owned only in the said usurper's person as a member of the said pretended house of commons, to the high indignity and contempt of his majesty's sacred person and authority, the utter destruction of monarchical government, the dishonour of this kingdom, and the great disgrace of your own family and posterity.

Thirteenthly, You the said Marquis, to make it further appear to the world, that it was always your purpose and intention to destroy his majesty's authority and government, and to oppose his restauration to his just right and interest to his three kingdoms, at a provincial assembly holden at Innerary a little after the defeat of his majesty's army at Worcester, the ministers praying for his majesty after the accustomed manner, you did most villainously and treasonably rebuke them, saying, 'That they were but fools to pray for a malignant and wicked king, whom God had rejected, and would never restore him again;' or some such like words to that purpose. And also, you being at London, in the time of the usurper Oliver, you said in presence of divers persons of quality, 'That you wondered how people could be so mad, as to call home a family whom God had rejected,' or such words to that purpose: likewise after your home-coming to Scotland, yea, openly in a public meeting at James Mausterton's, in Niddrey's Wynde, in presence of several noblemen and gentlemen, you boasted, 'That you would own any thing you had done in these things by-gone; and that if it were to do, you would do it again; howbeit you had known that all that had, would have come.' Thereby presumptuously taking upon you, by outward success, to give judgment upon the hidden and secret counsels and determinations of Almighty God, and thereby to alienate the affections, duties, and allegiance of his majesty's good subjects, and to harden and confirm others, such as are otherways disposed in their wicked courses towards his majesty's person and authority.

Lastly, That your monstrous and execrable treason may appear to all the world, it is of verity, that in the year 1648, at a private conference betwixt you, Oliver Cromwell, and col. Ireton, the said Oliver complaining of the many difficulties that attended their affairs, by reason of the divers designs which his majesty had on foot from time to time against them; you the said Marquis made answer, 'That their danger was great indeed, in regard that if any of these designs should take effect, they were all ruined.' And thereupon gave your positive advice, that they should proceed to the questioning of the king for his life; assuring them, that they could never be safe until they had taken away his majesty's life. At least, you did know of the horrible and treasonable design of murdering his said majesty; and did most treasonably conceal, and not reveal the same till after the said horrid deed was committed, and so past prevention or remedy. At which time, in anno 1649, publicly in the face of the pretended Parliament then sitting, you said, that the usurper Cromwell had told you, 'That England and Scotland, would never be at peace, until the king were put to death.' By all which particulars respectively, above rehearsed, it is clearly evinced, that you were, and are author, contriver, deviser, consulter, adviser, of all or part of all the aforesaid crimes of treason, and other above libelled, or other of them, in manner above declared. And thereby has incurred the pains and punishments of high treason, and others contained in the laws and acts of parliament above-written; which must and should be inflicted upon you with all rigour, in example to others in all time coming.

Jan. 31. Ordered, That the above-written Dittay be given to the marquis of Argyle, by a herald or pursuivant, and he to answer thereto, upon the 13th day of February next to come.

The Marquis of ARGYLE'S PETITION to the Parliament of Scotland, craving Precognition of his Case, containing many weighty reasons urging the necessity thereof. Presented to the Parliament, Feb. 12, 1661.

To my Lord Commissioner his grace, and honourable Estates of Parliament. The humble PETITION of Archibald Marquis of Argyle, Humbly sheweth; That for as much as the Petitioner can with a safe conscience affirm, and solemnly protest, that whatever his actings or accession has been in relation to public business since the beginning of the troubles, till his majesty's departure hence in the year 1651, though he will not purge himself of errors, failings, and mistakes, both in judgment and practice, incident to human frailty, and common to him, if not with the whole, at least with the greatest part of the nation; yet in one thing, though he were to die, he would still avouch and retain his innocence, that he never intended any thing treasonably, out of any pernicious design against his majesty's late royal father of ever-glorious memory, or his present majesty (whom God may long preserve), their persons or government; but endeavoured always to his uttermost for settling the differences betwixt their majesties and the people. And as to any actings before the year 1641, or from the said year, till his majesty being in the parliament at Perth and Sterling, your petitioner did with a full assurance rely upon his gracious majesty, and his royal father, their treaties, approbation, oblivion, and indemnity, for what was past, and firmly believed that the same should never have risen in judgment, or that the petitioner should have been drawn in question therefore. And during his majesty's absence, and being forced from the exercise of his royal government by the late usurpers, and long after that the nation, by their deputies, had accepted of their authority and government, and they in possession, the petitioner was forced to capitulation with them, being in their hands, and under sickness, and the same was, after all endeavours used, according to the duty of a good subject; and upon the petitioner's part, so innocent and necessary for self-preservation, without the least intention, action, or effect to his majesty's prejudice: that albeit upon mis-information (as the petitioner humbly conceives) his actings and compliance both in their designs and quality have been misrepresented, as particularly singular and personal, stating the petitioner in a degree of guilt beyond others, and incapable of pardon; the same have so far prevailed upon his majesty, as to cloud and damp the propitious and comfortable rays of his royal grace and favour, and have strained his gracious inclination beyond its natural disposition of clemency expressed to his other subjects, to commit the petitioner's person, and give way to the trial of his carriage and actings: yet so firmly rooted is the petitioner's persuasion of his majesty's justice and clemency, and that he intends the reclaiming, and not the ruin of the meanest of his subjects, who retain their loyalty, duty, and good affection to his person and government; that upon true and right representation of the petitioner's carriage and actings, he shall be able to vindicate himself of these aspersions, and shall give his majesty satisfaction; at least so far to extenuate his guilt, as may render him a fit object of that royal clemency, which is of that depth, that having swallowed and past by, not only personal but national guiltiness, of much more a deeper dye than any the petitioner can be charged with, or made out against him; and so will not strain to pass by and pardon the faults and failings of a person, who never acted but in a public joint way, without any sinister or treasonable design against his majesty or his royal father; and against which he can defend himself either by acts of approbation and oblivion in verbo principis, which he conceives to be the supreme, sacred, and inviolable security, or which he was forced to, much against his inclination, by an insuperable necessity. And albeit his majesty's grace and favour is strictly tied to no other rule but his royal will and pleasure; yet his majesty's so innate, essential, and inseparable a quality of his royal nature, that the petitioner is persuaded in all human certainty, that the leaving and committing to his parliament (as is expressed in his majesty's declaration of October 12th last by-past) the trying and judging of the carriage of his subjects during the late troubles, as indeed it is in its own nature, and ought to be so accepted of all, as an undoubted evidence of his majesty's affection to, and confidence in his people; so no other trial or judging is therein meant, but a fair, just, legal and usual trial, without any prejudice, passion, or prelimitation, or precipitation; like as by the said declaration there was a freedom for all the people interested, to make their application to the parliament, or in the mean time to the committee, from whom only his majesty is pleased to declare he would receive address and information. And seeing it was the petitioner's misfortune, during the sitting of the said committee, to be prisoner in England; whereas if he had been prisoner here in Scotland, he would have made application to them, and would have craved, and in justice expected that, precognition might have been taken by them, to whom the preparing and ordering of that affair (to wit, anent the trial of the subjects carriage during the troubles) was recommended, that the petitioner's absence, which was his punishment, not his fault, may not be prejudicial, seeing the petitioner has lately received two several dittays, wherein there be many crimes grossly false, with all the aspersions and aggravations imaginable laid to his charge; importing no less than the loss of his life, fame, and estate, and the ruin of him and his posterity; which he is confident is not intended by his majesty. And that by the law and practice of this kingdom, consonant to all reason and equity, the petitioner ought to have upon his desire a precognition, for taking the deposition of certain persons, which being frequently and usually practised in this country, when any person is defamed for any crime, and therefore incarcerate before he was brought to a trial, at his desire, precognition was taken in all business relating thereto; which the petitioner in all humility conceives, ought much more not to be denied to him, not only by reason of respect to his quality, and of the importance and consequence thereof to all his majesty's subjects of all quality in all time coming; but also in regard it has been so meant and intended by his majesty's declaration aforesaid; like as the manner of the crimes objected, being actings in times of wars and troubles, the guilt thereof was not personal and particular, but rather national and universal, and veiled and covered with acts of indemnity and oblivion; and so tender and ticklish, that if duly pondered, after a hearing allowed to the petitioner, in prudence and policy, will not be found expedient to be tossed in public, or touched with every hand, but rather to be precognosced upon by some wise, sober, noble, and judicious persons, for thir and several other reasons in the paper hereto annexed. Nor does the petitioner desire the same animo protelandi, nor needs the same breed any longer delay; nor is it sought without an end of zeal to his majesty's power, and vindication of the petitioner's innocency, as to many particulars wherewith he is aspersed; and it would be seriously pondered, that seeing 'Cunctatio nulla longa ubi agitur de vita hominis,' far less can this small delay, which is usual, and in this case most expedient, if not absolutely necessary, be refused, 'ubi agitur non solum de vita, sed de fama,' and of all worldly interests that can be dear or of value to any man.

Upon consideration of the premises, it is humbly craved, That your grace, and the honourable estates of parliament, may grant the petitioner's desire, and to give warrant to cite persons to depone before your grace, and the estates of parliament, upon such interrogatories as your petitioner shall give in, for clearing of several things concerning his intencion and loyalty during the troubles. And for such as are out of the country, and strangers, residents in England, commissions may be directed to such as your grace and the parliament shall think fit, to take their depositions upon oath, and to return the same.—And your petitioner shall ever pray, &c.

February 12. This Petition being read was refused.

Edinburgh, at the Parliament-House.

February 13, 1661.

The Marquis of Argyle (being accused of high-treason, at the instance of sir John Fletcher, his majesty's advocate for his interest) was brought to the bar. His lordship humbly desired but to speak a few words before reading the Indictment; assuring to speak nothing in the cause itself. Whereupon he was removed a little, and after some debate, the house resolved that the said Indictment should be first read. Then his lordship desired that a bill which he had caused his advocates to give in to the lords of the articles, (desiring a precognition, with many reasons urging the necessity of it) to which he had received no answer, might be read before the said Indictment: which being likewise refused, the said Indictment was first read; and after the reading thereof, the Marquis (being put off his first thoughts) was compelled to this extemporary discourse following, as it was faithfully writ when his lordship spoke.

of any portion that should happen to fall to my satisfaction. And to evidence that I was no means to harm the family, I stood with my right betwixt all fines and forfeitures of bonds, and accounted for any thing I could receive. And to manifest yet further, that the burden of that family was not from any extrinsic cause to themselves, I have under the old Marquis's own hand, and his son, George lord Gordon, (who was a very worthy young nobleman) the just inventory of their debts, amounting to about one million of marks, in anno 1640. It would, I fear, my lord, consume too much of the parliament's precious time, to hear many other circumstances, to make this particular more clear, which I shall at this time forbear.

The fourth calumny is, the death of the marquis of Montross. There are many in this house, my lord, who know very well I refused to meddle either in the matter or manner of it: and so far were we from having any particular quarrels at one another; that in anno 1645, he and I were fully agreed upon articles and conditions contained in a treaty past betwixt us: the gentleman is yet alive who carried the messages both by word and writing betwixt us; and it was neither his fault nor mine that the business did not end at that time, which (it is known to all) proved very obnoxious to the kingdom thereafter.

The fifth calumny is concerning my dealing with the English after Worcester fight. It is well known, my lord, to many, that myself, and the gentlemen of Argyleshire, my kinsmen, vassals and tenants, endeavoured cordially to engage all their neighbours about them on all hands against the English, which they did not prevail in, but was most unhappily made known to the English commanders for the time; which they caused immediately to be published, as a very notable discovery, in their news-books; which occasioned two sad disadvantages to us: For they not only crushed our attempts in the infancy, but also determined the severer resolutions against us; whereby two strong regiments of foot, (Overton's and Read's) and very near the number of one of horse (under the command of one Blackmoor) were sent to Argyle; and when Dean came there, it pleased God to visit me with a great distemper or sickness (as Dr. Cunningham, and many others who were with me, can witness). What, my lord, I was pressed to, when I was violently in their hands, may be instructed by the paper itself (written by Dean's man's own hand, yet extant to shew), which I did absolutely refuse, upon all the hazard of the uttermost of their malice; as also what I was necessitated to do, is likewise ready to be shewn, whereby I was still continued their prisoner upon demand.

I shall, my lord, add one reason more to clear this (besides many other weighty public reasons and considerations, which I shall forbear to mention at this time, it being more natural to bring them in by way of defences afterward), my own interest, and of all noblemen and superiors in Scotland. It may rationally be presumed, that I had been a very senseless fool, if ever I had been for promoting such an authority and interest over me, as levelled all, and was so totally destructive to all that differed, myself and other noblemen, from their own vassals, which many say I was too earnest in, yea, it being absurdly derogative to all true nobility; and my ancestors and I, as it is said in that libel, having had so many titles of honour, dignity, and eminent places of trust, conferred upon us by his majesty's royal predecessors and himself, all for our constant loyalty and adherence to the crown on all occasions, as the records and histories of this ancient kingdom hold forth, besides the narratives of all our grants, and asserting the just privileges thereof, against all opposers. I did, my lord, ever, even when the English were at the intolerable height of usurpation, declare my true abhorrence to a Commonwealth Government, which was well known to them all. I was not indeed, my lord, very dissatisfied, when there were rumours spread abroad of Cromwell's being made a king, as some here present can witness; for I told them it was a most probable way for his majesty; and the more it were encouraged, would tend the more to Cromwell's, and their deformed Commonwealth's Government's ruin, and promote his majesty's just interest the more. My lord, I shall not much blame my Lord Advocate for doing his endeavour, it being an essential part of his function to accuse, but I must say, that it is very hard measure, that so able a man has taken near as many months, in taking pains to prompt as many enemies as his persuasions could possibly invite, to vent out the highest notes of their malice; and laying out search by them for, and collecting all the bad reports, or rather, to give them their genuine term, I may call them a confused mass of the common clashes of the country, thereby to advise misconstructions of all the public actings of both parliaments and committees during the late troubles, and with strange and remote inferences to adduce all those to the channel of my particular actings; he has taken, I say, my lord, as many months, as I have had days to answer them, being an exceeding disadvantage. But, my lord, that is not all, I am likewise extremely troubled, that he labours in that libel all along to draw an obscure veil of perpetual oblivion over all my good services; and specially my faithful and loyal endeavours in restoring of his sacred majesty to the crown of this his most ancient kingdom of Scotland, and the exercise of his majesty's royal authority therein; with my cordial endeavours for his majesty's restitution to the rest of his dominions also: which his majesty both knows, and has been pleased often to acknowledge it to have been good service. Yea, and many present in this honourable house know, that I expended both my zeal and affection to the utmost of my power for his majesty's service in that particular; which I willingly acknowledge nothing, bless the Lord, that in these things which have been, and are here cast upon me, I am able to make the falshood and misconstruction of them palpably appear.

My lord, before I mention any thing in particular, I must shew this honourable meeting of parliament, and all that hear me (who doubtless have various apprehensions of my being present in this condition), that I am here rather as my misfortune, not my injury; wherein I desire to explain the difference, as Plato and Aristotle do very well; calling injuries such things as are done purposely with a wicked mind; and misfortunes, such things as are done with a good mind, though the events prove bad, yet we could not foresee them.

So my lord, I shall take God to record (who must judge me one day) upon my conscience, that what I did, flowed not from any injurious principle to any, though I acknowledge the events were not still so successful (which was my misfortune) indeed; but it has been my lot often in these times (wherein I and many others have been inevitably involved) to be by the malicious tongues of my calumniating enemies misconstrued for the worst; yea, even in many things that the Lord was pleased to make successful. For the truth of this, I may, I hope safely appeal to many in this honourable house, who can abundantly witness, my faithful and loyal endeavours for both my king and native country; whereof I should be very sparing to be an herald myself, were not the contrary so impudently affirmed. There are five main calumnies that I desire, my lord, to satisfy all that hear me a little in; to the end that the rest of less moment may be likewise in their own due time heard, afterward abstracted more from personal prejudice.

The first calumny is, my lord, concerning that horrid and unparalleled murder of his late royal majesty of eternally blessed memory. I do here publicly declare that I neither desire, nor deserve the least countenance or favour, if I was either accessary to it, or on the counsel or knowledge of it: which to make clearly appear, is under oath in the parliament-books 1649; whereof I was the first starter myself, to the intent that we might both vindicate ourselves, and endeavour a discovery, if any amongst us had any accession to that horrid and villainous crime; as also in my latter will, which I made going to England, in Anno 1655, or 1656, fearing what possibly might hereafter be obtruded by any upon me or my family upon that account, I set it down to clear my posterity; that I was altogether free of that detestable and execrable crime, or of any prejudice to his majesty, in either person or government. I left this with a very worthy gentleman, I believe well known to your lordship, and never saw it since; so your lordship may be pleased if ye will to call for it; and try the truth. Whatsoever other thing may be in it, I hope, my lord, this opportunity is a meroy to me to have that vile calumny (amongst many others) against me to be cleared.

And, my lord, to make this particular yet more evident, I did still, and do positively assert, that I never saw that monstrous usurper Oliver Cromwell in the face, nor ever had the least correspondence with him, or any of that sectarian army, until the commands of the Committee of estates sent me, with some other noblemen and gentlemen, to the border in anno 1648, to stop his march into Scotland, after those who retired from Preston fight; neither after he left the border, in the year 1648, did I ever correspond with him, or any of that sectarian army; so unsatisfied was I with their way, after the wicked and sinister courses he and they were upon, afforded evident presumptions for us to apprehend that he and they intended prejudice to his royal majesty. Only one letter I received from sir Arthur Hugerig, to which I returned answer, that he might spare his pains in writing to me, for I blessed the Lord, who had taught me by his word, 'to fear God, and honour the king, and not to meddle with them that were given to change.' Though sir Arthur be now dead, yet he acknowledged to several in the Tower, that he still had my letter: and when I was there, I often desired he might be posed and examined about it; which I can presently instruct. And during, my lord, my being in England, neither in London nor Newcastle, in anno 1647, there was not any thing so much as mentioned concerning his late majesty's person; all that ever I heard of, was in public parliament 1647. The commissioners papers at London, and Committee Books at Newcastle, will clear this fully.

The second calumny is anent the inhuman murder of duke James Hamilton: my lord, it is well known my great respect to that truly noble and worthy person, whereof (upon all occasions) I gave ample testimonies, and can yet convince any of his friends with the reality of it; and evidenced my true sorrow for the wicked cruelty committed upon him. But indeed I cannot deny I refused to compliment Cromwell on his behalf (he having, my lord, been immediately preceding, so instrumental, and so very active in that most horrid and lamentable murder of his late sacred majesty;) and if I had done otherwise, undoubtedly it had been a more black Article in that libel now read, than any that is in it.

The third calumny is, that which breeds a great part of these groundless clamours, (though it be not in the indictment) is my lord marquis of Huntley's death; wherein I may truly say, I was as earnest to preserve him, as possibly I could, (which is very well known to many in this honourable house) and my not prevailing may sufficiently evidence I had not so great a stroke nor power in the parliament as is libelled. And, my lord, for his estate, I had nothing in that, but for my own absolutely necessary relief; and was ever most willing to part with any interest I had therein, getting his friends (who professed much zeal for the standing of the family) engaged for warrant to me; liament to-morrow. His Lordship being removed, after long debate it was carried against him by two or three votes; and his lordship being called in, my Lord Chancellor told him it was refused, and ordered his lordship to produce his Defences; whereupon he spoke as followeth:

May it please your Grace; My Lord Chancellor, this business is of very great concernment to me, and not small in the preparative of it to the whole nation; yea, it may concern many of your lordships who are sitting here, and your posterity: and therefore I desire to have your grace (my lord Commissioner) and the remanent members of this honourable meeting, your patience to hear me a few words without prejudice or mis-construction, which any thing I can say is often obnoxious to. I shall, my lord, begin with the words of that godly king Jehosaphat, that good king of Judah (after he was come back in peace to Jerusalem) in his instructions to his judges, he desires them to take heed what they do, for they judge not for men, but for the Lord, who is with them in the judgment.

My lord, I shall speak another word to many young men, who were either not born, or so young that it is impossible that they could know the beginning of these businesses, which are contained in the libel against me, (being all that hath been done since the year 1638) so that they might have heard by report what was done; but not why, or upon what grounds; and what some have suffered, but not what they have deserved.—Therefore I desire your lordship's charity, until all the particulars, and several circumstances of every particular be heard, without which no man can judge rightly of any action: For as it was well observed by that incomparable Grotius that Aristotle asserts, That there is more certainty in the mathematics than morals; for as Grotius has it, the mathematics separates forms from matters, as betwixt straight and crooked there is no midst; but in morals, even the least circumstances vary the matter, so that they are wont to have something betwixt them, with such latitudes, that the access is near sometime to this, sometime to that extreme; so that betwixt that which ought to be done, and that which ought not to be done, is interposed that which may be done, but is nearer now to this than to the other extremity, or part, whence ambiguity often ariseth. The particular circumstances are so obvious to every understanding man, that I need only to mention them.

Polybius, my lord, makes much of his history depend upon these three, concilia, causa, et eventus; and there are likewise other three, tempus, locus, et persone, the change whereof makes that which is lawful duty unlawful, and on the contrary: so likewise in speaking or repeating words, the adding or paring from them will quite alter the sense and meaning; as also in writing, the placing of commas or points, will change the sentence to a quite other purpose than it was intended.

There is, my Lord, another maxim, which I do not mention as always undeniable; but when there is no lawful magistrate exercising power and authority in a nation, but an invading usurper in possession, esteeming former laws crimes; in such a case, I say, the safety of the people is the supreme law.

There is another maxim which is not questioned by any, and it is, necessity has no law; for even the moral law of God yields to it, and Christ's disciples, in David's example: For this Seneca says, Necessity (the defence of human imbecility) breaks every law; 'Nam necessitas legum irridet vincula,' necessity scorns the fetters of law. So he that answers that libel "The Long Parliament revived," speaking of this last parliament (which his majesty calls a blessed, healing parliament), he says, the necessity to have it, may dispense with some formalities: So Ravenella (so much esteemed in matters of scripture), after he has divided necessity into absolute and hypohetic, makes that of submitting to powers of absolute necessity. Josephus also, my lord, that famous historian, when he mentioned David's speech to his children, after he had made Solomon (being but younger brother) king, he exhorts them to unity among themselves, and submission to him and his authority; for if it should please God to bring a foreign sword amongst you, you must submit to them; much more then to him who is your brother, and one of your own nation.

There is another maxim, my lord, 'Inter arma silent leges;' and it is well known, that divers retours and other things in Scotland were done in consideration of times of peace, and times of war.

Another maxim, 'Ex duobus malis minimum eligendum est, cum unum eorum non potest evitari;' says Aristotle, Cicero, and Quintilian, 'cum diversa mala inter se comparantur, minimum eorum locum boni occupat.'

There is another maxim, No man's intention must be judged by the event of any action, there being oftentimes so wide a difference betwixt the condition of a work, and the intention of the worker.

I shall only add another maxim, It cannot be esteemed virtue to abstain from vice, but where it is our power to commit the vice, and we meet with a temptation.

As I have named shortly some few maxims, my lord, I shall humbly tender some weighty considerations to your lordship's thoughts.

The first consideration is, That there are different considerations to be had of subjects' actions when their lawful magistrate is in the exercise of his authority by himself, or others lawfully constituted by him, and when there is no king in Israel.

The second is, That there is a different consideration betwixt the subjects' actions when the lawful magistrate is in the nation, and when he is put from it, and so forced to leave the people to the prevalent power, of a foreign sword, and the invader in possession of authority.

Thirdly, That there is a difference betwixt subjects' actions, even with the invading usurper, after the representatives of a nation have submitted to, and accepted of their authority and government, and they in possession several years; the nation acknowledging their constitutions, and all the lawyers pressing and pleading them as laws.

Fourthly, The actions of subjects are to be considered, when assisting the lawful magistrate to their power, and never submitting to the invading usurper until they were prisoners, and could do no better.

Fifthly, That there is likewise consideration to be had of the actions of such subjects, being still prisoners upon demand under articles to that purpose.

Sixthly, It is to be considered likewise of the actions of such a subject, who was particularly noticed and persecuted by the invaders, for his affection to the lawful magistrate and his government.

Seventhly, It is to be considered, that there is a great difference betwixt actions done ad lucrum captandum, and those done ad damnum evitandum; that is to say, actions to procure benefit, and actions to shun detriment.

Eighthly, It is to be considered, that there hath ever been a favourable consideration had, by any prince, of any person coming voluntarily, and casting himself upon a prince's clemency.

Ninthly, It is to be considered, that his majesty himself hath a gracious, natural inclination unto clemency and mercy, which hath been so abundantly manifested to his subjects in England, even to all (except to some of the immediate murderers of his royal father) that it cannot be doubted, that the same will be wanting to his people in Scotland, who suffered by them (whom his majesty hath graciously pardoned) even for their dutiful service, and affection to his majesty.

Therefore without thought of any prejudice to the parliament, or this honourable meeting, I must make use of my Lord Chancellor of England his words, though in another case, saying, 'There cannot too much evil befall those who do the best they can to corrupt his majesty's good-nature, and to extinguish his clemency;' for his majesty's self declared his natural inclination to clemency, in his speech to both his houses of parliament in England, whom he hath, with all his people, conjured, desired, and commanded, to abolish all notes of discord, separations and difference of parties, and to lay aside all other animosities, and the memory of past provocations, and to return to a perfect unity amongst themselves under his majesty's protection; which is hoped all your lordships will concur in, having so worthy a pattern to follow: And as these are his majesty's inclinations expressed, so it is suitable to the arms he bears as king of Scotland, which is the lion, whose motto is known to all:

Nobilis est ira lennis,
Parcere subjectis, et debellare superbos.

Which is to say, to vanquish and subdue the proud, and spare such as are submissive; of the which number I am one, and for that effect, in all humility present this humble Submission to his majesty, and your grace, my Lord Commissioner, in his majesty's name.

To my Lord Commissioner his grace, and High Court of Parliament, March 5, 1661.

Forasmuch as I Archibald, marquis of Argyle, am accused of treason at the instance of his majesty's advocate, before the High Court of Parliament; and being altogether unwilling to appear any way in opposition to his sacred majesty, considering also that this is the first parliament called by his majesty after his happy return to his kingdom, and government, for healing and repairing the distempers and breaches made by the late and long troubles: I have therefore resolved that their consultations and debates about the great affairs and concernment of his majesty and this kingdom shall have no interruption upon occasion of any process against me. I will not represent the fatality and contagion of those times, wherein I, with many others in these three kingdoms, have been involved; which have produced many sad consequences and effects, far contrary to our intentions. Nor will I insist upon the defence of our actings in this kingdom before the prevailing of the late usurpers, which, if examined according to the strictest interpretation, and severest censure of law, may be esteemed a trespass of his majesty's royal commands, and a transgression of the law: But, notwithstanding thereof, are by his majesty's clemency covered with the veil of oblivion by divers acts of parliament, and others, to that purpose, for the safety and security of his majesty's subjects: And that my actings since, and any compliances with so prevalent a power (which had wholly subdued this, and all his majesty's other dominions, and was universally acknowledged) may be looked upon as acts of mere necessity, which hath no law; and it is known, that during that time I had no favour from these usurpers.

It was inconsistent with, and repugnant to my interest, and cannot be thought (unless I had been demented and void of reason) that I should have had freedom or affection to be for them, who being conspired enemies to monarchy, could never be expected to befriend or tolerate nobility. And whereas that most horrid and abominable crime of taking away the precious life of the late king of ever-glorious memory, is most maliciously and falsely charged upon me; if I had the least accession to that most vile and heinous crime, I would esteem myself unworthy to live, and that all highest punishments should be inflicted upon me: but my witness is in heaven, and my record on high, that no such wicked or disloyal thought ever entered into my heart. But choosing to shun all debate, rather than to use any words or arguments to reason with his majesty, whom though I were righteous, yet would I not answer, but would make my supplication to my judge; and therefore (without any excuse or vindication) I do, in all humility, throw myself down at his majesty's feet (and before his grace his majesty's commissioner, and the honourable estates of parliament), and do submit and betake myself to his majesty's mercy: and though it be the great unhappiness of these times (the distempers and failings of these kingdoms being so epidemic and universal), that his majesty should have had so much occasion and subject of his royal clemency; yet it is our great happiness, and his majesty's high honour, that he has expressed and given so ample testimony thereof, even to those who did invade his majesty and this nation, for no other cause than for their faithful and loyal adherence to his majesty, and his just, royal interests: which renders his majesty's goodness incomparable, and without parallel, and gives me confidence, that his grace his majesty's commissioner, and the honourable parliament, of their own goodness, and in imitation of so great and excellent a pattern, will compassionate my condition. And seeing it is a special part of his majesty's sovereignty and royal prerogative, to dispense with the severity of the laws, and that it is a part of the just liberty and privileges of the subjects, that in cases of great extremity and danger, they may have recourse to his majesty as to a sanctuary and refuge.

It is in all humility supplicated, that the Lord Commissioner's grace, and the honourable parliament, would be pleased favourably to represent my case to his majesty, and that the door of his royal mercy and bounty, which is so large and patent to many, may not be shut upon one, whose ancestors for many ages (without the least stain) have had the honour, by many signal proofs of their loyalty, to be reputed serviceable to his majesty's royal progenitors in the defence of the crown, and this his ancient kingdom. And if his majesty shall deign to hold out the golden sceptre of his clemency, as an indelible character of his majesty's royal favour, it will lay a perpetual obligation of all possible gratitude upon me and my posterity, and will ever engage and devote us entirely to his majesty's service. And the intercession of this honourable parliament on my behalf to his gracious majesty, will be a real evidence of their moderation, and they shall be truly called a healing parliament; and God, whose mercy is above all his works, shall have the honour and glory which is due to his great name, when mercy triumphs over justice.

The aforesaid Submission being read, the Lords of Articles would give him no present Answer; but resolved to report the same to the Parliament the morrow.

Edinburgh, at the Parliament.

Martii 6, 1661.

My Lord Chancellor having reported what had been done the former day before the Lords of Articles anent the marquis of Argyle's process, presented his Submission, which was immediately read; and after a long debate, the first question was stated; If it was satisfactory, or should be accepted or not? The second question was, Whether they should proceed presently in his process, without regard to his Submission or not? Both which were carried in the negative against him. Then he was brought to the bar, and the Lord Chancellor told him, that his Submission was rejected, and that notwithstanding thereof, the parliament commanded him to give in his Defences.

He replied,, That his case was very hard, to be debarred from that which was his just privilege, and of all subjects, in such extremities to refuge themselves at his majesty's mercy and clemency; and that as it was the undeniable privilege of the subject, so also it was a special prerogative of his majesty, and the grandeur of it consisted much in the eminency of the subject, whom his majesty should graciously be pleased to extend his mercy unto: And besides many other strong persuasions that encouraged his Submission, his majesty's own Proclamation (which he acquiesces in), wherein his majesty is graciously pleased to declare, 'That his just interest and royal prerogative being first asserted, and trial only taken of his subjects carriages, then he is most willing to pass an Act of Indemnity to secure them.' And the like being already done in our neighbouring nation, and his majesty having performed his royal promise there already, he desired that their study might be to imitate his royal pattern; considering, that as it was a practice most agreeable to his majesty's clement inclination, so also, that as Solomon that wise king said, That 'the king's throne is established by righteousness and mercy:' He entreated therefore their lordships seriously to consider his condition, and not to single him out, and aim at his ruin; and not only his, but also, he feared, both his family and name, their ruins also.

As for giving in his Defences presently, he said, that the confidence and firm hope he had that his humble Submission should have been accepted, and so cut off totally all further trouble either to their lordships or himself, made him the more secure and slack, not resolving to lean to them, or any way (as he had expressed in his Submission) make use of them, though he were altogether innocent: and if he were necessitated to make use of his Defences (as he declared he was most unwilling to do), it should be simply in obedience to their lordships commands, and no otherwise.

Not having fully ended,

The Chancellor told him, if his lordship had them not in readiness at that time, to have them ready to give in to the Lords of Articles the morrow.

So he was returned to the castle.

March 7, 1661, at the Lords of Articles.

The Marquis being called before the Lords of Articles to give in his Defences,

He declared, that he had seen their lordships order, that he might forbear his coming, if he would produce his Defences; therefore he told their lordships ingenuously, that if he had them in readiness, he would neither have troubled their lordships nor himself; for having a petition ready to desire a delay, he thought it rather his duty to come and propose it himself, hoping their lordships would consider that his presenting his Defences either lame and wanting something, or blotted so as they could not well be read, was a very great prejudice to him, but a delay of a few days was no prejudice at all to any thing my Lord Advocate could say; and therefore hoped their lordships would not refuse him some competent time, whereby he might have them in readiness.

Upon the which he was removed; and after some debate, being called in again, my Lord Chancellor told his lordship, that he was ordered to give in his Defences before Monday at ten o'clock to my Lord Advocate, otherwise the Lords of Articles would take the whole business to their consideration, without regard to any thing he could say.

The Advocate told his lordship, that he must give in his whole Defences.

To which he answered, that that was a new form to give in peremptory Defences before the discussion of relevances.

Whereupon sir John Bychmore did rise up, and told his lordship that he was commanded to inform him, that there was a different way betwixt a process in writ, and the ordinary way before the session, or chief-justice.

To which his lordship answered, That he was very ill-yoked with so able men; but he must tell them, that he had once the honour to sit as chief-justice in this city, and he knew the process before them was in writ, and yet the relevance was always first answered, before any peremptor proponed; for relevance is most to be considered in criminals.

Sir John Therester said, and so did the Advocate, That it was his lordship's advantage to give in as strongly his Defences as he could, otherwise the Advocate might refer the whole business to the judge, and make no other answer.

His Lordship replied, That he would do in that by advice of his lawyers, and hoped any order of their lordships at present, was without prejudice to his giving in more defences afterwards, since he was so straitened with time, and commanded to give in what was ready: His lordship likewise added, if their lordships and the parliament had been pleased to grant his desire of a precognition, which was agreeable as he humbly conceived both to law and practice, and his majesty's Proclamation, which he acquiesced in, it could not but have been the readiest way for trying his carriage during the late troubles; where now of necessity he must in the process, which he hopes will not be refused, crave one way for exculpation in many particulars; for he both was resolved, and is resolved to deal very ingenuously as to matter of fact. And if that had been first tried, which he was most desirous of, both from the committee, and since from the parliament, he is hopeful there would not remain so much prejudice against him in the most part of things of greatest concernment in this libel; and for his own part, he desired nothing more than the truth to have place, and to do with his person what they pleased; for by the course of nature he could not expect a long time to live, and he should not think his life ill bestowed, to be sacrificed for all that had been done in these nations, if that were all.

Thereafter he was returned to the castle.

The Marquis of ARGYLE'S DEFENCES against the grand Indictment of High-Treason exhibited against him to the Parliament in Scotland.

The defender professes his sense of the mercy and happiness of the land, that we are delivered from the lawless arbitrary power of the armed force of cruel usurpers, and have restored to us our only lawful sovereign lord, and in his sacred person, the authority of law, the order of legal judgment, and in them the liberty of legal defences: thereupon depend the great security of the liberties, lives and estates of the subject; this gives the defender confidence to appear in judgment, nothing doubting of a fair procedure and full hearing, compleat time being allowed in all the dyets of the process, and all things therein so ordered, as may be suitable to the justice and gravity of this high and honourable court, and the importance of the cause; justice, not only as to the defender, but justice as to the preparative and consequence. And he with much confidence expects all justice from his most gracious sovereign, the justest of princes, and who is represented and acting by so truly noble a person as my Lord Commissioners' grace, also hoping the honourable court of parliament will without all prejudice impartially consider his legal and just Defences; and that they will proceed so far without all ground of suspicion therein, that any who is within degrees to persons against whom he is libelled to have committed any of the deeds which are made the ground of his diktay; or if any are conscious to themselves, of capital enmity, or has been any ways informer against the defender, or have predetermined by uttering the judgment already of his cause, conscience and honour will make them abstain sitting and voting therein: so much the more, that they see how unwilling he is to propose any recusatory against any member of the house upon these or other grounds in law ; so confident is he of the vindication of his own carriage, so much he defers to the ingenuity or generosity, and so high is the honour he bears to this honourable Court.

First, It is alledged, that there be no process, nor is the defender holden to answer, till the whole libel and all the parts thereof be given him up to see : also it is the Commissioners instructions, and addresses sent and made to his majesty by the defender, as is alledged, and the Commissioners at Breda are expressly repeated, as a part of the libel, brevitatis causa, in the tenth article, and yet the same has not been produced nor given to the defender to see and advise with ; till which be done, he cannot be held in to answer : like as, where points of the dittay are founded upon writ, the defender craves that he may have up the writs whereupon the same are founded, to see before he be holden to answer to the dittay, which is very consonant to law, l. 1. Sect. 3. F. 'de edendo ubi edenda sunt omnia quæ actor editurus est, apud indicem,' et l. 3. cod. eodem. whereby the pursuer is ordained to shew to the defender all that he will use against the defender before the judge : Otherwise the defender cannot prepare himself for his defence, which is the reason given in these laws ; Paulus, lib. 5. cent. 16. and the doctors throughout the said laws, 'et l. unius, Sect. 9. F. dequest. post alios to l. 2. Mun. 3, 4, 5, 6. eo dedendo bart. ad leg. ubi min. 8. F. de quest.' But so it is, there are several articles in this dittay founded upon writ, not produced ; as in the first articles in the prosecution of Mr. John Steward to death, as a leasing-maker between the king and his subjects libelled, and yet neither libel nor sentence against Mr. John produced.

Item, Colonel Henderson's commission for keeping Dunbarton castle is libelled, and the commission not produced.

Item, In the sixth article a capitulation alledged, made and subscribed by the laird of Arkinglas and other officers under the defender's command, with the laird of Lamond and Escoge.

Item, The assurance alledged given to the persons within the house of Lochhead, mentioned in the seventh article, the defender craves, ante omnia, it may be produced.

Item, That ordinance of parliament or committee of estates, whereby it is libelled in the same seventh article, that Cailkitoch was ordained to be brought from the prison where he was for the time, &c. to the town of Edinburgh.

Item, In the ninth article the defender's protestation, Parliam. anno 1648.

Item, In the same article the letter written to Cromwell, libelled as being dated the 6th of October, 1648 ; whereby it is libelled, that the defender and his complices wrote to Cromwell, &c.

Item, In the same article sir John Cheesly's instructions libelled, as being dated the 17th of October, 1648, desiring the persons taken in the engagement to be detained as pledges of that kingdom's peace.

Item, eod. art. the warrant alledged to be under the defender's hand for a proclamation against the families of Ogilvie and Ræa.

Item, Art. 10, the letter alledged written to Cromwell, anno 1650, after his invasion.

Item, eod. art. the act of the West-Kirk, with the declaration whereunto it relates.

Item, Art. 11, the remission alledged given to John Mac-Dougal of Dimolich, under the defender's hand.

All which the defender humbly alledges ought to be given up to see, before he be held in to answer ; especially 'post tanti temporis intervalum,' so long a time having intervened between the intention of this pursuit, and the dates of the said act and papers aforesaid libelled on ; some of them being twenty years ago, some fifteen, and the latest ten or eleven years ; as has always been the practice in such cases ; and may be instanced in my lord Balnerino's process, and was found by this honourable court in Mr. James Guthrie's process.

Second, Under protestation that the former exceptionation may be the first discussed, that the papers therein mentioned, ante omnia, be given up to the defender to see ; it is alledged, that it has been always the princely care of his majesty's royal ancestors to keep the laws of this realm certain, 'Ne dum incerto utemur jure, fluctuaret respublica ;' and lest law, which is introduced for the lieges security, should become their snare : therefore, by king James 1, (that illustrious prince) parliament 7, cap. 107, all the interpretation of his majesty's statutes, otherwise than the same bear, is forbidden ; and if forbidden, can be no ground of dittay : and in effect to found a dittay upon statutes otherwise than they bear, were to found it upon such statutes we have not ; but so it is in the proposition of this libel. The acts of parliament whereupon the same is founded, are otherwise repeated than they bear : for, 1. The first part of the proposition of the dittay founded upon the two first acts of parliament libelled, viz. the third act of the 5th parliament of king James 1, and the first act of king James 6, doth upon the said acts conclude the pain of forfeiture and treason. The same is most irrelevant, because in the said acts, there is no mention made of any crimes of the nature and quality libelled ; the said third act of the 5th parliament of king James 1, being anent the fees of craftsmen, and the price of the work ; and the first act of king James 6, being anent the constitution of the earl of Murray, regent ; and in neither of the said acts is there any pain or punishment inferred, and so far less can the pain of forfeiture or treason be from the said acts concluded against the defender. And if it should be said, the 5th parliament of king James 1, is mistaken in the writing for the first parliament ; and in citing the first act of king James 6, the citation of the number of the parliament is also omitted, viz. the number eighteen: the dittay repeats these two acts otherways than they bear, for the words of the said 3d act of the first parliament of king James 1, statutes and ordains, 'That no man openly or notoriously rebel against the king's person, under the pain and forfeiting of life, lands and goods;' which is not at all in the libel repeated. And as to the said 1st act of the 18th parliament of king James 6, the words thereof are cited, yet with some difference and transposition libelled; but thereto is added the sanction and pain, 'That whosoever doth in the contrary, they are to be punished as traitors, and to forfeit their life, lands and goods;' whereas there is no sanction or pain in the said act, only it is declarative of his majesty's prerogative, and of his three estates to maintain the same.

Item, In the second part of the proposition of the dittay, founded upon the 25th act of the 6th parliament of king James 2, and 75th act of the 9th parliament of queen Mary: is not repeated as it bears as to punishment, for therein they who attempt to do, or raise any bands of men of war, horse or foot, without any special licence of his majesty, and his successors, are only declared punishable by death; whereas they are libelled to be punishable as traitors, while it is the pain only of the said 25th act of the 6th parliament of king James 2.

Item, in the next part of the proposition of the dittay, founded upon the 43d act of the 2d parliament of king James 1, and the 134th act of the 8th parliament, and the 10th act of the 10th parliament, and 205th act of the 14th parliament of king James 6, none of these acts are repeated as they bear, but confounded, both as to the crimes and pains therein contained, to a very far different sense (as is humbly conceived) from that which the said acts severally propose; transferring the pains of the said several acts and crimes therein contained from one to another, as may appear by what follows. For the first of these acts, being the 43d act of the 2d parliament of king James 1, is only of leasing-makers and tellers of them, which may engender strife between the king and his people; and the pain of the act is tinsel of life and goods to the king, as is clear both by the title and body of the act. The second act, viz. the 134th act of the 8th parliament of king James 6, is also the same crime, viz. Against those that utter false, slanderous and untrue speeches, to the disdain, reproach or contempt of his majesty, his council or proceedings, or to the dishonour of his majesty's parents and progenitors: adding also those that meddle in the affairs of his majesty and his estates, and the pain is the pain contained in the acts of parliament made against leasing makers and tellers of them. The third is the 10th act of the 10th parliament of king James 6, against those who speak or write any purpose of reproach or slander against his majesty's person, estates or government, or deprave his laws or acts of parliament, or misconstrue his majesty's proceedings, whereby any misbelieving may be moved between his majesty and nobility, and his loving subjects: and the pain thereof is only the pain of death. And by the 205th act of the 14th parliament of king James 6, those that hear the said words leasings, and do not apprehend and reveal the authors thereof, shall incur the like punishment with the principal offenders; and yet leasing-making, and telling, which is the crime punishable by the first of these acts, viz. the 43d act of the 2d parliament of king James 1, is punishable, but the loss of life and goods to the king is omitted. And false slanders, which is the crime contained in the 134th act of the 8th parliament of king James 6, and only speaking to the dishonour of his majesty's parents and progenitors, and meddling with the affairs of his highness's estate, is repeated out of the said 134th act; and joined to the crime contained in the said acts, 10th parliament, 10 James 6, and to both, the pains added of losing life, lands and goods, whereas the pain of the said 10th act is only of death. And the pain of the said 134th act of the 8th parliament of king James 6, is only the pain contained in the acts against leasingmakers, which in the said 43d act of the 2d parliament of king James 1, is only the loss of life and goods, and not of life, lands and goods: but allannerly the escheats of goods moveable: as may appear, first, because whenever the pain of tinsel of life and goods is found either in the acts of parliament or old laws, goods are understood moveable, as is clear from the crimes that are ordained to be so punished: as man-slaughter, by the 49d statute of Robert 3, is prohibited under the pain of tinsel of life and goods: where Skein explains, that the goods are to be understood of moveables. And by the 90th act of the 6th parliament of king James 1, the receipt of him who is fugitive for slaughter, is forbidden under the pain of tinsel of life and goods. (Where Skein expounds goods to be goods moveable, in his Tractate of Crimes, tit. 2, cap 6, parl. 4.) And so it is clear in the other acts of parliament, that their whole pains are distinct, viz. tinsel of life and goods alike, is only extended to moveables; and tinsel of life, lands and goods, which latter pain in the stile of our acts of parliament is commonly thus expressed: that he who incurs it shall die, and forfeit life, lands and goods, as the 31st act of the 7th parliament of king James 2, et passim alibi forfeiture properly relating to lands; and in the common signification of our said goods, to be understood of goods moveable.

More especially it may appear, that the pain of the said 43d act of the 2d parliament of king James 1, given to the said 134th act of the 8th parliament of king James 6, is only the pain of escheat of moveables, because the pain of forfeiting of life, lands and goods, is the proper pain of the crimes that by our laws are declared treason. And therefore Skein, both in his index of the acts of parliament on the word treason, refers the crimes that are so punishable to the head of treason; as also in his tract upon crimes in the end of Reg. Maj. but doth not at all mention therein the crime of the said 43d act of the 2d parliament of king James 1, nor of the 134th act of the 8th parliament of king James 6, nor of the other acts whereupon this part of the proposition is founded. But in his index has the crime of leasing-making between the king and his people under a head by itself, and therein expressly mentions both the said 43d act of king James 1, and 134th act of king James 6, like as in the said tract of crimes after the chapters of treason and points thereof, cap. 1, and pain of the same, which, cap. 2, he expressly says, is the tinsel of life, lands and goods; and declares, that he understands by goods, moveable goods. And ament the process and judge of the crime of treason, cap. 3, when he comes to other crimes capital, of all which the pains are either the tinsel of life and moveable goods, or life only, or of some less pain in body or goods, but never of life, lands and goods, as is clear through the whole tract that follows. And in his 12 cap. ament the crime of falsity, he has the crime of leasing-making between the king and his people. And the same acts of parliament, viz. Act 43d of the 2d parliament of king James 1, and the 205th act of the 14th of king James 6, and in his 25th cap. has the crime of infamous and seditious libels; and the said 10th act of the 10th parliament of king James 6, cited therefore.

Item, In the last two acts of parliament whereupon the proposition of the dittay is founded, viz. the 37th act of the 2d parliament of king James 1, and 144th act of the 12th parliament of king James 6, it is libelled, that all receptors, suppliers or intercommoners with any traitors, are punishable by forfeiture, as the traitors themselves; which is not as the act bears, for both the crime and pain libelled out of the said 144th act of the 12th parliament of king James 6, the act is not simply against those who intercommon with traitors and rebels, but with such as are declared rebels and traitors. From all which it follows, that the proposition of the libel founded upon the acts as they are libelled, is not relevant; and therefore the defendant ought to be asspillied in hoc libella.

Tertio, As to the last part of the proposition of the dittay, the defender abhors so much the crime therein mentioned, that he thinks any person who will conceal any malicious purpose, wronging in the least, far more in putting violent hands on the inviolable sacred person of his sovereign lord, were unworthy to breathe in common air, let alone to be defended; and is so conscious to himself of his own innocency in any such things, that he needs no other defence, but the confident denial of any guiltiness therein, either less or more. But before a practice pass in this honourable court of parliament, of founding a dittay of treason upon common law and practice; it is under protestation aforesaid, and with all humility alledged against the relevancy of that part of the proposition, as founded upon the said common law and practice, That it is not relevantly founded thereon, in so far as by the 28th act of parliament, 1640, it is expressly found and declared traitors, but after trial by the parliament or judges ordinary; and finding that the said persons have contravened a law and act of parliament, made under the pain of treason: and therefore a person cannot be declared guilty of treason on a dittay founded on common law and practice. 2. Pena being legis sanctio; and the common law is known with us, to have only vim rationis, non legis; and therefore no pain, but especially the highest of pains cannot be founded thereupon. And 3, specially as the practice beside the reason aforesaid; because l. s. 4. facti sonat. Consult. Turpilianum, 'facti quidem questio in arbitrio est judicantis, poena vero persecutio non ejus voluntati mandatur, sed legis auctoritati asservatur.' Whence Menochius lib. 5. Presumpt. cap. 29. in principio saith expressly, 'poena iudici non potest nisi expresse jure sit cautum per l. et si quis divus facti. reli. et sumptibus funerum.' And it is the common opinion of the doctors, That ever when punishment is not expressly defined in the law, but is permitted, arbitrio iudicis, it cannot be extended to death, far less to the pain of treason. And the foresaid act of parliament, 28th act, A. D. 1640, takes away the relevancy of founding treason upon common law and practice, as said is.

If a dittay to infer the crime of treason might be founded on practice, either of the justice-court or parliament, which are two courts, before which crimes of treason are judged; yet our practice is 'consuetudo rerum ita judicatorum,' as Craig defines it, lib. 1. De Feudis Dig. 8. And therefore to it, as to the introducing of all other consuetudes, there must be actuum frequentis, reiterated acts and practices, Per l. De quibus ff. De Legibus et Cart. Jason, and other doctors on that law; et per l. Cod. 'quae sit longa consuetudo,' et l. et in totum 3. c. De Cres. Dif. privat. 2. 'Illud explorandum, an contradictio aliquo iudicio sit firmata;' that is, it would be tried if decrees in foro contradictorio have been given thereupon. As also saith Craig, Dicta Dig. 8. in fine; and if in any case, that ought to be far more in crimes; and if in crimes, yet more in the highest of crimes; and in all consecrations of one of the most eminent peers of the land, which is clear.

For in matters civil (how small soever) before the session, a practice will never be founded on some decrees given either for non-compearance, or on compearance where there is little or no dispute, or it may be great inequality in advocates of the two parties. And if in civils, where the interest is only pecuniary, this ought to be much more in libels of treason, as hath been said; but so it is, neither in justice-court nor parliament will be found, that it hath been frequently judged, nor in foro contradicto- ria, on a dispute where this defence hath been propounded. Yea, it may be well alledged, that there can be no practice shewed of either of these courts, that any hath been found guilty of treason, but on some act of parliament under the pain of treason, as is said; but however the said 28th act of parliament 1640, is most clear, which is most agreeable to reason, and the law of England, very laudable in that point; as Coke has it in his chapter of treason, and therefore the libel as founded on practice is no ways relevant, and the defender ought to be assolized therefrom.

Quarto, Every libel both of civil law and our law ought to be clear, distinct and special; but especially criminal libels, because of the great importance of them, ought to be most clear, distinct and special, 'jura libellus in criminalibus debet esse clarissimus,' saith Dambaud, Prax. Crim. 3. num. 3. And therefore, 'Libellus Criminalis obscurus parte etiam non excipiente extenditur favore rei,' Baldus in Lege Addita, num. 10. c. De Edendo, Alex. Consil. 72. Col. Versit. et licet volum. 1 Hip. Consil. 49. et Battander Prax. Crim. Reg. 6. s. 3 et 4. 'nec enim debet accusator cum exhibitionis alienæ jactura, et discrimine vagari licet.' L. si in Rem ff. de Rei num. So that any obscure criminal libel is inept, and the defender ought to be assolized therefrom, though he did not oppose his defence for that effect. But so it is, this dittay is most unclear and undistinct, in so far as in the proposition of the dittay, there are many acts of parliament libelled on, being statutes anent diverse crimes of very different natures, and inferring different punishments, according to the article of the crimes; and in the subsumption the pannel is indicted for several crimes alledged committed by him, contrary to the said laws and acts of parliament in general, without condescending on the particular acts of parliament that the pannel has contravened by committing the particular deeds libelled, and so leaving him to great uncertainty. Whereas in all law, reason, and form of process, the defendant ought to be certified what acts and laws he has contravened, by committing such deeds that are in a multiplicity of crimes. After proposing all the statutes relating to the same crimes, all the deeds immediately ought to be subsumed, falling under the compass of such statutes, and thereafter the acts relating to another indifferent crime ought to be proposed, and the deeds falling under the compass of these acts immediately subsumed, and throughout the libel; which is no way done here; but first, by many different acts accumulated together in the proposition, and then the most different facts accumulated together indistinctly in the subsumption, not condescending on the acts by them contravened: and therefore the libel is inept, and the defendant ought to be assolized therefrom.

This defence is further confirmed in law; 2. Because a libel being sylogismus quidam practicus, Jamon and the Doct. Instit. de Act. in criminali dittay, the proposition consists in jure constitutionis, in the laws whereupon the libel is founded: The manner is in the subsumption of the facts or crimes under these laws, and the conclusion inferring the pain: Because of such a crime, as falling under the law libelled, on a very essential part of every libel, is quo jure petatur; and a libel being uncertain in this, is unclear and uncertain in a very essential point, and inept. 3. In law, a libel ought so to be conceived as the defender may know actionis speciem, otherwise it is inept. l. i. de edendo, l. 3. c. eodem, and may also know actionis jus, and that he may deliberate how to defend; but in our case, that arises from the distinct application of the laws to the facts, ex quibus jus oritur. 4. If such uncertain libel were admitted, the defender, because of the obscurity and uncertainty of the libel, should be prejudged of a certain defence he could make against the relevancy of the same, because the relevancy of it consists in the subsumption of the facts and crimes libelled under some certain law: which being condescended on by a distinct subsumption, under each law, of the crimes that were libelled properly to fall under the same, the defendant would alledge why such crimes cannot be subsumed relevantly under such laws and acts, which he otherwise cannot do in such multiplicity; both of different acts and crimes as are libelled in this dittay: there being not only in divers articles, but even in every article, a great diversity of the crimes therein libelled, and yet the defender left in uncertainty under which of all the acts libelled on, the pursuer intends the subsumption thereof; and so in uncertainty altogether how to conceive his defence. And if this be not 'maxime vagari, cum maxime alienæ vitæ et fortunæ periculæ;' it is hoped, as it will be found very evident so it was never the practice heretofore used in criminal libels; and which, that it should not be now sustained, is of universal concernment: and if sustained, might prove of very dangerous consequence. And the libel, as it is now conceived, is inept, and the defender ought to be assolized therefrom.

Before the defender come to his particular answer to the several Articles of the Dittay, to the effect the defender's case, in his accession to the public sittings of this kingdom, during the unhappy troubles till the treaty of Breda, and his majesty's home-coming, may be truly stated; it is humbly craved that the Commissioner's grace and honourable estates of parliament may be pleased to remember, that the Kirk and whole body of this kingdom entered at first into the national Covenant, for defence of religion and his majesty's person and authority, and mutual defence one of another in maintaining the same; wherein, and in what followed in prosecution thereof till the treaty with his late majesty, and act of oblivion, set down at length and ratified in the 6th act of the 3d parliament, anno 1641; his late majesty did so far acknowledge and approve their loyalty, that in the seventh article of the said large treaty his majesty was pleased to appoint, that at the close of that treaty, their said loyalty should be made known at the time of public thanksgiving in all places, particularly in the parish churches of his majesty's dominions. And in the said act of pacification and oblivion, is pleased to declare, that their constant loyalty in their intentions and proceedings should not be hereafter called in question; and that whatsoever fell forth in those tumultuous times, whether prejudicial to his majesty's honour and authority, to the laws and liberty of the church, or the particular interest of the subject, might be buried in perpetual oblivion; and whatever had ensued thereon, no mention should be made thereof in judgment or without: like as his majesty for himself and his successors, promises, in verbo principis, never to come in contrary to the said statute, nor any thing therein contained; but to hold the same firm and stable, and to cause it to be truly observed, and these presents to have the full force and strength of a perfect and true security. Like as thereafter in anno 1643, the League and Covenant was entered in with the two houses of parliament, upon the ground of the large treaty, by the church and whole body of this kingdom, purporting the same ends of the Covenant, for maintenance of religion, king and kingdom; which was thereafter approved by the parliament, 1644, and fifth act thereof, and prosecuted by wars both within and without the kingdom, by the authority of divers succeeding parliaments; church and state going unanimously along together, without any apparent public difference till the year 1648. And even then that parliament, 1648, so highly homologate the said League and Covenant, that they declare the breaches thereof to be the grounds of their resolutions of that war, act 4, 7 and 8; and their desires for preventing thereof to be the fulfilling of the same, ibidem. The necessary qualification required in all with whom they would join either in their armies or committees, is, that they be such who were of known faithfulness to the Cause and Covenant in the said act 7, and that they would oppose, and endeavour to suppress the enemies to the Cause and Covenant on all hands, ibid. Witnessing to the world that they swerved not from the principles contained in the national Covenant and League and Covenant, and that they resolved closely and constantly to adhere thereunto, and to all the ends thereof. So that at that time there was still no difference as to the Cause and Covenant, any difference being only in the manner, and not in the matter of that engagement.

Thereafter what straits this poor kingdom was reduced to, by the defeat of that engagement, and how unable it was to make resistance to that English army, who, in prosecution of their victory, came to the borders, and entered the same, is notorious to all; wherewith the whole kingdom being surprised with amazement, and in evident hazard, it was hard in that juncture of affairs to resolve upon any course for preventing the same, or rather incumbent hazard of the kingdom. Whereupon a Quorum of the Committee of Estates appointed by the said parliament, 1648, were necessitated to take upon them the managing of affairs, and to sue for conditions of peace, not being able to resist by force (the flower and strength of the nation being broke by the said defeat) and to accept the same upon the easiest terms that could be had for the time; which as it was endeavoured upon no other intention, or for any other end but that which they were constrained to by inevitable necessity; so at that time it was generally looked upon as good service, and which at that time was most necessary to evade very great, and otherwise inevitable evils, being either necessitate to condescend to their demands at that time, or otherwise to have delivered the persons of all that did prosecute the said engagements, according to the obligation of the large treaty, together with the forts and strength of the kingdom. The succeeding parliament for the time, in the year 1649, after proclamation of his present majesty, did send Commissioners to Holland, and afterwards, according to his majesty's desire, to Breda, where there was a treaty concluded by his sacred majesty; wherein he was graciously pleased to approve of the said parliament, in anno 1644, and remanent parliaments, and their proceedings from the year 1641, preceding the said treaty, which was thereafter ratified by his sacred majesty and his parliament at Perth and Sterling; and, after the royal example of his ever-glorious father, an act of oblivion was indulged, whereby all that might be ground of question was buried in oblivion, and pardoned by a general Act of Oblivion in a most full and ample form.

This being the state of public affairs during the time aforesaid, albeit by the first ten articles of the dittay, the defender is charged with deeds and public actings, coming within the compass of the said approbation and oblivion aforesaid; yet such firm reliance hath he of his majesty's persisting in his gracious clemency, which does in his royal heart so much abound, that albeit his majesty by his Proclamation, dated the 12th of October, 1660, is pleased graciously to declare, that he has remitted to his parliament the trial of the carriage of his subjects in Scotland during the late troubles: That the late troubles have only respect to the time during the Usurper's possession, and that trial should be taken during that time of the subject's carriage: The defender in all humility conceiving, that it is no ways to be supposed, that his gracious majesty did thereby intend to rip up or revive, or to institute any new trial of old offences, forgotten and forgiven, as is said; especially seeing it is not to be supposed that the bowels of his mercy should be so straitened to this his ancient kingdom, to which he has upon all occasions given so many signal and recent testimonies of his superabundant favour, than they are, and have been to his subjects of his other dominions; to whom, according to his majesty's declarations, he hath granted a full and free pardon, from which few, and these only the unpardonable murderers of his royal father, are excluded; for whom, or any guilty thereof, no punishment can be sufficient. And therefore the defender in all humility conceives the said articles, though libelled, are not to be insisted on.

The solemnity of the oaths, both of Covenant and League, will be, as the defender hopes, pregnant presumptions to put an end to all controversy, anent the sincerity of his, as of the church and kingdom, their loyal intentions for the maintenance of the person and authority of our dread sovereign, whereunto they were thereby so religiously engaged; and the constant tenour of his acting still by virtue of public orders and warrants of parliament, and their committees, wherein his faithfulness in the execution was also in the like manner approved, will witness, that what he did was not for any private interest, but for the public ends; whereunto he conceived himself engaged in manner aforesaid. Nor was the defender for continuing of these unnatural civil discords, as he did witness by his inclination to an accommodation with Montross, in the year 1645, mentioned after in answer to the tenth article; which albeit fully agreed to betwixt him and the defender, yet he could not obtain the committee's approbation thereof: which is an evidence, that the defender had not the chief sway of affairs, and was always inclinable to peace, religion being secured; like as the carrying on the engagement in the year 1648, though the defender differed in his judgment as to the way and manner, upon the grounds and reasons thereafter expressed in answer to the ninth article, doth clearly evince, that he had not the chief sway in public actings. And what power and interest he had in the year 1649, he did faithfully, according to his bond duty, improve the same for removing these differences betwixt his majesty and his subjects, wherein he was passionately earnest, as shall be made appear in answer to the said tenth article. And after his majesty's home-coming, and during his being in this kingdom; and thereafter, till the enemy had fully prevailed, and that by his articles of agreement he was their prisoner, he faithfully served his majesty, and even during his majesty's absence, did always, and still shall, return loyal duty and good affection to his person, government, and posterity.

And whatever these who are grown up may judge, who only see the unhappy and accidental events that are the effects of the corruption of men, but have not known the counsels and causes which are the two parts of these things necessary to be known to all who would judge of human actions aright; events being for the most part uncertain, and the worst of events of times, through the corruption of agents, or other extrinsical circumstances following upon the best of actions, yet had they been intimately acquainted with the grounds, causes, and nature of the actings while a-doing, the defender is confident that they would have concurred and been of the same judgment, as being clear, that these proceedings had no native connexion with the sad and unexpected consequences that have ensued.

And now to come to the particular defences to the several points of the subsumption, of the dittay. And first as to the article of the subsumption, anent the words alledged, spoken at the ford of Lions, which are libelled to have been, That it was the opinion and judgment of many lawyers and divines, that a king might be deposed for desertion, vendition, or invasion; and which is alledged to have been meant by the pannel of the then king's majesty; and the presumptions adduced for enforcing that to have been the defender's meaning, are some words alledged subjoined, to wit, Mr. John, you understand Latin. It is alledged for the defender, no ways acknowledging, to the best of his memory, that he uttered any such words; 1. All criminal dittays should contain in them at least year, month and place, otherwise they are inept; Bartol. et D. D. ad L. libellorum ff. de accusatione, because amongst other reasons, 'diversitas loci varia argueret facinora,' saith Battand. Reg. 6, Prax. cum Postangel. &c. But so it is, there is no month condescended on, when the defender should have spoken these words, and therefore the dittay in this article is inept. 2. There is no particular act of parliament in the act libelled upon in the proposition condescended on, which is contravened by the words libelled; therefore the libel in this article of the subsumption is general and obscure, and till the particular law contravened be condescended on, one can receive no answer. 3. The speeches as they are libelled fall not under the compass of the acts libelled on in the proposition of the libel, to infer any of the pains therein contained; because they are but libelled as the narration of the opinion of others, which is not relevant to infer so much, that the narrator is of the same opinion, except it were also libelled, that he did declare his homologation, and that he was of the same judgment, which neither is, nor can be libelled; far less then is it relevant to infer a crime, and so high a crime as treason. For suppose the defender had said, that they are very learned, both divines and lawyers, whose opinion it is, that the Pope is the head of the church, and that he has power to dispense with the article of faith, to depose kings, a horrid opinion, &c. and that it is their opinion also we may merit heaven by good works, and that all Hugonots or Protestants are damnable heretics, and that he had related their words in Latin, as the Latin of that verse of the gloss of the common law, cap. sicut de excess. prelat.

'Restituit Papa salus deponit, &c.
'articulus solvit.'

And had said to Mr. John Stewart. thereupon, Mr. John, you understand Latin; albeit these opinions of these divines and lawyers be execrably heretical, yet nobody will say, that the defenders relation of them would have inferred him to have been guilty of the same; no more in our case can the relation libelled infer him to have been of that opinion with these divines and lawyers, or in any way thereby to have contravened any act of parliament libelled. 2. The aforesaid opinion is libelled, only to have been related in abstracto (nothing of our king's majesty who then was). And whereas it is libelled, that it appears the sense and meaning thereof appeared to have been of the then king's majesty, in so far as the defender subjoined to Mr. John Stewart, the words aforesaid, that he understood Latin: 1. The libel in this part is ambiguous; for this may be interpreted, either that it was the meaning of the opinion of these divines which he related, (this seems to be most consonant to the words) or else that his own meaning was, That it was the judgment that the then king's majesty our sovereign might be so dealt with, as is libelled in the latter part of this article, and so the article in this part thereof is ambiguous and inept, and there ought to be no process thereupon. 'Nam libellus (in criminalibus præsertim) nihil ambiguitatis vel obscuritatis continere debet, per cap. Constitut. 6. extr. de reg. dou. Bet. 3.' If it be understood in the former sense, it is but still relative of the opinion of others; and if in this latter sense, to wit, that it was his own judgment, the presumption libelled of what he spake to Mr. John Stewart is no way relevant to infer it. 1. Because they held a more obvious meaning, viz. That it might have been, the opinion of these divines and lawyers was related in Latin; and indeed Grotius and Barclaius, who writ of that subject, are both in Latin, and that he had subjoined to Mr. John Stewart, Mr. John, you understand Latin. 2. That such opinions being rather the fancy of notional schoolmen, (otherwise not unlearned in their own art) or of such as are doctors notional in the law, if there be any of such opinions, rather than of solid juriconsults, who for most part do not so much as move these questions, not to be moved. 3. If any such words had been spoken to Mr. John Stewart, they might have had this more proverbial sense: some lawyers and divines are of that opinion, but the subtilty of these questions or opinions is Latin to me, that is, I understand it not; as we say commonly of things we understand not, It is Latin to me; but, Mr. John, you are a scholar, and you understand it. Now it is a rule in law, that where the meaning is doubtful or obscure, that which is the most favourable sense should be followed. L. 9, ff. de reg. juris, and Mathew de Afflictis, Decisiones 265, n. 68, 69, et decis. 307, n. 15. And when these words are ambiguous, the declaration of him who uttered them should be acquiesced unto, Menochius, consilio 197. And the defender is ready to declare, that if he had ever spoken such words, he was very far from any such meaning as is libelled against him. Nor 4. is it any way presumable, that any rational man, who had the honour to know his late majesty, could have made application of any of these three causes to so worthy and illustrious a prince, seeing the said Grotius, Barclay, and others that write upon that subject acknowledge, yea, it is obvious to common sense, that hardly can they fall out in the worst of princes, if he be but compos mentis. And as to the presumption that follows, that the defender meant by the late king's majesty, because of the condition wherein the kingdom was for the time; 1. It is far more presumable that the kingdom was in such a condition of affection to his majesty's sacred person and authority, as at that time none durst have uttered what might reflect thereupon, seeing it is libelled to have been shortly after the subscribing of the covenant, wherein they had solemnly bound themselves by the oath of God to maintain his majesty's person and authority. 2. His majesty by his royal judgment in the act of oblivion, 1641, has presumed the loyalty of his subjects both in their intentions and proceedings in these times, which is presumptio juris, et de pre. As for the defender's prosecuting of Mr. John Stewart, 1. It was a judicial process and legal act, and so can be no imputation to him, wherein the process was laid in so fair a course of law, that he was condemned, not only upon clear probation, but his own confession: and yet the words whereupon he was indicted and convicted were far different from these words, as they are here libelled, otherwise the defender would never have pursued it.

Ultimo, Adhering always to the alledgeance above propounded, humbly protesting, that they may be first discussed: and whereupon it is craved, he may be assoilzied in hec libella, because by act of parliament in anno 1641, amongst the imprinted acts anno 70, the same service is approved and he exonerated. It is alledged, that the defender ought to be assoilzied from the whole crimes in the first article, because after the time libelled of the alledged committing of the same, his late majesty of glorious memory granted that never-to-be forgotten act of indemnity and oblivion in anno 1641; which did proceed upon the preceding treaty with his majesty, and which is solemnly confirmed by his majesty himself in person, and his three estates in his parliament, 1641, 6th act thereof; wherein his majesty, for himself and his successors, does promise in verbo Principis, never to come in the contrary of that statute and sanction, or any thing therein contained; but to hold the same in all points firm and stable, yea, and to cause it to be truly observed by all his majesty's lieges for ever. Hereupon the defender doth confidently rely, for all that is libelled as committed by him in this article, or any other proceeding that time, as being confident it is the greatest imaginable security that he and the rest of the lieges of the land can have.

As to the second article, and whole head thereof, 1. Neither day, month, nor year of God are condescended on; and therefore so general, that it is inept. 'Nam generalitas parit obscuritatem, Marent. part. 6. spec. et de libel. oblat. quomodo concip. et per textus 'ibi citatos.' 2. It is not condescended which of the Acts of Parliament libelled this article, and the several heads thereof, contravenes, which is a general ineptitude and nullity in this libel. 3. As to the first; if that article anent the in-taking of the house of Airly, cutting and destroying the planting, and demolishing the houses; 1. It is not relevantly libelled, in so far as it was libelled that the house was kept for his majesty's service, but doth not condescend that service now. 2. Is it libelled that there was any in it had a commission from his majesty, without which it has not any colour of relevance? 4. The defender never had any private quarrel, nor personal prejudice against the noble lord James earl of Airly; but if his marching to that house be meant of that which was in A. D. 1640, it was by virtue of, and in obedience to, a commission put upon him by the Committee of Estates for the time: nor was the said house, at his arrival thereat, kept for his majesty's service, as is (though wrongfully) libelled. But before that time was surrendered to the earl of Montross, who had put colonel Sibbald to keep the same for the king and country's use, and which col. Sibbald, upon sight of the defender's commission, did abandon the said house. And if there was any planting cut, it was altogether some few shrubs and bushes, which the defender could not hinder, for hurting to the soldiery; and though the defender's commission bear power and warrant to demolish the house, he was so far from stretching or fully executing the same, that he did not only slight the house and delayed a long time to do the same, in expectation that the lord Ogilvy should have procured a countermand from the Committee, and did slight it till he was passed all hope of obtaining the same; and this as is hoped will be acknowledged by the said noble earl; neither did, so far as the defender knew or could hinder, the earl, his friends and followers, sustain any other prejudice than what was usual, and what all places are ordinarily obnoxious to, where armies or parties of soldiers come: but however it is not relevant, as said is.

Tertio, That part of the said article, though it were true, as it is not, is no ways relevant to infer the conclusion of the Dittay, there being no law nor statute libelled on; that for cutting of timber, or demolishing the houses of private persons (though done upon private quarrels, as this was not) infers the pain of treason.

As to that part of the article, anent the burning of the house of Forther, beside the exceptions against both the points thereof, alleged before in the beginning, it is not relevant to say, that the defender seized thereupon to infer any crime, except it were libelled he seized by force, for he might have entered in vacuam possessionem. 2. Non relevant to libel, that those under him did seize thereupon, or raise fire therein, except it were libelled that the defender had given express order or warrant to raise that wilful fire; who, as he gave not order therefore, so he was not present nor near the place, nor knew any thing thereof, till after the house was burnt, and noxia caput sequitur. 8. In the Acts of Parliament libelled on, anent burning and wilful fire-raising, the same can only be understood of burning and raising of fire on private seeds, and for particular revenge in time of peace, and is not to be extended to such deeds done in the heat and fury of wars, seeing inter arma silent leges.

And as to the aggravation of the defender's hatred against the earl, merely for his loyalty to his majesty, it is gratis dictum, and against that presumption, qua unusquisque præsumitur bonus, and against that loyalty to his majesty, that is hoped shall more and more appear in the defender.

Lastly, The defender ought to be assoilized from the said article, and all deeds therein mentioned. Because the same preceded the act of oblivion, A. D. 1641, whereby all things that did fall forth in these tumultuous times, whether prejudicial to his majesty's honour and safety, or to the laws and practices of the church and kingdom, or to the particular interests of the subject, are buried in perpetual oblivion, as more fully is contained in the said act.

9. As to the third article, anent the besieging of Dunbarton castle, and transporting cannon and ammunition out thereof:

It is alleged for the defender, That the assaulting of the said castle is not relevant to infer the conclusion of the Dittay, because, as is before alleged, none can be declared traitors, but those who have contravened a special act made under the pain of treason. But so it is; that none of the particular acts of parliament, whereupon the proposition is founded, mentions any thing against those who assault the king's castle, nor does any of them infer the pain of treason therefore: but only the 25th Act of Parliament, 6 Jac. 6. intitled 'Sundry Points of Treason,' by the which acts they only are to be punished as traitors, who assault the castle or places where the king's person is, and that without warrant of estates; but it is neither libelled, nor was the king's person in the said castle at the time of the alleged assaults thereof; nor did the defender assault and lay siege to the same without warrant from the estates, but by their express order and commission. And the truth is, the defender himself did not appear before the said house, till the said sir John Henderson being straitened with the siege, sent for the defender, and offered to surrender the house upon honourable conditions, which the defender suffered him to make himself, and which were accordingly kept, not without some difficulty, the inhabitants of the town, by reason of prejudice done to them, being highly incensed against the said colonel.

As to that part of the said article, anent the transporting of the king's cannon and ammunition, not relevant to infer the conclusion, none of the acts libelled on concluding against any such fact, the said crime of treason; and the truth is, the defender did never transport any cannon or ammunition out of the said castle, but two cannons, which the duke of Richmond, heritable keeper thereof, gifted to the defender, and which he would never have gifted, if they had not been his own, and not the king's. 2. The defender ought to be assoilzied from the said article, and all deeds therein contained, the same having also preceded the said act of oblivion, A. D. 1641.

4. And as to the fourth article of the Dittay, anent the defender's calling, or causing to be called a Convention of Estates, A. D. 1643, entering in league with his majesty's enemies, imposing excise and subsidies on the kingdom, raising an army, entering England therewith, fighting for and with the rebels there; it is answered, That the whole points of this article of the Dittay are charged personally on the defender, so contrary to the notoriety of the matter of the fact known to both kingdoms, and to his majesty's commissioner's grace, and to the whole parliament; yea, to the fifth Act of Parliament, 1644, relating and approving all the acts that are made points of this article; that there needs no more but propone as known to all, and to repeat out of the said law and act of parliament, what is therein libelled, to evince that they are not the defender's personal deeds; but the committees (commissioners established by his majesty), convention of estates, and of the whole church and kingdom of Scotland, and approved by parliament, 1644, in the said fifth act thereof. First then as it is notorious, so it is clear by that act, that the said convention of estates was called not by the defender, as is libelled, but by his majesty's privy-council, commissioners for conserving the articles of the treaty therein mentioned, and commissioners of common burdens, all established by his majesty's authority A. D. 1641, which conservators concerning that article in the large treaty, bearing the kingdom of Scotland their desire for unity in religion, and conformity in church-government, as a special means for conserving of peace betwixt the two kingdoms; in answer thereto his majesty, with advice of both houses of parliament in England, doth declare his approbation of their affection in their desire of having conformity of church-government between the nations; and as the parliament had already taken to consideration the reformation of church-government: so they would proceed therein in due time: and this was one of the main grounds whereupon both houses entered the said league. (2.) That the enacting and entering the said league and covenant, was an act of that convention of estates, not the defender's personal act. (3.) That the league and covenant was entered in with the two houses of the long parliament, and assistance given to them in fighting with or for their army, or otherwise, which is libelled fighting with rebels. The point of fact being thus cleared in opposition to the Dittay. 2. It is alledged, That the first two members of this article are subsumed under some of the acts of parliament libelled on in the proposition; there being no act of parliament libelled against meetings, bands or leagues in general; or in special betwixt the two nations or estates thereof. 3. As to the remanent members of the article, they can no ways be relevant (with all submission) except it were qualified, that the two houses of the long parliament, to whom the assistance libelled was given, that they were enemies and rebels; but that the defender is confident it will not be said, because by his majesty's act of oblivion, 25 April, 1660, his majesty, after his happy restoration, declares, that what was acted even against his majesty, and his royal father, by his subjects in England during these times, thereafter shall not be called in question at all, so much as to the prejudice of their reputation, in manner at length contained in that gracious act. And how loyal the long parliament was, did appear in that the usurper durst never attempt anything against his late majesty's person, till they were broken; as also what loyalty the secluded members of that parliament have (as became them) shewed to his majesty in his just and glorious restoration, is known to all Europe, to their eternal commendation and renown: No doubt as from conscience of their oath of duty and allegiance, so of the oath of God whereunto they bound themselves to maintain his majesty's person, authority and greatness, as well as religion, in that covenant. 4. All the foresaid deeds, which are the members of this article, viz. The calling the foresaid convention of estates, as being the act of the foresaid council and commissioners, the entering in the league and covenant, raising of the army for assisting the two houses of parliament of England, imposing excise, &c. as all being acts of the said convention of estates, together with the same convention of estates, are all approved by the said 5th act of parliament, 1644. In respect whereof the defender ought to be assoilzied from this whole article, and all the crimes contained therein. 5. Not only is the said calling of the said convention of estates, and the said convention entering in the league and covenant, imposing of excise, raising of forces for the parliament of England, and remanent acts of the said convention approved by the said 5th act of parliament of 1644; but by his majesty's treaty of Breda, and the act of oblivion, in the parliament holden at St. Johnston and Sterling, in anno 1650 and 1651, or either of them, all things done during these tumultuous times, intervening betwixt the said act of oblivion 1641, and his majesty's home-coming 1650, whether prejudicial to his majesty's honour and authority, or to the laws and liberties of the church and kingdom, or to the particular interest of the subject, are buried in perpetual oblivion. And by the said treaty and act of ratification of the said parliament, or one or other of them, the said parliament 1644, and all acts thereof are ratified; and so amongst the rest, this which is the 5th act, which approves all the acts, whereupon this 4th article of the dittay is founded, and therefore the defendant ought to be assoilzied therefrom.

5. As to the 5th article, anent the burning of the house of Menstrie, in anno 1645, the defender is so innocent thereof, that if it were libelled relevantly, he needed no other defence but a simple denial; but the truth is, that it hath been burnt by some of the soldiers, commanded by major-general Bailey, for the time, upon the greatest provocations that could be; two parishes, viz. Muckart and Doller, having been burnt the night before, and several, both men, women and children, cruelly killed by the concourse of those that were in that house. But it is no way relevantly libelled, in so far as it is libelled, that the defender, or others under his command, burnt it: 1. Because there is no act of parliament, of all the acts libelled upon in the proposition, whereupon this can be subsumed; especially the acts anent the raising of fire, upon which (if upon any) it seems it is particularly founded, there is no such odd extension of that so high a crime, as to make any guilty of it by committing of it by others, who are under their command. And this were a very universal, terrible concernment; and in the present case were most dangerous and unjust, that a commander should be holden to answer for all the illegal deeds done by his soldiers. 2. It is against common reason, the common law, by which this therefore, is well established, that 'delicta proprios tenent auctores, et noxa caput sequitur;' and therefore is not relevant that the defender burnt it by himself, or others by his special direction, or particular order for that effect.

4. Though it were made relevant in manner aforesaid, yet the Dittay is inept as to this article, and the defender ought yet to be assoilzied therefrom, because the year of God is only libelled, to-wit, the year 1645; whereas not only the month, as in all criminal libels, 'per L. libellorum ff. de accusationibus,' and the doctors treating thereupon, but the very day ought to be condescended on; for the omission of the day prejudices the defender of his defence; especially his alibi, which he might and would propone, if the day were condescended on; that being required, the day ought to be condescended on, otherwise the libel is inept. 'Nam Libellus debet continere non tantum annum et mensem, sed et diem si reus id requisierit cum probaturus suum alibi. Damhaud, cap. 3. num. 4. 5. et Battander Reg. 6. num. 4. Maranta in spec. de bel. Ohl. 3. num. 12. per bark. in L. Si quis rues Colurn. 3. in fin. de publ. judic. et Jason. in L. Ubiteraria 2 sect. Si quis occisi ff. de eo quod Crito loco.' But so it is, that if the day were condescended on of the said burning, the defender might, and if need were, would offer to prove, that he was that day, during all the time of the burning, alibi, at a considerable distance from the same place.

3. Absolvitur, Because lieutenant-general Bailey, at that time when the house was burnt, had the command of the said forces (adhering always to the former defences against the aptitude and relevancy of this part of the dittay, and expressing the same that may be discussed ante omnia): In respect whereof the defender ought to be assoilzied 'ab hoc libello,' at least there can be no process upon that part of the dittay, as it is now libelled. 4. Albeit the defender had burnt, or given direction only to burn the said house, as he had not; yet by special act and commission of lieutenancy, granted him by the parliament 1644, he was empowered to pursue the Macdonalds, and their adherents and accessories, with all kind of hostility, by fire and sword, (with a dispensation) with slaughter, mutilations, raisings of fire, assailing of houses, taking of prisoners, and other inconveniences whatsoever, that should fall out in the execution of that commission in pursuing of them; as the said act and commission may at length bear, and which commission is ratified by his majesty in the treaty at Breda, his ratification of that session of parliament 1644, among the other parliaments and sessions thereof ratified by his majesty, all after 1641, and preceding his return. But so it is, that the said Macdonalds were at that time, at the burning of the said house, joined with Montross, and it was in pursuance of both that the said house was burnt, as is notorious, (and, if need be, the defender will prove) and therefore though he had burnt, or given direction for the burning thereof, he ought to be assoilzied.

5. By act of parliament, 30th act, 22 March, 1647, it is statute and ordained, that all his majesty's good subjects shall be altogether freed, and liberate in all time coming, from being any ways called, convened, pursued, troubled or molested in judgment, civil or criminal, or out with the same, for any deed done, or to be done by them, against the persons, lands or goods, of such as have, or shall be in the rebellion; (by which it is notorious, that the same armed opposition, made by the deceased marquis of Montross and the said Macdonald, and others under his command, to the estates, is understood) during the time of their being in the said rebellion, or have been, or shall be guilty with the rebels in their wicked courses, or of any of them, who came under the first or second classes of delinquents, contained in the 5th act of the 5th session of that parliament holden at St. Andrew's in the month of January, 1646. But so it is, the defender offers to prove, if need be, that a son of the earl of Sterling, named Charles or John Alexander, who had, or either of them had right to Menstrie, had joined with Montross and those under him; and so came under the second class of the said 5th act of the 5th session of parliament, 1646: Or at least, went or sent into their leaguer, or without compulsion entertained them in the said house; and therefore the defender ought not to be pursued, even though he had burnt, or given direction to burn the said house (as he no ways did), and being pursued, ought to be assoilzied from this article; like as it is conjunctim alledged for the defender in fortification of the said act, That the same is ratified by his majesty's large treaty at Breda, as being one of the acts of that session of parliament, 1647, which amongst the other sessions of parliament, and acts thereof, since the year 1641, and preceding his majesty's return, in anno 1650, are ratified by the said treaty, as also by the act of ratification, at St. Johnston's or Sterling, in anno 1650 and 1651. By which ratification (or ratification of his majesty by the treaty aforesaid) the said act of parliament 30, in anno 1647, comes (as a most solemn remission granted by his majesty, and whole estates of parliament, to the persons therein contained); and so like as if every one of them had got a particular remission so solemn, it had been an uncontrovertible remission for what were therein contained; so must it now be, being in effect of the same nature and virtue, albeit many being included in one.

6. By the Act of Oblivion at St. Johnston's or Sterling, in the year 1650 or 1651, all acts of hostility, whether between the king and his subjects, or between subject and subject, and what things fell out in these times, betwixt the year 1641, and his majesty's return, whether prejudicial to his majesty's honour and authority, or to the laws of the kingdom, or the particular interest of his subjects, are buried in oblivion. In respect whereof, though the defender were accessory to the said burning, as he is not, yet he ought to be assoilzied.

As to the sixth article, anent the taking of the house of Towart, belonging to the laird of Lamond, and the house of Oscoge, belonging to Oscoge; and after articles of capitulation drawn and subscribed by Ardkinglas, and others under his command, trust and assurance, murdering a great many of Lamond's and Oscoge's friends: as this is no way true, (the defender being altogether innocent thereof) so it is no ways relevantly libelled. For, 1. Neither day nor month of these deeds are condescended on. 2. The alternity, by others under his command, not relevant to infer a crime, far less treason against the defender, for the reason contained in the first answer to the former article, viz. That there is neither act of parliament libelled, nor common law, ordaining a man to be liable to a pain, far less the highest of pains, for deeds or crimes by those under his command, except he gave them special direction. But every one is to suffer for his own fault, as more at length is contained in the said answer, which is here repeated. 3. Non relevat those for whom he is answerable, for the same reasons, because every one is answerable for his own fault and crime. 4. Non relevat, that others whom he might stop, did it; because there is neither any act of parliament libelled on, ordaining any to be answerable for all the deeds of those he might stop (especially the act against murder under trust, bearing no such thing); nor is there any law nor reason for the same, but 'delicta pro-prios tenent authores,' as hath been said; and no ways granting the defender could have stopped them: for the truth is, he could not, and was not near them, when what is libelled was done: and albeit indeed, it be 'contra officium charitatis,' not to stop any doing of mischief, if any one may safely do it, yet that it comes under the compass of law to infer a crime, especially treason, cannot be affirmed.

5. Taking of the house of Towart and Oscoge, is not subsumed upon any of the acts of parliament libelled, there being none of them, anent the taking in of houses belonging to the lieges, and so is not relevant to infer any of the crimes contained therein. 6. The alledged killing a great many of Lamond's and Oscoge's friends, after the assurance given by Ardkinglas, is no ways relevantly libelled, to infer the crime of slaughter under trust, because by the act of parliament, Jac. 6, par. 11, cap. 51, of slaughter under trust, upon the which it is founded, slaughter under trust, is only when the party slain is under the trust and assurance of the slayer, which is no way here libelled; but that the persons who are libelled to have been slain by the defender, were under the trust of another, to-wit, Ardkinglas; who if he, or any other under the defender's command, have done any thing against their own assurance, they are to answer for it.

7. The defender adhering to these defences, and craving that they being against the relevancy be first discussed, repeats his former answer founded upon his commission of lieutenancy therein mentioned; for they who are designed Lamond's and Oscoge's friends, were the Macdonalds, or their adherents and accessories, (as is notorious, and the defender, if need shall be, offers to prove it) whom by the aforesaid commission he had power to prosecute with fire and sword, with dispensation of slaughter, and raisings of fire, in manner at length contained in the commission; which amongst the other acts of parliament, 1644, is ratified by his majesty in his treaty at Breda, as is alledged in the said answer, which is bolden herein repeated; and therefore the defender ought to be assoilzied from this article. And truly what cruelty was exercised, was by the laird of Lamond himself, against the heritors and other inhabitants in the sheriffdom of Argyle; for the which, upon a supplication given in to the king's majesty and committee of estates at Sterling, in August 1651, he was imprisoned within the castle of Sterling, till after trial, justice should have been done upon him; but was released by the English when they took the castle, with the other prisoners. However, the defender is confident, as it is known, so he shall make it appear, if need be, in the other process whereunto this relates, and wherein it will be more pertinent; and yet the day and time of the committing of the deeds mentioned in this article not being condescended on, as it ought to be when required by the defender, that he may propone his alibi, he offers to prove, if need be, that he was alibi the time of the committing of the said deeds, at a very great distance, to-wit in England. Like as his majesty, by his treaty at Breda, hath ratified and approved the acts of parliament; and his majesty, and estates of parliament have ratified the said treaty, and past an act of oblivion, of all former deeds done by the subjects, which secures and indemnifies them for any former actings, in respect whereof he ought to be assoilzied.

As to the seventh article made up of several members or parts; as, 1. Anent the men alledged murdered at Lockhead and Dunnaverty. 2. Anent the aggravation added thereto; anent an old man begging his son's life, and denied him. 3. Anent the sending two hundred men from Ila to starve in Jura. 4. Anent the taking of the person of col. Kittoch out of a ship in Leith road, wherein it is libelled, that he had been brought by order of parliament.

It is alledged against the seventh article, that, 1. The first part thereof (anent the men alledged murdered at Lockhead and Dunnaverty) is no ways relevant, not only in respect that the particular month and days whereupon the same should have been done, are not condescended upon, but also in respect there is not one particular person by name, and surname, whereby he might be known, condescended upon, against whom the deeds libelled should have been committed; without the which, this part of the article cannot be sustained as relevant; it being contrary to all law and practice, that murder in general, without naming the persons murdered, should be sustained as a relevant dittay against any. 2. The slaughter alledged, committed upon those in the house of Lockhead, is not relevantly subsumed upon the acts of parliament libelled, in so far as there is no assurance libelled to have been given to them, to bring it under the act of murder under trust, and there is no other act libelled under which it can fall. 3. It is alledged, that the defender cannot be charged with any of the deeds libelled in the said first part of the article (though they were true and relevantly libelled, as they are not), because the expedition made against the rebels in Kintyre, in the year libelled, was by David Lesley, and those under his command, against each, who, contrary to his majesty's order sent to them at that time, commanding them to lay down arms, and contrary to their own engagements not to join with Alister Macdonald, did notwithstanding continue in arms rebelliously, (as was then declared by the estates of parliament) resisted David Lesley in the execution of his said commission against them; who therefore after defeating of them in the field, who took them out of the said houses of Lockhead and Dunnaverty without any capitulation, and disposed of them, as the council of war then present with him thought fit, (which is notorious, and the defender offers to prove if need be;) for which, and other his services, the said David Lesley got the parliament's approbation in anno 1648, as the said approbation and exoneration bears date; which will clearly prove any thing that is herein alledged. And therefore the defender, nor any in his company at that time, cannot be charged with any deeds libelled in the first part of this article, but ought to be assoilzied therefrom. 4. The defender repeats his third defence made to the fifth article founded upon his commission of lieutenancy; the persons mentioned in this article, against whom the deeds are libelled to have been committed, having been the Macdonalds, or the adherents and accessaries, which is notorious, (and the defender offers to prove, if need be) to prosecute whom he had the commission containing dispensation, and which was ratified in manner mentioned in the said answer; like as he repeats the fourth and fifth answer made to the said article, in respect whereof he ought to be assoilzied therefrom.

It is alledged against the second, third and fourth members of this seventh article, that they are no ways subsumed nor cannot be subsumed under any of the acts of parliament libelled, and therefore the dittay herein is inept, and the defender ought to be assoilzied therefrom (and yet in point of fact they are but mere calumnies). As to the second part (anent the said old man and his son) it is no ways relevant, not condescending on the persons names, and therefore can receive no other answer, but that it is a mere fiction to make the defender more odious, who ingenuously professes, that he never heard of such a thing till he saw it in the libel. The third part of this article hath no better ground than the second; and the defender desires, that for clearing his innocency of the fact libelled therein (anent the sending of two hundred men from Ila to starve in Jura), that the gentlemen in the said Isles may be examined upon the truth of the matter. It is alledged, that the fourth part of this article, anent col. Kittoch, is of the same nature with the former two, and therefore the simple relation of the truth is sufficient to refute the falsehood thereof; which is shortly this, viz. That col. Kittoch was not brought to Leith, either by order of the committee of estates or parliament; but being taken prisoner in Ila, by the forces under the command of David Lesley, and delivered to the defender, the defender put him aboard in captain Brown's ship, who undertook to deliver him at Dunstaffnage. But captain Brown finding the opportunity of a fair wind to Leith, to which he intended, and not willing to lose the same, did not go to Dunstaffnage, but came straight to Leith road; and immediately gave the defender notice, that he had his prisoner aboard; whom therefore the defender received from him, and sent him to Dunstaffnage. And the defender desires that captain Brown, who lives at Weems, may be examined upon the truth of this matter; by whom he offers to prove this, if need were.

And whereas it is libelled, that col. Kittoch was hanged, it is true; but it is also true, that he was condemned to die in a justice or lieutenant-court judicially; which is notorious, and the defender offers to prove, if need shall be: so that this can be a ground of no crime nor dittay whatsoever; but however the defender ought to be assoilzied therefrom.

8. To the first member of the eighth article that notwithstanding the manifold acts of dignity, favour and honour conferred upon him by his then dread sovereign; his majesty being reduced to great straits by that army of sectaries, and having cast himself over in the hands of the army of the Scots subjects for shelter and preservation of his royal person; nevertheless, the said Marquis being chief ring-leader of that factious party, who then swayed the estate of affairs both in counsel and army, did so contrive and complot, and by his influence so prevail, that after all fair offers made by his majesty and his desire to have come and lived in Scotland, till all differences in both kingdoms had been settled, an act of parliament was made, for abandoning his majesty to the mercy of his inveterate enemies, the said army of sectaries.

It is answered, that as he must continually acknowledge the late king's and his present majesty's acts of favour, honour and trust; so must he still deny, as he safely may in the presence of God, who is the searcher of all hearts, and of all men, that he never entertained any disloyal thought, or contrived any treasonable plot or machination against the sacred person, dignity or authority of his late sovereign, or of his present most sacred majesty; and therefore with a clear conscience may answer this dittay:

1. That the same is not special nor clear, but very obscure and general, how and in what manner he was chief ring-leader of any factious party. 2. Who that factious party were: nor, 3. By what deeds, and how he swayed the state of affairs: nor, 4. Those means, by which, and upon whom, he procured his influence to prevail. 5. The alledged offers made by his majesty are not expressed: and therefore the said articles are altogether general and inept.

The act of parliament, which the defendant is alledged to have procured to have been made is not produced, nor indicated by number or rubrick, nor does the defender know any act of the tenor and title libelled.

And the defender in humility conceives, that it is not consistent with the act libelled on, in the opposition of the dittay, discharging persons to impugn the authority of the estates of parliament, to term the members thereof (especially in making an act, which being carried by plurality of voices, as the deed of the whole, and especially such an act as is mentioned in the libel, where there were none, or very few of a contrary judgment) a factious party.

13. The cause of the first member of the said eighth article, anent the pretended act of parliament, as is libelled, for abandoning and leaving his majesty to, the disposal and mercy of his enemies, the sectarian army, does arise from the acts of parliament (as clearly appears), and can be subsumed on under none of the acts of parliament libelled: For if the tenth act of parliament, 1647, be understood and meant as the act libelled, that being an act of parliament, the defender humbly alledges, that an act of an acknowledged lawful parliament should be made a crime of accession, whereunto a member of parliament shall be indicted, especially for so high a crime as treason, is without ground of law or practice, and is hoped the honourable parliament will no ways sustain it; and therefore, that he needs say no more now in confirmation hereof.

14. Likewise, all that is in that act and substance thereof, being the estates of parliament their declaring their concurrence for his majesty's going to Holmby-house, or some other of his houses in and about London; and that expressly to satisfy the desire both of his majesty himself, and of his two houses of parliament in England; and there to remain, not under the power of sectaries, but with such attendance about him as both houses should think fit to appoint, with respect also had to the safety and preservation of his royal person: and the estates therein do also declare against all harm and prejudice, violence or injury to be done to the same (as indeed it was horrid to think that any on earth should have done), or prejudice to his majesty's posterity: But thereafter it is clear from the fourth and seventh acts of the parliament, 1648, that the sectarian army disobeyed, and threatened the houses of parliament, imprisoned and banished faithful members, and by a sudden surprize, violently seized upon the person of the king's majesty, carried him from his house at Holmby against his own will, and declared resolutions of both kingdoms, and kept him under their guards; till at length, by their power and prevalency, he was committed, and kept close prisoner at the Isle of Wight: this being the true case out of the express words of the acts before cited.

As to that declaration, act 10, parl. 1647, the defender alledges, 1. The act bears express, that it was to satisfy his majesty's own desire. 2. That it is homologate and approved by the parliament, 1648, in so far as by their fourth act, intituled, "Anent their resolutions concerning the breaches of covenant and treaties betwixt the kingdom of Scotland and England, and demands for reparation thereof;" finds the violent seizing on his sacred majesty's person, and taking him away from Holmby-house, as appears by act 7, by that army, against the resolutions of both kingdoms, a breach: And amongst the reparations, they desire expressly, that conform to the former desires of this kingdom, the king's majesty may come with honour, freedom and safety to some of his houses in or near London, that the parliaments of both kingdoms may make applications to him. And in their seventh act, intituled, "A declaration of the parliament of Scotland, to all his majesty's good subjects of this kingdom, concerning their resolutions for religion, king and kingdom," &c. after they declare, that violently seizing on his majesty's person, and carrying him away by that army, against the resolutions of both kingdoms, to be a breach: And they declare, they intend to send to the two houses of the parliament of England the desires following; which they call necessary and just desires for religion, his majesty's good, and peace of these kingdoms: whereof this is one, That conform to the former desires of this kingdom, the king's majesty may come with honour, freedom and safety to some of his houses in or near London; and declares, that thereafter they will endeavour it: And act 8 in their desires to both houses of parliament in England, the same desire is repeated, conform to the former desires of this kingdom. By all which it is clear, that the seizing upon his sacred majesty's person, was the violent deed of that wicked army, done with a violent surprisal against the declared resolutions of both kingdoms. And that his majesty's coming to some of his houses in or about London, where both kingdoms might make application to him, conform to his kingdom's desire; which is, that wherein the estates declare their concurrence with his majesty and both houses of parliament in England's desire in the said tenth act, is approved as a just and necessary desire for his majesty, and accordingly enacted among that parliament, 1648, their desires to the said houses; and declare it should be endeavoured, if refused: so highly it is approved by the said parliament. In respect whereof, especially of the standing acts of parliament, 1648, the defender humbly craves, That albeit the article was relevantly, distinctly and clearly libelled and subsumed on some of the acts of parliament in the proposition condescended on, as he humbly conceives it is not, yet he ought to be assoilzied therefrom.

And for further clearing what was the ground and occasion of that act, and the reasons inducing the defender and the parliament at that time to go along therein, and how little ground there is for challenging him thereon, it would be considered, That when the late king came to the army before Newcastle, the defender was in Ireland, by commission from the parliament, 1646; and that his majesty's declarations anent the grounds of his resolution in coming to the Scots, was sent both to the committee of estates in Scotland, and to the parliament of England; so that the same being printed before the defender came to Newcastle, he neither did, nor could know, any other ground of his coming, nor what was contained in his declaration, viz. his gracious resolution to comply with his parliaments in both nations, and those entrusted by them, in every thing, for settling of truth and peace; and that he would totally commit himself to their councils and advices.

Upon which terms, both the committee of Scotland, and officers of the army, declared to his majesty, and to the parliament of England, that they received him, and all this before the defender came from Ireland to Newcastle; from whence his majesty sent him with instructions to the commissioners at London (of which commissioners the defender was one also) to hasten the propositions; and privately commanded the defender to take the advice of the duke of Richmond, and marquis of Hertford, anent what might concern his majesty; and particularly, if it was fit that the Scots army should declare for his majesty; whose judgment and opinion was (which they conjured him to tell his majesty), that such a course was the only way at present to ruin his majesty: for that he himself knew, that neither the nobility nor gentry of England who attended him at Oxford, wished him to prevail over his parliament by the sword, and much less would they endure the Scots army to do it; and that it would make all England as one man against him. And that it was their earnest request to his majesty, by any means to give way to the propositions. Which advice he not only faithfully told to his majesty at Newcastle, and many others there, and to our gracious sovereign who now is, when he was in Scotland; but also being in the Tower, he entreated the Lieutenant thereof to propose for him, that the marquis of Hertford, who was then alive, might be examined in this matter; which was put off from time to time, because of his majesty's great affairs. And as it is most certain, that neither independent nor sectary was able to carry one vote in the house at that time; so it is notorious, that they who tendered his majesty most in England, were for disbanding the Scots army, and his majesty's staying in England: wherein the defender appears to the particular knowledge of the earl of Lauderdale, Loudon, sir Charles Erskine, and the rest of the commissioners then there. And it is of truth, which all know, that so little fear, suspicion and jealousy there was of what followed, that the great fear of his majesty's friends in both kingdoms was, that if he fixed on his subjects in Scotland, all England would be against him, and probably cast off his government and interest for ever: So that under what representation soever the matter may now appear, because of the sad sequels, yet to them who know the matter, as it was there stated, what declarations and assurances there were from the parliament of England, and how little fear of the prevalency of sectaries; it did appear to be an act, if not of necessity, at least an act very expedient and convenient for the time, otherwise many who did dissent thereto, would never have condescended; and consequently the defender's concurring therein, upon such probable grounds, can be no such crime as is libelled; nor is it relevant to answer the conclusion of the dittay.

To the second member of this article, bearing, that under pretext for satisfaction for the arrears of the army, he went to London; and there treasouably gave up, at least condescended to the up-giving of his dread sovereign and master, as being impowered so to do by the kingdom of Scotland:

It is answered, 1. This member is not relevant, because neither the time of his going to London, nor of his being there, or the persons to whom he condescended to give up, are particularly mentioned and set down.

By which generality he is precluded from several defences which might arise to him if the dittay were clear; and it is a principle in common law, and of constant practice, That 'non est vagandum in crimine, sed debet certum et speciatim dici:' for that 'dolus et error verisantur in generalibus.'

2. No ways acknowledging the relevancy of the subsumption herein, upon any of the acts of the proposition, till the same be clearly condescended on; and craving the same may be first done, opposes the act of parliament: and the truth is, while the defender was at London, there was nothing spoken at all by him of leaving his majesty in England, except what he was expressly commanded by his majesty to speak to Richmond and Hertford, as aforesaid.

To the third member of the eighth Article, bearing, That in a joint committee of both kingdoms, where the English questioned, whether the Scots army would concur with them in their said treason and treachery; the defender after many arguments used in their favour, earnestly requested them to have patience for a little time, and that it would appear how far they intended to concur. And that within few days thereafter there was a declaration and vindication emitted in name of the said army, holding forth, That in case his majesty did not condescend to all the desires of both kingdoms, which were no less than divesting himself of all regal power, civil, ecclesiastical and military, they would deliver him up; which immediately upon the receipt of two hundred thousand pounds the defender and they did:

It is answered, That adhering to the former defences anent the subsumption, and repeating it here, this member, although it were rightly subsumed, as it is not, is most irrelevant and general in time, place, person and speeches; mention being made of many arguments, and never a one produced, and of a question and answer, out of which (even as libelled) treason cannot be inferred, viz. That the defender requested them to have patience a while, and it would appear how far the army intended to concur; but within few days after, the army declared themselves in manner as aforesaid; seeing these alledged words of the defender, as they are indefinite and general, so the most they could infer is, That in a short time it would appear whether the army would concur or not. And what can from thence be inferred, as to any thing the army did? If they have outshot their duty, as it was in regard of him, with the speaking of these words, a future contingent, wherein the defender had no casualty; so they must answer for themselves, and not the defender.

And for aught he knows, there never was any such declaration emitted; neither should there be any captious use made of words, if there had been any such words spoken, as there never was, especially to infer his treason; for that labricum lingue is oftener a frailty than a fault; and that by all doctors of both laws it is constantly held, that 'verba debent intelligi ne sonent in delictum.' And that in dubio they should be interpreted à proferenti. And therefore no way, acknowledging the words and deeds libelled, except in so far as concerns the defender's vote to the declaration, and as the circumstance libelled, That the delivery of his majesty was immediately after the payment of 200,000*l.* it is clear that there was no respect to that money in what was done therein, by the act of 7 Parl. 1648, wherein the estates there declare, That money was never the cause nor motive of any of our undertakings and resolutions, whatever our enemies had falsely suggested of that kind. And lastly, adhering to his former defences, opposes to this whole article, the treaty at Breda, and the acts of parliament of oblivion and ratification.

As to the ninth Article, and whole first member thereof, bearing, That the defender opposed the proceedings of parliament, 1648, by arguing, voting, and after the resolutions of parliament were passed in an act, in protesting against the same:

It is alledged for the defender, 1. It is not condescended, under which of the acts of parliament libelled on in the proposition, this article is subsumed; and therefore the libel, as to that member of the article, for arguing, voting, and protesting, is inept, and the defender hath just reason in such an incertitude to deny, that it can be relevantly subsumed on any of the said acts of parliament.

2. Arguing and voting is no ways relevant to infer the conclusion of the dittay; because by divine law, law of nations, statutes and practices of this kingdom, in deliberando, a member of parliament or other council, should give advice or suffrage, according to his persuasion of the good or ill of the subject debated on, and under consideration; wherein if his reason cannot bring him up, nor his conscience admit him the length of others in such public councils, he ought to have charity for the one, and excuse for the other.

Like as by the 5th act, parl. 2. king Charles 1, it is expressly statute, That every member of parliament shall faithfully and freely speak, answer and express themselves upon all and every thing which is propounded, in so far as they think in their conscience may conduce to the glory of God, the peace of the church and state, and employ their best endeavours to promote the same. Under which oath, (read in the audience of the late king, and by him approved in the parliament, 1641) the defender, as a peer of that parliament, A. D. 1648, was solemnly tied to the dictates of his reason, and pre-scripts of his conscience, and cannot be called in question as a member, having freedom therein; and conform thereto is the oath of this present parliament, bearing, that every member shall faithfully and freely, according to their best judgment, give their advice and vote in parliament.

To the second part of the first member of the said article, anent the defender's protesting and dissenting from the said act, 1648; it is alledged for the defender, the protestation is not produced as it ought to be, whereby it will appear, that if any was, the same was before the act of parliament passed; and that they did only protest and enter their dissent against proceeding to the determination of the question then in hand, which evinces the same to have been before the act was made. Like as the defender offers himself to prove by the members of parliament then present, that being asked if they would renew the protestation after the act, they shunned to do the same, the act being now passed.

2. Absolvitur, (though the same were produced) because it is offered to be proved, that the same was ratified in the fourth act, Parl. 2. Sess. 2. Char. 2, which was approved at the treaty at Breda, and confirmed at Perth and Sterling, as is said. But for the honourable parliament, their more full clearing, anent the defender's carriage in the said particular, it is offered to be proved, if need be, That the defender (before the Commissioners return from the said Isle of Wight, in the said year), when he heard that his majesty had satisfied his people's desires concerning religion, in presence of divers persons of honour, he expressed himself passionately earnest to engage for his majesty's freedom. Like as the only difference of the opinion anent the engagement was in the manner the grounds of those that were dissatisfied; being as they are expressed in the said protestation, viz. That the parliament should not proceed till the commission of the church were consulted; and adding also, (which is not therein expressed) till advertisement and three month's warning were given, conform to the large treaty; until all means of peace had been first essayed, and while first the lawfulness and necessity of that war should be found by the parliament, conform to the 7th act thereof. And it is humbly conceived, that many in this present parliament do remember, how unanimous all were, that his majesty should be brought out of the hands of the sectaries, to some of his houses in or about London: And all they differed in was, that the church should be consulted anent the securing of religion, all means of peace should first have been essayed, and warning given in manner aforesaid, conform to the large treaty; the breach whereof was made one of the grounds of that declaration, Act 7. And it cannot be refuted, but that at several meetings, the dissenters debated the dangerousness of that war (especially if the army should be defeated), from the sad consequences that might thereupon ensue to the king, kingdom and religion; as immediately thereafter fell out. Whereas had the nation been entire and whole in their power and force, that army of sectaries, in probability, would not have dared to have attempted those matters which afterwards they did. So that the case being truly stated, there will appear no malice against his majesty's person, authority, and restitution thereof; but an uncleanness to enter into a war of such danger, and hazard, and the respect they had to the security of religion (as all then professed) according to the covenant.

To the second member of the ninth Article, whereby it is alledged, That in contempt of the authority of that parliament, and against the preservation of his majesty's person and authority, that the defender convoked an army of rebellious subjects, and therewith committed divers and sundry outrages, slaughters and vastations, upon the persons and estates of his majesty's subjects; invaded cities and castles, seized upon magazines, arms and ammunition, and called in an army of sectaries to his assistance:

It is answered, first, That the same is not relevantly subsumed upon any act of the proposition; at least till the Advocate condescend upon which act thereof the same is founded, the defender is not bound to make answer.

Secondly, The defender denies that he did convocate these forces, or gave counsel or command therefore: And as to his being with them, he must be assolizied,

1. Because by a treaty at Sterling, betwixt the chief officers of the army then alive, and out of prison; and a Quorum of members of the Committee by authority of parliament, 1648; who had power to order the incident affairs of the nation, the said meeting, and all acts of hostility, and others thereby committed, are expressly discharged, hinc inde, and a mutual oblivion and indemnity therefore.

2. Any meeting he had with them, was by a call of those of the Committee of Estates, who joined with those forces, and who in the treaty is acknowledged the Committee of Estates.

3. The said meeting and acting thereof, together with the treaty and Articles thereof, is ratified and approved by the third act, 2 Parl. 2. Sess. Charles 2.

The third member of the ninth Article, bearing, That apprehending his power was not able to withstand his majesty's good subjects, the defender called in to his assistance the army of sectaries; and that he went into Mordington, and met with the commander of that army, had private consultations with him, and prevailed with him to come to Edinburgh with his army, whose coming he might have hindered; because Oliver said, That he could not help his lying upon the tenants of Mordington, for that his staying and going depended upon the defender; and that he did countenance and consult with the sectaries and their commanders, in Edinburgh, or the Canongate, in the house called the Lady Hume's lodging:

It is answered, That as to speeches and consultations in general, not relevant except they were condescended on; and as to the words spoken by Cromwel, if spoken by him, it was a lye, and can infer nothing against the defender: and the occasion of his stay was till he got Berwick and Carlisle, which could not be restored till the treaty of Sterling was closed. And as to his meeting and treating with him, absolvitur, because he and others did the same by warrant of the Committee, and which treaty was ratified in the aforesaid act of parliament thereafter:

To the fourth member, That he concealed and voted to the drawing up of a letter, directed to Cromwel, wherein he and his complices engaged themselves, in the name of the kingdom of Scotland, to do their utmost endeavours, that none who had been necessary to the engagement, or in arms at Sterling, in pursuance thereof, should be employed in any place of trust, without the advice and consent of the parliament:

It is answered, 1. No such letter produced.

2. Though it were produced, yet consenting and voting not relevant; because a vote in the Committee of Estates can infer no crime against the defender, nor any member thereof, nor any act passed in the said Committee: especially seeing.

3. The acts of the said Committee were ratified in the fourth act of the parliament aforesaid; all ratified thereafter by the treaty at Breda, and acts of ratification at Perth and Sterling: and the necessity thereof would be also considered in respect of the large treaty, both kingdoms having given their public faith, that the breakers should be rendered up to the observers; and that the English army then upon the borders, required the performance thereof against the engagers, and for farther security, pledges and places of strength. It was at that time counted a great favour (considering their power to have made their own terms) when they might have imposed and forced what they pleased more, yet they did accept this act.

To the fifth member of this article, bearing, That he did draw up, at least did counsel the drawing of certain instructions, given to sir John Chiesly, purporting, That the noblemen, gentlemen of quality, and considerable officers, who went into England under duke Hamilton, and were there prisoners, should be kept as pledges for the peace of the kingdom:

It is answered, 1. Not produced as it ought to be, that it may thereby appear whether he subscribed the same or not.

2. Not relevant (one of the committee) except it were libelled present, and voted at that time; for 'noxa caput sequitur.'

3. Not relevant, voted 'quia in senatu nemo tenetur de consilio.'

4. Oppones the authority of the committee, treaty, acts of parliament, and ratifications aforesaid.

To the last member of this article, bearing,

That he gave warrant under his hand for issuing of a proclamation against the families of the laird of Rea and Vyres:

It is allged for the defender, 1. No such warrant produced; if any such a warrant were produced under the defender's hand, it will certainly appear to be as president of some committee, and so not his personal deed; nor such a deed as can infer any crime against him.

2. No such proclamation ensued.

3. Although ensued, yet that took no effect, and so was 'minæ tantum, et animus ad effectum non perductus.'

4. Oppones the act of the committee, and act of parliament, 1649, aforesaid; which parliament, and the whole act thereof, is ratified in the treaty at Breda, and approved in the parliament at St. Johnston's and Sterling; wherein was also made an act of oblivion, oftentimes before alledged on: in respect whereof the defender ought to be absolved from the said ninth article, and whole member thereof, and all therein contained. And because the defender has in his defences so oft alledged the act of parliament, 1649, for his vindication, he desires that it may be observed (which is very observable) that by the printed treaty at Edinburgh and Sterling, September, 1648, it is agreed and appointed by those of the committee at Sterling, 1648, that a parliament should sit down before the 10th of January next; conform thereunto, they did convene and sit down the fourth of the month of January, as by the said treaty, and the first and third acts of the parliament doth appear: whereby it is clear, that the said parliament, 1649, was appointed to sit by the committee of the parliament, 1648, who had power by the last act of the said parliament, to convene the parliament before the first Thursday in March, 1650, if they thought fit: as also that session of the parliament, 1649, by the last act thereof continues the same to the first Thursday in March, 1650. At which day they convened in the next sessions, and therein ratified the act of parliament made in the former session; and which day was the dyet to which the parliament, 1648, continued the same, with power to the committee of estates to convene the same sooner, if they thought fit, as is said. Whence it is evident, that the said parliament, 1649, whether as appointed by the uncontroverted committee, 1648, at Sterling, in the first session, or as it is continued to the first Tuesday of March 1650, in the second session, (both conform to the last act of the parliament, 1648) must subsist and sway the said defender his just reason, to found his defences upon the acts thereof. It is also further considerable, as to the loyalty of that parliament, that therein the murder of his late majesty was declared against, his present majesty proclaimed and brought home, his subjects of this nation reconciled to him, and taken into favour, an army appointed to oppose his enemies, the crown set upon his head; and that session of Perth, wherein the whole preceding proceedings were approved, was dignified by the presence of his royal person.

And to the tenth article, and that part thereof where it is libelled, That the defender, in anno 1649, not daring to oppose in public, or in a direct way, his majesty's home-coming, he procured the application made, to be clogged with such limitations and restrictions, as were most derogatory to monarchical government; as is alledged to be more fully expressed in the commission, instructions and addresses, which are repeated as a part of the libel.

It is alledged for the defender, 1. Seeing the said commission, instructions and addresses are libelled on, and repeated as a part of the dittay; in all law and form of process, they ought to be produced with the libel, for the reason adduced in the defence, against the relevancy of the proposition of the dittay; and till which be produced, it cannot be consistent with the said limitations and restrictions, and how far they are derogatory to monarchical government, and therefore till then there can be no process.

2. It is not condescended nor cleared, on which of the acts libelled on in the proposition, this article and members thereof are subsumed; and therefore it is obscure and inept: and in that incertitude, the defender has just reason to deny, that it can be subsumed on any of the said acts, to infer the crime and pain libelled against the defender, none of the said statutes making any mention of treating or inferring any pain therefore. Likewise after ruptures and differences betwixt a king and his subjects, all lawyers and politicians do agree, that the best and safest way of removing the same, is by treaty; and that being concluded on, it is also their opinions, that the same are to be observed, at least so far as to exempt the subjects from punishment, to whom indemnity has been thereby promised. And in this, Grotius de jure belli et pacis, lib. 3. cap. 19, is most clear; and many others who write on that subject. And therefore the said treaty being concluded, and after ratified by his majesty and his parliament, the defender cannot be called in question for his accession thereto, nor the pain of treason thereupon inferred: For the said treaty and conditions thereof being accepted and agreed by his majesty's voluntary contract, cannot be like as a crime, far less so high a crime as treason, against the defender.

3. Absolvitur from that member of the said article; because not only after the said treaty did his majesty tacitly remit any crime, if any was, in the said treaty, by admitting the defender to places of trust, by receiving the crown from his hand at the coronation, and by admitting him to take the oath of allegiance, and to be a member of his majesty's privy-council; but also after the said treaty was ratified, there was an act of pardon and oblivion by his majesty and estates of parliament, oft-times before alledged, and is here repeated.

Though the above-written defences be relevant in law, as to the said member; yet for the defender's further vindication, the honourable parliament would take notice; that all along the preceding articles, all the public actings from the year of God 1640, to the year 1648, (wherein the generality and representatives, both civil and ecclesiastic in the kingdom, concurred) are charged upon the defender as his particular actings, or as if the defender had been the special author; whereas in this article anent the treating with, and bringing home of his majesty, therein it is known the defender, according to his bounden duty, was most active and zealous; and therein he wrestled with all his might, and by his pains and God's blessing thereon, overcame many difficulties, and did effectuate the same. The libeller does so far detract from the defender's faithful discharge of his duty in this so glorious action, and without libelling the least presumption of any circumstance to make the same probable; the defender is accused, as if he had in his judgment been against his majesty's home-coming; which because he durst not avow publicly, therefore he betook himself to underhand dealing, to clog the treaty with limitations and restrictions, excluding the defender from all accession to the said duty, in so far as it was good, viz. to bring home the king; and making him to be the sole author of all libelled to be evil therein, to wit, of the limitations and restrictions. Whereas the truth is, he was active in the king's home-bringing, and was passive in the other; having laboured what he could, that there should be as few conditions, and the same as satisfactory to his majesty as was possible at that time to obtain; which is known to all that did transact the said affair, and which, if need be, is offered to be proved.

And for further clearing hereof, if this article shall be further insisted on, my Lord Advocate will be pleased to condescend to declare who the parties were that made the motion for addresses to his majesty, of whom the defender should have been afraid, if he had been of a contrary judgment, to have opposed openly. For if the defender had so great sway in affairs, as all along the preceding articles he is allowed to have had; and also if he had intended, (as is broadly and with foul mouth alledged) in the said libel all along alledged, to have extirpated and evacuated the king's majesty's authority, government and posterity; and had such correspondence with those abominable regicides, as all are persuaded by the said libel to believe, in the said year of God, 1649; when the said traitors were strong, and both this land through divisions and otherwise, very low; and when the power was in the defender's and his complices hands, (as my lord Advocate is pleased to libel and term them) who at that time had the managing of affairs; then was the fittest time and best opportunity, if they had any such disloyal thoughts, to have shaken off that government. But so far did they abhor any such treachery, that they not only proclaimed his majesty, and according to their duty owned his interest, even with the hazard of their lives and fortunes, there being none so shallow, but easily might have seen, that the discharge of the said duty would bring upon themselves and the nation the power of England, (the only power of arms and armies being at that time in the abominable regicides their hands) who did immediately thereafter invade this kingdom.

As to the other member of the tenth article, whereby it is libelled, that the defender, (to obstruct his majesty's purpose, yea in so far as in him lay, and to terrify him therefrom; by his and his complices cruelty executed upon the marquis of Montrose, who as his majesty's commissioner did represent his majesty's person) caused to murder the said Marquis, in anno 1650, in manner, &c.

1. It is no way relevantly libelled, that the defender in general caused to murder him, except it were condescended, quo modo he caused; and if thereby be meant his voicing in parliament, 1649, in the said matter; non reletur, because a vote, act, or sentence of parliament, is no way relevant to infer a crime against any particular member therein, as hath been oft before alledged.

Likewise, 2. The sentence of the forfeiture of the life and estate of the said Marquis, was no decree of the parliament 1649, but of the parliament 1645, which was homologate by several other acts of parliament, excepting the said marquis among other excepted persons, as specially by and by the 28^d act of the parliament 1648.

And yet, 3. The defender did not vote in the business of Montross, as he can prove, if need be, by the members there present 1649. And as to the aggravations of the said murder, the said marquis being his majesty's commissioner for the time; it is no way a relevant circumstance to aggravate the same, except it had been libelled, that the said commission had been shown to the parliament, which nobody can affirm; but on the contrary, the said parliament conceived they had just reason to presume that there could be no such commission for his coming against them at that time; because his majesty, after the murder of his royal father, very graciously had admitted their gracious applications to him.

Like as before Montross's coming at that time to Scotland, and always thereafter, his majesty had a committee of the said parliament, under the name and title of the Committee of Estates of his majesty's kingdom of Scotland.

As to the defender, his alledged keeping correspondency with Cromwell in the year 1650, as the same is irrelevantly libelled, no deeds nor acts of correspondency being condescended on; so there was never any such thing. And there was one named Hamilton who vented this untruth, hanged at Sterling, and at his death did declare, that the same was a most unjust calumny; and it is not to be believed that at that time he would have charged his soul with a lye; and in law, the words of a dying man are oraculously believed.

As to the act of the West Kirk, the defender (noways acknowledging the relevancy of the said article, as it is libelled) was so free from having the least accession to the said act or declaration; that so soon as he got knowledge thereof, to evidence his fidelity to his majesty, it is offered to be proved by witnesses (for their loyalty above all exception), that when the first news came, that the commissioners were about the drawing of the said act, the defender gave advice to his majesty, to draw a fair declaration, and to go such a length, as in freedom he could, that thereby he might prevent the said act, and obviate the pressing thereof. But as for the other that was pressed, he was altogether against the same, and dealt with the minister who came from the commissioners of the kirk, to forbear pressing his majesty therewith; which also, if need were, might be proved.

As to the eleventh article, and subsequent articles, because the same are for deeds of compliance after the usurpers had prevailed and were in possession; before the defender make particular answer, it is necessary to premise in general, that it being notoriously known to the world (to the eternal honour of this kingdom) as for that damnable usurpation of Oliver, not only we were not active in establishing the same, but according to our bound allegiance to our sovereign, were to the utmost possibility of our power in arms under his majesty; and otherways active against him, and in opposition thereto, many lost their estates, many their lives, and all of us our liberties: and when we could do no more, being oppressed by the force of the said usurper, (as a chaste forced virgin) we cried to God and man, attesting heaven and earth against usurpers, (even when their bloody swords were at our throats) he and his army, amongst many other execrable mischiefs, were also guilty of this usurpation. We have suffered, and been only passive under that irresistible force. And as this was the condition of the kingdom, so specially the defender, who as he had been most active and instrumental in his majesty's home-bringing, (which was the only ground of the quarrel, and for which he was looked upon by them as one of their capital enemies) even so after it pleased God for our exercise and punishment, to suffer their power to prevail over all his majesty's forces and over this kingdom, such aversion had the defender, even so much as to live under their power; much less to comply actively with them; that after Worcester fight the defender offered to Mr. David Dick, if he could get his company, or the company of any other honest minister, that he would never capitulate with any Englishman, so long as he could subsist in any part of Scotland, either in his lands, or isles thereupon. It is humbly craved that Mr. David Dick may be examined. Neither did the defender ever capitulate with them, in August 1652; haring before that, endeavoured all that in him lay, to have persuaded those of Athol, Monteith, and others, his neighbours in the Highlands to have concurred with him, that they might have jointly made some probable force, for resisting the over-spreading power of the usurper; but all in vain. Likewise, long before that time, the whole forces and strength of the kingdom were surrendered, yea, the whole kingdom, by their deputies and representatives, who met at Dalkeith, with the commissioners of the parliament of England, so called, was forced to submit to their power, and accept the tender of the union of this nation with England, proffered by them. Neither did he at the said time, in August 1652, voluntarily come in, and capitulate with the said English; but was surprised, (several regiments of their forces, horse and foot, having suddenly come about his house, where he was for the time lying deadly sick,) as can be testified by Dr. Cunningham, who was with him for the time, and is humbly craved to be examined thereon. As also, not withstanding the said surprisal, and the defender's condition, though they threatened, notwithstanding his sickness, to carry him away prisoner, yet all their threatening could not prevail with him, but he did absolutely refuse to subscribe the articles first offered, which contained the tender of the union, and an obligation upon his part to promote the same, and the government as then established, and to live peaceably; yea, such jealousy had they of the defender, that by his capitulation he was prisoner upon demand. Neither during all the time of their power over this kingdom, had he ever any favour of the said English, but was always looked upon by them with a most jealous eye. And for evidencing hereof, the defender humbly craves, that there be commission granted for examining of lieutenant-colonel Utter, (anent what was deposed by Macnaughtan, and several others) viz. of the defender's small affection to the English, or any other authority but the king's. Likewise, it is notorious how unjustly he was persecuted before the Exchequer here for the time, for payment of 4000*l.* sterling, alledged to be due for by-gone feu-duties. This being the defender's true case, it is hoped that the honourable court of parliament will take consideration how the defender stood out as long as he could, till he was prisoner; and will have a different consideration of subjects acting under the lawful magistrate in exercise of his authority by himself, or others lawfully constituted by him; and of the actions under cruel usurpation and tyranny, the lawful magistrate being forced, for his own safety, to abandon his dominions and people to the lust and oppression of the unjust usurper (who was master not only of their fortunes and persons, but their lives and all that was dear to them;) and had for a long time detained the possession of his unjust usurpation, and devoured the lawful magistrate. Which case is not only differenced by all who write on that subject, but also Coke in the third part of the Institutes of the laws of England, cap. 10, anent treason, in expounding the statute of the 25 Ed. 3, upon the words of the statute le Roy, puts such a weight upon the king's being in possession, or one of the same, that he expressly affirms, the statute is to be understood of a king regnant, and in possession of the crown and kingdom; as also, that in such cases, a favourable consideration is to be had of the actions of a subject, who was particularly noticed, and jealously looked upon by the usurper, for his affection to the lawful magistrate and his government. All which being remitted to the commissioner his grace, and the honourable parliament their consideration, he now comes to answer to the eleventh article: against which eleventh article, and all the members thereof, as libelled, it is alledged, the said article is general, not condescending on the day or month, nor on the particular year of God, of the committing of the deeds therein libelled, but only alternative in anno 1653, or 1654, and therefore (as has been oft before alledged) the same is inept, and there can be no process thereon. 2. It is not condescended on, nor cleared, which of the acts of parliament libelled on in the proposition, this article, and several members thereof, are subsumed; and therefore it is obscure and general, and in that incertitude the defender has reason to deny, that it can be subsumed on any of the said acts to infer the said crime and pain.

As to that which is first libelled in this article, That the defender did not rise in arms with the commissioner his grace, and the earl of Glencairn, who were commissioned by his majesty: the defender repeats the two exceptions aforesaid, against the whole article, being confident this cannot be subsumed on none of the acts libelled on. And further alledges, that it is not relevantly libelled, to infer (vel minimam culpam) against the defender, far less so high a crime, except it were libelled, that your lordship's commission had been shewed him, and he required, which was never done. And herein he may refer himself to the commissioner his grace's declaration; and if his grace does not remember, that the defender sent him word, shewing his desire to have met with his grace, and to have spoke with him about the business; but had never the honour to have his grace's answer or appointment.

2. For the further clearing, that his not joining, except he had been required, is no crime, it is evident from the fourth act of the first parliament Jac. 1. that those only are punishable, who do not assist the king's host, being required thereto. And Craig, page 366, says, that because the king has so many vassals, they are not obliged, nor cannot be punished; except the particular pain to be inflicted upon the away-stayer, be particularly expressed in the edict, by which they are commanded to appear. And page 365, he says, that those who come not, being warned by an edict, shall be punished, and page 370, he says, that the vassals should not be obliged to appear at any such services, except they be desired; which commands shall be proved by his peers. These edicts were particularly required by the fundamental law, and were called 'beri bona,' which is defined by Cujas, to be the calling and citation of the army, and is lib. 3. cap. 10. quart. leg. franc. to be the punishment of him who comes not to the king's host when he is called: and this assertion is clearly proved from Rague, in his treatise de Jur. Reg. pag. 53. Likewise by the said act of the first parliament of king James I. it is expressly ordained, that those who disobey to defend the king against notorious rebels shall be challenged:

1. If they be required by the king, as is said.

2. And except they have for themselves reasonable excuses. But sure it is, the defender not only was never required, as has been alledged, but there were even pregnant reasons, as he humbly conceives, the which seemed very probable at that time. Albeit it be the duty of all his majesty's subjects, to rise for his majesty's interest, in opposition to usurpers; yet it was not seasonable, as affairs then stood, till either they had been defeated by sea in the engagement, that they then had with Holland, (whereby both the forces might have been diverted, and the transportation of victuals and ammunition from England, Ireland, and the parts of Scotland under their command, and their army in Scotland, might have been intercluded;) or that Spain and France had concluded that peace, whereof there was then several reports: and thereupon his majesty's subjects in Scotland might have had hopes of some probable assistance in the undertakings in his majesty's service; or that division, and, in consequence, confusion, had fallen out in the English army among themselves; whereof there seemed to be but little hope, so long as the appearance for his majesty should meet them as against a common enemy, as it was. Likas it would be thought it should have no other effect: and as in effect the event proved, that that army never divided till they had no common enemy, against whom mutual preservation doth necessitate a mutual concurrence, but all at amity one with another. And albeit a particular command had not been absolutely necessary, (if his majesty had been there in person) yet in a juncture of time, wherein such a war was improbable for many state reasons (which induces the defender to believe, that there was no commission granted at that time), which presumptions 'excusant à dolo;' and without dolo (as has been said formerly) there can be no crime. And though he had been required, yet could not have been punished for his not obeying, seeing in effect he was the enemies prisoner upon demand.

But this is conceived only to be libelled as an aggravation of what followed, which is, That he joined in open hostility with the usurper's forces, especially with the colonels Overton and Twisleton, at the least Cobbet and Twisleton, at the least Twisleton, when he was in the highlands, and in opposition to the said earls.

It is answered, 1. This member is general, not condescending upon the particular deeds of hostility, and therefore inept; for criminal libelling ought to be most clear, as is affirmed by Damhaud, cap. 30. prax. coron. num. 4. and should contain all the qualities of the crime alledged committed. And as to the alternative, that he joined with one or other of them, it is most lax and obscure, and therefore in that also this dittay is inept. And for the alternative added (at the least he gave counsel) non relevat (because general), except the counsel were condescended on, and that it were such as might fall under the acts libelled on. and the most that can be alledged, if the time were condescended on of his alledged joining, is, that he was in company (it may be) with Twisleton; and if it was, he was only going along with him to general Monk (being sent for by him, and that when the earl of Glencairn was under treaty with him; if not after the treaty was concluded, which he conceives will not be denied), and the defender being their prisoner upon demand, by his capitalation with major-general Dean.

It is alledged first, that a prisoner should go in company (being commanded) with, and to those whose prisoners he is, is nothing like a crime.

2. Though that had not been, yet he alledges in answer to that member of the alternative, anent his furnishing of several pieces of great cannon to Alured, governor of Air, viz. That the defender and all that was his, or in his possession, being under the absolute power of the usurper, they might command him to go, or call him where they would, with whom to go along, or to bring whatever he had to them, had it been on his back, had he been able to carry it: and that cannot be imputed to him for any crime (otherwise who should be innocent) when subdued; must they not give to their enemy of their goods, whatever he will have? and who in Scotland should be innocent: behoved not all to bring them; that is, in effect did they not take what they pleased? but as for voluntary going, or joining in action with Twisleton, or any of the others named in their service, the defender absolutely denies the same.

Item, For his taking and relieving prisoners, non relevat, except the prisoner was specially condescended on: specially relieving of prisoners is not relevant to infer any crime, but on the contrary is a good office to the persons and parties; except it is libelled that he, as an officer under the English service, took and relieved prisoners, which can never be made appear, whatever the same might import. But the truth is, the defender meddled with no such things; and the defender shall truly relate the point of fact which he conceives hereby to be meant, which is as follows: The defender hearing that his isle and county of Roisnaith was pillaged, and going up the river Clyde, the boat wherein he was being followed by another boat: and the defender having asked what they were? they alledged they did belong to the earl of Glencairn, but could shew no warrant; and thereupon the defender having some suspicion that they were rather robbers, than soldiers belonging to the earl; and fearing that general Monk, whom the defender was then going to, and whom he had never seen till that time, might get notice thereof, and make use of the same as a snare; the defender advised them to secure their money and arms in the hands of one of his servants, upon assurance that the same should be delivered to them, after he should be certified what they were; and thereafter recommend them (fearing to incur the danger of a private prison) to the garrison of Dumbarton, not under the notion of soldiers under the earl of Glencairn, but as common delinquents for injury done to the country. And at his return after a few days (being tender that they should incur no danger) procured their release, and their names were never enrolled as prisoners to be exchanged; and according to his promise, he caused to be re-delivered their money and arms.

As to the following member of that article, viz. That the defender took pay from the usurpers, for a company of Scots under them, and in their service.

Adhering to the several exceptions against the relevancy of the propositions of the dittay, and exceptions against this whole article, in the beginning of the answer thereto; specially that it is not condescended, under which of the acts libelled on this member is subsumed, till which be done, the defender has reason to deny that it falls under any of them. Neither is it relevantly libelled, to infer any crime, unless it had been libelled, that the defender, having commission for that pretended company for the English service at that time, had levied that company, or enrolled their names as a formed company, under the English and their regiments, and engaged them to the commonwealth and their service; because these are required in a soldier in any service.

1. That he be relatus in numeros, that is to say, enrolled, per lex eod. 42. Y. de Test. milit.

2. Ut prestat sacramentum, that is, that they gave the oath, ex milit. 11. F. eod. et Veget. 2. c. 6. or that the defender had employed them in the English military service, or in execution of their orders, all which the defender absolutely denies; they never having been enrolled, given any oath or engagement, or employed in their service, as is said.

But on the contrary, and the truth is, there used to be in the said shire, and all other places in the Highlands in broken times, watches to keep off depredations, masterful reifs, and other oppressions amongst the country people themselves and their neighbours in such times. And accordingly, in the year of God, 1653, or thereabout, the shire of Argyle not being able to entertain their watch, and pay cess also, (not being as yet well planted after the burning) general Monk was prevailed with, to help to entertain the said watch (like as at the same time, also several other shires bordering upon the Highlands, as Inverness, Perthshire, Aberdeenshire, Sterling, Dumbarton, all of them had watches at the said times, and allowance therefore from general Monk), who within two months did withdraw the said allowance from the said watch of Argyleshire, because they refused to engage against those that were then in the hills, under the defender's son and others, whom the said general Monk also alledged they favoured; and thereupon withdrew his help and allowance for the said watch, and spake of the defender what his grace pleased.

And to evince that this was nothing but a watch, the men were not in a formed company, but several gentlemen in the shire had the ordering of several numbers of them at convenient and needful places of the shire, with proportionable entertainment, and without subordination as ordinary soldiers; all which is notorious, and, if need be, the defender offers to prove. And the duke of Albemarle it is hoped will remember, how much offended he was, that the defender would not engage the said watch against the said lord Lorne and his parties; and what prejudice he did still entertain against the defender upon the said public account. As also colonel Robert Lilburn, when the lord Lorne and Kenmure went to Kentyre in the year 1653, the said Lilburn, immediately upon the notice thereof, having come with a considerable party of the English army to Dumbarton; and sent to the defender to meet him, and to go along with him in Argyle towards Kentyre; if the said colonel does not know and perfectly remember, that the defender shunned the meeting, and would not go; whereupon he returned back with the forces, after he was at the length of Lochlomond; whereupon the defender humbly craves that he may be urged to declare. As also that the countess of Balcarras may be examined, if the defender did not assist her and her husband, in their passage through Argyleshire, as they were going to a meeting at Finlarrig for the business in the hills, in the year 1653. Neither can it be alledged, that the defender or any of his people did the least prejudice to any person or party that professed to be for his majesty's service; albeit if he had been so disposed, he had, and might have had several opportunities to have done the same.

As for the member following, That the defender called the actings of his majesty's forces against the Usurper, rebellion:

It is most general, neither condescending on time nor place, and therefore irrelevant and inept; but when condescended on, he nothing doubts, but that it shall appear he spake no such things, nor had he ever any such construction thereof.

As to the last deed in the said article, That the defender, A. D. 1654, took upon him power to bring off such as were in that service, and to give remissions therefore, and particularly to John Mackdowgall:

It is general, neither condescended on time nor person brought off, and therefore inept and irrelevant. And if it be meant only of the person named, viz. John Mackdowgall of Dumolich; it will never be made out that he was in that service, when the Commissioner his grace and the earl of Glencairn were in the field; nor that there ever was a remission granted by the defender to him, or any other, in relation to that service.

As to the twelfth article and first member thereof, anent the defender's countenancing and assisting, by his personal presence, the tyrannical and treasonable Proclamation of Richard the Usurper and Protector of his majesty's dominions, at the Market-Cross of Edinburgh and Dumbarton:

The defender is so notoriously innocent of this member of the article, that he might with much confidence (in place of all other defence) simply deny it. But he will do no more for defence and clearing of his innocency, than where he is to propound his defence of alibi, that there month and day must be condescended on, whereof none is condescended on in this member of the article; and till this be condescended on, it is inept, and the defender ought to be assoilzied therefrom. But the days of the said Proclamation at Edinburgh and Dumbarton being condescended on; the defender offers him to prove, that during these days he was alibi, and neither at the city of Edinburgh nor Dumbarton all these days.

As to the second member, anent the defender's procuring himself elected a commissioner for the shire of Aberdeen; and accepting a Commission from them, to Richard's pretended parliament, and sitting and voting therein as a member of his pretended house of commons:

That the English Usurpation was one of the most horrid usurpations that ever has been in Europe, against all divine and human law, against the most uncontroverted right of the most illustrious of kings, our dread sovereign, and his most royal father of eternal, glorious memory, which none of common sense or honesty will controvert. Next, the said Usurpers having nothing but an unparalleled, unjust detention of that power, whereunto no manner of way they had the least right to, or any title whatsoever; but in place of a title, armed violence and force: the only mean, for title they had none, whereby they both de facto attained, and violently detained that possession unjustly, of that power whereof the only right was, and possession ought to have been our dread sovereign's: Whosoever by arms, counsel, or otherways, aided or abetted that armed force, in establishing de facto, of the power in the persons of the monsters of men, and so in setting up of that abominable usurpation; that he is guilty of the highest treason, is heartily acknowledged. But the Usurpers having treasonably thrust their and our sovereign, his majesty, from all possession of his just right, and having taken upon them the supreme power; and being possessed, though most unjustly, yet most peaceably therein, and keeping the same by force, as they had taken it; the case then became most singular, as to what the poor oppressed subjects under their force might do, hoc rerum status posito, in this state of affairs, wherein the Usurper had treasonably put them. Lucklame, a most acute Juris Consult. Eccllog. 6, membran. in l. 3, de Officiis prætorum, observes learnedly, that 'Distinctio fieri debet inter personam ejus qui magistratum gerit (cum tamen jus ad magistratum non habeat) et ipsum magistratum quem gesserit; persona enim ejus est privata, hic publicus; et in publicis non tanta personæ quam utilitatis hic publicæ habenda est ratio, ut enim tutela,' ait Cicer., p. 1. Offic. 'Sic procurato reipub. ad ætatem eorum qui commissi sunt, non ad eorum quibus commissæ gerenda est, et sapientes definiunt nihil aliud esse imperium nisi curæ rei alienæ,' ut ait Ammianus Marcellinus lib. 29, that is, ipius reipub. So Lucklame distinguishes betwixt the person of him who unjustly de facto attains the magistracy (whose person is still but in effect private, and in the case of usurpation, a traitor), and the magistracy which he carries, which is public.

Likewise, it should be distinguished betwixt acts concurring with the usurper, transferring de facto in his person the power he usurps, (which are treasonable against the lawful sovereign); and acts, whereby the oppressed subjects make use of the power now usurped; wherein the utility, not of the usurper, but of the subjects, is respected, as Lucklame observes, ubi sup. And then Grotius, lib. 1. de Jure belli et pacis, cap. 4, num. 15, speaking 'de invasore imperii,' of an unjust invader, while his possession remains unjust, says, the act of power is binding for the good of the commonwealth; and because it is probable the lawful governor's will is, rather the usurper's command should be obeyed, or take effect, than that laws and judgments should fall in confusion in their terms; 'Restat ut de invasore imperii videamus nunc postquam longa possessione vel pacto jus nactus est, sed quoadiu durat in justam possidendam causam, et quidem dum possidet actus imperii quos exercet vim habere possunt obligandi, non ex ipsius jure, quod nullum sed ex eo quod omnino probabile sit, cum qui jus imperandi habet sive est Populus ipse, sive rex, sive Senatus, se male interim rata esse quæ imperat quam legibus sub tali summam induci confusionem.' And Lessius, who is one of the authors Grotius cites upon the place, says, in the place cited, viz. Lib. 2, de Justitia et Jure, cap. 29, dub. 9, P. 37. That 'tyranni usurpatione potestatis mandatis obtemperandum propter bonum commune;' which is, that the tyrant and usurper is to be obeyed, even from the law of nature, for the public good, in such a state of affairs; and adds 'alioque omnia essent plena latrocinii et furtis;' that is, that all would be full of robberies, thefts and confusion, in that state of affairs, because of the usurper's force the use of no other government can be had. So that the necessity of the benefit of government for the good of the subjects or common-wealth, especially in what relates ad reipublicæ statum, in things necessary for the standing of the commonwealth, or to evite the ruin thereof; and the interpretative and presumed consent thereupon of the prince, who has the right to the authority which the usurper has usurped, but is excluded by the usurper from benefiting the subjects by it himself for the time, are two grounds whereupon the making use of the power now in the hands of the usurper is founded, as is said.

Whereupon it is subsumed, that in our case the invader and usurper Oliver having violently taken upon him the power, after he had put his and our sovereign from the possession thereof, oppressed by his armed force this nation, and amongst others the defender; and Oliver having kept the possession all his time, and Richard continuing same, the benefit of that power, which now he had usurped, and whereof he was in possession, was, as always it is, so necessary for the standing of the common-wealth, that without it men become but as fish in the sea, the lesser a prey to the oppression of the great: but especially, the said Richard having called a pretended parliament, and commanded the shires to send commissioners thereto. Meetings and representatives of the nation, as they are of great use at any time, for treating common affairs of common consent, so transcendently at that time, for moderating the arbitrary tyranny of a usurper; and that not being able to expugn his force, they might by strength of common-counsel overcome and persuade his reason to things absolutely necessary for the subsistence, at least for the preventing the ruin of the whole body of the kingdom, and of his majesty's lieges therein: as was the stopping that miserable union, which the defender knew that it would be, as it had been before, at even other parliaments, so, at that, strongly attempted, as indeed thereafter it was. Which union was that vortex wherein our religion, our ancient government, monarchic in his majesty's person and family, and the interest of the nobility and our liberties were wholly swallowed up; and under pretext of being united, we were really enslaved to that pretended common-wealth. The easing, if they could not persuade him to the taking off of the maintenance and cess, (which upon Scotland was sixtuple more than the proportion of England, and in itself so heavy, with the excise and other public burthens laid by the usurper on it, that more was exacted in one month, than his Majesty's royal predecessors would have imposed or taken of taxation for an age, so that the country could not subsist under it;) as also taking off some of the forces under which we were kept in bondage, if that at least could have been obtained: The prevention of the alteration and change of our whole laws, which was vehemently threatened, yea, and in general the confounding, and dolo optimo, circumventing and defeating of the counsels, by which the event proved, it was more hopeful and easy to overcome that force, than by might or power. And as the liberty of the election of the members in England, at the time of Richard's parliament, made it serviceable to his Majesty in it, and hopeful to all his Majesty's friends and loyal subjects, so was it no small encouragement to the defender to go there for the same end: And at the meeting in the committee of Scots affairs, and several other meetings, when they were upon the debate of the said union, the defender, on purpose to stop the same, did propose that there could be no union, except it were agreed, that we might enjoy our religion in Scotland without alteration, as it was established by our own laws: and that we might be ruled and judged according to the same laws, and except our cess were proportioned according to theirs in England. All which concerns the defender knew would never be granted, and were indeed so utterly improbable at that time, that the proposition thereof was construed for no other end, than for the end aforesaid, to stop the said union: likewise it did so well succeed as in effect it did obstruct it, as the several persons of quality that were present can, and, if need be, will declare. And at that meeting, the actings and usurpation of the Usurper (Oliver, and the oppressions of that army were of purpose much called in question to make that government and them odious, which accordingly happily followed; and such a breach and confusion amongst them was made, that their affairs thereafter could never come to any consistency, which made considerably and evidently a way to his Majesty's happy and glorious restauration. To all which joining, that the call and command of the armed force has parentis necessitatem, a necessity of obeying lying upon persons under their power; it will follow from what is alledged out of these above-cited authors, founded strongly on reason, the defender in that state of affairs had necessity and some obligation to go and essay what could be done by counsel, wisdom and prudence, since now there was no strength nor might left, effectuate for the standing; at least, to evite the ruin of the country, in the particulars above-mentioned, and others of that nature: at least the defender, as all of us, was under their force; and for eviting of his own and the country's ruin, habuit parentes necessitatem: and by consequence there was no design of treason therein, but by the contrary most loyal intentions, upon good ground of hope, and very probable appearance. And therefore it is hoped the commissioner's grace and estates of parliament will not find this member relevant to infer so high a crime against the defender; hoc maxime attento, that beside public odds, it was even a necessary self-preservative act; for the defender had several other things of personal interest; as that they had ordained him to pay to them about 4000*l.* sterling, for alledged feu-duties, and in time coming so much, that both joined, he was not able to bear, and if need be, it is offered to be proved, and that he was most rigorously persecuted for the same; not only threatening to use real execution against his estate, but also to imprison his person.

For eviting whereof, he was behoved to go at that time to London, and could not have his person secured from arrestments there, but by going in commission: and it is known that his majesty is so gracious, as in not a few, to excuse what they did of that nature, to evite though but their own personal ruin, not imputing it to unfaithfulness in them at such a time; according to whose glorious and imitable example, it is with much confidence hoped, that the commissioner's grace, and honourable estates of parliament, will have a favourable construction of what the defender did in that particular, being necessitated thereto both for public and private interest; without any deceit or fraud, either in the intention or event, there being nothing at that time, while the defender was there, done, for confirming the usurpation, or excluding his majesty's interest.

Likewise it may appear, that it was only the concurrence both of public and private interests and necessities aforesaid, that moved the defender to go at that time; because, though he was desired oft-times before to go, yet he still refused till then: he was one of the last that went to that, being the very last pretended parliament under their power; not till long after that commissioners had gone for the nation for several years, and that all had submitted to their constitutions, and were of necessity made use of as laws for the time.

As for the aggravations of this member, and to the first, that because of the defendant's nobility, he was incapable to have been elected, at least might have refused:

It is answered, that it is notorious, nobility was not then respected at all, nor was any ground of excuse, the meetings to the elections being commanded to all, as heretofore (and so noblemen and others heretofore met promiscuously through all the nation) as is notoriously to all known.

And whereas it is libelled, that he had not his residence within the shire; it ought to be repelled as irrelevant, because it is true, and was known to the usurpers, and their ministers and underlings, that he had land within the said shire, and that considerable. So that he could not decline the said employment without prejudice, the will and lust of the usurper at that time being uncontrollable, and tied to no rules of law or justice.

And whereas it is inferred, that sitting and voting in that pretended parliament, he acknowledged his majesty's power and interest to be in the usurper's person: it is answered,

1. He acknowledged the same no otherwise but as all the kingdom did, to wit, de facto, for de facto the usurper had taken or possessed himself of the power; as his majesty is pleased to speak of it in his proclamation anent commerce with Portugal, in October last, and had obtained the same for a long time: but neither the defender, nor any other loyal subject, ever did, or will acknowledge, that de jure the same belonged to him, or that he had any just right or lawful title thereto: as also Lessius says in the above-written place, speaking of them that seek from usurpers that use of government; whereunto, he says, they are holden in and obliged, once taking on them the government, (though sinfully and unlawfully) they seek the benefit of it, says he, not absolutely, but under a tacit condition, viz. if the usurpers will take upon them the government: 'Petunt' says he, 'sub tacita quadam conditione, si velit, se pro principe gerere;' speaking of the usurper. And that the usurper would not give the use of the power he had taken upon him, but in the way he pleased, was his crime, which he continued during his usurpation. In respect of all which, it is humbly craved, that the defender may be assoilized from the crime of treason, libelled thereupon.

Like as for the defender's further clearing in this particular, it is humbly desired, that certain ministers and others above exception whom the defender shall condescend on, may be examined, if after his return from England, in anno 1658, he did not express with great joy his hopes, that business in England did tend toward his majesty's advantage.

Item, That a commission be directed for examining sir Anthony Ashley Cowper, and several other Englishmen above all exception; how the defender expressed himself in private anent his disaffection to that usurpation, during his being there the time of the said parliament, even though to his very great hazard at that time.

Item, That certain persons, upon whose names also he shall condescend, may be examined, if the defender to their certain knowledge, at the time of sir George Booth's rising (which fell out immediately after the defender's return from the said parliament) did not put himself out of the way, being informed that he was to be secured, and thereupon delayed his journey to Caithness, and so be the readier to have laid hold of any opportunity that should have offered for his majesty's service and restitution; that time being the most probable that ever offered after Worcester fight.

As for the precept of twelve thousand pound sterling, which is alledged the defender got from the usurpers;

It is answered, the defender did indeed obtain a precept, but not as a reward of any service (which he never did, nor desired to deserve from them), but for what they had wrongfully intromitted with, of the half of the excise of wine and strong waters, whereunto the defender had right by act of parliament, before they had any power in Scotland.

And as to the thirteenth article, first, for the whole article, it is not consented on what act of parliament the same, consisting of three different members, is subsumed; and till it be condescended on, there can be no process thereupon.

And as to the first member thereof, anent the words alledged spoken at Innerary:

1. No time is condescended on, and therefore the libel in that part is inept for the reasons afore-mentioned, for which a criminal dittay ought to be special in the time, at least year and month.

2. Whereas it is libelled, he rebuked the ministers for praying for the king, in the words libelled, or some such like words; non relevat as to the ministers, except the persons were condescended on, whom he rebuked.

3. Non relevat, some such-like words; some such-like being most general, except the words were particularly libelled, alledged to be such-like whereby the defender might advise his defences, and alledge why they were not such-like, as he would, if any words ever he spoke were condescended on; for the truth is, he never spoke any such words; and was so far from rebuking any for praying for the king's majesty, that after the defeat at Worcester (which is the general time libelled, wherein he should have rebuked the ministers for praying for the king), he himself caused continual praying for his majesty both in his parish-church and family, yea even in presence and audience of the English when they came there, though it was to his great hazard so to do.

As to the second member anent the words libelled and alledged to have been spoken by the defender at London, that he wondered how the people should be so mad as to call home a family whom God had rejected, and would never restore; or some such-like words:

First, this is also general; neither time, that is, year nor month, nor particular place, condescended on.

Secondly, It is libelled, that it was in the presence of persons of quality, they ought to be condescended on.

Thirdly, In so far as it is libelled the defender said, the people were mad to call home his majesty; it is general and inept, not condescending what people, and what was the occasion; if there was any motion made of calling home the king, whereupon that should have been spoken, and among whom it was. And Damhaud, cap. 50, prax. com. num. 4, and others, say, a criminal dittay should be most clear, and contain 'omnes criminis patrati qualitates,' lib. 30, F. de accus. and Bart. And others, ibid. That it should contain all the qualities of crimes alledged to be committed.

Fourthly, some such-like words non relevat, except the words were specially condescended on: which if they were, the defender would alledge and evince they were no-wise such-like: for the truth is, he never spake any such words, but on the contrary did all that he could there to make way for his majesty's happy restoration; as has been at length cleared before.

And was a very suspected person, in so far as in the year one thousand six hundred fifty-seven, Oliver was so jealous of the defender, that he commanded him to stay at London, and not to return to Scotland, till his affairs, as he was pleased to express, were settled. So that not without great difficulty, by the mediation of the lord Droughil and Charles Fleetwood, he obtained his liberty: Whereupon the defender desires the said Charles Fleetwood may be examined, which he also desired at London. And not only was suspected, as odious to the English for his known affection therunto, as is notorious, and has also before been expressed,

As to the third member of the said article, anent the alledged speech in Mastertonne's;

1. Neither the year nor month condescended on, and therefore general as to the time, and inept. 2. As to the first member thereof, that he would own anything he had done;

First, it is exceedingly general, and not relevant; except what were the things he had owned were specially condescended, and what time, year and month: it is an unparalleled generality, and therefore till made special, no process thereupon.

Secondly, It can import nothing in common sense, wherein to own a thing is to acknowledge it for a man's own; but what he had acknowledged to be his own, whether word or deed, he would yet acknowledge; which is an expression of ingenuity, and no crime; And this being the received sense of owning, the word cannot be strained to any other sense; or if occasion should be taken so to do: and that another sense could be put on that expression, yet being 'more interpretatio capienda est,' the most usual interpretation is to be taken, Perd. ea quæ S. I. 1. F. de reg. juris, as being both justest and safest by that law. And in ambiguous speeches, or such as may receive two senses, every man is the best expounder of his own mind, and his interpretation ought to be admitted, per leg. in ambiguis F. de reg. juris, and other laws. But the sense aforesaid is so plain, that there is no place for caption.

As to what follows in the said member, That if what he had owned or done were to do he would do it again, albeit he had known that all that has been would have come.

1. As to what is alledged against the first part of this member, That this is exceedingly general as to the time and month he should have spoken it on.

2. As to what the things are that he would do if they were to be done, and that time the things were done, or owned to be done, or that the saying that he would do if they were to do, is a crime.

3. What were those things in particular that are understood, or may be subsumed under the general of all things that have come to pass; whereupon it may be inferred, that that were a crime for the defender to have said, that notwithstanding of them he would do what he had done, if that were to do; and therefore the libel in this part of the member is also general, obscure and inept. And to evince the ineptitude of this generality, suppose the defender were thus indicted; You are indicted for all that you have done the times by-gone, preceding your being in James Mastertonne's house, erection against his estate, but also to imprison his person.

For eviling whereof, he was behoved to go at that time to London, and could not have his person secured from arrestments there, but by going in commission : and it is known that his majesty is so gracious, as in not a few, to excuse what they did of that nature, to evite though but their own personal ruin, not imputing it to unfaithfulness in them at such a time ; according to whose glorious and imitable example, it is with much confidence hoped, that the commissioner's grace, and honourable estates of parliament, will have a favourable construction of what the defender did in that particular, being necessitated thereto both for public and private interest ; without any deceit or fraud, either in the intention or event, there being nothing at that time, while the defender was there, done, for confirming the usurpation, or excluding his majesty's interest.

As for the aggravations of this member, and to the first, that because of the defendant's no-belonged to him, or that he had any just or lawful title thereto : as also Lessius says, the above-written place, speaking of those that seek from usurpers that use of government ; whereunto, he says, they are holden, and obliged, once taking on them the government, (though sinfully and unlawfully) do seek the benefit of it, says he, not also do but under a tacit condition, viz. if the usurper will take upon them the government : ' Petrus,' says he, ' sub tacita quadam conditione, ut se pro principe gerere ;' speaking of a usurper. And that the usurper would not use the use of the power he had taken upon him but in the way he pleased, was his crime, while he continued during his usurpation. In respect of all which, it is humbly craved, that the defender may be absolved from the crime of treason, libelled thereupon.

Like as for the defender's further clearing in this particular, it is humbly desired, that certain ministers and others above excepted, whom the defender shall commend on, may be examined, if after his return from England in anno 1658, he did not express with great joy his hopes, that business in England should tend toward his majesty's advantage.

Item, That a commission be directed for examining sir Anthony Ashley Cowper, and several other Englishmen above all excepted, how the defender expressed himself in private about his disaffection to that usurpation, during his being there the time of the said parliament, even though to his very great hazard at that time.

1. No time is condescended on, and therefore the libel in that part is inept for the reasons afore-mentioned, for which a criminal dittay ought to be special in the time, at least year and month.

2. Whereas it is libelled, he rebuked the ministers for praying for the king, in the words libelled, or some such like words; non relevat as to the ministers, except the persons were condescended on, whom he rebuked.

3. Non relevat, some such-like words; some such-like being most general, except the words were particularly libelled, alledged to be such-like whereby the defender might advise his defences, and alledge why they were not such-like, as he would, if any words ever he spoke were condescended on; for the truth is, he never spoke any such words; and was so far from rebuking any for praying for the king's majesty, that after the defeat at Worcester (which is the general time libelled, wherein he should have rebuked the ministers for praying for the king), he himself caused continual praying for his majesty both in his parish-church and family, yea even in presence and audience of the English when they came there, though it was to his great hazard so to do.

As to the second member ament the words libelled and alledged to have been spoken by the defender at London, that he wondered how the people should be so mad as to call home a family whom God had rejected, and would never restore; or some such-like words:

First, this is also general; neither time, that is, year nor month, nor particular place, condescended on.

Secondly, It is libelled, that it was in the presence of persons of quality, they ought to be condescended on.

Thirdly, In so far as it is libelled the defender said, the people were mad to call home his majesty; it is general and inept, not condescending what people, and what was the occasion; if there was any motion made of calling home the king, whereupon that should have been spoken, and among whom it was. And Damhuid, cap. 30, prax. com. num. 4, and others, say, a criminal dittay should be most clear, and contain 'omnes criminis patrati qualitates,' lib. 30, F. de accus. and Bart. And others, ibid. That it should contain all the qualities of crimes alledged to be committed.

Fourthly, some such-like words non relevat, except the words were specially condescended on: which if they were, the defender would alledge and evince they were no-wise such-like: for the truth is, he never spake any such words, but on the contrary did all that he could there to make way for his majesty's happy restoration; as has been at length cleared before.

And was a very suspected person, in so far as in the year one thousand six hundred fifty-seven, Oliver was so jealous of the defender, that he commanded him to stay at London, and not to return to Scotland, till his affairs, as he was pleased to express, were settled. So that not without great difficulty, by the mediation of the lord Broughil and Charles Fleetwood, he obtained his liberty: Whereupon the defender desires the said Charles Fleetwood may be examined, which he also desired at London. And not only was suspected, as odious to the English for his known affection thereunto, as is notorious, and has also before been expressed.

As to the third member of the said article, ament the alledged speech in Mastertonne's;

1. Neither the year nor month condescended on, and therefore general as to the time, and inept. 2. As to the first member thereof, that he would own any thing he had done;

First, it is exceedingly general, and not relevant; except what were the things he had owned were specially condescended, and what time, year and month: it is an unparalleled generality, and therefore till made special, no process thereupon.

Secondly, It can import nothing in common sense, wherein to own a thing is to acknowledge it for a man's own; but what he had acknowledged to be his own, whether word or deed, he would yet acknowledge; which is an expression of ingenuity, and no crime; And this being the received sense of owning, the word cannot be strained to any other sense; or if occasion should be taken so to do: and that another sense could be put on that expression, yet being 'more interpretatio capienda est,' the most usual interpretation is to be taken, Perd. ea quæ S. I. 1. F. de reg. juris, as being both justest and safest by that law. And in ambiguous speeches, or such as may receive two senses, every man is the best expounder of his own mind, and his interpretation ought to be admitted, per leg. in ambiguis F. de reg. juris, and other laws. But the sense aforesaid is so plain, that there is no place for caption.

As to what follows in the said member, That if what he had owned or done were to do he would do it again, albeit he had known that all that had been would have come.

1. As to what is alledged against the first part of this member, That this is exceedingly general as to the time and month he should have spoken it on.

2. As to what the things are that he would do if they were to be done, and that time the things were done, or owned to be done, or that the saying that he would do if they were to do, is a crime.

3. What were those things in particular that are understood, or may be subsumed under the general of all things that have come to pass; whereupon it may be inferred, that that were a crime for the defender to have said, that notwithstanding of them he would do what he had done, if that were to do; and therefore the libel in this part of the member is also general, obscure and inept. And to evince the ineptitude of this generality, suppose the defender were thus indicted; You are indicted for all that you have done the times by-gone, preceding your being in James Mastertonne's house, execution against his estate, but also to imprison his person.

For eviling whereof, he was behoved to go at that time to London, and could not have his person secured from arrestments there, but by going in commission : and it is known that his majesty is so gracious, as in not a few, to excuse what they did of that nature, to evite though but their own personal ruin, not imputing it to unfaithfulness in them at such a time ; according to whose glorious and imitable example, it is with much confidence hoped, that the commissioner's grace, and honourable estates of parliament, will have a favourable construction of what the defender did in that particular, being necessitated thereto both for public and private interest ; without any deceit or fraud, either in the intention or event, there being nothing at that time, while the defender was there, done, for confirming the usurpation, or excluding his majesty's interest.

Likewise it may appear, that it was only the concurrence both of public and private interests and necessities aforesaid, that moved the defender to go at that time ; because, though he was desired oft-times before to go, yet he still refused till then : he was one of the last that went to that, being the very last pretended parliament under their power ; not till long after that commissioners had gone for the nation for several years, and that all had submitted to their constitutions, and were of necessity made use of as laws for the time.

As for the aggravations of this member, and to the first, that because of the defendant's nobility, he was incapable to have been elected, at least might have refused :

It is answered, that it is notorious, nobility was not then respected at all, nor was any ground of excuse, the meetings to the elections being commanded to all, as heretofore (and so noblemen and others heretofore met promiscuously through all the nation) as is notoriously to all known.

And whereas it is libelled, that he had not his residence within the shire ; it ought to be repelled as irrelevant, because it is true, and was known to the usurpers, and their ministers and underlings, that he had land within the said shire, and that considerable. So that he could not decline the said employment without prejudice, the will and lust of the usurper at that time being uncontrollable, and tied to no rules of law or justice.

And whereas it is inferred, that sitting and voting in that pretended parliament, he acknowledged his majesty's power and interest to be in the usurper's person : it is answered,

1. He acknowledged the same no otherwise but as all the kingdom did, to wit, de facto, for de facto the usurper had taken or possessed himself of the power ; as his majesty is pleased to speak of it in his proclamation anent commerce with Portugal, in October last, and had obtained the same for a long time : but neither the defender, nor any other loyal subject, ever did, or will acknowledge, that de jure the same belonged to him, or that he had any just right or lawful title thereto : as also Lessius says in the above-written place, speaking of them that seek from usurpers that use of government ; whereunto, he says, they are holden in and obliged, once taking on them the government, (though sinfully and unlawfully) they seek the benefit of it, says he, not absolutely, but under a tacit condition, viz. if the usurpers will take upon them the government : 'Petunt' says he, 'sub tacita quadam conditione, si velit, se pro principe gerere ;' speaking of the usurper. And that the usurper would not give the use of the power he had taken upon him, but in the way he pleased, was his crime, which he continued during his usurpation. In respect of all which, it is humbly craved, that the defender may be assoilzied from the crime of treason, libelled thereupon.

Like as for the defender's further clearing in this particular, it is humbly desired, that certain ministers and others above exception whom the defender shall condescend on, may be examined, if after his return from England, in anno 1658, he did not express with great joy his hopes, that business in England did tend toward his majesty's advantage.

Item, That a commission be directed for examining sir Anthony Ashley Cowper, and several other Englishmen above all exception ; how the defender expressed himself in private anent his dissatisfaction to that usurpation, during his being there the time of the said parliament, even though to his very great hazard at that time.

Item, That certain persons, upon whose names also he shall condescend, may be examined, if the defender to their certain knowledge, at the time of sir George Booth's rising (which fell out immediately after the defender's return from the said parliament) did not put himself out of the way, being informed that he was to be secured, and thereupon delayed his journey to Caithness, and so be the readier to have laid hold of any opportunity that should have offered for his majesty's service and restitution ; that time being the most probable that ever offered after Worcester fight.

As for the precept of twelve thousand pound sterling, which is alledged the defender got from the usurpers ;

It is answered, the defender did indeed obtain a precept, but not as a reward of any service (which he never did, nor desired to deserve from them), but for what they had wrongfully intromitted with, of the half of the excise of wine and strong waters, whereunto the defender had right by act of parliament, before they had any power in Scotland.

And as to the thirteenth article, first, for the whole article, it is not consented on what act of parliament the same, consisting of three different members, is subsumed ; and till it be condescended on, there can be no process thereupon.

And as to the first member thereof, anent the words alledged spoken at Innerary :

1. No time is condescended on, and therefore the libel in that part is inept for the reasons afore-mentioned, for which a criminal dittay ought to be special in the time, at least year and month.

2. Whereas it is libelled, he rebuked the ministers for praying for the king, in the words libelled, or some such like words; non relevat as to the ministers, except the persons were condescended on, whom he rebuked.

3. Non relevat, some such-like words; some such-like being most general, except the words were particularly libelled, alledged to be such-like whereby the defender might advise his defences, and alledge why they were not such-like, as he would, if any words ever he spoke were condescended on; for the truth is, he never spoke any such words; and was so far from rebuking any for praying for the king's majesty, that after the defeat at Worcester (which is the general time libelled, wherein he should have rebuked the ministers for praying for the king), he himself caused continual praying for his majesty both in his parish-church and family, yea even in presence and audience of the English when they came there, though it was to his great hazard so to do.

As to the second member anent the words libelled and alledged to have been spoken by the defender at London, that he wondered how the people should be so mad as to call home a family whom God had rejected, and would never restore; or some such-like words:

First, this is also general; neither time, that is, year nor month, nor particular place, condescended on.

Secondly, It is libelled, that it was in the presence of persons of quality, they ought to be condescended on.

Thirdly, In so far as it is libelled the defender said, the people were mad to call home his majesty; it is general and inept, not condescending what people, and what was the occasion; if there was any motion made of calling home the king, whereupon that should have been spoken, and among whom it was. And Damhaud, cap. 30, prax. com. num. 4, and others, say, a criminal dittay should be most clear, and contain 'omnes criminis patrati qualitates,' lib. 30, F. de accus. and Bart. And others, ibid. That it should contain all the qualities of crimes alledged to be committed.

Fourthly, some such-like words non relevat, except the words were specially condescended on: which if they were, the defender would alledge and evince they were no-wise such-like: for the truth is, he never spake any such words, but on the contrary did all that he could there to make way for his majesty's happy restoration; as has been at length cleared before.

And was a very suspected person, in so far as in the year one thousand six hundred fifty-seven, Oliver was so jealous of the defender, that he commanded him to stay at London, and not to return to Scotland, till his affairs, as he was pleased to express, were settled. So that not without great difficulty, by the mediation of the lord Broughil and Charles Fleetwood, he obtained his liberty: Whereupon the defender desires the said Charles Fleetwood may be examined, which he also desired at London. And not only was suspected, as odious to the English for his known affection thereunto, as is notorious, and has also before been expressed.

As to the third member of the said article, anent the alledged speech in Mastertonne's;

1. Neither the year nor month condescended on, and therefore general as to the time, and inept. 2. As to the first member thereof, that he would own any thing he had done;

First, it is exceedingly general, and not relevant; except what were the things he had owned were specially condescended, and what time, year and month: it is an unparalleled generality, and therefore till made special, no process thereupon.

Secondly, It can import nothing in common sense, wherein to own a thing is to acknowledge it for a man's own; but what he had acknowledged to be his own, whether word or deed, he would yet acknowledge; which is an expression of ingenuity, and no crime; And this being the received sense of owning, the word cannot be strained to any other sense; or if occasion should be taken so to do: and that another sense could be put on that expression, yet being 'more interpretatio capienda est,' the most usual interpretation is to be taken, Perd. ea quæ S. I. 1. F. de reg. juris, as being both justest and safest by that law. And in ambiguous speeches, or such as may receive two senses, every man is the best expounder of his own mind, and his interpretation ought to be admitted, per leg. in ambiguis F. de reg. juris, and other laws. But the sense aforesaid is so plain, that there is no place for caption.

As to what follows in the said member, That if what he had owned or done were to do he would do it again, albeit he had known that all that had been would have come.

1. As to what is alledged against the first part of this member, That this is exceedingly general as to the time and month he should have spoken it on.

2. As to what the things are that he would do if they were to be done, and that time the things were done, or owned to be done, or that the saying that he would do if they were to do, is a crime.

3. What were those things in particular that are understood, or may be subsumed under the general of all things that have come to pass; whereupon it may be inferred, that that were a crime for the defender to have said, that notwithstanding of them he would do what he had done, if that were to do; and therefore the libel in this part of the member is also general, obscure and inept. And to evince the ineptitude of this generality, suppose the defender were thus indicted; You are indicted for all that you have done the times by-gone, preceding your being in James Mastertonne's house, after your coming for London; were not that ditray without all controversy irrelevant? Then is it not also irrelevant to be indicted for owning in general that he had owned, or saying in general, that he would do that he had owned during that time, if that were to do again, without any farther particular condescendence?

Like as, 4. There is a very clear, obvious and benign sense these words may have, (if ever he spake, as he truly never remembers that he spake any such words) that if it had been possible that times could have returned, and actions to be done under the same circumstances and representations they had then, it is probable these same might be the defender's actions again, though he had known what had come thereafter, not having connexion with, or necessary dependance on these actings, each does not so much as import his present thoughts or approbation thereof, but is very consistent with a present disapprobation of the same. And is it not ordinary to say, that if such times were as have been, or such motives, or circumstances of actions as have been, that it is very like I would be engaged in them as well as others, or as I have been myself; and yet to say with great consistence I ought not so to do, like as truly it is known, and if need be is offered to be proved, that the defender, on the just contrary, had said to one of Cromwell's counsellors, and to many other famous gentlemen, that things had been done wherein he would have been very far from engaging in, if he had seen what followed, which was the product of the corruption of evil men, that had abused what was well intended, for accomplishing of their wicked ends, and (till they brake forth and could not be resisted) unknown designs. And the defender hopes the sense aforesaid is very clear, and even though it were not so obvious, yet, 'rapienda est occasio quæ benignum præbet responsum,' L. Rapiend. 168, F. de reg. juris: That is, any occasion should be even taken, as it were, though there were some violence done to the words for a benign interpretation; and therefore by all means that interpretation of the words that may seem to infer a crime ought to be eschewed. Or if the word might be drawn to any other sense, yet 'in dubiis benigniora præferenda sunt,' as has been said, in speeches dubious, the most benign sense is to be preferred, pret. seimp. 56, F. de reg. juris; or where words are obscure, or may suffer two senses, the party's own interpretation is to be taken as the best interpreter of his own mind; Per eam quæ ss. 1. F. de reg. juris. And 'odia sunt restringenda, favores ampliandi;' what is odious, (as that which may infer a crime against any) should be restricted, and favour amplified; and in general, the judge is always to be more inclined to absolve than condemn, and so consequently take the sense that may absolve, rather than that which may condemn, Leg. Corinnus F. de oblig. et 47, act.

5. The Doctors say, that 'voluntas et propositum delinquentis distinguunt facinora per

'legem expressam, leg. qui in jur. 53. F. de furtis in præ. that is, the will and purpose of him that commits a crime, distinguisheth it. but 'velleitas,' or 'voluntas inefficax,' as it is called, not a will, but a would, is no purpose to do, and can be the cause of no crime; especially being about things past, and qualified with an impossible condition, if things already done were to do, which is altogether impossible, that a deed done can return to have a new being, and so to be done. And even there is some presumption of that mistake may be in this, from the place libelled, in which it is alledged to have been spoken, it being such as it is not improbable, that men may be very apt to fall both in judgment and memory, and so both wrong themselves and misconstrue others. And as for the aggravations that follow, that by speaking these words the defender took upon him by outward success, to give judgment upon the secret counsel of the Almighty: 1. As it is in no wise true that the defender spoke any of the words libelled; so this does, as he humbly conceives, in no wise follow upon the words immediately going before, alledged spoken in Mastertonne's, viz. that the defender owned what he had done, or would do the same if it were to do again; for that is not any judgment given of any hidden counsels of the Lord's, but an expression at most of his own actions. And as for the words before these, albeit he had been so presumptuous as to say them, as he blesses the Lord he never was, yet it is not libelled, that any thing that is therein alledged to have been spoken, either at Innerary or London, was spoken, or inferred from Providence and success. For the defender blesses the Lord, he has been otherwise taught than to use, or rather to abuse so Turkish an argument, and which the Lord has by his majesty's happy restoration so signally refuted.

And as to the last aggravation that the defender thereby hardened others such as otherwise were not ill disposed, in their wicked courses towards his majesty; it is indeed a sad reflection upon others herein not called. However, 1. It is so general, both as to these others and their courses, that it cannot, and the defender hopes it shall have no weight; especially considering that, 2. The defender opposes his defences before alledged, against all the members of this Article; whereby it is clear, that as they are libelled, they can infer no such thing in respect of all which the defender ought to be, assoilzied also from this Article of the ditray.

As to the last Article, 1. It is not condescended under which of the acts of parliament libelled on, it is subsumed; and till then, it is ineptly libelled, and there can be no process thereupon. Moreover, the defender has the testimony of his own conscience, yea, and of an higher, that nothing libelled therein is true. Albeit if he had said, that the usurper's hazard was great from his majesty, and if his majesty's designs took effect they were ruined, the same were notorious truths, and it ought to have been so; that is, it ought to be, and it was good, they were in hazard from his majesty's designs; and it was most just that his majesty's designs should take effect to their ruin. And what crime could be in so saying, he cannot apprehend: however, he never spoke any such words to Cromwell or Ireton, which Ireton he never saw with his eyes; and did far more abhor the least thought of giving counsel to challenge, or question his late majesty upon his precious life; and his innocency shall rest confident, absolutely to deny the same.

And as to the last part of this Article, whereby it is libelled, that in anno 1649, in face of the parliament then sitting, he told, that the usurper Cromwell had told him, that England and Scotland would never be at peace till the king were put to death; the defender adheres, as to this part, to the general exception against all this Article.

That it is not condescended under which of the acts of parliament libelled on it is subsumed, till which be done, there can be no process; and if it be intended that it be subsumed under the 43d Act, 2 Parl. Jam. 1, and the 134th Act, Parl. 1, and 10th Act and 10th Parl. and 205th Act, 14th Parl. K. Jam. 6, all these acts, as both by their titles and tenours, and by Skeine in his index on the words leasing-makers, appears; and it seems by their conjunction in this libel, they are understood also therein of lying and slandering his majesty and his progenitors: and the words libelled, though very horrid, yet seem to be of another nature. And 2. To that Act 205, Parl. 14. Jam. 6, whereon only any thing can be subsumed against him for concealing and not apprehending; 1. It is general as to the time when Cromwell should have told it to him, and therefore inept till the time be condescended on, which must be; especially seeing, if it be not condescended on to have been after the engagement was broken, nothing can be subsumed on the said act thereupon against the defender, nor on his not apprehending him; for he was not holden thereto by that act expressly, except (according to law) it had been in his power. But so it is, it is known, that at that time it was not in the power of the whole kingdom to apprehend him, whether his victory or strength he considered, or the kingdom's low and weak condition at that time, wherein they lay open to ruin by him, if the Lord had not restrained him more than their power could effectuate. And as to the concealing and not revealing, the defender ought to be assoilzied; because by the express words of the act, that revealing is declared to be such a revealing to some of his majesty's privy-council, or some under-officer, &c. as that there-through the authors of slanderous speeches may be called, tried, and punished: But that cannot be subsumed, except it were subsumed that the speeches were spoken before witness; otherwise could not have been proved, and without probation could not have been so urged, as that sentence could have been given thereupon, and the author punished according to the words of the act, which is also according to common law, and which is hereafter cleared. Like as if the words thereafter should have been found treasonable, and the defender not been found able to have proved them, he should have brought himself under the crime of treason, for accusing another of treason, and not being able to prove it, and therefore could not be holden so to do. As also, albeit the defender had heard any such words as is libelled, (which he altogether denies) and that before witness, yet through his revealing thereof, the author could not be tried or punished; for it is notoriously known, it was above the power of the kingdoms at that time, as is said, or for many years thereafter, to punish him; and therefore the defender's not revealing cannot be subsumed upon the said act of parliament, to infer the pain contained therein, or related unto.

Lastly, the pains of the said act, and other acts before-mentioned together therewith, is not the pain of treason, as has been oft before evinced; and therefore the defender cannot be convened for treason, or the pain thereof, upon the said acts, but ought to be assoilzied therefrom.

But if this member of this article be intended to be subsumed under the last part of the proposition of the Dittay, whereby it is alledged, that by common law and practice of this kingdom, all concealers and not revealers of any malicious purpose of putting violent hands on the sacred person of his majesty, or purposing of killing and putting him to death, are guilty of treason; the defender protesting his innocence in never concealing any such purpose, nor the words aforesaid libelled, which he abhors, he is so far from justifying thereof, judging the horrid murder of his majesty to have been the very ruin of our peace and happiness: Yet as to the relevancy of that part of the proposition, in so far as is founded upon common law and practice only, the defender, because of the preparative, repeats what was before alledged in the answer to the proposition, in that part thereof: And adds further, 'In crimine læsæ majestatis,' in the crime of lese majesty, 'Num sciens tractatum prodicionis contra principem vel patriam, et illum non relevans, sit puniendus poena mortis;' that is, whether he that knows a treaty about treason against his prince and country, he punishable by death. Clarus; l. 5. S. sus. pract. crim. quest. 57, says, that many hold he is punishable by death: And that Cognol, in his lib. Culpa caret F. de reg. juris num. 2. that it is the common opinion, citing Alciat. in lib. tacere F. de verb. sig. & m. l. bona fide num. 20. F. de poss. et in lib. 4. of Cato num. 30. F. de verb. oblig. related also by Gigas, de crimine læsæ majestatis fol. 180 num. 10. Roll. Cons. 88. num. 10. lib. 2. Carel. prac. crim. fol. 253. num. 29, saith, that all others follow this opinion. And Baldus cries out in one certain counsel, that because Bartol held otherwise, therefore his soul for that, as a crime, is tormented in hell. Where it is clear, that even by Clarus's acknowledgment, which is very high treason, is not treason, by the common opinion of the doctors, according as is asserted by the famous authors he cites, and whom he contradicts not therein. 2. And Clarus nothing contradicting, but this is the common opinion, albeit he be of another mind with Bartol, that it is capital to conceal, and not reveal, yet it is only in two cases; to wit, 'In tractatu qui fiat contra ejus personam vel statum;' that is, where he has been conscious to, and known any treaty or consultation against the prince's estate or person. But as for other causes, he holds expressly, that the concealer, and not revealer, is not punishable by death, in these words; 'In aliis autem casibus et si sint comprehensi in crimine læsæ majestatis non putarem esse puniendum pœna mortis subditum qui non revelaverit.' And that he counsels princes even in these cases, to use clemency and humanity, rather than severity; and to excuse their subjects upon any probable cause, from the pain of death. Whence, 3. It is alledged, even according to Clarus's opinion, concealing not relevant to infer the pain of death; except where the concealer has been conscious to, and heard some treaty, that is, deliberate consultation against the prince or his estate. But so it is, the words libelled, especially what is alledged to have been heard in parliament, 1649, seems not to import that, being, as would appear, but 'volitantia verba;' if any such thing had been heard, which the defender absolutely denies; and importing indeed the author Cromwell's thought or opinion, that there would be troubles still so long as his majesty (horrendum dictum) were not put to death. But Clarus, lib. 5. prax. crim. F. fin. num. 87. distinguishing betwixt 'cogitationem nudam,' a naked thought, and 'tractatum,' a treaty or consulting; he affirms that a naked or sole thought is not punishable in any crime, no, not in lese-majesty, except only heresy, when guilt is perfected in the mind. And thereafter, num. 2. he moves the question, 'Sed pone quis non steterit in meris terminis cogitationis, sed ulterius etiam processerit ad tractatum cum aliquo de ipso maleficio committendo.' But, says he, put the case that any has not contained himself within the bounds of a thought, but has proceeded further to treat with any for committing the crime, &c. thereby making a clear difference betwixt a clear, sole thought, and a treaty about committing the crime. Now the words, as they are libelled, do not import any treaty with any for committing that horrid murder; but the signification only of Cromwell's damnable thought, what might be the consequence of not taking the life of our dread sovereign.

And hence, 3. It will follow, that these words cannot be subsumed relevantly, under that part of the proposition of the libel; because that any sense these words seemed to have, as they are libelled, would appear only to import this naked thought of what might be the consequence of taking the life of our then dread sovereign, but no purpose of his to take the same. Neither could any presume, albeit his thought anent that consequence had been true, (as it is most contrary to the truth) that yet any man, in whom there had been the least sparkle of common reason, or conscience, would have purposed to commit, or committed one of the highest evils of sin, to evite though very great evils of punishment, it being a received rule among men, at least among Christian men, that the least of the evils of sin should not be committed, to evite the greatest of the evils of punishment.

4. Gomez, a most excellent lawyer, is clear in his third 'tom. variar. resolv. de crimine læsæ majestatis, num. 8.' that concealing even of treason, is only then punishable, when the concealer might prove it otherwise; not 'per text. leg. nostris, in fine cap. de calumniat. et L. quæ accus. capite, cap. de edendo;' whereby it is said, that whosoever counsels to accuse, should have his proofs ready, and who accuseth falsely shall be punished as the party accused would be, if the accusation were proved. Gomez citeth the canon law, Platina, Hippolatus, and others for their exception, which a fortiori holds in our law, whereby the 49th act parl. 11 Jam. 6. accusing any of treason, not being able to prove, so that the party accused be acquit, being so far reprobate by our law, that it is declared, that thereby the accuser shall incur the same crime of treason whereof he accused the other; is a sufficient warrant to the defender not to have revealed that of Cromwell, if there had been any such speech, as the defender never heard any such, except he had witness to have proved it; which neither is libelled, nor can be alledged, and therefore he ought also to be assolized therefrom.

5. All these laws anent concealing and not revealing, (as the defender humbly conceives) must be understood where the treason is privately plotted, and the execution thereof is carried on by secret conveyance, and which by revealing might be crushed and prevented. But it is notorious that the usurper, as he had the power of armed force, so he had the unparalleled boldness to carry on his execrable treason most openly; and that his power was such, as it was impossible for his majesty's poor subjects of this kingdom to resist (nor yet his majesty's other kingdoms, though far more powerful, and that many thousands of them from their souls abhorred the said act) or prevent and impede the same. And if the defender had heard any such words of the usurper (as he has just reason to deny he ever heard), whatever they should import; what probable reason might have been for not revealing it at that time, from the prevalency and power of that enemy, the condition of our poor country, and utter impossibility to bring him to punishment, beside the want of probation: and so what place there were to Clarus's counsel of humanity, the defender leaves to the commissioner's grace, and the honourable estates of parliament to judge.

6. Whatever relevancy there were in the defender's concealing, yet his acknowledgment thereof in parliament, 1649, as libelled non relevat, to infer or prove it. 1. Because a confession that prejudgeth a party must be prejudicial, that is, 'In judicio, idque utroque jure et civili et canonico;' as says Panormitan. C. ex parte decret. de confess. num. 16, that it must be in judgment in a process, wherein he who confesseth is convened, as is clear by Leg. 6. F. de confess. where the words are, 'Si dum quis convenitur, confiteatur;' that is, If any be convened, confess, &c. and Panormitan. dicto loco saith, That to the end a confession may prejudice him, who confesseth, it must be among other requisites, 'super re litigiosa,' that is, on any thing litigious, or any thing in dependance or process, per L. in confessionibus, F. de Interrog. ait; the words are, 'Confessionibus falsis respondentibus, ita obligantur, si ejus nomine de quo quis interrogatus sit, cum aliquo sit actio;' that is, any in making answer is obliged by false confessions, if there be any action or dependance against him, upon that whereupon he was interrogate and confessed: and Panormitan is express, ubi supra, That 'non valet confessio, facta coram Judice, tanquam in judicio, nisi Judex ad hoc sedeat, per Bartol. in lib. si confessus, F. de custod. reor.' That is, a confession is not valid, though made before a judge, as in judgment, except the judge be sitting on that business. Whence it is clear, that the acknowledgment libelled is no ways relevant to infer against the defender what is libelled to have been thereby acknowledged, except it were libelled, that he had been in judgment convened thereupon; or that there was a process depending against the said defender, wherein he had confessed what was libelled in judgment, and the parliament had been sitting on that process. But so it is, that neither is it, nor can be libelled, and therefore his naked acknowledgment not relevant; and in effect, if in any discourse before the parliament, any such word had escaped the defender, (which he in no wise acknowledges) yet that such a passing and indeliberate word should infer or prove a crime, or so high a crime against him, he is hopeful the honourable court of parliament will be very far from ever finding: For the very reason, why confession has so much weight, is because it is presumed that no man will confess against himself in judgment, that, whereupon he is convened and processed, without great deliberation: which holds not, if the acknowledgment be given out of any process, there being no dependent action or process upon the matter thereof. And therefore the defender is confident that he need not trouble the honourable court with more legal dispute against the relevancy of the alledged acknowledgment.

7. The words or acknowledgment libelled as spoken in parliament, 1649, can never be obtruded to the defender; nor that he was conscious to the counsel of that horrid murder of his late majesty: because it is notorious, and he offers to prove, if need be, that the whole members of the said parliament, 1649, and he himself, amongst others, in plain parliament, were purged by their solemn oaths of all knowledge of, or accession to that wicked design in relation to the king's majesty and house of parliament.

8. And yet he is so confident he never spake any such thing in parliament, that the day being condescended on, and dyet of sitting of parliament, as by all doctors is agreed it ought to be, then the defender offers to prove his alibi: he offers to prove, if need be, he was alibi all that dyet, and so not in parliament, where he is alleged to have spoken these words. And yet that the defender's innocency, as to the accession or knowledge of that horrid murder, may yet further appear, it is known to many persons, and to some of the members of this present parliament, that when Cromwell was in Scotland, A. D. 1650, notwithstanding it is known what malice he had to the defender at that time, in this particular he expressed himself concerning the 'marquis of Argyle,' 'That he thought him a man that had neither courage nor honour to have been upon such a business.' And the defender thanks God he had so much honour and honesty, as in no wise to be accessory thereunto, and to abhor the same.

9. The defender ought to be assoilzied from the two last Articles, as from all the other, from the year 1641, to his majesty's coming home to Scotland, A. D. 1650, because of the ratification and oblivion contained in his majesty's treaty at Breda, and most full and ample act of ratification and oblivion at St. Johnston and Sterling, A. D. 1650 and 1651.

And in regard the deeds libelled are either such as preceded the Treaty and Act of Oblivion in A. D. 1641, and were thereby pardoned and buried in oblivion; for such as intervened after the year 1641, before his majesty's home-coming, in the year 1650, during which time he is in his libel charged with several deeds which are irrelevant, and whereof the defender is most innocent. And for such public actings as the defender is charged with, and had accession to, the defender is also secured and pardoned by his majesty's treaty, and gracious condescendances at Breda, which was also thereafter ratified in parliament; or are deeds of necessary compliance, both for the public and self-preservation in that unhappy juncture. Which compliance, as it was sore against his inclination, if it had been in his power to have helped it, so it is not more than whole kingdoms did, and far less than many condescended to: It is in all humility expected, that the defender should not be brought under the compass of law for the same, which were as to make him the singular sufferer in so universal a guilt; so there can be no precedent therefore instanced, either out of scripture, or holy writ, the histories of our own, or of other nations, that a subject not having contributed to the said usurpation, but to his power resisted the same, when the said unjust usurpation prevailed, expelled the lawful magistrate, detained the unjust usurpation for many years, and tyrannized over the people when the lawful magistrate could not rule for the time, or protect or help; that the said subject for his compliance, and using endeavours for necessary, public, and self-preservation, should be indicted of so high a crime, is in all humility conceived without precedent or parallel, and quite contrary to the current of example and practice that may be from scripture and other histories adduced, and not so suitable to that goodness and natural clemency, whereof his majesty hath given so abundant proof to others, even the usurpers and invaders, and who aided and abetted them, without envy be it spoken; and which is not only most agreeable to his majesty's gracious inclination, but very suitable to that advice given by his royal father to him; in whose words, in one section, there are as follows, 'Your Prerogative is best shewed and exercised, in remitting, rather than in exacting the rigour of the law, than which nothing is worse.' In respect whereof, and of the defences above-mentioned, the defender ought to be assoilzied from this libel, and the whole articles therein contained*.

* The author of "An Apologetical Relation of the particular Sufferings of the faithful Ministry and Professors of the Church of Scotland, since August, 1660," in page 78, 79, 80, 81, and 82, gives the following account of the proceedings against this nobleman:

"This his compliance with them, at that time, by sitting in their judicatories, and their concurring with his advice and counsel, for the good of the land that was now under their feet, is the only particular ground upon which his sentence is founded; and the particular, special cause pretended, for which he was condemned to lose his head as a traitor, and to have his head put on the top of the Tollbooth as an eminent traitor. A sentence which, questionless, at first view, may make all men of understanding astonished, and to wonder how ever it could have entered into the mind of the parliament of Scotland, to sentence unto death such a peer of the land, such an useful member of the kingdom, and an ornament, upon such a ground, and for such a cause. But if these four particulars be considered, the matter will yet appear more wonderful.

"1. The matter of compliance with the English at that time, was so far from being accounted treasonable, that several of the lawyers, (among whom was one sir John Fletcher, who was now advanced to be his majesty's advocate, and did accuse this worthy nobleman of treason) did swear and subscribe an oath, to be faithful unto the government, as it was then established, without king and house of lords. Now if there had been treason really in this deed, either by the civil law, or by the municipal laws of the land, would not the lawyers have perceived it, whose daily work and study the laws are?

The Proceedings hereupon are thus related by bishop Burnet in his History of his own Times, vol. I. p. 122, &c.

"He hath council assigned him, who performed their part very well; the Marquis made a long speech himself, wherein he chiefly in-

"2. If this had been the deed of this nobleman alone, the matter had been less to have been wondered at; but it being such a deed whereof few of the nobles of Scotland were altogether free, yea, whereof many of the members of parliament his judges were guilty, the matter is beyond a parallel. It is hard to make socios criminis sit as judges, and condemn the accused; reason would require that the table should be purged. Is it not strange for a Parliament to condemn one for such a fault, in which many of their own members might with as much justice and equity be condemned? And is it not strange, how they being, by their own confession, traitors in the highest degree, could sit and judge others? It is true, it will be replied, that his majesty might pardon whom he pleased: but then it will evidently appear, that not this, but something else was the cause of this worthy nobleman's death. Whatever may be said in point of law, yet it will be a dispute in point of conscience, If kings may pardon such crimes as do deserve death by the law of God, or if such crimes which kings may pardon, of their own accord, and according to their own good pleasure, do before the Lord deserve death?

"3. If the parliament had thought this particular worthy to bear so much stress, why would they have spent so much of their time in searching for other grounds to go upon? and why did they not make use of this at the first? But it is like this had never once been mentioned, if they had been able to fasten treason upon any other of his actions. And this makes it so much the more to be wondered at, that they would condemn such a nobleman for such a particular, which they would never once have named, if they could have done their intended work otherwise.

"4. Is it not strange, that of all the compliers of Scotland, there was not one, except this nobleman, impannelled upon this account, much less put to death; yea, is it not strange that those noblemen were never once questioned, who being desired by general Monk, when he was entering England with his army to encounter Lambert, did abjure king Charles and his interest, and this nobleman must die? Yea, is it not yet more strange that one William Purves, who by complying had occasioned almost ruin to many noblemen, burghs and gentlemen, should have been absolved by act of parliament, as might be cleared, if there were a table of the unprinted acts set down after their acts, as is done always in other parliaments, and yet this nobleman must be sentenced to death, for complying for the good of the country?

sisted, that during the late wars he was but one among a great many more: he had always acted by authority of parliament, and according to the instructions that were given him, as oft as he was sent on any expedition or negotiation. As to all things done before the year 1641, the late king had buried them in an act of oblivion then passed, as the present king had also done in the year 1651: so he did not think he was bound to answer to any particular before that time. For the second head, he was at London when most of the barbarities set out in it were committed: nor did it appear that he gave any orders about them. It was well known that great outrages had been committed by the Mac Donalds: and he believed his people, when they had the better of them, had taken cruel revenges: This was to be imputed to the heat of the time, and to the tempers of the people, who had been much provoked by the burning of his whole country, and by much blood that was shed. And as to many stories laid to the charge of his men, he knew some of them were mere forgeries, and others were aggravated much beyond the truth: but, what truth soever might be in them, he could not be answerable but for what was done by himself or by his orders. As to the third head, of his compliance with the usurpation, he had stood out till the nation was quite conquered: and in that case it was the received opinion both of divines and lawyers, that men might lawfully submit to an usurpation, when forced to it by an inevitable necessity. It was the epidemical sin of the nation. His circumstances were such, that more than a bare compliance was required of him. What he did that way was only to preserve himself and his family, and was not done on design to oppose the king's interest. Nor did his service suffer by any thing he did—This was the substance of his defence in a long speech, which he made with so good a grace and so skilfully, that his character was as much raised as his family suffered by the prosecution. In one speech, excusing his compliance with Cromwell, he said, what could he think of that matter, after a man so eminent in the law as his Majesty's advocate

“ But to speak unto the business in point of law, let these four or five particular Quæres be considered, and then any shall be able to perceive the iniquity of this sentence.

“ 1. By what act of parliament is such a deed as this condemned as treasonable? By what municipal law can any member of the kingdom be challenged upon the account of treason, for treating with a conqueror for life and liberty: and for sitting in his counsels for the good of the country, after that he, with the rest of the body of the land, had fought in the defence of the king and country till no more could be done; after the whole land had been overcome in several battles, and wholly overrun: and had acted nothing for the advantage of the enemy, and disadvantage of the king and country, before the victory obtained; but in all points had carried as became a loyal subject, contributing all the help by arms and counsel which was required? What act of parliament declareth such a deed as this treasonable, and such a subject to deserve death as a traitor?

“ 2. Was there ever such a practice in Scotland since ever there was a king in it? Several times was the kingdom of Scotland over-run by the kingdom of England, particularly in the days of Baliol, and at that time king Edward caused the nobles of Scotland to swear allegiance unto him. But when Bruce came to be king, was there any of the nobles questioned for treason upon that account? And seeing there can no instance be produced out of the History of Scotland, since ever it was a kingdom, that any subject, nobleman or other, was accused of high-treason, for such a cause, surely this nobleman's case is unparalleled.

3. Is not this strange, considering what the principle of royalists is? They say, That conquest giveth a just title to a crown; so sayeth D. Ferne, Arnisaus, and Maxwell, in his Sacro Sancto Regum Majestas, c. 17. And by this principle Cromwell was the lawful supreme governor of the kingdom of Scotland, and had just title and right to the crown thereof, having now conquered the same. And if this principle of theirs be truth (which is much questioned by their opposites), no compliance with him could, by any law in the world, be treason against any prince whatsoever; for obedience unto, and concurrence with a lawful supreme magistrate, can be treason against no man living: How then could this nobleman be challenged upon the account of treason for compliance? Let all the royalists answer this, without contradicting themselves, if they can.

“ 4. Is there any lawyer who can produce such a definition of treason against a prince, or a supreme magistrate, out of the civil law, as will condemn the deed of this worthy nobleman, and make compliance with a conqueror for the good and safety of the country, after all means of defence are broken and lost, an act of treason? And since the civil law can condemn no such deed as treasonable, the sentence given out against this nobleman must be without all warrant of law.

“ 5. Are there not many countries, kingdoms and cities that have been over-run by their enemies, and have had their own lawful governors put from them, and so have been forced to live under the feet of strangers? And hath it not been usual for them to comply with such as had the present power in their hand, for their own safety and the good of the place? And was it ever yet heard, that such were accused and condemned of treason against their own lawful governors, thrust from them sore against their wills, for any such compliance? And is it not wonderful that this eminent nobleman should become a preparative to all the world.”

had taken the engagement? This inflamed the other so much, that he called him an impudent villain; and was not so much as chid for that barbarous treatment. Lord Argyle gravely said he had learned in his affliction to bear reproaches; but if the parliament saw no cause to condemn him, he was less concerned at the king's advocate's railing. The king's advocate put in an additional article, of charging him with accession to the king's death, for which all the proof he offered lay in a presumption: Cromwell had come down to Scotland with his army in September 1648, and at that time he had many and long conferences with Argyle; and immediately upon his return to London the treaty with the king was broken off, and the king was brought to his Trial: the advocate from thence inferred, that it was to be presumed that Cromwell and Argyle had concerted that matter between them. While this process was carried on, which was the solemnest that ever was in Scotland, the lord Lorn continued at court soliciting for his father; and obtained a letter to be writ by the king to the earl of Middleton, requiring him to order his advocate not to insist on any public proceedings before the indemnity he himself had passed in the year 1651. He also required him, when the trial was ended, to send up the whole process, and lay it before the king, before the parliament should give sentence. The earl of Middleton submitted to the first part of this: So all farther enquiry into those matters was superseded. But as to the second part of the letter, it looked so like a distrust of the justice of the parliament, that he said, he durst not let it be known, till he had a second and more positive order, which he earnestly desired might not be sent; for it would very much discourage this loyal and affectionate parliament: and he begged earnestly to have that order recalled; which was done. For some time there was a stop to the proceedings, in which lord Argyle was contriving an escape out of the castle. He kept his bed for some days: and his lady being of the same stature with himself, and coming to him in a chair, he had put on her clothes, and was going into the chair: but he apprehended he should be discovered, and his execution hastened; and so his heart failed him. The earl of Middleton resolved, if possible, to have the king's death fastened on him. By this means as he would die with the more infamy, so he reckoned this would put an end to the family, since no body durst move in favour of the son of one judged guilty of that crime. And he, as was believed, hoped to obtain a grant of his estate. Search was made into all the precedents of men, who had been at any time condemned upon presumption. And the earl of Middleton resolved to argue the matter himself, hoping that the weight of his authority would bear down all opposition. He managed it indeed with more force than decency: he was too vehement, and maintained the argument with a strength that did more honour to his parts than to his justice or his character. But Gilmore, though newly made president of the session, which is the supreme court of justice in that kingdom, abhorred the precedent of attainting a man upon so remote a presumption; and looked upon it as less justifiable than the much decreed attainder of the earl of Strafford. So he undertook the argument against Middleton: they replied upon one another thirteen or fourteen times in a debate that lasted many hours. Gilmore had so clearly the better of the argument, that though the parliament was so set against Argyle that every thing was like to pass that might blacken him, yet, when it was put to the vote, he was acquitted as to that by a great majority: at which he expressed so much joy, that he seemed little concerned at any thing that could happen to him after that. All that remained was to make his compliance with the usurpers appear to be treason. The debate was like to have lasted long. The earl of Lowdon, who had been lord chancellor, and was counted the eloquentest man of that time, for he had a copiousness in speaking that was never exhausted, (he was come of his family and was his particular friend,) had prepared a long and learned argument on that head. He had gathered the opinions both of divines and lawyers, and had laid together a great deal out of history, more particularly out of the Scottish history, to shew that it had never been censured as a crime: but that on the contrary in all their confusions the men, who had merited the most of the crown in all its shakings, were persons who had got credit by compliance with the side that prevailed, and by that means had brought things about again. But, while it was doubtful how it would have gone, Monk, by an inexcusable baseness, had searched among his letters, and found some that were writ by Argyle to himself, that were hearty and zealous on their side. These he sent down to Scotland. And after they were read in parliament, it could not be pretended that his compliance was feigned, or extorted from him. Every body blamed Monk for sending these down, since it was betraying the confidence, that they then lived in. They were sent by an express, and came to the earl of Middleton after the parliament was engaged in the debate. So he ordered the letters to be read. This was much blamed, as contrary to the forms of justice, since probation was closed on both sides. But the reading of them silenced all farther debate. All his friends went out: And he was condemned as guilty of treason. The marquis of Montrose only refused to vote. He owned, he had too much resentment to judge in that matter. It was designed he should be hanged, as the marquis of Montrose had been: But it was carried that he should be beheaded, and that his head should be set up where lord Montrose's had been set. He received his sentence decently, and composed himself to suffer.

"The day before his death he wrote to the king, justifying his intentions in all he had acted in the matter of the covenant: he protested his innocence, as to the death of the late king: he submitted patiently to his sentence, and wished the king a long and happy reign: he cast his family and children upon his mercy; and prayed that they might not suffer for their father's fault."

On the 27th of May, the day appointed for his execution, he came to the scaffold in a very solemn but undaunted manner, accompanied with many of the nobility and some ministers, when he spake as follows:

"Many will expect that I speak many things, and according to their several opinions and dispositions, so will their expectations be from me, and constructions of me; but I resolve to disappoint many, for I come not hither to justify myself, but the Lord, who is holy in all his ways, and righteous in all his works, holy and blessed is his name; neither come I to condemn others: I know many will expect that I will speak against the hardness of the sentence pronounced against me; but I will say nothing to it. I bless the Lord, I pardon all men, as I desire to be pardoned of the Lord myself: let the will of the Lord be done; That is all that I desire.

"I hope ye will have more charity to me now, than ye would have had at another time, seeing I speak before the Lord, to whom I must give an account very shortly. I know very well that my words have had but very little weight with many: and that many have mistaken my words and actings both: many have thought me to be a great enemy to these great works, that have of late been brought to pass. But do not mistake me, good people: I speak it in the presence of the Lord, I entered not upon the work of reformation with any design of advantage to myself, or prejudice to the king and his government; as my latter will which was written 1655, and thereafter delivered to a friend (in whose hands it still remaineth) can show. As for these calumnies, that have gone abroad of me, I bless God, I know them to be no more: and as I go to make a reckoning to my God, I am free as to any of these, concerning the king's person or government. I was real and cordial in my desires to bring the king home, and in my endeavours for him when he was at home, and I had no correspondence with the adversaries army, nor any of them, in the time when his majesty was in Scotland; nor had I any accession to his late majesty's horrid and execrable murder, by counsel or knowledge of it, or any other manner of way. This is a truth, as I shall answer to my Judge. And all the time his majesty was in Scotland, I was still endeavouring his advantage; my conscience beareth me witness in it. So much to that particular. And (turning about, he said) I hope, gentlemen, you will all remember these.

"I confess, many look on my condition as a suffering condition: but I bless the Lord, that he that hath gone before me, hath trod the wine-press of the Father's wrath; by whose sufferings, I hope that my sufferings shall not be eternal. I bless him that hath taken away the sting of my sufferings: I may say that my charter was sealed to-day; for the Lord hath said to me, Son, be of good cheer, thy sins are freely forgiven thee: and so I hope my sufferings shall be very easy. And ye know the Scripture saith, the captain of our salvation was made perfect by sufferings.

"I shall not speak much to these things for which I am condemned, lest I seem to condemn others: it is well known, it is only for compliance, which was the epidemical fault of the nation. I wish the Lord to pardon them: I say no more.

"There was an expression in these papers presented by me to the parliament, of the contagion of these times; which may by some be misconstrued, as if I intended to lay an imputation upon the work of reformation: but I declare that I intended no such thing; but only related to the corruptions and failings of men, occasioned by the prevailing of the usurping powers. (At this he turned and took them all witnesses.)

"Now, Gentlemen, concerning the nation, I think there are three sorts of people that take up much of the world and of this nation. There is, 1. The openly prophane: and truly I may say, though I have been a prisoner, I have not had mine ears shut: I hear assuredly, that drinking, swearing, whoring were never more common, never more countenanced than now they are. Truly, if magistrates were here I would say to them, if they lay forth their power for glorifying of God, by restraining this, they should fare the better; if they continue in not restraining, they shall fare the worse. I say no more, but either let people shun prophanity and magistrates restrain it, or assuredly the wrath of God shall follow on it. 2. Others were not openly prophane (every one will not allow that) but yet they are Gallios in the matter: if matters go well as to their private interest, they care not whether the church of God sink or swim. But whatever they think, God hath laid engagements upon Scotland: we are tied by covenants to religion and reformation: these that were then unborn are yet engaged; and in our baptism we are engaged to it. And it passeth the power of all the magistrates under heaven to absolve them from the Oath of God: they deceive themselves, and it may be would deceive others that think otherwise. But I would caveat this, people will be ready to think this a kind of instigation to rebellion in me; but they are very far wrong that think religion and loyalty are not well consistent. Whoever they be that separate them, religion is not to be blamed, but they. It is true, it is the duty of every Christian to be loyal, yet I think the orders of things are to be observed as well as their natures; the order of religion as well as the nature of it. Religion must not be the cock-boat, it must be the ship. God must have what is his, as well as Caesar what is his: and those are the best subjects that are the best Christians. And that I am looked on as a friend to reformation, is my glory.

"3. There is another sort that are truly Godly: and to them I must say what I fear, and every one hath reason to fear (it's good to fear evil.) It's true the Lord may prevent it; but if he do not (and truly I cannot foresee any probability of it) times are like either to be very sinning or very suffering times; and let christians make their choice: there is a sad dilemma in the business, sin or suffer; and surely, he that would chuse the better part would chuse to suffer. Others that will chuse to sin, shall not escape suffering; they shall suffer, but it may be, not as I do (pointing and turning about to the maiden) but worse: mine is but temporal, theirs shall be eternal; when I shall be singing, they shall be howling. Beware therefore of sin whatever you are aware of, especially in such times.

"Yet I cannot say of my own condition, but that the Lord in his providence hath mind of mercy to me, even in this world: for if I had been more favourably dealt with, I fear I might have been overcome with temptations, as many others are, and many more I fear will be; and so should have gone out of the world with a more polluted conscience, than through the mercy of God now I have. And hence my condition is such now, as when I am gone, will be seen not to have been such as many imagined. It is fit God take me away, before I fall into these temptations that I see others are falling into, and many others I fear will fall: I wish the Lord may prevent it. Yet blessed be his name, that I am kept both from present evils and evils to come. (Here he turned about a little and spoke some words to Mr. Hutchison, when turning again to the people, he spoke as followeth.) Some may expect I will regret my own condition: but truly I neither grudge nor repine, nor desire any revenge. And I declare I do not repent my last going up to London; for I had always rather have suffered any thing, than to lie under reproaches as I did. I desire not that the Lord should judge any man; nor do I judge any but myself: I wish, as the Lord hath pardoned me, so he may pardon them for this and other things; and what they have done to me, may never meet them in their accounts. I have no more to say, but to beg the Lord, that when I go away, he would bless every one that stayeth behind."

(His last words, immediately before he laid his head on the block, after his doublet was off, were these.) "I desire you, gentlemen, all that hear me this day to take notice (and I wish that all who see me might hear me) that now when I am entering into eternity, and am to appear before my Judge; and as I desire salvation, and do expect eternal salvation and happiness from him, from my birth to my scaffold, I am free from any accession by my knowledge, concerning counsel or any other way to his late Majesty's death: and I pray the Lord to preserve his present Majesty, and to pour his best blessings on his person and government; and the Lord give him good and faithful counsellors." (Turning about to his friends, he said,) Many christians may stumble at this, and my friends may be discontented; but when things are rightly considered, my friends have no discredit of me, nor christians no stumbling-block, rather an engagement.

When he had done speaking he took his leave of his friends very decently, and after some time spent in his private devotions, he was beheaded.*

* "The public hatred which he had incurred while alive, was converted into general commiseration at his death. His attainder was justly imputed to the enmity, his precipitate death to the impatience and insatiate desire of Middleton to procure a gift of his titles and estate; and as it generally happens wheresoever a statesman suffers, whether from national justice or revenge, his execution served to exalt, and to relieve his character, from the obloquy which would have continued to attend him, had he been permitted to survive. His letters to Monk are lost, and the records of his trial have been carefully destroyed. But we discover from Thurloe's papers, that he was obnoxious to Cromwell and to Monk himself, as a suspected royalist; and that he was excluded during the usurpation, from employment or trust. Under a jealous usurpation, professions of the most zealous attachment were requisite for the preservation of a suspected royalist; and we must conclude that the letters employed for his destruction were necessary to appease the suspicions or the resentment of Monk. His original share, as a chief instrument in the Civil Wars, of which he was not convicted, is represented as some apology for the sentence on which he was executed; but the apology becomes the more dangerous as a pretext that is never wanting for judicial murder. Originally driven into rebellion, by an insidious plan to invade his country, and to deprive him of a large part of his estate, he incurred the imputation of whatever violent measures it was necessary to tolerate, or impossible to prevent. But his character, impartially examined, was that of a better patriot than a subject, more attached to the national religion than to the interests of the crown. His ambition was regulated by habitual prudence, penetration, experience, and consummate address; but his sagacity was not always exempt from enthusiasms; his prudence was apt to degenerate into craft, and the apprehensions which his subtle dexterity excited, occasioned his destruction. His services in the recall of Charles to Scotland, deserved a better fate; but his enemies were disappointed by Lauderdale's intercession, and his son was afterwards restored to a part of his titles, and to the possession of his estates." 4 Laing, 16.

"The marquis of Argyle (without mentioning of whom there can hardly be any mention of Scotland) though he was not of this fraternity, yet thought he could tell as fair a story for himself as any of the rest, and contribute as much to the king's absolute power in Scotland. And therefore he had no sooner unquestionable notice of the king's being in London, but he made haste thither with as much confidence as the rest. But the Commissioners who were before him wrought so far with the king, that in the very minute of his arrival he was arrested by a warrant under the king's hand, and carried to the Tower, upon a Charge of High Treason. He was a man like Drances in Virgil,

'Largus opum, et lingua melior, sed frigida bello
'Dextera, consiliis habitus non futilis auctor,
'Seditione potens.'

"Without doubt he was a person of extraordinary cunning, well bred; and though by the ill-placing of his eyes, he did not appear with any great advantage at first sight, yet he reconciled even those who had aversion to him very strangely by a little conversation: Inasmuch as after so many repeated indignities (to say no worse) which he had put upon the late king, and when he had continued the same affronts to the present king, by hindering the Scots from inviting him, and as long as was possible kept him from being received by them; when there was no remedy, and that he was actually landed, no man paid him so much reverence and outward respect, and gave so good an example to all others, with what veneration their king ought to be treated, as the marquis of Argyle did, and in a very short time made himself agreeable and acceptable to him. His wit was pregnant, and his humour gay and pleasant, except he liked not the company or the argument. And though he never consented to any one thing of moment, which the king asked of him, and even in those seasons in which he was used with most rudeness by the clergy, and with some barbarity by his son the lord Lorne, whom he had made captain of his majesty's guard, to guard him from his friends and from all who he desired should have access to him; the marquis still had that address, that he persuaded him all was for the best. When the other faction prevailed, in which there were likewise crafty managers, and that his counsels were commonly rejected, he carried himself so, that they who hated him most were willing to compound with him, and that his majesty should not withdraw his countenance from him. But he continued in all his charges, and had a very great party in that parliament that was most devoted to serve the king; so that his majesty was often put to desire his help to compass what he desired. He did heartily oppose the king's marching with his army into England, the ill success whereof made many men believe afterwards, that he had more reasons for the counsels he gave, than they had who were of another opinion. And the king was so far from thinking him his enemy, that when it was privately proposed to him by those he trusted most, that he might be secured from doing hurt when the king was marched into England, since he was so much against it; his majesty would by no means consent to it, but parted with him very graciously, as with one he expected good service from. All which the Commissioners well remembered, and were very unwilling that he should be again admitted into his presence, to make his own excuses for any thing he could be charged with. And his behaviour afterwards, and the good correspondence he had kept with Cromwell, but especially some confident averments of some particular words or actions which related to the murder of his father, prevailed with his majesty not to speak with him, which he laboured by many addresses, in petitions to the king and letters to some of those who were trusted by him, which were often presented by his wife and his son, and in which he only desired 'to speak with the king' or with some of those lords,' pretending 'that he should inform and communicate somewhat that would highly concern his majesty's service.' But the king not vouchsafing to admit him to his presence, the English lords had no mind to have any conference with a man who had so dark a character, or to meddle in an affair that must be examined and judged by the laws of Scotland: And so it was resolved, that the marquis of Argyle should be sent by sea into Scotland, to be tried before the parliament there when the Commissioner should arrive, who was dispatched thither with the rest of the lords, as soon as the seals and other badges of their several offices could be prepared.

"As soon as the parliament was convened at Edinburgh, and the Commissioner found the temper of them to be such as he could wish, the marquis of Argyle (who had been sent by sea from the Tower of London to Leith) was brought to his trial upon many articles of treason and murder; wherein all his confederacies with Cromwell were laid open, and much insisted upon to prove his being privy to the resolution of taking the king's life, and advising it: and though there was great reason to suspect it, and most men believed it, the proofs were not clear enough to convict him. But then the evidence was so full and clear of so many horrid murders committed by his order upon persons in his displeasure, and his immediate possessing himself of their estates, and other monstrous and unheard of acts of oppression; that the parliament condemned him to be hanged upon a gallows of an unusual height, and in or near the place where he had caused the marquis of Montrose to be formerly executed: all which was performed the same day with the universal joy of the people; the unfortunate person himself shewing more resolution and courage than was expected from him, and expressing much affection and zeal for the Covenant, for which he desired all men should believe he was put to death. There was likewise one seditious preacher, Gilaspy, who had been a notorious and malicious rebel against the last and the present king, underwent the same trial and judgment, with the same faith in the Covenant, and without shew of repentance. And it was much wondered at, that no more of that tribe, which had kindled the fire that had almost burned two kingdoms, and never had endeavoured to extinguish it, were ever brought to justice; and that the lives of two men should be thought a sufficient sacrifice for that kingdom to offer for all the mischief it had done." Clarendon.

Other Criminal Proceedings in Scotland soon afterwards followed, of which the following mention is made by Burnet and Laing:

"In August, 1660, the earl of Glencairn was sent down to Scotland, and had orders to call together the Committee of Estates. This was a practice begun in the late times: when the parliament made a recess, they appointed some of every state to sit, and to act as a Council of State in their name till the next session; for which they were to prepare matters, and to which they gave an account of their proceedings. When the parliament of Sterling was adjourned, the king being present, a Committee had been named: so, such of these as were yet alive were summoned to meet, and to see to the quiet of the nation, till the parliament should be brought together; which did not meet before January. On the day in which the Committee met, ten or twelve of the Protestant Ministers met likewise at Edinburgh, and had before them a warm paper prepared by one Guthery, one of the violentest ministers of the whole party. In it, after some cold compliment to the king upon his Restoration, they put him in mind of the Covenant which he had so solemnly sworn while among them: they lamented that, instead of pursuing the ends of it in England, as he had sworn to do, he had set up the Common Prayer in his chapel, and the order of bishops: upon which they made terrible denunciations of heavy judgments from God on him, if he did not stand to the Covenant, which they called the oath of God. The earl of Glencairn had notice of this meeting: and he sent and seized on them together with this remonstrance. The paper was voted scandalous and seditious: and the ministers were all clapt up in prison, and were threatened with great severities. Guthery was kept still in prison, who had brought the others together: but the rest after a while's imprisonment were let go. Guthery, being minister of Sterling while the king was there, had let fly at him in his Sermons in a most indecent manner; which at last became so intolerable, that he was cited to appear before the king to answer for some passages in his Sermons: he would not appear, but declined the king and his council, who, he said, were not proper judges of matters of doctrine, for which he was only accountable to the judicatories of the Kirk. He also protested for remedy of law against the king, for thus disturbing him in the exercise of his ministry. This personal affront had irritated the king more against him, than against any other of the party. And it was resolved to strike a terror into them all, by making an example of him. He was a man of courage, and went through all his trouble with great firmness. But this way of proceeding struck the whole party with such a consternation, that it had all the effect which was designed by it: for whereas the pulpits had, to the great scandal of religion, been places where the preachers had for many years vented their spleen and arraigned all proceedings, they became now more decent, and there was a general silence every where with relation to the affairs of state: only they could not hold from many sly and secret insinuations, as if the ark of God was shaking, and the glory departing. A great many offenders were summoned, at the king's suit, before the Committee of Estates, and required to give bail, that they should appear at the opening of the parliament, and answer to what should be then objected to them. Many saw, the design of this was to fright them into a composition, and also into a concurrence with the measures that were to be taken. For the greater part they complied, and redeemed themselves from farther vexation by such presents as they were able to make. And in these transactions Primerose and Fletcher were the great dealers."

"A few days after Argyle, Guthery suffered. He was accused of accession to the remonstrance when the king was in Scotland, and for a book he had printed with the title of "The Causes of God's Wrath upon the Nation;" in which the treating with the king, the tendering him the Covenant, and the admitting him to the exercise of the government, were highly aggravated, as great acts of apostacy. His declining the king's authority to judge of his Sermons, and his protesting for remedy of law against him, and the late seditious paper that he was drawing others to concur in, were the matters objected to him. He was a resolute and stiff man: so when his lawyers offered him legal defences, he would not be advised by them, but resolved to take his own way. He confessed, and justified all that he had done, as agreeing to the principles and practices of the Kirk, who had asserted all along that the doctrine delivered in their Sermons did not fall under the cognisance of the temporal courts, till it was first judged by the church: for which he brought much tedious proof. He said, his protesting for remedy of law against the king was not meant at the king's person, but was only with relation to costs and damages. The earl of Middleton had a personal animosity against him; for in the late times he had excommunicated him: so his eagerness in the prosecution did not look well. The defence he made signified nothing to justify himself, but laid a great load on Presbytery; since he made it out beyond all dispute, that he had acted upon their principles, which made them the more odious, as having among them some of the worst maxims of the Church of Rome; that in particular, to make the pulpit a privileged place, in which a man might safely vent treason, and be secure in doing it, if the Church judicatory should agree to acquit him. So upon this occasion great advantage was taken, to shew how near the spirit that had reigned in Presbytery came up to Popery. It was resolved to make a public example of a preacher: so he was singled out. He gave no advantage to those who wished to have saved him by the least step towards any submission, but much to the contrary. Yet, though all people were disgusted at the earl of Middleton's eagerness in the prosecution, the earl of Tweeddale was the only man that moved against the putting him to death. He said, banishment had been hitherto the severest censure that had been laid on the preachers for their opinions: he knew Guthry was a man apt to give personal provocation: and he wished that might not have too great a share in carrying the matter so far. Yet he was condemned to die. I saw him suffer. He was so far from shewing any fear, that he rather expressed a contempt of death. He spoke an hour upon the ladder, with the composure of a man that was delivering a Sermon rather than his last words. He justified all he had done, and exhorted all people to adhere to the Covenant, which he magnified highly. With him one Gouan was also hanged, who had deserted the army while the king was in Scotland, and had gone over to Cromwell. The man was inconsiderable, till they made him more considered by putting him to death on such an account at so great a distance of time.

"The gross iniquity of the court appeared in nothing more eminently than in the favour shewed Maccloud of Assin, who had betrayed the marquis of Montrose, and was brought over upon it. He in prison struck up to a high pitch of vice and impiety, and gave great entertainments: and that, notwithstanding the baseness of the man and of his crimes, begot him so many friends, that he was let go without any censure. The proceedings against Wariston were soon dispatched, he being absent. It was proved, that he had presented the Remonstrance, that he had acted under Cromwell's authority, and had sat as a peer in his parliament, that he had confirmed him in his Protectorship, and had likewise sat as one of the Committee of Safety: so he was attainted. Swintoun had been attainted in the parliament at Sterlin for going over to Cromwell: So he was brought before the parliament to hear what he could say, why the sentence should not be executed. He was then become a Quaker; and did, with a sort of eloquence that moved the whole house, lay out all his own errors, and the ill spirit he was in when he committed the things that were charged on him, with so tender a sense, that he seemed as one indifferent what they should do with him: And, without so much as moving for mercy, or even for a delay, he did so effectually prevail on them, that they recommended him to the king, as a fit object of his mercy. This was the more easily consented to by the earl of Middleton, in hatred to the earl of Lauderdale, who had got the gift of his estate. He had two great pleas in law: The one was, that the record of his attainder at Sterlin, with all that had passed in that parliament, was lost: The other was, that by the act rescissory that parliament being annulled, all that was done by it was void: But he urged neither, since there was matter enough to attaint him anew, if the defects of that supposed attainder had been observed. So till the act of indemnity was passed he was still in danger, having been the man of all Scotland that had been the most trusted and employed by Cromwell: But upon passing the act of indemnity he was safe." Burnet, 126.

"One of the first things that was done in this session of parliament 1663, was the execution of my unfortunate uncle, Warriston. He was so disordered both in body and mind, that it was a reproach to a government to proceed against him: His memory was so gone, that he did not know his own children. He was brought before the parliament, to hear what he had to say, why his execution should not be awarded. He spoke long, but in a broken and disordered strain, which his enemies fancied was put on to create pity. He was sentenced to die. His deportment was unequal, as might be expected from a man in his condition. Yet when the day of his execution came, he was very serene. He was chearful, and seemed fully satisfied with his death. He read a speech twice over on the scaffold, that to my knowledge he composed himself, in which he justified all the proceedings in the covenant, and asserted his own sincerity; but condemned his joining with Cromwell and the sectaries, though even in that his intentions had been sincere, for the good of his country, and the security of religion. Lord Lauderdale had lived in great friendship with him: But he saw the king was so set against him, that he, who at all times took more care of himself than of his friends; would not in so critical a time seem to favour a man, whom the Presbyterians had set up as a sort of an idol among them, and on whom they did depend more than on any other man then alive." Burnet, 203.

"The next after Argyle was Guthry, a clergyman accused of framing or promoting the western remonstrance, and of protesting against the authority of the king, or the interposition of the council, in ecclesiastical affairs. To decline the authority of either was treason, but the punishment, from its undue severity, had never been inflicted; and the offence itself, if aggravated by the violence of his publications, was extenuated, and ought to have been obliterated, at the distance of ten years, by his resolute opposition to the usurper's government. But his real crimes were a sentence of excommunication which he had formerly pronounced against the commissioner, and the report of some personal indignities which he had offered to the king. His defence was firm, yet pronounced with such pathetic effect, that many withdrew from having any concern in his sentence or death. He was executed with an obscure deserver, and died with that unshaken fortitude and contempt of life which enthusiasm inspires. Rutherford was removed by an opportune death; Gillespie and other remonstrants were preserved by a confession of their guilt. Warriston, who had escaped to the continent, was attainted, and Swinton, who had turned quaker, acknowledged his offences with such ingenuous contrition, that he was recommended to mercy, but deprived of his estate." 4 Laing, 18.

"Johnston of Warriston, who had escaped to the continent, and had resided two years unmolested at Hamburgh, was discovered at Rouen on his removal to France, and delivered up to the resentment of the English court. When produced in the present parliament to receive sentence of death, his faculties were so much decayed, and his body so debilitated by age and sickness, or by the treacherous prescription of the king's physician,* that his incoherent defence afforded a subject of cruel derision to his enemies, and a melancholy spectacle to the compassion of his friends. His sentence in such a situation, was a reproach to government. Lauderdale durst not, however, protect a man whom the presbyterians revered, and against whom the king was personally exasperated. His faculties seemed to revive on the scaffold, where he spoke and suffered with devout enthusiasm. Among the presbyterians, his lengthened devotions, and zeal for the covenant, had procured a reputation of superior sanctity, which, as it was confirmed by martyrdom, is still preserved. But he was a man of more than common understanding or genius; of an active, violent, and disinterested spirit; of a quick and vivid invention; of an extensive and tenacious memory; incapable of repose; indefatigable in application; ever fertile in expedients; endowed with a vehement, prompt, and impressive elocution; and at a time when the nobility themselves were statesmen, his political talents raised him from an obscure advocate, to a level with the prime nobility in affairs of state."* 4 Laing, 35.

drained of sixty ounces of blood by Bates, author of the Elenchus Motuum, and successively physician to Cromwell and to Charles 2. Nor is it discountenanced by Bates's character, who permitted his friends to boast, after the restoration, that he had accelerated Cromwell's death by his prescriptions. Biographia Brit.
